the bank had received at the time the action arose and had realized, in pursuance of the letter of June 13, 1891, sums amounting to $83,000. They brought the action to recover the entire amount said to be due—some $145,000. The suit raised the question, Were they entitled to treat the sum they had received and realized of the so-called securities as not having been received at all, or were they entitled to recover in respect of the entire amount of their indebtedness? No such right as they alleged could possibly exist. The bargain was intelligible enough—namely, that an overdraft should be allowed, and that cheques, bills, and securities should be deposited to secure repayment. The intention of the parties was made still more clear by the postscript to the letter:—"The meaning of the above is not that the advances shall be fully secured by collections, but as near as you can." It was admitted that $83,000 had been received and realized by the bank on those collateral securities. As the bank received the money, or turned the securities into money when they received them, it was impossible to say that the indebtedness between them and their debtors was otherwise than diminished to the extent of the money which the bank put into their pockets. For these reasons their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed with costs down to the time of lodging the appeal.

THE SOUTH HETTON COAL COMPANY (LIMITED) V. THE HASWELL, SHOTTON, AND EASINGTON COAL AND COKE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Practice—Pleading—Statement of claim—No cause of action disclosed—Striking out—O. 25, r. 4.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 176), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff company against a decision of Mr. Justice North directing the statement of claim to be struck out on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action. (See ante, p. 176.) The action was for specific performance of an alleged contract by the defendant company, in voluntary liquidation, by the agency of their liquidator, Mr. Holmes, for the sale of certain coal measures known as the Easington and Undersea royalties, which belonged to the defendant company, who also held a lease of coal measures known as the Pespool royalty. Besides the liquidating company, their liquidator and Mr. Barwick, a rival purchaser, were made defendants. It appeared from the statement of claim that Mr. Holmes was negotiating with both the South Hetton Company, through their solicitors, Messrs. Dees and Thompson, and Mr. Barwick for the sale of the Easington and Undersea royalties. On September 20, 1887, he made a proposal in writing to each party that they should send in sealed tenders, which he undertook should be opened on October 7 in the presence of the chairman and directors of his company. His invitation closed with the following words:—"And the highest net money tender I receive (all other things being equal and satisfactory), that tender I will at once accept." Mr. Barwick sent in a tender in the following terms:—"I hereby offer you the sum of £31,000 for the company's interest in the Easington and Undersea royalties, and, in addition, I agree to indemnify you and the company against all claims and liabilities under the Pespool lease, taking an assignment of the same as from May, 1896, and repaying the £1,000 already paid by the Messrs. Lamb." Messrs. Dees and Thompson sent in a tender on behalf of their principals as follows:—"Referring to previous negotiations, we on behalf of the South Hetton Company offer for these royalties such a sum as will exceed by £200 the amount to-day offered for them by the other proposing purchaser, coupled with a transfer of the Pespool lease, if the other offer be upon that footing." Mr. Holmes accepted the tender of Mr. Barwick as the one he ought to act upon, and the plaintiffs brought this action on the footing that they had made the highest net money tender. They claimed specific performance of their alleged contract, an injunction to restrain the carrying out of a sale of the royalties to Mr. Barwick, and damages. Mr. Justice North on the construction of the letters set out in the statement of claim, came to the conclusion that if the plaintiff's tender could be considered "the highest net money tender," it did not fulfil the condition "all other things being equal and satisfactory." In his Lordship's opinion this was an ingenious attempt on the part of the plaintiffs to get behind the offer of their rival bidder, and the statement of claim showed no just cause of action. It would therefore be struck out and the action dismissed with costs. The plaintiff company appealed.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh Clare were for the plaintiff company; Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Micklem were for the defendant company and the liquidator; and Mr. Younger was for Mr. Barwick.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the question to be determined was whether the plaintiffs' offer fairly answered the description of what the liquidator bound himself to accept, or, in other words, was it the highest net money tender? Whether it was a tender at all depended not upon the construction of the plaintiffs' letter but upon what other people tendered. That was not what was meant by the liquidator. The plaintiffs' offer was illusory. It did not answer the description of the highest money tender either in the business sense or in the legal sense of the words. To hold that the plaintiffs' offer answered that description would be to encourage trickery and chicanery. It would be opening the door to the grossest fraud not only towards purchasers but towards vendors also. Further than that, the liquidators agreed to accept the highest money tender only on condition of all other things being equal and satisfactory. His Lordship agreed with the learned Judge below that this condition had not been fulfilled. Giving the plaintiffs the full benefit of all the previous correspondence, this letter was ambiguous as to the terms upon which the Pespool property was to be assigned. The liquidator was perfectly justified in not considering this a satisfactory tender. Both points were absolutely fatal to the plaintiffs' claim. There was no contract at all. The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICES RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an application to exclude the names of shareholders from the list of contributories on the ground that the shares were to be deemed to be fully paid up, as having been issued in pursuance of a contract filed with the registrar of joint stock companies under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The agreement was made in 1895, and was for the sale by the Yilgarn Exploring Company (Limited) to the Coolgardie Company of certain mining claims. The purchase money was to be £75,000, and, as to £30,000 of this sum, the contract provided that the directors of the purchasing company might discharge it either wholly in cash or partly in cash and partly in fully-paid-up shares, or wholly in fully-paid-up shares, and "for that purpose the shares from 30,008 to 60,007 shall be set aside for issue to the vendors or as they shall appoint, in case the directors shall so decide to pay in shares, and such shares shall be issued solely as fully-paid-up shares without any liability whatsoever accruing thereon." The directors did decide to discharge the purchase money in fully-paid shares, and before the shares were issued to the applicants the contract was filed at Somerset House. But nothing showing that this option had been exercised was filed until after the shares had been issued.

Mr. John Chester and Mr. Marten supported the application; and Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Ward Coldridge opposed it on behalf of the liquidator.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that he must be guided by the plain language of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, although there might be great hardship to the applicants. That injustice, if it was such, had followed from the language of the Act in other cases. The doctrine of estoppel did not arise here. The case turned on the words in the section, "unless the same shall have been otherwise determined" by the contract. It was otherwise determined when the option was exercised, but not before that was done, and when the document was filed it was not a contract to issue shares. It only became such a contract when the option was exercised. To decide otherwise would open wide the door to frauds and uncertainties, which the section was passed to avoid. His Lordship must decide this point against the applicants, but there were other points which he would allow them to argue on another day.

IBBOTSON V. IBBOTSON BROTHERS AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Company—Shares—Shares issued as fully paid—
Filing of contract—Companies Act, 1867, sec. 25.
Decision of Wright, J. (13 The Times L.R., p. 589), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright at the trial of the action (reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 589). The plaintiff claimed £8,000, being the balance of the purchase-money due upon the sale of a business to the defendant company, and £2,500 for money lent, with interest. The plaintiff also claimed damages for the non-registration by the company of a contract to issue to him fully-paid shares in the company. The defendants admitted that £8,000 was due, subject to a deduction of £2,228, and they counterclaimed for £20,000, being £80 per share on 250 shares, and a declaration that the plaintiff held 200 shares subject to a liability to pay for them in full. The defendants also claimed damages for negligence on the part of the plaintiff as managing director of the company. The learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the £10,500 claimed, with interest, and disallowed the set off of £2,228; and he disallowed the defendants' counterclaim for the calls on the shares and for the declaration, and gave judgment in their favour for £1,500 damages for negligence. The present appeal only related to the liability of the plaintiff for calls. The facts, which were very complicated, are stated in the judgment hereunder.

Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. Theobald appeared for the defendants; Mr. Stanger, Q.C., and Mr. T. W. Chitty for the plaintiff.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment, in which he said:—The point to be determined upon this appeal has only to be stated to show what I can but call the unrighteous contention of the defendants, who are a company limited, and the appellants in this case. It is this, that, having in the year 1872 contracted to purchase of the plaintiff and his brother their lands and works upon which they had theretofore carried on the business of steelworkers at Sheffield, together with their goodwill, machinery, and plant, for the sum of £74,000, to be paid, in part, by fully-paid-up shares and part-paid-up shares, they now, although they have failed to hand to the plaintiff one single fully-paid-up or part-paid-up share, and do not intend to do so, but have, as they now assert, handed him instead thereof shares with a liability thereon of £40,000, say that they can, nevertheless, keep his property and make him pay to them £40,000 in cash for having thus contracted to part with his property to them. My brother Wright refused to accede to this contention; but, as it has been argued before us for two days that he is wrong, and that this is the effect of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, combined with the numerous decisions thereon, I must deal with the case as shortly as I can. Section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, is as follows:—
"Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares." It is to be borne in mind that throughout the transactions, which commenced in 1872 and ended in 1877, the contracting parties have acted in perfect good faith; that a valuable business in the year 1872 was contracted to be sold by the plaintiff and his brother to the promoters of the defendant company then about to be formed for the purpose of acquiring the plaintiff's property and business; that no case has been made that the price then contracted to be paid was other than a fair and proper price, and that the company, since they became a company, have successfully carried on the business contracted to be purchased, and have been and still are a prosperous and thriving company. In this case no question arises of a liquidator intervening, or of creditors, or of a winding-up of the company. The facts are as follows:—By an agreement under seal dated May 11, 1872, and made between the plaintiff and his brother of the one part and certain gentlemen who were promoters of the defendant company, which was then about to be formed, of the other part, the plaintiff and his brother agreed to sell to the promoters for and on behalf of the intended company their freeholds, leaseholds, stock-in-trade, goodwill, and plant as and from the preceding January 1 for the price (subject to valuation as therein provided) of £74,000, and it was agreed that the plaintiff's interest in such property (which was two-thirds of the whole) should be paid for to him by the company, by, amongst other payments, 200 fully paid-up shares of the intended company of £100 each, representing £20,000 in money, and by 250 shares of £100 each, £80 paid, representing a further £20,000 in money, that is, £40,000 in all. By clause 10 of this agreement it was provided that "the purchase and sale of such of the freehold and leasehold hereditaments and the fixed plant and machinery thereon as were then the property of the vendors, and which were in the meantime to be leased to the company, should commence and take effect as and from the 1st of January, 1877." Four days after this agreement, that is, upon May 15, 1872, the plaintiff subscribed the memorandum of association of the company for 450 shares. Nothing is stated upon the face of the memorandum of what these shares consisted, but they, in fact, represented 200 £100 shares, which were contracted to be fully paid-up, and 250 £100 shares also contracted to have £80 paid thereon as before mentioned. The articles of association are of equal date with the memorandum, and upon May 17, 1872, the company was registered. The agreement of May 11, though set out in the articles and stated therein to have been ratified and confirmed, was never adopted by the company by any formal resolution, though the company upon registration entered upon the premises and works and at once proceeded to carry on the business therein which had heretofore been carried on by the vendors, as if the company had formally adopted the agreement. Share certificates for the shares for which the plaintiff had subscribed the memorandum were handed to him by the company, each party at this time believing that the company were handing to the plaintiff fully-paid-up and partly-paid-up shares in accordance with their contract. It was at this time thought either that registering the articles of association with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, which was done, a verbatim copy of the agreement of May 11 being contained, was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the section, or from want of knowledge, or from forgetfulness of the section, that no contract other than that contained in the articles of association, or no contract at all, needed to be registered. I do not stop to discuss whether the authorities are such as to compel me to hold that the registration of these articles was not in the present case a sufficient registration of a contract within the meaning of section 25, for in the view I take of this case it is wholly unnecessary to do so, and I will assume that no sufficient contract was registered at this time to satisfy the section. But if this be so, it appears to me clear that the company failed to perform their part of their contractual obligation with the plaintiff, which was to in part pay him for his property by fully-paid-up and partly-paid-up shares, for it was only by registering a sufficient contract at the proper time that the company could fulfil their part. It was the duty of the company to pay the plaintiff in fully-paid-up and partly-paid-up shares, and consequently it became their duty to register the necessary contract, for in no other way could they carry out what they had contracted to do. It was argued by counsel on behalf of the company that they had performed their contract with the plaintiff by handing him shares, though not fully-paid-up or partly-paid-up, and with a liability of £40,000 attaching thereto, and that it was the plaintiff's own fault that the shares were not fully-paid-up or partly-paid-up, for he had not registered the contract as he should have done. In this I do not agree. It was the defendant's duty to register a sufficient contract, for to give a man shares with a liability of £40,000 thereon is not. I venture to think, a performance of a contract to give him shares with no liability thereon. Some five months after the registration of the company it appears that the necessity of registering some contract under section 25, other than the articles of association containing a copy of it, dawned upon the parties, for upon October 22, 1872, I find the company entering into a contract with the vendors which shows that the necessity of registering some other contract was then recognized, and the contract of October 22, 1872, was accordingly executed and registered. This contract with the company, although registered, is said not to be sufficient to satisfy the section because it was not registered "at or before" the issue of the shares, and I will take it that this is so. After this contract matters continued until the year 1877 as they had done before. It will be remembered that it had been expressly agreed by the contract of May 11, 1872, that the purchase and sale of the freeholds and leaseholds of fixed plant to the company, which were to be leased to the company in the meantime, was not to commence and take effect until five years afterwards—viz., from January 1, 1877. There had, during those five years, been no conveyance or assignment of these properties by the vendors to the company; the legal title to the lands, fixed plant, and machinery thereon, subject to the lease thereof to the company, still remained in them. When the year 1877 arrived all parties were fully alive, not only to the position of matters, but also to the requirements of section 25. The plaintiff was aware that he had not received fully-paid-up and partly-paid-up shares for his property as contracted by the company, and instead thereof that he held shares with large liabilities thereon. The company were also aware that they had not carried out their part of their contract with the plaintiff, and that the vendors—that is, the plaintiff and his brother—had not as yet conveyed and assigned their property to them. In these circumstances the company could not have compelled the vendors to convey their property to them, although the time had arrived for their doing so, unless they were ready and willing to perform their part of the contract—namely, pay the price, which they had never done and which they were not then in a position to do, by handing the plaintiff the fully-paid-up and partly-paid-up shares. In my judgment at this time the vendors were in a position to have brought ejectment against the company, and the company would have had no defence, the lease having run out. To get rid of these difficulties an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders was summoned and held upon August 22, 1877. This meeting was duly convened and the resolutions were duly confirmed on September 8, 1877. At this meeting it was resolved that the articles of association of the company should be altered by repealing and omitting the whole of article 3 (that is, the article containing the agreement of May 11, 1872) and by inserting in lieu thereof the following article:—"In lieu and stead of the agreement of May 11, 1872, heretofore subsisting as the basis of the arrangement between the vendors and the company, Henry Ibbotson Ibbotson and Charles Harvey, as directors of the company, are authorized to execute in the name and on behalf of the company and seal with the company's seal the indenture, a copy of which is as follows"; and article 3 was thus altered. This indenture is dated September 8, 1877, and is made between the company and the vendors, and after reciting that it was the intention of the company and the vendors that the latter were to be paid for their property in part by fully-paid-up and partly-paid-up shares, and that grave difficulties might arise in effectuating such intention and for avoiding which it was agreed between the company and the vendors that mutual releases should be executed and that the purchase and sale of the property referred to in the agreement of May 11, 1872, should be for cash, it was witnessed that the vendors and the company mutually released each other from the further performance of the agreement of May 11, 1872, and in consideration (amongst other things) of £60,000 (i.e., £40,000 to the plaintiff and £20,000 to his brother) paid by the company to the vendors on the execution of the indenture, the vendors agreed to sell and assure to the company and the company agreed to purchase the property of the vendors, and that a conveyance of the freeholds and leaseholds should be executed by the vendors when required by the company, and that the vendors should assign to the company their goodwill, trade-marks, patents, and patent rights, and in the meantime hold the same in trust for the company. There is no suggestion that the resolution in this case went beyond the memorandum. It is said that it was ultra vires of the company to alter their articles so that they should pay cash for what they had already purchased and paid for by shares. That is not the present case or anything like it, for to pay a man for his property with pieces of paper with a liability of £40,000 thereon is not in truth and in fact a payment for his property at all, especially under a contract to pay him by fully-paid-up and partly-paid-up shares. His Lordship said that he could see nothing ultra vires in the company bona fide resolving to alter the mode of payment for the property which they were authorized to purchase by the memorandum, and which they had not yet paid for as contracted. In his opinion, the resolution did not in the circumstances of the case sin against section 25. When the contract of September 8, 1877, was executed, the company by cheque paid to the plaintiff for his share in the property about to be conveyed to the company the sum of £40,000, and the plaintiff by cheque paid to the company the amount of his liability upon the shares which he held, which also amounted to £40,000. The company, upon the faith of this payment in cash having got the necessary conveyances and assignments executed to them, 18 years afterwards turned round and asserted that they could keep the plaintiff's property and make him pay back the £40,000 in cash for having conveyed his property to them. On September 8, 1877, the company gave a receipt to the plaintiff for £40,000, being £20,000 in payment in full for 200 shares in the company in respect of which the plaintiff had subscribed the memorandum of association, and £20,000 in payment of £80 per share on 250 shares, being the residue of the shares in respect of which he had subscribed the memorandum. Thus it was that the sale and purchase of the plaintiff's property to and by the company was upon September 8, 1877, honestly carried out between the parties, the company obtaining the conveyance and assignment of the plaintiff's property to them, and paying him the value thereof, and all matters between him and the company as regards the purchase and sale were closed. For 18 years after this the company continued to work the business with prosperity and success until a new direction came upon the scene, and the present unrighteous claim for £40,000 was made upon the plaintiff. Mr. Justice Wright had most properly dismissed this claim. He (the Lord Justice) entirely agreed with him, and also with the excellent judgment he had given, and consequently this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read a judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

Mr. TINDAL ATKINSON, Q.C., applied for a stay of execution pending an appeal to the House of Lords.

FOX V. THE "EVENING NEWS" (LIMITED)—SAME V.
THE "STAR" NEWSPAPER (LIMITED).*

Practice—Nonsuit—O. 26—Discontinuance.

The effect of O. 26 is to do away with a plaintiff's right to take a nonsuit.

These were two applications by the plaintiff for new trials in the above actions. The plaintiff was a practising barrister, and was the Registrar of the Croydon County Court, and the actions were brought in respect of alleged libels published in the Evening News and the Star. At the trial of the action against the Evening News, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, the jury found a verdict for the defendants. The action against the Star was next in the list before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, and the plaintiff's counsel, after the verdict of the jury in the first case, said that he did not propose to offer any evidence in that case. The cases are reported in The Times of December 17. For the purposes of these applications the facts are sufficiently set out in the judgments.

The plaintiff appeared in person.

Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., appeared with Mr. Haydon for the defendants in the first case. Mr. Temple Franks appeared with Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., in the second case.

The Court dismissed both applications.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the plaintiff, Mr. Fox, brought two actions, one against the Evening News and the other against the Star, for what he alleged to be serious libels on himself containing reflections on him as the Registrar of a County Court. He would presently read the alleged libel which appeared in the Evening News. That which appeared in the Star was almost identical with it, though there were some differences. The action against the Evening News came on to be tried before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury immediately after the conclusion of another newspaper libel case, in which a verdict had been returned for the defendants. It seemed that the Lord Chief Justice, having read the libel complained of, made some observations, which might have been strong observations, on the bringing of actions of libel against newspapers on trivial grounds, where no real attack had been made on the plaintiff's character, and he said he thought that Mr. Fox ought to have had more sense than to have taken any notice of these paragraphs. Mr. Fox's counsel opened the case, and put his client in the box. He was examined and cross-examined, and the hearing of the case continued in due course. When the Lord Chief Justice was about to sum up the jury said they were agreed, and gave a verdict for the defendants. Mr. Fox now said that there had been a miscarriage of justice, and that the action had not been fairly tried. His Lordship thought there was great force in the observation of Mr. Odgers that, if the Lord Chief Justice had made the remarks which the plaintiff complained of during his summing-up, there could be no pretence for objecting to them. He did not think there was any unfairness in the trial. The plaintiff contended that he was entitled in law to a verdict. The jury, however, had found a verdict for the defendants, which meant that in their opinion there was no libel. The question in the case was whether the words complained of were a libel. His Lordship read the paragraph in the Evening News. It was headed "What the peer said," which was printed in large type to catch the eye. It purported to be an amusing account of an incident in the Croydon County Court, and described how the plaintiff, seeing an elderly gentleman, who was stated to be Lord Cahir, making for the well of the Court, where the solicitors were seated, roared at him, "What are you about, Sir?" The plaintiff at the trial complained of the use of the word "roared," but he passed that by now, and complained that the paragraph omitted to state that the gentleman was shouting and gesticulating in the body of the Court, and that this omission made it appear that the plaintiff had acted unreasonably. The paragraph went on to say that the gentleman paid no attention, and that the plaintiff then roared out, "Turn that man out," and that his lordship then retorted, "Turn me out! that be d--d for a tale"; and that the plaintiff told a constable to turn him out, but not to use unnecessary violence, and that he was turned out accordingly. Could any human being after reading that think any the worse of Mr. Fox, or any the better either? In his opinion it was not in any sense a libel imputing misconduct to the plaintiff in his office, and the verdict for the defendants in the first case could not be disturbed. Then they came to the next case. The paragraph in the Star was headed, "The lord turned out," and it did not contain the word "roar." The plaintiff alleged that this also bore a libellous meaning, but, in his opinion, it was impossible to hold that the words carried the innuendo suggested. The plaintiff, however, took a point of law in this case. The first action having failed, when the second was called on before the same jury the plaintiff's counsel advised him not to proceed with it. The plaintiff, however, did not quite agree with this, and he got up and claimed a nonsuit. The Chief Justice said that he was not entitled to a nonsuit, and that there must be judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff now contended that the Chief Justice in so ruling made a mistake in law. The word "nonsuit" was certainly often used at the present day, but, in his opinion, there was not now any such thing as a real nonsuit. Before the Judicature Acts a plaintiff was entitled to claim a nonsuit after having brought a defendant up to the hearing of the action, and in such a case he was able to bring another action. The rules of 1875 were intended to stop a plaintiff from harassing a defendant in this way, and order 41, rule 6, was made for the purpose of putting a fetter on the right of a plaintiff to claim a nonsuit, by enacting that he should not thereby acquire a right to commence a fresh action, unless the Judge allowed it. The rules of 1875 were repealed by the rules of 1883, and therefore that rule no longer stood; but he thought the question was provided for by the rules as to discontinuance, order 26, and that, when an action had reached the stage of trial, the plaintiff could not discontinue with the right of bringing a second action, except by the leave of the Judge. Both appeals must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY was of the same opinion. The plaintiff said the case had not been fairly tried. No doubt strong observations had fallen from the Lord Chief Justice. But there had been no mistrial. A Judge was not in libel cases any more than in other cases a mere dignified figurehead, but he was entitled to make such observations as he thought fit. The plaintiff complained of an omission in the report of what had taken place in the County Court. But the jury were entitled to decide on the question of libel or no libel, and they said there was no libel. As to the question of nonsuit he was clearly of opinion that the present order 26 covered everything which had formerly been matter of nonsuit. He thought that now, when the plaintiff had reached the stage of meeting his adversary face to face in Court, it was only by the leave of the Judge that he could withdraw his action in such a way as to enable him to bring another action.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS referred to the facts and said he could not see that the plaintiff had any legal ground of complaint. He did not think that the incident in the County Court had been satisfactorily reported in the Evening News; it did not seem to him to have been reported in a way calculated to give a fair impression of what had occurred. He sympathized with Mr. Fox, and was not at all astonished at his feeling nettled at the manner in which the affair was treated. But the jury were the proper tribunal to determine whether the words constituted a libel or not. Then, had there been a miscarriage of justice? The Lord Chief Justice had not ruled anything; he simply made observations, and expressed an opinion that the action was not worth bringing. But a Judge was not muzzled, and generally if a Judge made observations which the jury thought were not warranted, he would not carry the assent of the jury. He thought that the report in the Star was milder and less objectionable than that in the Evening News, but the effect was much the same. As to the question of nonsuit, he agreed with what had been said by the other members of the Court.

WESTOLL V. CARTER.*

Ship—General average—Action for contribution —Defective machinery.

A vessel having had to put back to repair defective machinery became ice-bound in port.

Held, that the expense of breaking up the ice so as to give her a passage to the open sea was not a matter of general average contribution.

This was an action brought by the managing owner of the steamship Beneficent against the defendant, as the owner of cargo carried in that steamer, to recover £61 17s., contribution to a general average expenditure. The defendant objected to the admission in general average of a sum of 5,000 roubles paid to the Neptune Salvage Company under the following circumstances. The Beneficent, having on board as part of her cargo certain wheat, the property of the defendant, sailed from St. Petersburg for London on November 12, 1896. On that day, when the vessel had proceeded some little distance from her loading berth, one of her boilers became unworkable owing to a defect, and in consequence she was unable to proceed any further, and it became necessary for her to put back to her berth for repairs. The defect was patched, and on November 13 she started again, but the boiler again gave out at the same place, and she again returned to her berth, where the boiler was again repaired. By November 14, when the repairs were finished, ice had formed in the river between St. Petersburg and Kronstadt, and the Beneficent was therefore unable to proceed on her voyage. A contract was then entered into with the Neptune Salvage Company to clear a passage for the Beneficent to Kronstadt for a sum of 5,000 roubles. A passage was broken for her by tugs and a large steamer, and she was thereby enabled to make her way through the ice to open water and proceed upon her voyage. The sum of 5,000 roubles was paid to the Neptune Salvage Company for the services rendered. This sum was allowed by the average adjuster in general average. Upon the vessel's arrival in London a general average bond was executed by the defendant, which provided that general average should be ascertained and adjusted in the manner provided by the charterparty. The charterparty excepted the usual perils, and contained the usual negligence clause. It also provided that general average should be in accordance with York-Antwerp Rules, 1890.

Mr. BOYD, Q.C., and Mr. T. MATHEW, for the plaintiffs, contended that the cost of cutting a way through the ice was recoverable in general average:—(1) At common law, because the vessel was in danger of being nipped by ice, and cutting a way through the ice was the most reasonable way of extricating her from that danger. (2) Under the York-Antwerp Rules, 1890, Rule X. (a), which provides that, when "a ship shall have returned to her port or place of loading in consequence of accident . . . which renders that necessary for the common safety, the expenses of entering such port or place shall be admitted as general average; and when she shall have sailed thence with her original cargo, or part of it, the corresponding expenses of leaving such port or place consequent upon such entry or return, shall likewise be admitted as general average."

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. SCRUTTON, for the defendant, contended that the expenses in question were not recoverable either at common law or under York-Antwerp rules upon the facts stated, and that, further, the return to the loading berth was rendered necessary by a defect in the boiler which amounted to a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness.

The chief engineer of the Beneficent, who was called, stated that a crack appeared in the boiler within a very short time of the vessel leaving her loading berth, that he had no doubt that the crack was due to frost, and that the injury was done while the vessel was loading her cargo.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that the evidence of the engineer confirmed him in the opinion which he had formed—that the vessel was unseaworthy when she started on her voyage, and that the necessity for putting back arose from that unseaworthiness. That conclusion having been arrived at, there was an end of the plaintiffs' case, but even if the vessel had been seaworthy, in his opinion the plaintiffs would not have been entitled to recover contribution in respect of the expenditure in question. They could not do so at common law, because there was no danger threatening the safety of ship and cargo, which could easily have been discharged if there had been such danger. They could not recover contribution under the York-Antwerp rules, because this expenditure was not, in his opinion, an "expense of leaving" her berth within the meaning of those rules. The expenses meant by the rules were the ordinary expenses of leaving, "corresponding" to the expenses of entering such place. This expenditure was part of the cost of prosecuting the voyage, which must be borne by the shipowner. There must be judgment for the defendant with costs.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,) 1898.
Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) March 11.

SMITH AND OTHERS (OVERSEERS OF WORTHING) v.
RICHMOND (SURVEYOR OF TAXES).*

Rating—Agricultural rates—Agricultural land,
what is—Agricultural Rates Act, 1896,
The greenhouses covering a market garden are rateable as buildings and not as agricultural land.

Decision of Divisional Court (13 The Times L.R., 562) reversed (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting).

This was an appeal by the surveyor of taxes from a decision of the Divisional Court—Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Collins and Mr. Justice Ridley—dated August 2 last, and reported in The Times of the following day; also in The Times Law Reports, Vol. 13, p. 562. The matter came before the Divisional Court on a special case stated by the quarter sessions for West Sussex on an appeal by the overseers of the parish of Worthing from a decision of the assessment committee of the union of East Preston under the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 16). The case raised a question as to the rating of glass-houses over market gardens. By section 1 of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, "the occupier of agricultural land" in England is made liable, in the case of every rate to which the Act applies, to pay one-half only of the rate in the pound payable in respect of buildings or other hereditaments. The facts were as follows:—Robert Piper was a grower of fruit, vegetables, and flowers at Worthing, and described himself and was commonly known as a market gardener and nurseryman. He was the owner and occupier of land rather more than four acres in extent, on which 57 glasshouses or greenhouses of various sizes were erected. The houses were used by the appellant for the purpose of growing tomatoes, cucumbers, and grapes, and, to a smaller extent, other vegetables, for the purpose of sale. The plants and crops grown therein were watered and heated by artificial means, and grown upon soil placed upon prepared beds inside the houses and matured much earlier than in the open ground. The vines were planted inside the houses and the roots ran partly in the soil under the houses and partly passed through apertures in the walls into the soil outside. Fifty-one of the glasshouses were thus used for growing vines. In the cucumber houses (which were six out of the 57 houses) there were inside the houses dwarf brick walls supporting corrugated iron sheets, upon which sheets earth taken from the other parts of the nursery ground was placed. In this earth so placed upon the iron sheets the cucumber plants were planted. Beneath the iron sheets and between them and the ground there were hot-water pipes. The area actually occupied by the 57 houses was rather more than two acres. The rest (rather more than two acres) consisted merely of vine borders, paths, and the stakeholes. The whole of the houses were built upon dwarf brick walls like an ordinary greenhouse. It is provided by section 9 of the Act that, "unless the context otherwise requires, the expression 'agricultural land' means any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, cottage gardens exceeding one quarter of an acre, market gardens, nursery grounds, orchards, or allotments, but does not include land occupied together with a house as a park, gardens other than as aforesaid, pleasure grounds, or any land kept or preserved mainly or exclusively for purposes of sport or recreation, or land used as a racecourse." For the purposes of the Act section 6, subsection 1, requires certain returns to be made to the Local Government Board. Subsection 2 provides that "for the purpose of the returns statements showing the gross estimated rental and rateable value of the agricultural land in a parish, and in the case of any hereditament separately valued which consists in part of agricultural land and in part of buildings or other hereditaments of each such part, shall be made by the overseers of every parish and corrected by the assessment committee and sent to the surveyor of taxes and be subject to objection or appeal by the said surveyor and overseers" as therein provided. In pursuance of the requirements of subsections 1 and 2 of section 6, of certain regulations made by the Local Government Board under subsection 3 of that section, the overseers made the prescribed statements, and sent them to the assessment committee and the surveyor of taxes, and in such statements they returned Mr. Piper's property and other property of a similar nature as agricultural land. The assessment committee, however, on the objection of the surveyor of taxes, decided that the statement, to the extent to which it includes land partly covered with glasshouses, was incorrect, and corrected it by striking out that entry. Upon the hearing of the appeal before the quarter sessions it was contended for the appellants, the overseers, that the particulars of the gross estimated rental and the rateable value of the hereditaments in question were correctly entered by them in their statement under the heading of "agricultural land," and that the decision of the assessment committee to correct the statement by striking out the entry was wrong, and in support of their contention they cited the case of "Purser v. Local Board for Worthing" (18 Q.B.D., 818). For the respondent it was contended that the case relied on by the appellants did not decide that the glasshouses were not buildings, but merely that the land was not the less used as a market garden because the glasshouses had been placed upon it, and that moreover the definition of agricultural land in the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, was to be read subject to the context, and that the context in the Act required that any buildings should be excluded from the term agricultural land, that the glasshouses were buildings within the meaning of the Act, and that it followed that either the whole of the hereditaments in question should be excluded from the overseers' statement, or, alternatively, that so much thereof as consisted of buildings should be inserted under the heading of "buildings not being agricultural land." The quarter sessions were of opinion that the contention of the appellants was right, and allowed the appeal and ordered the statement of the overseers to be altered by restoring all the items which formed the subject of the appeal to the condition in which they were before they were altered by the assessment committee, subject to the statement of a case for the opinion of the Court. Upon the appeal to the Divisional Court the Judges differed, Lord Justice Collins being of opinion that the buildings in question were to be treated as part of the market garden, while Mr. Justice Ridley thought that no buildings were entitled to the partial relief granted to agricultural land. Mr. Justice Ridley, however, as the junior Judge, withdrew his judgment, and consequently the appeal was dismissed. The surveyor of taxes appealed to the Appeal Court. The appeal was heard on February 8.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.), Mr. Day, and Mr. Trevor appeared in support of the appeal; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Clavell Salter were for the overseers.

The Court allowed the appeal (Lord Justice Vaughan Williams dissenting).

The MASTER of the ROLLS said,—The question in this case is whether glasshouses in or on a market garden are to be rated as buildings or as agricultural land under the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896. The Court of Quarter Sessions held that the glasshouses ought to be rated as agricultural land. On appeal to the Queen's Bench Division the members of the Court were equally divided, and the appeal was dismissed, but leave was given to appeal to this Court. The glasshouses in question are clearly buildings in the ordinary legal meaning of the word. The case stated leaves no doubt on this point. The question turns entirely on the true construction of the Act of Parliament, 59 and 60 Vict., c. 18. The ninth section contains a definition of agricultural land, but no definition of buildings nor of market gardens or nursery grounds. The Interpretation Act, 1889, contains, in section 3, a definition of land; and this word, when used in subsequent statutes, is to include buildings, unless a contrary intention appears. The Interpretation Act, 1889, contains no definition of buildings, market gardens, or nurseries. The ninth section of the Act of 1896 clearly shows that land there cannot possibly mean or include buildings in the early part of the section, for the definition is that agricultural land means any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only. Market gardens and nursery grounds are, however, also declared to be agricultural land, and this is the enactment which gives rise to the difficulty with which we have to deal. The definition in section 9, however, must not be used to contradict other parts of the Act, or to introduce anomalies which the language of the enacting part of the statute does not justify. Market gardens and nursery grounds may or may not have buildings upon them. If they have not no difficulty arises; but if they have, then comes the question, How are those buildings to be rated? To answer this question, we must look to the enacting clause, which is section 1. (His Lordship read the section and continued.) Here we have "agricultural land" used in connexion with, and, as I think, plainly contrasted with, "buildings and other hereditaments." Similar language is used in sections 5 and 6. This express mention of buildings makes the whole statute perfectly clear to my mind, and removes the doubt caused by the use of the words "market gardens and nursery grounds" in section 9. The only conclusion at which I can arrive is that buildings are not to be treated as agricultural land for rating purposes under this Act of Parliament. The case of "Purser v. Worthing" (18 Q.B.D., 818) does not, in my opinion, assist the Court in construing this Act of Parliament. That case merely shows that a market garden prima facie includes the buildings upon it used for market garden purposes. To urge that market gardens and nursery ground do not cease to be so because they are more or less covered with glasshouses is to urge what is quite true, but is beside the mark. The question is, How are such houses to be rated under this Act of Parliament? My answer is, if they are buildings, they must be rated as such, and not as agricultural land. Mr. Salter, in his very able argument, suggested that buildings used only for covering land which was cultivated under their protection ought to be distinguished from other buildings, and ought to be held to be agricultural land. I can find nothing to justify a distinction between one class of buildings and another for any such purpose as his argument requires. Section 5 speaks, no doubt, of buildings used only for the cultivation of land, but this clause in no way shows that such buildings or any others are to be rated as agricultural land. The case of "The London and North-Western Railway v. Llandudno Commissioners" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 287) turned on the construction of a provision in another Act of Parliament, and does not really assist me to arrive at the true interpretation of the statute with which we have to deal. In my opinion, the appeal must be allowed and the orders of the Queen's Bench Division and of the quarter sessions must be reversed, with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY delivered a written judgment to the like effect.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS differed. His Lordship agreed with Lord Justice Collins that the cases of "Purser v. Worthing Local Board" and "The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Llandudno Commissioners" showed that prima facie this land covered with these glasshouses was part and parcel of the market garden, and therefore agricultural land, the occupier of which was entitled to the benefit of this exemption. The form and collocation of words used in this Act was not new as defining partial exemptions in rating cases. It was to be found as early as the Public Health Act, 1848, and in the Public Health Act, 1875, and had uniformly received such a construction that the hereditaments catalogued in the definition had been held to include the buildings thereon, whenever the buildings in question were part and parcel of the specified hereditament. The buildings in such cases were treated as being practically incapable of beneficial occupation independently of the defined hereditament. He could find nothing in the tenour or details of this Act to lead to the conclusion that the words "market gardens" and the other collocated words should receive a different construction, so as to exclude from agricultural land the buildings on each hereditament, whatever their character. After discussing sections 1, 5, 6, and 9, his Lordship arrived at the conclusion that the land covered with glasshouses fell within the exemption, because the buildings were part and parcel of the market garden, which, by the terms of the definition, was agricultural land, and were used exclusively for the purpose of cultivating the land.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. THE MAYOR, &C., OF TYNEMOUTH.*

Local Government—Expenses—Application of borough rate—Validity—Payment of costs of licensing appeals.

Held, that borough funds cannot be applied by the town council in payment of costs incurred by the chief constable in connexion with licensing appeals.

Decision of Divisional Court (13 The Times
L.R., 412) affirmed, but on different grounds.

This was an appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Wright) on a special case stated in an action between the Attorney-General, on the relation of the Newcastle Breweries (Limited), and the corporation of the borough of Tynemouth. The case is reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 412. The action was one whereby the plaintiffs claimed (1) a declaration that any agreement by the defendant corporation to indemnify the chief constable against costs he might have, or might have had, to bear or pay in connexion with licensing appeals from the borough justices to quarter sessions, and any payment pursuant thereto, or any payment of such costs by the defendant corporation, was ultra vires and void; and (2) an injunction restraining the defendants from making or acting on any such agreement or from making any such payment. The plaintiffs, the Newcastle Breweries (Limited), were ratepayers in the borough of Tynemouth, and as such were interested in preventing any misapplication of the borough funds. At a meeting of the watch committee of the town council held on August 13, 1895, a resolution was passed authorizing the chief constable of the borough to obtain legal assistance at the ensuing brewster sessions. A similar resolution was passed at a meeting of the council held on August 21. At the brewster sessions held at North Shields on August 23 the chief constable of Tynemouth raised objections to the renewal of certain alehouse or full licences under the Licensing Acts for the sale of intoxicating liquors held by persons in respect of premises situate in the borough. After hearing the objections, the justices refused to renew such licences. The holders of five of the licences gave notice of appeal from such refusal to the quarter sessions. On September 27, at a meeting of the watch committee, it was resolved that the opinion of counsel should be obtained whether the watch committee or the council had power to authorize the chief constable to act as respondent in the licensing appeals and pay his costs. On October 10, the watch committee, having had the opinion of counsel submitted to them, refused to authorize the chief constable to act as respondent in the appeals or to indemnify him against any costs. On October 15, at a meeting of the council, it was resolved:—"That the chief constable, who is the respondent in the licensing appeals from the decisions of the borough justices, be authorized to oppose such appeals, and that the council agree to indemnify him against any costs which he may have to bear or pay in connexion with the appeals as such respondent." On the hearing of the appeals the chief constable appeared by counsel and opposed the appeals, which were dismissed with costs. The costs incurred by the chief constable in opposing the appeals exceeded the amount of the costs which, on taxation, he recovered from the appellants by the sum of £132 5s. On November 19, at a meeting of the new watch committee, it was resolved:—"That the committee direct payment of the solicitors' (Messrs. Adamson and Adamson) account, amounting to £132 5s., being the difference between the fees paid to counsel and the amount allowed on taxation. The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the said resolution of the council to indemnify the chief constable against the said costs was ultra vires, and if any payment pursuant thereto, or any payment of the said costs by the defendant corporation pursuant to the direction of the watch committee, would be ultra vires and void. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that the authorization and indemnity given by the council on October 15 were not sufficient, and that there had been no sanction by the watch committee as required, as the sanction of the new watch committee could not reverse the decision of the former committee. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., appeared for the defendants: Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. T. W. Chitty, and Mr. D. H. Crompton for the plaintiffs.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment in the course of which he said that the important question was raised whether the borough fund could be used by the town council for the purpose of opposing publicans seeking to obtain renewals of their licences. The borough fund of this borough had no surplus. Four points were raised, two under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, one under the Borough Funds Act, 1872, and one upon which the Queen's Bench Division decided. Part IX. of the Act of 1882 comprised a group of sections which dealt with the appointment of a watch committee and the powers they had over the police of the borough: section 191 had reference to the powers and duties of the watch committee in relation to the borough police, such as their appointment, supervision, dismissal, and making the force generally efficient. The watch committee had nothing to do with the carrying out of the licensing laws in the borough. As regards the formation of the borough fund, section 139 provided what payments were to be made into it so as to constitute the fund; and section 144 provided for the making of a borough rate, should the borough fund be insufficient "for the purposes to which it is applicable under the Act or otherwise by law." Section 140 dealt with the application of this fund when formed. By subsection 1 of this section it was enacted that the borough fund should be applicable to and charged with the several payments specified in schedule 5 of the Act. Subsection 2 enacted that the payments specified in part I. of schedule 5 might be made without order of the council; those specified in part II. might not be made without such order. By subsection 3 it was enacted that no other payment should be made out of the borough fund except under the authority of Parliament, or by order of the council, or by order of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the borough, or by order of a justice in pursuance of the Act, or in cases in which the Court of Quarter Sessions for a county or a justice might make an order for the payment of money on the treasurer of the county. Section 141 enacted that an order of the council for payment of money out of the borough fund should be signed by three members of the council and countersigned by the town clerk. Section 143 enacted that if the borough fund was more than sufficient for the purposes to which it was applicable by law the surplus should be applied under the directions of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough. It was under schedule 5 that the first point was taken by the corporation, and it was said that it authorized the payment of the costs in question out of the borough fund. It was headed "Payments out of the Borough Fund." Part II. authorized payments out of the borough fund upon the order of the council for certain purposes, amongst others (5) to or in respect of the borough police, including (d) all other charges and expenses which the watch committee, subject to the approbation of the council, direct to be paid for the purposes of the borough constabulary force. This schedule was explicit as to what payments were to be made out of the borough fund. It was argued for the corporation that sub-clause (d) authorized the payment of the costs incurred in opposing publicans seeking to obtain renewal of their licences out of the borough fund. In his judgment it was out of all reason to attempt to strain the words "in respect of the borough police," "for the purposes of the borough constabulary force," into covering the costs of the counsel and witnesses of a litigant chief constable acting hostilely at quarter sessions to an appellant publican in a licensing appeal. Such a proceeding was not in respect of the borough police nor for the purposes of the borough constabulary at all; it was for the purpose of opposing a publican obtaining a renewal of his licence and nothing else, which was no part of the duty of a police-constable nor of the watch committee nor of the council of a borough. A chief constable might well attend quarter sessions as a witness to give information if required, but it was no part of his duty to act as a litigant party thereat. The recent case of "Boulter v. Justices of Kent" (1897, A.C., 556) had no bearing upon this case. Mr. Justice Blackburn, in "Reg. v. Mayor of Liverpool" (41 L.J., Q.B., 175), when dealing with section 82 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, which was a similar section to clause 5 of schedule 5, held that the last clause therein, which was similar to sub-clause (d), was to be construed as referring to matters ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned, and was confined to acts affecting the constabulary force. In that he (the Lord Justice) agreed, and he was of opinion that no part of schedule 5 authorized the payment of these costs out of the borough fund. The next point was that taken by the corporation upon the Borough Funds Act, 1872. In 1871 the Court of Queen's Bench in "Reg. v. Mayor of Sheffield" (L.R., 6 Q.B., 652) held that under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, the borough fund could not be charged with the costs and expenses incurred by the council in opposing before justices certain regulations proposed by a water company which would impose onerous conditions upon the consumers nor in opposing a Bill in Parliament subsequently promoted by the company which was also detrimental to the interests of the inhabitants. The Court held that unless the borough fund showed a surplus it could not be applied in payment of these costs and expenses. In the next year, in consequence probably of that decision, the Borough Funds Act, 1872, was passed. Section 2, in his opinion, meant the taking of some legal proceedings by or on behalf of the inhabitants against some person or persons in order to promote the interest of the inhabitants, or defending some legal proceedings brought against the corporation or the inhabitants by some person or persons in order to protect the interest of the inhabitants. The intervention of a police-constable as a respondent at quarter sessions in a licensing appeal was neither the one nor the other. His Lordship now came to the point raised upon sections 140-142 of the Act of 1882. What Mr. Justice Blackburn said of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, in "Reg. v. Mayor of Sheffield" (L.R., 6 Q.B., at p. 661), which was the precursor of the Act of 1882, was, in his judgment, applicable to the Act of 1882. It was argued that section 140, subsection 3 (b), taken in conjunction with section 141, subsection 2, authorized a payment out of the borough fund whenever there was "an order of the council," subject only to the liability of the order being disallowed in whole or in part by the Queen's Bench Division. It was clear to him that this subsection must have some limitation. It could not mean to authorize any payment the council might order. That would be absurd. It was said that the sole limitation was the control of the Queen's Bench Division given by section 141, subsection 2. He did not read the section so. It could not be said that section 140, subsection 3 (c) and (d), dealing with orders of the Court of quarter sessions or an order of a justice in pursuance of the Act, meant that any order of quarter sessions of a justice directing payment out of the borough fund would authorize a payment out of the fund even though they were orders for payment for purposes other than those authorized by the Act or otherwise by law. The words "or otherwise by law" were new in the Act of 1882, and appeared to have reference to the Borough Funds Act, 1872. It could not be said that as to these orders of quarter sessions or of justices section 141, subsection 2, applied, for it obviously did not, and therefore there was no such limitation as was suggested of the controlling power of the Queen's Bench Division applicable to them. Then what was the limit as to the making of the orders by the council, by quarter sessions, and by justices? He could find none other than that orders could only be made for those purposes for which the Act of 1882 and the Act of 1872 might be applied. He could in those Acts find no pretence for saying that the borough fund was to be applied for opposing publicans who were appellants at quarter sessions. The true reading of section 140, coupled as it must be with sections 141, 142, and 143, was that, until the borough fund had discharged the several purposes for which by the Acts of 1882 and 1872 it was applicable, the borough fund could not be resorted to by the council to pay thereout for matters outside those purposes, but should the borough fund be more than sufficient for the purposes to which by those Acts it was made applicable, then the surplus, if any, might be applied under the direction of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough. In his opinion section 141 was a restraining and not an enabling section as regards the powers of the council. His Lordship did not wish to be understood that, if there were a surplus, these costs could come within the words "for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough," but this point he had not to decide in this case. For these reasons he was of opinion that neither under schedule 5 nor under the Borough Funds Act, 1872, nor under sections 140-143 of the Act of 1882 could these costs be legally paid out of the borough fund. As regards the last point, the learned Judges in the Court below did not deal with the construction of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, nor with the Borough Funds Act, 1872. They determined the case upon the ground that the new watch committee had no jurisdiction to overrule what had been done by their predecessors in office, and make the order they did upon November 19, 1895. He was not satisfied as to this, but as he determined the case adversely to the corporation upon the main points, although the Court below decided it adversely to them upon a different ground, the judgment must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read a judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

KNIGHT V. NORTH METROPOLITAN TRAMWAYS COMPANY.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to third persons—Scope of servant's authority—Tramway company—Prosecution for passing bad money—Company held not liable.

This was an action for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. The defence was that the defendants' servant was not acting within the scope of his authority in detaining and prosecuting the plaintiff. Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., and Mr. Norman Craig were for the plaintiff; Mr. Kemp, Q.C., Mr. C. W. Mathews and Mr. F. Richardson were for the defendants.

It appeared that the plaintiff, a leather merchant, of Hackney, was going home one night last April with his wife on a tramcar belonging to the defendants, and he gave the conductor a sixpence in payment of the fares. The conductor gave him fourpence change, but shortly afterwards came back and said that plaintiff had given him a bad sixpence. The conductor had bent the coin, and plaintiff said that it was good money, and he would not give another instead of it. When he got out of the car the conductor, at the bidding of one of the defendants' inspectors, gave him into custody on a charge of passing false coin. Next day the conductor appeared at the police-court to prosecute the plaintiff, but the magistrate dismissed the charge. Another inspector of the company was present during the hearing. When the sixpence came to be examined it had been found to be a perfectly good coin. The plaintiff said in his evidence that his credit had been stopped owing to these proceedings. The tramway company had dismissed the conductor for what had happened and had apologized to the plaintiff.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, Mr. KEMP, Q.C., submitted that there was no case to go to the jury, as there was no evidence as to the duties and powers of inspectors and conductors. There was no express authority in them to give a person into custody, and there was no authority to be implied from their position. The property of the company was not in any danger, nor were they acting for the purpose of protecting it. The learned counsel quoted "Abrahams v. Deakin" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 516) and "Charleston v. London Tramways Company (Limited)" (4 The Times Law Reports, 629).

Mr. RUEGG, Q.C., said that the first case was clearly distinguishable, and all that the second amounted to was that it was not to be implied that the conductor of a tramcar had authority to give a person into custody. Here there was evidence of direct authority.

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE said that he was inclined to agree with Mr. Kemp, but he preferred to take the opinion of the jury in order to save the possible expense of a new trial.

No witnesses were called for the defence. The following questions were left to the jury:—(1) Whether the act of the conductor was done to serve his own ends in consequence of a dispute with the plaintiff, or was it done, as he supposed, in the interests of his employers and to protect their property? (2) Did the company take steps to support the act of the conductor? (3) What was the amount of the damages?

The jury found that the conductor acted in the supposed interest of his employers; they answered the second question in the affirmative; and they assessed the damages at £60.

Judgment was postponed to admit of the consideration of the legal points raised.

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE subsequently delivered a written judgment, in the course of which he said:—I have felt considerable doubt about this case, and after consideration I have come to the conclusion that I should enter judgment for the defendants. I did not think it right to stop the case at the time, because I thought it better that any facts that either party wished to be submitted to the jury should be found by them, and that the jury should assess the damages, so that in any case the expense of a new trial might be avoided. The only questions that I was asked to submit to the jury beyond the amount of damages related to the authority of the conductor to act on behalf of the defendant company in the manner in which he acted, and to the question whether the defendant company ratified his acts. Both these questions the jury answered in favour of the plaintiff, so that the question now to be considered is whether there was any evidence to show that the conductor acted within the scope of his authority express or implied, or to show that the defendant company ratified his proceedings. The plaintiff, who was travelling with his wife on one of the defendant company's trams, tendered a sixpenny piece to the conductor in payment of the fare for himself and his wife; he received in exchange two tickets and 4d. change. Shortly after, the conductor alleged that the sixpenny piece was a counterfeit, and he asked the plaintiff for another. The plaintiff said, "The sixpenny piece is a good one," and refused to give the conductor another. Shortly after the tram arrived at the place where the plaintiff's journey ended, and the plaintiff and his wife got out. There was a police constable at the spot and the conductor gave the plaintiff in charge for passing a counterfeit coin. A person wearing the uniform of the defendant company, who was identified by the police constable as an inspector of the company, came up at that time. The conductor spoke to him, and the inspector said to the conductor, "Give me your badge and satchel, and take him down to the station and charge him." The plaintiff was then taken to the nearest police-station by the constable, accompanied by the conductor, and the inspector took the place of the conductor on the tram. At the police-station the conductor signed the charge-sheet. The plaintiff was admitted to bail about 2 a.m. on April 8. The plaintiff appeared in Court to answer to the charge the same day, and, after the conductor and the constable had given evidence, the magistrate dismissed the case. In point of fact the sixpenny piece was genuine. During the hearing at the police-court an inspector of the company—not the inspector who was present when the plaintiff was given into custody—was present, but took no part in the proceedings. The first question that arises is whether there is any evidence that the conductor was acting within the scope of his authority as the defendants' servant. It was not suggested that he had any express authority to give into custody persons who might be suspected of passing counterfeit money. This case does not resemble the numerous class of cases, of which "Goff v. Great Northern Railway Company" (3 E. and E., 672) is an example, in which persons have been given into custody by the officials of railway companies for travelling on a railway without having paid the fare and with intent to defraud. In those cases power is given by statute, 8 and 9 Vict., c. 20, sections 103 and 104, to all officers and servants on behalf of the company to apprehend such persons. In cases of that class it has been held that where some servant of the company has authority to do a particular act, which, if done at all, must be done immediately, a servant on the spot, in the absence of any superior servant to whom he can refer, may be considered as clothed with implied authority to act on the emergency. In the present case there is nothing to show that any officer of the company had under any circumstances authority from the company to give passengers into custody for passing counterfeit coin. The case of "Charleston v. the London Tramways Company (Limited)" (4 The Times Law Reports, 629) seems to be conclusive on this point. Had the charge against the plaintiff been that he had attempted to avoid payment of his fare or any charge of a like nature within the 51st section of the Tramways Act, 1870, a very different question would have arisen, and the case would then have come within the principle of "Goff v. the Great Northern Railway." See "Rayson v. South London Tramways Company" ([1893] 2 Q.B., 304). The ground upon which counsel for the plaintiff contended that the conductor had implied authority was founded upon the direction of Mr. Justice Blackburn in "Allen v. London and South-Western Railway Company" (L.R., 6 Q.B., 65). That learned Judge stated that a servant who had the charge and custody of his master's property may be fairly said to have implied authority to do all acts which are necessary for the protection of the property entrusted to him. He adds:—"I am inclined to think that if a man in charge of a till were to find that a person was attempting to rob it, and he could not prevent him from stealing the property otherwise than by taking him into custody, the person in charge of the till might have an implied authority to arrest the offender; or if the clerk had reason to believe that the money had been actually stolen and he could get it back by taking the thief into custody, and he took him into custody with a view of recovering the property taken away, it might be that that also might be within the authority of a person in charge of a till. I am not, however, prepared to pronounce a decided opinion on these supposed cases."

The learned Judge does not pronounce a decided opinion. It is possible that if the matter ever comes up for decision it may be found that it is not enough to confer authority upon the servant to arrest that he should believe that his master's property is in danger. It may be found that it is necessary that the property should be actually in danger. See "Edwards v. the London and North-Western Railway Company" (L.R., 5 C.P., 445). But I do not need to consider this distinction for the purposes of this case. I take the words of Mr. Justice Blackburn in the fullest sense, and it does not appear to me that there is evidence to bring the present case within the lines laid down by him. I cannot see that the acts of the conductor can be said to have been done with the view of recovering the property of the company, or that there was any evidence from which the jury could properly infer that the acts were done with any such view. That the acts were done by the conductor to make an example of the plaintiff, and in that sense indirectly to protect the company's property, I do not doubt, but to admit such a state of things as affording any evidence of an implied authority on the part of a servant to give a person into custody would be to go far beyond the principles laid down. It would be to affirm the principle that every servant who is entrusted with the property of his master has an implied authority to put the law in motion with reference to any offence that may be committed with reference to the property. As to the second question, whether there had been any ratification on behalf of the company, there is evidence that the inspector who was on the spot when the plaintiff was given into custody ratified the act of the conductor. But there is no evidence that the inspector had any authority to act on behalf of the company in sanctioning the act of the conductor. There is no evidence of express authority, and the case as to his implied authority is not so strong as that as to the implied authority of the conductor. It is said that the fact that the conductor appeared at the police-court is evidence that the company must have given him leave of absence, but there is nothing to show that he obtained leave from any officer with authority to sanction the prosecution. It must constantly happen that the conductors obtain leave of absence, but it would be going beyond reasonable inference to assume that an officer who had authority to grant leave of absence had authority to sanction a prosecution. An inspector of the company was present at the police-court, but took no part in the proceedings. I do not think his presence was a ratification by him of the proceedings, but, even if it were, there is no evidence that his presence was by the authority of an officer who had the authority of the company to ratify the proceedings. There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendants.

IN RE NEW PAR CONSOLS (LIMITED).*

County Court—Jurisdiction—Contempt of Court —Committal.

A County Court Judge has power to commit for contempt of Court under sec. 1, subsec. 6, of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

This was an appeal by the Official Receiver from an order of Mr. Justice Bigham directing that a writ of prohibition should issue to the County Court of Truro. Proceedings had been taken in that Court for the winding-up of a company called the New Par Consols (Limited), of which company Mr. Charles Gregory was one of the directors, and in the course of such proceedings an order had been made by the County Court Judge on Mr. Gregory to submit and verify a statement of the affairs of the company. Mr. Gregory having failed to comply with the order, the County Court Judge held him to be guilty of contempt and made an order for his committal to prison. An application was then made on behalf of Mr. Gregory for a writ of prohibition restraining any further proceedings on the order for committal. One of the grounds of the application was that the order calling upon him to furnish an account was not in accordance with the form prescribed by the County Court rules, and, further, that it did not bear an endorsement, as according to the rules it ought to have borne, stating that if he did not comply with the order he would be liable to be sent to prison. Mr. Justice Bigham granted a writ of prohibition.

The Solicitor-General and Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the Official Receiver in support of the appeal; Mr. Glenn appeared for Gregory.

The Court allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said there was no doubt the County Court Judge had jurisdiction to wind up this company, and section 1, subsection 6, of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, said that every Court having jurisdiction to wind up a company should for the purposes of that jurisdiction have all the powers of the High Court. He thought that was enough to enable them to decide that a writ of prohibition did not lie in this case. Even independently of that enactment he was of opinion that the County Court Judge had jurisdiction to make a committal order, and that therefore a writ of prohibition could not properly be directed to him, though he did think that in this case the County Court Judge had gone wrong in his way of exercising his jurisdiction. That, however, was matter of appeal, and not of prohibition.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY was of the same opinion. He thought that the Act of 1890 had placed the County Court on the same footing with the High Court with regard to these matters, and that therefore the writ of prohibition had been incautiously granted. He also agreed with Lord Justice A. L. Smith in thinking that the order of the County Court Judge was erroneous, and could not have stood upon appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that on the main ground he agreed. Having regard to the Act of 1890 he thought it was impossible to treat the County Court as an inferior Court, and so liable to prohibition. But, apart from that enactment, his opinion would have been that the County Court Judge in this case had acted without jurisdiction, and that prohibition might have been rightly granted.

BENNETT V. CASTLE AND SONS.*

Negligence—Personal injuries—Liability as between contractors and occupiers of house—Finding of jury.

This was an application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Lawrance and a common jury. The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries owing to the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants. The defendants were contractors who were engaged in doing certain work at a private house from the end of September, 1896, until November 24, 1896, when the accident happened. After each day's work was over the ladders were fastened together and laid on and at the side of the path leading to the back door of the house. The plaintiff was a baker who delivered bread at the house in question, and between 6 and 7 p.m. on November 24, 1896, the night being very dark, he walked up the path and delivered the bread, and when returning he stumbled against the ladders and fell, and was injured. The defendants' case was that at first the ladders were placed each night on the lawn, but the occupier of the house objected, and directed the defendants' men to place them on the path in question. The ladders were accordingly placed there, and the defendants contended that, if there was any negligence at all, they were not liable. The jury were asked whether the ladders were placed there by the permission or by the orders of the occupier of the house, and they answered, by the permission of the occupier, and they found a verdict for the plaintiff for £50 damages.

Mr. Montague Lush and Mr. W. H. Griffith appeared for the defendants. Mr. Packard, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

The Court dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that it was contended that the defendants' men, in putting the ladders on the path, acted as the servants of the occupier of the house, and not as the servants of the defendants. He could not agree with that contention. The answer of the jury disposed of it. The jury were asked if the ladders were placed on the path by the permission or by the orders of the occupier of the house, and they said that the ladders were placed there by the permission of the occupier. That meant that the ladders were not placed there by the orders of the occupier. That finding negatived the suggestion that the defendants' men, in putting the ladders on the path, were acting as the servants of the occupier of the house. There was evidence to justify that finding, and there was no ground for disturbing the verdict.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

WHITTHAM V. WATKIN AND OTHERS.*

Limitations, Statutes of—Trustee—Directors of railway company—Trustee Act, 1888—Payments ultra vires.

This was an action which had for its object to compel the first three defendants, Sir Edward Watkin, Sir John Maclure, and Mr. Pollitt, to repay to the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company certain sums which they, along with other directors of the company, had applied in the purchase of certain shares in the Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Company. The plaintiffs were the holders of £100 deferred ordinary stock of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, and one of them was also the holder of £700 preferred ordinary stock. On July 15, 1890, the plaintiffs, together with a Mr. H. E. Piercy, as trustee of the will of Mr. B. Piercy, entered into a contract for the sale to a company called the Railways and General Company (Limited) of £339,807 consolidated ordinary stock of the Wrexham Company at the price of 182 per cent., and the purchasers agreed to purchase at the same price all ordinary stock of the same company which might at any time thereafter be found due to the plaintiffs and H. E. Piercy in respect of certain agreements between that company and their testator. Although on the face of the contract the Railways and General Company were the purchasers, it was, in fact, arranged that the purchase money should be provided by the Manchester and Sheffield Company, and that the stock should be transferred to trustees for that company, the object being to acquire on behalf of the Manchester and Sheffield Company a controlling power over the Wrexham Company; and that arrangement was carried out in the following manner. On August 1, 1890, a cheque for £64,457 16s. 11d., being the purchase money of the stock in question, was by the authority of the directors of the Manchester and Sheffield Company (of whom the defendants Sir E. Watkin and Sir John Maclure were two) drawn on the bankers of the company, and on August 5 this sum was paid to the credit of the Railways and General Company. On August 9 that company paid the amount to the plaintiffs, who transferred the stock into the names of Mr. Pollitt, the general manager of the Manchester and Sheffield Company, and Sir John Maclure. Subsequently, in October, 1890, a similar transaction was carried into effect with reference to £4,101 like stock of the Wrexham Company, the price of which was £768 18s. 9d. The ground upon which relief was sought in the action was that the purchase of the shares in question was ultra vires the Manchester and Sheffield Company. The writ was issued on August 6, 1896, against Sir Edward Watkin, Sir John Maclure, Mr. Pollitt, and the Manchester and Sheffield Company.

Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. F. Thompson appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Cozens Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. M. Romer for the first three defendants; and Mr. Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Mr. Thomas Watson for the defendant railway company.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that it was not disputed that, at the dates when these sums were paid, the Manchester and Sheffield Company had no power to apply its funds in the purchase of Wrexham stock, and that the payments were prima facie ultra vires; but reliance was placed upon an Act of Parliament passed on July 21, 1891, which, it was alleged, gave the company power to do so; and by a resolution duly passed by the company the directors were authorized to subscribe towards the undertaking of the Wrexham Company the sum of £100,000 and to hold shares in that company to the amount of such subscription. No entries disclosing the application of the sums of £64,457 16s. 11d. and £768 18s. 9d. appeared in the accounts of the company for the half-years ending December 31, 1890, and June 30, 1891; but in the accounts for the half-year ending December 31, 1891, there appeared, under the heading "subscriptions to other railways," the following entry:—"Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway £65,231 18s. 2d., and it was admitted that that referred to the sums paid in August and October, 1890. In his Lordship's judgment these did not constitute a subscription towards the undertaking of the Wrexham Company within the meaning of the Act of 1891. It followed that the whole of the payments must still be regarded as ultra vires. The defendants, however, claimed the benefit of the Statute of Limitations, and the first question was whether that afforded a good defence. The statute applicable was the Trustee Act, 1888, but there were certain exceptions contained in section 8, and the only one of them which could apply was—"where the claim is founded upon any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee was party or privy." No such case was alleged or proved against the directors, and his Lordship thought that they had acted honestly and in the belief that what they did was for the benefit of the company. It was contended, however, that the entry in the accounts for 1891 was a misrepresentation of the transaction and prevented time from running under the statute until the true nature of the transaction was discovered. His Lordship then considered the authorities upon this point and came to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the entry in the accounts, the Statute of Limitations afforded a good defence if the period of six years had elapsed between the time when the cause of action accrued and the issue of the writ. As to the larger sum, which found its way into the banking account of the Railways and General Trust Company on August 5, 1890, the cause of action arose at that time, and the period limited by the statute had elapsed when the writ was issued on August 6, 1896. As to the smaller sum, however, the statute was no defence, and it was necessary to consider the circumstances under which the action was brought. At the time when these transactions took place the plaintiff, Mr. Whitwham, was in business as a stockbroker, and he carried them through on behalf of himself and his co-trustees. From the evidence his Lordship inferred that before October, 1890, the plaintiff knew that the money to pay for the Wrexham stock was to come from the funds of the Manchester and Sheffield Company. He therefore, and his co-plaintiffs through him, had notice of the source whence came the purchase money paid to them. In the ordinary course the proper plaintiff to bring an action for the recovery of moneys applied ultra vires would be the company itself, but in certain cases the Court allowed such actions to be brought by one or more shareholders suing on behalf of themselves and all other shareholders of the company. It was said that in the present case the defendant company did not intend to sue, and that was so. The plaintiffs therefore came as shareholders and complained that no action had been brought and insisted that justice should be done as if proper proceedings had been taken in the name of the company. Against whom would such proceedings properly be taken? Against the directors of the company, doubtless, but also, as it seemed to his Lordship, against the plaintiffs themselves. Was it in accordance with justice that this should be permitted? His Lordship thought not. He disapproved of what the defendants had done, but thought that the plaintiffs, into whose pockets the company's money had gone, were not the persons to raise the question. The action would, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

BEEVOR V. MARLER.*

Gaming—Agreement by way of wagering—Deposit with stakeholder—Mistake—Action to recover plaintiff's stake from defendant after stakeholder had paid it over—Judgment for defendant.

This was an appeal from the Yarmouth County Court in a case of a somewhat unusual description.

Mr. G. M. Cohen appeared for the plaintiff, the appellant; Mr. E. Wild for the defendant.

It was stated that the verdict was found for the plaintiff, and judgment was entered for the defendant. The facts were stated to be that the plaintiff made a wager with the defendant that one Thompson would walk 20 miles in four hours. Next day a course of a measured half-mile was marked out on the Yarmouth road. Mr. Watson was the referee for fair walking only. Thompson walked over it 40 times. He, however, exceeded the four hours by 30½ seconds. Thereupon the stakeholder paid over the stakes to the defendant Marler. Thompson, however, was not satisfied, and subsequently the course, in the absence of the defendant, was remeasured. It was then found that there had been a mistake and that the distance really was considerably over 880 yards. The result of this was that Thompson had walked 900 yards more than the 20 miles. It was therefore evident that he had, in fact, covered the 20 miles in four hours. The plaintiff asked for his stake to be returned under these circumstances, but this was refused, and accordingly he brought an action in the County Court to recover his money that had been paid. The County Court Judge asked the jury these questions—first, was the distance measured and walked inaccurate; secondly, did the plaintiff acquiesce in the said distance being accurate? The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, saying, "We think the money ought to be returned." The County Court Judge held that the action was not maintainable, on the ground that it was an action to recover a bet within 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, s. 18, and was not a case where the money was still in the hands of the stakeholder.

Mr. COHEN urged that the County Court Judge was wrong. The plaintiff was not seeking to recover money won, as he was only demanding his own stake back. The Gaming Act did not, therefore, apply. It only applied to recovering money won. He contended that the money had been paid under a mistake, in fact, and was therefore recoverable. He cited "Bize v. Dickason" (1 T.R., at p. 286), "Hodson v. Terrill" (1 Cr. and M., 797), "Strahan v. Universal Stock Exchange" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 697).

Mr. WILD, for the defendant, suggested that the plaintiff had acquiesced in the original measuring. The subsequent measuring in his absence was unsatisfactory. The referee had decided the event; at any rate, the plaintiff was relying on the wager.

Mr. COHEN replied, pointing out that the referee had only to decide whether the walking was fair heel-and-toe walking, and whether the time had expired. He had left the measuring of the distance to the parties themselves.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT said he would say nothing on the point as to whether the Gaming Act of 1845 applied. Apart from that there were two fatal objections to the plaintiff's case. The doctrine that a person could recover money voluntarily paid over without full knowledge of the facts was subject to an exception that a person who had waived all inquiry into the facts could not on subsequently ascertaining fresh facts recover the money. There was in this case evidence that the plaintiff had acquiesced in the correctness of the measurement. In the Judge's notes appeared this passage:—"The referee asked us if we were both satisfied with the measurement, and we both said, 'Yes.'" The second objection was more important and equally decisive against the appellant, who was seeking to get back money against the decision of the referee. So long as the referee's decision stood the appellant could not get behind it.

Mr. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. He had been pressed at one time by the case of "Hampden v. Walsh" (1 Q.B.D., 189), but he thought in this case the events had come off and had been decided by the referee. The Court could not go behind that decision. His Lordship referred to the case of "Cox v. Prentice" (3 M. and S. 344), and pointed out that that was a case of a purchase of silver, and actual property had passed. It was not, therefore, a case of the same class as the present.

Mr. COHEN then made an application for leave to appeal. This was refused, Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT saying that, in view of the mass of authorities to the effect that the Courts ought not to be called on to deal with such cases, it would be better to leave it to the Court of Appeal to give leave if they thought fit.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY V.
DONELLAN.*

Railway—Charges—Siding rent—County Court—Jurisdiction—Arbitration of "differences"—London and North-Western Railway (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891.

This was an appeal from the Deputy County Court Judge at Crewe. The action was one brought by the London and North-Western Railway Company for siding rent. The defence raised was that the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction, because under the London and North-Western Railway (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891, the jurisdiction was given to an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade. The County Court Judge held that he had no jurisdiction, and directed a verdict for the defendant, thinking that the reasonableness of the matter should be determined by an arbitrator. The County Court Judge found that the plaintiffs demanded the siding rent from the defendant, but that he always refused to pay, and, in fact, had never paid it, and that he had always told the company's servant that it was "exorbitant and unjust." In January, 1895, the railway company had issued a circular to all their traders, including the defendant, stating that a charge would be made for the accommodation of trucks when standing on the company's sidings for more than four days. Evidence was given that a charge of 6d. a day per truck after four days had elapsed was made on all traders over the system of the London and North-Western Railway Company. The same charge was made by other railway companies. In cross-examination, the defendant said the charge was exorbitant and unjust, and he objected to pay any sum at all, and he had never paid. The clause on which the County Court Judge had acted was section 5 of the schedule to the order scheduled to the Act, which is as follows:—"The company may charge for the services hereunder mentioned . . . when rendered to a trader at his request or for his convenience a reasonable sum, by way of addition to the tonnage rate. Any difference arising under the section shall be determined by an arbitrator to be appointed by the Board of Trade at the instance of either party. Provided that when, before any service is rendered to a trader, he has given notice in writing to the company that he does not require it, the service shall not be deemed to have been rendered at the trader's request or for his convenience." Among the services specified was the "use or occupation of any accommodation before or after conveyance."

Mr. NOBLE said that the company had given notice of the charge they would make if the trucks were not emptied in the four days. If after this the trader accepted the service he should pay for it.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There was no case for arbitration made out. No difference had arisen, for the defendant refused to pay in toto. There had never been a dispute as to the question whether the four days were reasonable. That was a question which the Railway Commissioners, and not an arbitrator, ought to decide. He referred to several unreported cases on the same subject.

Mr. WILLES CHITTY submitted that the matter was one for arbitration under the section.

The COURT allowed the appeal on the ground that the railway company had served notice on the traders that if they required the wagons to be kept beyond the four days a charge would be made. It was plain that the railway company were not obliged to give these services for nothing. If it were left to the decision of an arbitrator to say what they should be paid it might result in the railway company getting nothing. It was very doubtful if the 5th section had given to traders the protection desired. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs for £27 15s. 6d.

Leave to appeal was given.

MEDWAY V. GREENWICH INLAID LINOLEUM COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant
—Employers' Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1, subs. 3
—Order of person in authority—Evidence for jury.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Kennedy) affirming the judgment of the Greenwich County Court Judge. The action was brought under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The plaintiff was a workman, about 20 years of age, in the employment of the defendants, and he was employed as a linoleum mixer, his duty being to work at a machine which consisted of a box used for mixing certain substances, at the bottom of which was a pair of blades revolving horizontally which mixed the substances and threw up the stuff when mixed. There were two machines at the works, a large one and a small one. In the large one in order to get the mixture out of the box the machine was stopped and the box tilted. In the small one there was a wheel by means of which the machine could be stopped, but the almost universal practice was for the workmen to take the mixture out of the box with their hands while the blades were revolving. The plaintiff had been in the defendants' employment for 2½ years and had been employed in working at the large machine, but he had also worked at the small machine once a fortnight or once a month. When the plaintiff first entered the defendants' employment the foreman, O'Brien, taught him how to work the small machine, but did not tell him how to use the wheel to stop the machine. The foreman himself always took out the mixture with his hands while the blades were revolving. On February 27, 1897, the foreman ordered the plaintiff to mix 9lb. of stuff in the small machine, and after mixing it the plaintiff attempted to take the mixture out with his hands while the blades were revolving, when his right hand was caught by the blades and cut off. The plaintiff brought this action under section 1, subsection 3, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, alleging negligence in the foreman to whose orders or directions he was bound to conform and did conform. There was evidence that it was dangerous to take the mixture out with the hands while the blades were revolving. The action was tried in the County Court, when the following questions were left to the jury :—(1) Was O'Brien a person to whose orders or directions the plaintiff was bound to conform and did conform ? (2) Was O'Brien guilty of negligence in ordering the plaintiff to take out this stuff, knowing that the usual way (in which he expected him to do it) was to clear it from the top without stopping the machine, without warning him ? (3) Did the plaintiff bring the injury upon himself by voluntarily incurring the risk ? The jury answered the first question in the affirmative. In answer to the second question, they said that O'Brien was guilty of not warning the plaintiff and of not giving him instructions as to the proper way of using the machine. To the third question they said that the plaintiff did not voluntarily bring the injury upon himself and could not have appreciated the risk. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with £200 damages. The defendants appealed, and contended that there was no evidence of any order or direction of the foreman to the plaintiff to take out the mixture with his hands, the example of the foreman not being an order or direction ; and that upon the evidence the plaintiff knew that in order to start or stop the machine he must use the wheel, and that he had on previous occasions started and stopped the machine, and that he knew of the danger involved in taking the mixture out with his hands. The plaintiff contended that there was evidence of an order to work the machine coupled with a direction by implication to the plaintiff to use his hands when taking the mixture out without stopping the machine, and that there was no evidence of an agreement by the plaintiff to run the risk so as to make the maxim Volenti non fit injuria applicable within the decision in "Smith v. Baker" ([1891] A.C., 325). The Divisional Court affirmed the judgment of the County Court Judge. The defendants appealed.

Mr. W. S. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. H. Lynn appeared for the defendants ; Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Groser appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the only question was whether there was evidence for the jury that the plaintiff met with the accident under the circumstances stated in section 1, subsection 3, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. According to his view of the evidence, what O'Brien taught the plaintiff to do was to take the mixture out of the machine with his hands while the blades were revolving. There was evidence that this was dangerous. The evidence showed that O'Brien always took out the mixture with his hands without stopping the machine, and the plaintiff saw that he did so. That was the usual way of doing the work. Upon the day in question O'Brien told the plaintiff to work at the machine. What was the meaning of that order ? The clear intention of O'Brien was that the plaintiff should work it as it had been always worked for the last two-and-a-half years. He was inclined to think, though he did not decide it, that if the plaintiff had worked the machine in a different way he would not have obeyed the foreman's order, to which he was bound to conform. That was the interpretation which the plaintiff put upon the order, and in obeying it he had his hand cut off. That brought the case within section 1, subsection 3. As regards the maxim Volenti non fit injuria, if it could be made out that the injured person had agreed to undertake the risk, the maxim would apply. That was for the jury, and they found that the plaintiff did not appreciate the risk. The judgment, therefore, must be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

BUCKWELL V. NORMAN.*

Bankruptcy—Proof—Debts incurred between the act of bankruptcy and receiving order—Notice of act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 37, subsecs. 2 and 3.

When a creditor has had notice of an act of bankruptcy he is not entitled to prove for a debt incurred between the act of bankruptcy and the making of the receiving order; but the debt being in itself a provable debt, the debtor cannot be sued in respect of it.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Kennedy) affirming the judgment of the Brighton County Court Judge in an action by a solicitor upon a bill of costs. The defendant, who already owed the plaintiff a sum for costs, instructed the plaintiff to file his petition in bankruptcy, at the same time stating that he was unable to pay his debts. The plaintiff accordingly did so, and a receiving order was made against the defendant, and he was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt. The plaintiff received in respect of part of the costs incurred in connexion with the filing of the petition the sum of £4 from the defendant's estate, under rule 125 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, which renders the estate liable to the payment of, amongst other things, "the taxed costs of the petitioner." The plaintiff thereupon brought this action against the defendant, claiming the balance of his bill of costs in connexion with the filing of the petition. These costs were incurred before the making of the receiving order. The County Court Judge held that the defendant had committed an act of bankruptcy under section 4, subsection 1 (h), by stating to the plaintiff, who was a creditor, that he was unable to pay his debts, and he held that the plaintiff could not recover. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. FIRMINGER (Mr. E. Rowen Rowlands with him), for the plaintiff, contended that the plaintiff, having had notice at the time when the costs were incurred that the defendant had committed an act of bankruptcy under section 4, subsection 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, could not prove in the bankruptcy in respect of these costs (section 37, subsection 2). Section 9 only prevented an action from being brought against a debtor, against whom a receiving order had been made, in respect of debts provable in bankruptcy, and, therefore, as this debt was not provable, the plaintiff could sue for these costs. By section 30 an order of discharge only released a bankrupt from debts provable in bankruptcy.

Mr. E. T. HOLLOWAY, for the defendant, contended that this was a debt provable in bankruptcy under section 37, subsection 3, though the plaintiff, who had notice of an act of bankruptcy when the debt was incurred, was personally disqualified by section 37 subsection 2, from proving in respect of it.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the question was whether the debt which the plaintiff sought to recover in this action was a debt provable in the bankruptcy of the defendant within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. In his opinion these costs, having been incurred between the act of bankruptcy and the making of the receiving order, were a debt provable in the bankruptcy under section 37, subsection 3, of the Bankruptcy Act. Subsection 2 cast an incapacity for proving a debt on any person who at the time when the debt was incurred had notice of an available act of bankruptcy having been committed. This was a positive enactment that such a person should not prove. Though the debt was in itself a provable debt, any one who had notice of an act of bankruptcy was personally incapacitated from proving it. But, the debt being a provable debt, the debtor could not be sued in respect of it, and the decision of the Queen's Bench Division must therefore be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY was of the same opinion. It seemed at first sight a strange proposition that there could be a debt provable in bankruptcy which could not be proved. But he thought that such was the true construction of the Act. It was clear from section 168, the interpretation clause, and from subsection 3 of section 37, that debts incurred between the act of bankruptcy and the making of the receiving order, such as the debt claimed in this action, were provable in bankruptcy. Subsection 2 of section 37 enacted a personal exception in the case of a man who had notice of an act of bankruptcy. The result was that these costs were a provable debt, but the personal exception contained in subsection 2 prohibited the plaintiff from proving. He therefore agreed that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS was also of the same opinion. In order that a debt could be proved in a bankruptcy two things must concur—the debt itself must be a provable debt, and the person seeking to prove it must not be incapacitated from proving it. It was necessary to draw a distinction between the question as to the quality of the debt itself, whether or not it was a provable debt, and the question as to the personal capacity of the person who sought to prove it, whether or not he had notice of an act of bankruptcy. He thought that was the natural as well as the logical interpretation of the language of the Act.

SPENCER V. LANCASHIRE, &C., RAILWAY COMPANY.*
Railway—Passenger fares—Cheap Trains Act, 1883, sec. 6.

A railway company is not bound to supply a ticket at a reduced fare under sec. 6 of the Cheap Trains Act, 1883, to a police constable when travelling as an inspector under the Weights and Measures Act, 1878.

This was an appeal from the Manchester County Court Judge, sitting without a jury, in an action brought against the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company for the return of 2d., which the plaintiff had paid in consequence of the company's refusal to give him a ticket at a reduced fare under the provisions of section 6 of the Cheap Trains Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict., c. 34). The plaintiff was inspector under the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and he was also a constable in the county force. On the day in question he was travelling on duty connected with the inspectorship. He was made to pay the full fare and not a reduced fare. The County Court Judge held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the difference.

Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. E. W. Jordan appeared for the appellant, the plaintiff; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. T. F. Byrne for the respondents.

The facts were these. The plaintiff was for many years a constable in the county force, and in November, 1890, he was appointed an inspector under the Weights and Measures Act, 1878. On December 1, 1896, the plaintiff went from Ormskirk to Liverpool with an assistant on duty connected with weights and measures principally. He produced a "route" signed by a police officer, and claimed a ticket at three-quarters of the ordinary fare. The route was admitted to be "a route duly signed by a police authority," but it was not admitted that the plaintiff was travelling on police duty. Spencer stated that he was under the control of the chief constable and the superintendent of his division. When on duty inspecting weights and measures he had on several occasions acted as constable and had made arrests when away on such duties. His salary was paid by Superintendent Jervis, of the county police. Any fees he took he handed to his superintendent. He was paid out of the county fund, but not out of the police fund. The County Court Judge thought the police ought not to be appointed inspectors, and he referred to section 19 of 3 and 4 Vict., c. 88, under which the appointment had been made, and to section 10 of 2 and 3 Vict., c. 93, which enacted that constables were to be restrained from employing themselves other than as policemen. At any rate, this inspector was not travelling as a policeman, and it was only travelling as such that came within the Act. The material words of the Cheap Trains Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict., c. 34, section 6) were these:—"For the purpose of moving by railway on any occasion of the public service . . . (c) any officers or men of the police force . . . every railway company shall on the production of a route duly signed for the conveyance of forces provide conveyance for them . . . on such terms as may be agreed on between the railway company and the Secretary of State, Admiralty, or police authority," and in default on the terms specified in the remainder of the section.

MR. PICKFORD said that up to last year the companies had always carried these inspectors at a cheap rate. Then they had consulted together and determined to refuse the allowance of reduced fares. The plaintiff on this occasion was travelling for the public service.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT suggested that he was only travelling for the service of the county. The service of the county might not be public service, even in the case of police.

MR. PICKFORD contended that this was public service. If the movements of police were not included, what was the good of putting the police into the section at all. He was travelling to perform duties imposed on him by statute. He contended that all policemen travelling on duty were obviously entitled to travel at the reduced rate. The railway companies admitted that. The plaintiff, a policeman, was travelling on the public service. The Act did not say that the policeman must be travelling as a policeman.

The COURT, without calling on the counsel for the railway company, dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said it might be well not to express an opinion on anything not directly raised in the case. It was enough to say that, in his opinion, the Cheap Trains Act did not apply to inspectors of weights and measures travelling as such.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. He very much doubted whether the railway companies had not already conceded more than they need have done. The appeal must be dismissed.

FOXWELL AND OTHERS V. VAN GRUTTEN.*

Will—Construction—Devise of real estate—Estate tail—Gift over—Purchase.

This was an action brought to recover possession of certain lands in Cornwall. The case was originally tried in June, 1895, at Bodmin, before Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams and a special jury, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed, and the case was carried up to the House of Lords, the result being that a new trial was ordered. The case is reported in [1897] A.C., 658. The second trial came on at the recent assizes at Bodmin, before Mr. Justice Bigham and a special jury, and the case was subsequently argued in town before his Lordship.

MR. ALDERSON FOOTE, Q.C., and Mr. H. E. DUKE appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Lord Coleridge, Q.C., Mr. E. U. Bullen, and Mr. T. H. CARSON represented the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM read the following judgment:—"This action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover possession of an estate in Cornwall known as Rosewarne, and they claimed alternatively as being the heirs of one William Harris or of Mary his daughter and only child. The defendant pleaded possession. The material facts are as follows:—William Harris (whom I shall afterwards refer to as the testator) died on December 8, 1815, being at that date seised in fee simple in possession of the estate in question. By his will dated October 31, 1804, he devised the same to his child or children for an estate in fee tail. He died in 1815, leaving an only child, Mary, who afterwards—viz., on September 30, 1819—married one Winchcombe Hartley. By him she had one son—namely, William Henry Hartley, who was born on January 1, 1823. Mary survived her husband, and died on October 22, 1868, and her son, William Henry Hartley, died intestate on June 27, 1894, without leaving any heirs of his body. The plaintiffs are the heirs of the testator and of his daughter Mary. These facts were admitted by the defendant. The plaintiffs contended that the testator had not by his will disposed of the fee simple expectant on the determination of the estate tail, and that therefore they, as his heirs, were entitled, and, further, they contended (in the alternative) that the fee simple was devised by the will of the testator to his daughter Mary, who took the same as devisee (that is, as purchaser) within the Inheritance Act, and that, as she never disposed of the estate, it devolved at her death on her heirs, whom the plaintiffs also were. The main contention on the part of the defendant was that by the testator's will the fee simple (expectant on the determination of the estate tail given to Mary) was disposed of to her son William Henry, whose heirs the plaintiffs were not; and they contended, further, that if by the will the fee simple expectant as aforesaid was disposed of to Mary, yet she by the exercise of a power contained in her marriage settlement effectually disposed of it away from the plaintiffs and their ancestors. I understood that the defendant was the representative of the child or children of Winchcombe Hartley by a wife whom he had married before his marriage with Mary Harris. It appears from the foregoing that very much turns on the construction of the testator's will. His Lordship then referred to the terms of the will by which the testator left the lands in question to trustees upon trust to receive the rents for the benefit of the child or children living at his death and to apply the same in their maintenance, and from the date of such child or children attaining the age of 21 or marrying, upon trust to permit them to take the rents for life, and from and immediately after the death of such child or children the trustees were to stand possessed of the lands therein before devised "unto and to the use of the heirs of the body and bodies of such child or children lawfully begotten; if more than one, to be equally divided between them, such freehold lands . . . to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of my child or children in equal shares as they shall severally and respectively attain the age of 21 years or be married, and to their several and respective heirs and assigns for ever." His Lordship then continued:—Now this will has already been the subject of much legal argument and of one clear decision. The plaintiffs issued their writ within a few months of the death of William Henry Hartley—viz., on February 27, 1895—and by their original statement of claim, delivered on March 7, 1895, they claimed only as being the heirs of the testator, and not in the alternative as being the heirs of Mary. With the pleadings in this state the action came on for trial before Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams on June 13 and 14, 1895. At that trial the plaintiffs proved to the satisfaction of the jury that they were the heirs of the testator, and the finding on that point has remained undisturbed. The plaintiffs then claimed judgment on the ground that under the testator's will Mary took an estate tail, which came to an end upon the death of her son, and that the remainder in fee expectant on the determination of such estate tail was undisposed of by the testator, and therefore went to the plaintiffs as his heirs. On the other hand, the defendants claimed judgment, contending that on the true construction of the will Mary took only an estate for life, with remainder in fee simple to her son William Henry, whose heirs the plaintiffs were not. The defendant also put in evidence a disentailing assurance dated February 28, 1835, made by Mary Hartley, and duly acknowledged by her on March 2, 1835, and said that, even if she took an estate tail under the will of the testator, yet by the execution of this disentailing deed she became entitled to the fee simple, and that the estate would therefore descend to her heirs, and he pointed out that the plaintiffs had not by their pleadings claimed as such. To this disentailing deed the plaintiffs made answer by proving that Mary had by inquisition dated December 7, 1843, been found lunatic as from October 31, 1834, and the learned Judge accepted this as satisfactory evidence that she was at the date of the disentailing deed not mentally fit to execute it. In these circumstances the learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, holding in effect that Mary took an estate tail which she never barred, and which came to an end on the death of her son William Henry, leaving the fee expectant on the determination thereof undisposed of by the testator. His Lordship then dealt with the history of the case in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords, in which Courts the decision of Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams as to the construction of the will was upheld, but a new trial was ordered by the House of Lords on the question of her sanity. The House of Lords also inferred that the plaintiffs were the heirs of Mary as well as of the testator, and permitted the claim to be amended accordingly. His Lordship continued:—Accordingly the case came before me at Bodmin for a new trial, and a special jury was impanelled to try it. Then an entirely new position was taken by the defendant. The plaintiffs began by putting in a quantity of documentary evidence for the purpose of proving that Mary was incapable of executing any deed after October 31, 1834—evidence which, if it were accepted as satisfactory, would have the effect of displacing the disentailing deed of February, 1835. No witness was called, and the plaintiffs closed their case. Thereupon the defendant's counsel declined to address the jury, and in effect submitted to, and, indeed, I think, invited, the verdict which the jury, after my summing up, returned—viz., that Mary Hartley was incapable of making any will or deed as from October 31, 1834. No doubt the defendant had his reasons for taking this course, and, as Mr. Haldane frankly admits, he went to trial at Bodmin having made up his mind to take it. He tendered in evidence no will of Mary Hartley, because, no doubt, there was no will in existence which he could produce. Thus the new trial directed by the House of Lords was of no service to any one. It left the case exactly where it was when Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams delivered his judgment; the whole question once more depending upon the true construction of the testator's will, with this point, however, finally decided—viz., that whatever else the will did, it certainly gave to Mary an estate tail and not an estate for life. The point now taken by the defendant before me, and taken for the first time, is that the testator by his will disposed of the remainder in fee expectant on the determination of the estate tail in favour of the child or children of Mary, the devise to take effect on the child or children attaining the age of 21 or marrying, and he says that William Henry on the death of his mother, he being then of age, became by the operation of the will the last purchaser. The main question in the case is whether that is or is not the true construction of the will. The words in the will upon which the defendants more particularly rely are the following:—"Such lands to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of my child or children in equal shares as they shall severally and respectively attain the age of 21 years or be married, and to their several and respective heirs and assigns for ever." The plaintiffs contend that these words either (1) are repugnant to the previous provisions of the will giving an estate tail to Mary, or (2) amount simply to a discretion to the trustees to convey the legal estate tail to William Henry Hartley on his attaining 21, he being equitable tenant in tail at that time. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that the words in question amount to a direction to convey to William Henry Hartley in fee simple expectant on the determination of the estate tail, which he says amounts to an executory devise of such fee simple in remainder to William Henry Hartley. His Lordship next referred to the judgments in the House of Lords which incidentally dealt with this point, although it had not been raised in argument. Their Lordships' judgments on this point, with the exception of that of Lord Davey, supported the view now contended for by the defendant. Lord Macnaghten, at p. 679 of [1897] A.C., said, "The gift is not nor was it, I think, intended to be, in defeasance of the estate tail. What the testator says in effect is this:—'If one or more of my descendants, being tenant in tail, or tenants in tail in possession, should marry or attain 21, I cancel all ulterior limitations in favour of collaterals, and give him or them the fee simple expectant on the determination of the estate tail.'" Mr. Justice Bigham continued:—I have come to the conclusion that I ought to give effect to Lord Macnaghten's view, and for these reasons. Applying the rule as to the construction of a will laid down by Lord Macnaghten in an earlier part of his judgment, I find in the first place that Lord Macnaghten's interpretation of the clause in question gives full and literal effect to every word in it, for it cannot be denied that a direction to trustees (in whom the estate is vested) at a certain time to convey the estate to a designated person, "his heirs and assigns for ever," is a substantive gift of the fee simple to such designated person. Nor do I think this construction leads to any absurdity; an unusual thing is not necessarily absurd. Now Lord Davey's judgment involves giving the go-by to the expression "heirs and assigns," and treats the clause as if those words were not there. No doubt there is ample authority for saying that such words must be disregarded if they are introduced into a clause by which an estate tail is created, but that is because they are clearly inconsistent with the existence of such an estate. Here they are not introduced in such a connexion; they are found in a different part of the document, and are capable of bearing an interpretation which is inconsistent with nothing that has gone before. The words do not seek to modify the legal effect of the gift to the heirs of the body in the previous passage, but amount to a gift of a new estate—viz., the reversion in fee simple to the tenant in tail at a certain time. Another reason why this is not an absurdity is that the testator may well have desired to put his grandchild on attaining his majority in a position to deal with the fee simple without having recourse to the cumbrous and expensive procedure of suffering a recovery. But the plaintiffs say that the interpretation suggested by Lord Macnaghten is inconsistent with the scheme of the will, which provides, according to them, for the creation of a continuous succession of estates tail, each one taking effect on the determination of the preceding one. This, however, is not so, for the words of the will are—"And if it shall happen that I shall depart this life leaving no child or children or issue of any child or children, or if such child or children as I shall leave and the issue of such child or children shall die before he, she or they shall attain the age of 21 years or be married." Now, these words do not point to a gift over upon the determination of Mary's estate tail, but only point to a gift over in the event of the grandchild not attaining 21—that is to say, in my opinion, in the event of his not acquiring the fee under the preceding clause. So far, therefore, from Lord Macnaghten's interpretation being inconsistent with the scheme of the will, it would appear to give effect to its intention. The plaintiffs further contend that if the grandchild is to be held as taking the reversion of the fee he does so not as purchaser, but as heir, because they say the rule in Shelley's case applies and vests this reversion in Mary, to whom by the same will an estate tail is given. The answer, however, to this contention is two-fold. First, the devise is, in my opinion, an executory devise and not a remainder, because it was to take effect during the continuance of the estate tail; and, secondly, the beneficiaries under the devise were not the heirs of the body at large but designated individuals of that class. Either of these circumstances is sufficient to prevent the operation of the rule in Shelley's case. The conclusion to which I have arrived on this point makes it unnecessary that I should deal with the second point taken by the defendants; but inasmuch as it was argued before me I will express my opinion upon it. The defendant said that even if the testator's will had the effect of leaving the reversion in fee undisposed of, so that in the event which happened it went to Mary as his heir, yet she, by the exercise of a power reserved to her, as defendant says, under her marriage settlement of 1819, disposed of it by a will made in 1824. On the construction of the power, having regard to the whole settlement, and especially to the clauses immediately following the words of the power, I am of opinion that no power of appointment was here intended to be given, but if any such power was given it was a power to be exercised only after the death of Mary's husband; and the will relied on was therefore ineffectual to dispose of the estate. As to the costs, I think the defendant quite needlessly brought the plaintiff down to Bodmin. (See Lord Herschell's judgment). As soon as he had made up his mind that he was going to call no evidence on the question of Mary's insanity and would accept the plaintiff's contention on that question, he should have said so, and there would then have been no trial at all at Bodmin. He must pay the plaintiff the costs of the trial there, and, inasmuch as the point upon which he now succeeds might have been taken by him at the very beginning of this long litigation, I do not think I do him an injustice by leaving him to pay his own costs of the arguments before me in London.

His LORDSHIP granted a stay of execution pending an appeal.

Decision of Court of Appeal ([1896] 1 Ch., 726) reversed.

Their Lordships gave judgment in the above appeal, which was argued on November 11 and 12 last. The case before the Court of Appeal is reported [1896] 1 Ch., 726; 65 L.J., Ch., 486. The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Lord Herschell. In the year 1888 Edward Joshua Walker had contracted to purchase the business and assets of the firm of Walkers, Parker, Co., for the sum of £502,000, and was required to pay into Court a deposit of £25,000 on account of such purchase. By an agreement made June 20, 1888, between E. J. Walker of the one part, and Lord Henry Paulet, Sir John Willoughby, and Arthur Kennedy of the other part, E. J. Walker charged all his present and future interest in his purchase contract with the payment of the moneys subscribed by the persons named, and the bonuses thereon, and it was further provided that the subscribers should, as between themselves, rank rateably and pari passu as against the property thereby charged for the sum subscribed by them respectively and the bonuses thereon. The sum of £25,000 required for the deposit was paid by the subscribers upon the terms of the agreement, and was applied in payment of the deposit. The amount paid by Kennedy was £6,000, in respect of which he became entitled to the benefit of the agreement of June 20, as a security for the repayment of that sum with a bonus of equal amount, making together £12,000. The amount subscribed by Sir John Willoughby was £10,000 and by Lord Henry Paulet £9,000. On September 21, 1888, by an agreement of that date, Kennedy charged all his interest under the agreement referred to and the money and bonuses thereby secured with the payment to John Norton of sums amounting altogether to £6,200. Notice in writing of this charge was, on October 24, 1888, duly given to E. J. Walker, and acknowledged by him. In the month of January, 1889, E. J. Walker sold the greater part of the property which he had contracted to purchase from the firm of Walkers, Parker, and Co. to a company called Walkers, Parker, and Co. (Limited) for the sum of £850,000, payable as to £550,000 in cash and as to £300,000 in shares of the Walker Company of £10 each fully paid up. In April, 1889, £5,122 was paid to Kennedy by the Walker Company by the direction of E. J. Walker, and in June, 1890, certain property at Bagillt, in Wales, of the value of £5,000, included in the original purchase, was conveyed to Kennedy. This payment and conveyance must be taken as both Courts below have held to have been made and executed without the knowledge and concurrence of Norton. By a deed dated August 7, 1890, Kennedy assigned all moneys receivable or recoverable by him under the agreement of June 20, 1888, to Lord Windsor, upon certain trusts therein declared for securing the payment of all moneys then owing to him by Kennedy. By two other deeds, dated December 20, 1890, and June 18, 1891, all the interest of Kennedy under the agreement of June, 1888, and the benefit of the deed of August 7, 1890, became vested in Robert Forrest, upon trust to apply all moneys received or realized from the property comprised in the agreement, in payment of all moneys then owing by Kennedy to Lord Windsor, and to pay any surplus to Kennedy. The deed, as to the effect of which the controversy between the parties has arisen, was made between Forrest of the first part, Norton of the second part, Lord Windsor of the third part, the Capital Finance Company of the fourth part, and the appellant company of the fifth part. It recited a contract for sale to the Capital Finance Company, at the price of £6,000, of certain property, including all the interest of Lord Windsor or of Norton in the premises comprised in and charged by the agreement of June 20, 1888, and that this contract, so far as regarded Norton's rights, was entered into by Lord Windsor with his privity and approbation and upon the terms that he should receive £1,000, part of the purchase money of £6,000. It further recited a contract of sub-purchase by the appellant company from the Capital Finance Company. The deed witnessed that John Norton, "at the request of Lord Windsor, and in respect of his rights, powers, benefits, and interests under the said agreement of September 21, 1888, and as mortgagee," thereby assigned and Lord Windsor and Forrest also assigned, "all the estate and interest of the said Lord Windsor, John Norton, or Robert Forrest of and in the interest formerly of the said Arthur John Clarke Kennedy in or under the said agreement of June 20, 1888, and the moneys and bonuses thereby secured to hold the same unto the said Liquidation Estates Purchase Company (Limited) absolutely." It was declared by the deed that if Norton and Lord Windsor or either of them had a power of sale over the premises the deed should operate as a conveyance upon a sale in exercise of such power. The respondent, Sir John Willoughby, in June, 1889, instituted an action against Lord Henry Paulet, Kennedy, and others to realize his security under the agreement of June 20, 1888. John Norton was not a party to that action. Certain funds having been brought into Court representing the proceeds of the property charged by the agreement, a distribution of such funds was ordered, upon the footing of Kennedy having already received the sum of £10,122 on account of his share. Further sums were subsequently brought into Court, and the appellants, who until that time had had no notice of the action, obtained leave to attend the proceedings. The respondent, Sir John Willoughby, and the persons claiming under Lord Henry Paulet, contended that such further funds belonged to them, inasmuch as they had not received an amount equal to that received by Kennedy if he were bound to bring into account the sum of £10,122. It being considered incompetent for the appellants to enforce their rights as transferees of Norton's security in that action, the present action was instituted, and the defendants in this action were enjoined from obtaining the transfer or payment of the funds in "Willoughby v. Paulet" until this action could be disposed of. At the trial of the action Mr. Justice North came to a conclusion adverse to the appellants, and this judgment was affirmed by a majority of the Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Kay dissenting.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Dauney, and Mr. E. Ford were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. W. C. Druce for the respondents.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The facts out of which this appeal arises may be very simply stated. The business and assets of a mercantile firm were for sale in the year 1888, and a Mr. Walker had procured the sale to himself of the business and assets for the sum of £502,000. He was, however, under the obligation of bringing into Court the sum of £25,000. This he did not possess, and accordingly he procured the assistance of Lord Henry Paulet, who advanced £9,000; Sir John Willoughby, who advanced £10,000; and Mr. Arthur Kennedy, who advanced £6,000. The £25,000 was advanced under a bargain, among other things that the lenders should be repaid their advances rateably together with certain other advantages in proportion to their advances. The whole arrangement assumed that Walker was to manage the whole adventure and to be the recipient of the money paid and to distribute it in pursuance of the agreement when obtained. Three months after the date of this agreement Kennedy, who had advanced £6,000, charged his interest in the agreement to one Norton for the sum of £6,200. Of this charge Walker received due notice, and at the beginning of the following year Walker succeeded in reselling the property for £850,000. In the April following, Walker, notwithstanding Norton's notice, thought proper to hand over to Kennedy £5,122, and conveyed property to him which is assumed to be worth £5,000. I do not understand it to be denied that this payment, or, to speak more accurately, this handing over to Kennedy of what Walker had received, notwithstanding his knowledge of Norton's charge, was a breach of Walker's duty, something that he had no right to do, and for which he had neither received any authority from Norton, and of which, indeed, Norton had no knowledge. I desire to treat this part of the case as entirely independent of questions which arise upon further arrangements by Kennedy a year afterwards. But, stopping at this point, I am unable to understand in what way Walker's improper use of his possession of the property realized by the resale can affect Norton's rights or any person claiming under Norton. If, instead of handing it over to Kennedy, he had been robbed of it, and all that remained of the property was insufficient to pay all the persons having rights under it, why should Kennedy's assignee be in a less favourable position for receiving his proportionate amount because the whole fund had been diminished by the unlawful act of the robber? Can it make any difference that Walker, in defiance of his duty, thought proper to divert a certain sum of money from the gross fund in favour of Kennedy at a time when to his knowledge Kennedy had no right to receive it? What Norton, in right of Kennedy's previous rights, was entitled to was the amount of his debt from Kennedy, and why Norton should be selected as the victim of a loss to which he in no way contributed I am unable to understand. Lord Justice Lindley uses the phrase that he did not understand why Norton's loss should be thrown on the other adventurers. It appears to me that the words "Norton's loss" involve the fallacious assumption that in some way or another the share which had once belonged to Kennedy, and which by the hypothesis at the time of the handing over to Kennedy no longer belonged to him, must be so earmarked as already Norton's—that it becomes Norton's loss; but this I think is erroneous. If the whole fund created has been pro tanto diminished by an unlawful act of the person who by the agreement of all the parties was the custodian of the money, and the person through whose hands it was to be distributed, it appears to me that the observation to which I have referred might be retorted, and it might with propriety be asked—Why should the part of the loss which was a loss to the whole fund be appropriated to one particular adventurer? No one has ever yet explained what Norton did or what Norton omitted to do which made him more responsible for a loss of any part of the fund than any other one of the adventurers, and I am therefore of opinion that on this part of the case the judgment of the majority of the Court below is erroneous. So far, although I respectfully dissent from the conclusion, I understand the argument. The money and property handed over to Kennedy are assumed to be payments to Kennedy which he had a right to receive, and by that process Norton's claims were pro tanto defeated. I fear that with respect to the remaining part of the case I have some difficulty in understanding the ground of the decision. Kennedy in 1890 executed a deed assigning to Lord Windsor whatever he was entitled to under the original bargain of 1888. As I have already said, I think he was entitled to nothing at the date of that assignment except what remained to him after discharging the debt due to Norton. By a subsequent deed, through the medium of a company called the Capital and Finance Company (Limited), the present appellants purchased Lord Windsor's interest and Norton's interest under the original bargain of 1888. Lord Windsor took, and could only take, from Kennedy what Kennedy had left after his assignment to Norton. But the appellant company purchased for £1,000 Norton's interest which had been created by Kennedy on September 21, 1880. Some litigation had arisen in which Norton's rights were held not to be capable of being enforced, and accordingly this action was brought to enforce those rights against the funds that had been deposited in Court—the practical question in the cause being whether in taking the account of what was due to Norton the moneys and property handed over to Kennedy could be taken into account as being payment of Norton's claim. I am unable to follow the reasoning for one or two grounds. In the first place the thing assigned and of which title was conveyed to Lord Windsor was not the whole sum and could not have been the whole sum which was due to Kennedy under the original bargain, but only so much of it as remained after providing for £6,200 due to Norton. The thing assigned by Norton was that original sum and I am unable to follow what merger is supposed to arise when Norton sold one sum of money with right to it, and Lord Windsor sold another sum of money or the right to it. So far as the deed itself is concerned, I can see no indication of anything but an intention of two different vendors to sell two different things to the same vendor. Nor am I quite certain that I understand what is meant by extinguishing Norton's interest, or how, if such a thing could be done, there is any indication of any intention to do it. Norton's title to what he originally got seems to me to be untouched by anything disclosed in the course of the narrative. He has sold that interest to the appellant company for £1,000, and it appears to me, therefore, that the appellants are entitled to a decree for that interest whatever that may be; and in arriving at that amount it is wholly impossible to treat the moneys handed over to Kennedy as moneys paid to Norton. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed, and the account taken upon the basis I have described—viz., that up to the amount which is due to Norton the appellant company are entitled to obtain their proportionate amounts of what is due under the bargain of 1888, and I move your Lordships accordingly. The respondents, of course, must pay the costs both here and below.

LORD HERSCHELL, after expressing his dissent from the reasoning of the majority of the Court of Appeal and observing that an assignee could not be made responsible for the wrongful act of an assignor after notice of the assignment had been given, concluded as follows:—In view of the nature of the interests assigned by Norton and Lord Windsor respectively, to which I have called attention, I find it difficult to understand how the doctrine of merger, on which "Toulmin v. Steere" ([1817] 3 Mer., 210) rested, can have any application in the present case. Assuming the appellant company to be purchasers from Lord Windsor, what was the nature of the so-called "property" which they purchased? It could be no more than this—the right which Kennedy possessed on August 7, 1890, under the agreement of June, 1888. What was vested in Norton, and what he assigned was the right which Kennedy possessed on September 21, 1888, under the agreement just referred to, to the amount of the debt due to Norton. How could the right which Norton thus assigned merge in what the appellants bought from Lord Windsor? It seems to me that it can only be necessary to show an intention to keep alive that which would otherwise cease to exist by reason of merger. In any other case, the assignment of itself vests the right assigned in the assignee, and it remains in him unextinguished. But, further, I am unable to see any ground for the conclusion that Norton's interest was transferred in order to be extinguished. There is, in my opinion, nothing on the face of the deed, or in the nature of the transaction, to show such an intention. If this had been the intention, I think, having regard to the nature of the interests possessed by the parties to the conveyance, the instrument would have been differently framed. Reliance was placed by the majority of the Judges in the Court below on what was called "the speculative character of Norton's claim against the other lenders," and in another part of the judgment it was said that "the opportunity of making a very doubtful claim against third parties" was not such a benefit as to give rise to the presumption of an intention to keep alive Norton's charge. I think these expressions indicate an erroneous view of the nature of Norton's rights. In my opinion no claim of Norton against third parties, by which is meant the other lenders, is in question. Nor do I think his rights are open to any doubt. He was entitled to claim payment to the amount due to him out of the fund in Walker's hands in respect of Kennedy's original charge pari passu with the other lenders who had a charge on that fund. If a part of this fund had been improperly applied by Walker, and the fund thus diminished, Norton was entitled in virtue of the assignment of Kennedy to a rateable proportion of what remained pari passu with the other lenders. He was no more affected by its improper application than they were, and there is no more reason in point of law, or as it seems to me in point of justice or equity either, why the loss should fall on him rather than on them. For these reasons I am unable to see any ground for holding that the assignment to the appellant company by Norton of all his rights in Kennedy's interest under the agreement of June 20, 1888, and the moneys and benefits thereby secured did not vest that entire interest in them and give them precisely the rights which he possessed at the time of the conveyance. If it were necessary to hold that Norton's right was kept alive under the conveyance of 1893, there appears to me ample reason for so holding, inasmuch as it would be obviously for the benefit of the appellant company to keep alive Norton's interest so that they might not be affected by any transactions of Kennedy, subsequent to his assignment to Norton, and prior to his assignment to Lord Windsor. For these reasons, I think the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed, and that the order made by Mr. Justice North on July 10, 1895, should be varied by stating that the payments to Kennedy are not to be taken into account in ascertaining the amounts to which the plaintiffs are entitled in respect of Kennedy's interest under the agreement of June 20, 1888, until the plaintiffs have received an amount equal to the sum which was on March 17, 1893, due to John Norton. I think the respondents must pay the costs in this House and in the Courts below.

Contract—Contract to make a loan—Breach—Damages.

Decision of Court of Appeal (13 The Times
L.R., 361, and [1897] 1 Q.B., 692) affirmed.

The House heard the arguments in this appeal (which is reported 13 The Times L.R., 361; [1897] 1 Q.B., 692; and 66 L.J., Q.B., 551) on November 29 and 30 last, and reserved judgment. The following statement of facts is from the judgment of Lord Watson.

The appellant company, in September, 1895, invited tenders for a loan of £75,000, to be secured by the issue of first mortgage debentures for £50, and bearing interest at 6 per cent., repayable with a bonus of £5 10s. on each debenture on September 30, 1900. The whole floating assets of the company were to be conveyed to trustees, for behoof and for security of the bondholders. Ten per cent. of his advance to the company was to be paid by the subscriber upon application for an allotment, and the balance in four subsequent instalments. The respondent applied for an allotment of 16 debentures, representing an advance of £800, and with his application remitted the sum of £30. His offer was duly accepted and the remittance retained by the company. The respondent having declined to make any further advance, the present action was brought against him by the company for payment of a capital sum which they claimed (1) as in specific performance of his obligation; (2) as the balance of the price which he had undertaken to pay for the debentures; and (3) as damages which they had sustained by his breach of contract. Mr. Justice Wright gave judgment for the company for the price of the debentures, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Sir R. Reid, Q.C., Mr. C. Herbert Smith, and Mr. H. D. Woodcock were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Reginald Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Gore Browne for the respondents.

The appeal was dismissed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The terms which have been contrived for the business of joint stock companies and which, when applied to their proper purposes, are convenient, are nevertheless somewhat calculated to mislead when their mere language is regarded. The applicant for debentures on the face of the instrument contracts to pay something, but the real nature of the whole transaction is an agreement by the applicant to lend money at certain interest, and the action in this case was in truth mainly, if not altogether, directed to compel the intending lender to perform his contract to lend, which undoubtedly he had refused and neglected to do. With respect to the claim for specific performance, a long and uniform course of decision has prevented the application of any such remedy, and I do not understand that any Court or any member of any Court has entertained a doubt but that the refusal of the learned Judge below to grant a decree for specific performance was perfectly right. But, of course, in this, like any other contract, one party to the contract has a right to complain that the other party has broken it, and if he establishes that proposition he is entitled to such damages as are appropriate to the nature of the contract. In this case, as I have said, the contract was to lend money. Referring to the question of damages, the amount of interest to be paid for the loan, and the fact that £80 was under the contract itself forfeited to the company for the non-performance of the contract in its entirety, render it difficult to see what substantial damages could have been recovered, and I regret that under the circumstances it should have been thought advisable to appeal to your Lordships in a case which, upon a review of the facts, does not appear in any view of it to have been worth the expense necessarily involved in such an appeal. Your Lordships were informed that it took seven minutes to try, with the result that it has now been to two Courts of Appeal, and, but for what I am about to say, might have resulted in a new trial. Upon a careful review, however, of the facts I have come to the conclusion that it would be impossible to suggest any serious damages in this case, and the tacit admission of the parties by their declining to consider the question of a new trial upon payment of costs renders it unnecessary for me to do more than to say that in this case justice has been done by the Court of Appeal reversing the decision of the learned Judge below. I think it right, however, to add that if any serious right were involved, or if it was reasonably possible that injustice had been done, I should have felt myself at liberty to give my opinion in favour of a new trial. I agree that in this case the parties had in a great measure themselves to blame, but I think the blame was not entirely theirs, and where a miscarriage has taken place by errors in procedure I think the proper remedy is to make the party in default pay for his error in the shape of costs and not to deprive him of important rights, if any such exist. Of course, where error in procedure leads to altering the position of the other litigant party, it may well be that mere payment of costs will not do justice, and in such cases the party in default must suffer. But, speaking generally, a blunder in procedure, if it can be set right, and if important rights are involved, receives its most appropriate penalty on being made the subject of an order for costs. I think, therefore, in this case that the appeal ought to be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON, after stating the facts as above, said:—The only engagement made by the respondent with the company consisted in a promise to advance money to them on loan; and it is settled in the law of England that such a promise cannot sustain a suit for specific performance. It is equally clear, in my opinion, that the obligation of the company to issue mortgage bonds against the loan did not in any way alter or affect the character of the transaction or give the company any right to sue as for the price of an article sold by them which they were ready to deliver. The only remedy open to the company was by action against the respondent for any loss or damage which they might sustain through his breach of promise. The case was tried before Mr. Justice Wright, who gave the company a decree for the price of the debentures which the respondent had agreed to take up. I cannot say that the trial was satisfactory. The proceedings were chiefly occupied by a discussion between the learned Judge and the respondent's counsel, in the course of which the former indicated the terms of the order which he meant to pronounce. No evidence of damage was tendered by the appellant company. An appeal was taken by the respondent upon a notice of motion that the decree of Mr. Justice Wright should be reversed or varied, and that judgment should be entered for him or a new trial allowed. At the hearing of the appeal counsel for the company urged the first and second of the claims made by them, and did not refer to their claim of damages. After the judgment of the Appeal Court was delivered, reversing the order appealed from and entering judgment for the respondent, counsel, in the absence of the head of the Court, moved two Lords Justices to remit the case for trial of the question of damage. Their Lordships declined to entertain the application. On the hearing of this appeal, counsel for the company again pressed upon your Lordships the desperate arguments which they had addressed to the Court of Appeal, and moved your Lordships to send back the case, in order that the company might have an opportunity of proving damage. I do not doubt that it is within the discretion of the House to grant or refuse that motion; but I am very clearly of opinion that, in the circumstances of this case, that discretion ought not to be exercised in favour of the appellants, and that the order appealed from ought to be affirmed, with costs.

LORD HERSCHELL gave judgment to the same effect.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, in the course of his judgment, said,—It is quite plain that the contract made by the offer of these debentures and the acceptance of that offer is nothing more or less than a contract to borrow and a contract to lend so much money payable by instalments. The essential character of the transaction is not altered either by the circumstance that the creditor in a certain event is to have the option of exchanging his position for that of a shareholder or by the complicated nature of the arrangements made for the lender's security. That specific performance of a contract to lend money cannot be enforced is so well established, and obviously so wholesome a rule, that it would be idle to say a word about it. As regards the second head of claim it is enough to observe that there is no contract to pay except as incidental to the contract of loans. There is no contract of sale at all. The term "price" applied to such a transaction as this is quite out of place. To order payment, by way of damages, of an amount equal to the sum of the remaining instalments is to enforce the agreement against one of the parties to the contract and to set the other free—free from any obligation to pay interest, and free, too, from any obligation to repay the principal. That would be a very one-sided sort of specific performance, contrary to all precedent, and in the result plainly unfair. So far there is no difficulty and there can be no room for doubt. But the learned counsel for the appellants raised a point in connexion with the third head of claim which requires rather more consideration. That claim, as they said, and said truly, had not been dealt with at all. It was not disputed that the contract has been broken. There was, therefore, prima facie a case for damages. That there were no materials before the Court for assessing the amount of compensation was not, they said, wholly their fault, and so they asked this House, under the circumstances, to allow a new trial on that one point. If I thought there had been any miscarriage of justice—if I thought that, owing to some accident or to anything but the neglect or the prudence of the appellants themselves, they had been shut out from the trial of a question which they seriously desired to try, I should have been disposed to grant the indulgence, assuming that it could be granted on terms not unfair to the other side. But I think there is no substance in this claim: and I much doubt whether the appellants ever really meant to put it forward except as a sort of cover in case of disaster, or as a justification or excuse for embarking on this litigation. Thinking as I do that there is nothing substantial in the claim for damages, and that the appellants, if they keep the deposit, will be more than compensated for any loss which they could possibly prove, and thinking, too, that this claim for damages was advisedly not pressed before the Court of Appeal, or put forward until after judgment was given, I am of opinion that the application for a new trial ought to be rejected. To admit such a claim would, I think, be a very dangerous precedent. I think the appeal should be dismissed altogether, and with costs.

The other noble and learned LORDS concurred, and the appeal was dismissed, with costs.

IN RE RIPLEY AND SON'S TRADE MARK.*

Trade Mark—Registration—Capacity for—invented word—"Pearl" and "Pirle"—Application for registration refused.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 94), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich (reported ante, p. 94) affirming the refusal of the Comptroller-General of Patents to register the word "Pirle" as a trade mark for woollen fabrics in class 34 under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Acts. The applicants, Messrs. Ripley and Son, who were dyers and cloth finishers of Bradford, had also applied to register the word "Pearl" for the same goods, and that application was refused; but there was no appeal as to that. The Comptroller held that the word "Pearl" was incapable of registration on the ground that it was a commendatory word, and that the word "Pirle" was a mere misspelling of the word "Pearl." The applicants stated that the word "Pirle" was formed by the transposition of the letters in the name "Ripley," omitting the final "y," and they contended that it was registrable as an "invented word," and was not open to objection as being a "geographical" word, or a word "descriptive of the character or quality of the goods." Mr. Justice Kekewich agreed with the Comptroller that if the applicants failed as to the word "Pearl" they must fail equally as to the word "Pirle," and he refused the application. The applicants appealed.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter were for the applicants; the Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. Ingle Joyce for the Comptroller were not called upon.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that it was impossible to grant this application unless the Court was prepared to lay down a new proposition of law and say that whenever a man could not register a particular word he might register another word sounding exactly like it but spelt differently. The appeal would be dismissed.

IN RE PIERS—EX PARTE ASSIGNEE OF TURNBULL.*

Bankruptcy—Proof—Valuation of security—“Inadvertence,” what is—Bankruptcy Act,
1883, Sched. 1, r. 10.

This was an appeal by the assignee of Turnbull from an order of Mr. Justice Wright refusing him leave to amend a proof by altering the valuation of his security under Schedule 1, r. 10, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment. It is only necessary here to state that the debt and security were assigned to the appellant on March 20, 1896.

Mr. McIntyre appeared for the appellant; Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. E. A. Nepean contra.

THE COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The question raised upon the appeal is whether Mr. Turnbull, who was a creditor of Sir Eustace Piers, a bankrupt, has omitted to value his security, and that such omission has arisen from inadvertence within the meaning of Rule 10 of Schedule 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Mr. Justice Wright decided against Mr. Turnbull's assignee, Mr. Piers, who appeals. Rule 10 is as follows:—“For the purpose of voting a secured creditor shall, unless he surrenders his security, state in his proof the particulars of his security, the date when it was given, and the value at which he assesses it, and shall be entitled to vote only in respect of the balance (if any) due to him after deducting the value of his security. If he votes in respect of his whole debt he shall be deemed to have surrendered his security, unless the Court on application is satisfied that the omission to value the security has arisen from inadvertence.” Sir Eustace Piers was adjudicated a bankrupt upon October 1, 1890, and Mr. Turnbull, upon October 3, 1891, sent in his proof against the estate, which, so far as material, was as follows:—“The said Sir Eustace Piers was at the date of the receiving order—viz., October 1, 1890—and still is justly and truly indebted to Thomas Turnbull in the sum of £494 5s. for professional services rendered, work done, and fees payable by the said Thomas Turnbull as solicitor for and on behalf of the above-named bankrupt at his request, for which sum I say that I have not received any manner of satisfaction or security whatsoever, save and except a charge upon certain debentures which is considered worthless.” Having thus sent in his proof, Mr. Turnbull in March, 1892, voted at a meeting of creditors in respect of his whole debt of £494 5s. Mr. Turnbull's assignee in the year of 1897 for the first time contended that when Mr. Turnbull sent in his proof upon October 3, 1891, he omitted to value his security, and that this arose from inadvertence. Now pausing here, can it be truly said that Mr. Turnbull, when he sent in his proof upon October 3, 1891, omitted to value his security? It seems to me that he did not, for he then deliberately elected to assess the value of his security as being worthless, and to prove against the estate of Sir Eustace Piers in respect of his whole debt, and having done so proceeded to vote at a meeting of creditors as being a creditor against his estate for the whole amount of his debt. It appears to me that he then omitted nothing. He assessed the value of his security at what he then believed to be its value—i.e., as worthless. Assessing the value of a security as worthless is equally an assessment as if the assessment had been of some value. This, in my opinion, suffices to determine the present case against the appellant. But assuming that Mr. Turnbull had omitted to value his security, which I think he had not, did he do so by inadvertence? What is said is this—that Mr. Turnbull was induced in October, 1891, to assess the value of his security as being worthless by information which led him to believe that it was so, but that by reason of a litigation which has taken place in subsequent years it has been found out that his security is not worthless, and in 1897 the appellant sought to amend the proof by valuing his security at £494 and to adhere thereto rather than to prove as he did against the estate for his debt. The finding out by subsequent events that in October, 1891, Mr. Turnbull was in error in electing to assess as worthless his security is not, in my opinion, “inadvertence” within the meaning of the rule. This word points to forgetfulness or accident and not, as Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams well puts it in “Ex parte Clarke” (40 W. R., 608), to the case of a creditor having the choice before him of what he will do and balancing the advantage and deliberately electing to prove and abandon his security. I agree with Mr. Justice Wright that the word “inadvertence” in this rule means the opposite of deliberate election, and that it does not cover a deliberate election, though based upon false grounds. What Mr. Turnbull did in October, 1891, did not arise either from forgetfulness or accident, though it may have been a mistake. But this is not the word in the rule, and when I see that in rule 13, schedule II., the Legislature has used the words “mistaken estimate,” it shows me that it meant by “inadvertence” something other than a mistake. If Mr. Justice North in the case of “In re Lister and Co.” ([1892] 2 Ch., 417) intended to hold that the words inadvertence and mistake were convertible terms I cannot agree with him. In my judgment the appellant fails to show that Mr. Turnbull has either omitted to value his security, or that he did so by inadvertence, and the appellant must establish both to bring himself within the rule. I say nothing about the length of time which has elapsed nor the other circumstances of this case, for the appellant does not, in my judgment, bring himself within the rule. I agree with the Judge of the Court below, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that he agreed that upon the facts of this case Turnbull had not omitted to value his security from “inadvertence.” But upon the question whether the words “omission to value the security,” in schedule 1, r. 10, might not cover a valuation at nothing as well as an omission to put any value on the security at all, he was far from satisfied that the Legislature did not intend those words to cover both cases. The word “value” in the schedules was, in his opinion, used as denoting positive value. It was not, however, necessary to decide this point now because the case was not brought within the “inadvertence” clause.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL V. LONDON HYDRAULIC COMPANY.*

Metropolis—Subways—London County Council (Subways) Act, 1893—Charges for using subways—"Water company," what is—Company for supplying hydraulic power.

Decision of Divisional Court (ante, p. 22) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Kennedy) upon a special case, reported ante, p. 22. The case was stated by consent, under Order XXXIV., rule 1, in an action by the London County Council against the London Hydraulic Company, in which they sought to recover £185 5s. for remuneration or rates payable by the defendants in respect of their use of certain subways under Queen Victoria-street, Victoria Embankment, Northumberland-avenue, Shaftesbury-avenue, Charing-cross-road, Southwark-street, and Rosebery-avenue. The question raised by the case was whether the London Hydraulic Company was a water company, for, if it was, the charge for use of the subways would only be £32. The defendants were constituted under the Wharves and Warehouses Steam Power and Hydraulic Pressure Company's Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict., c. 121), for applying motive power by hydraulic pressure to waterside and land cranes used for working lock gates and other machinery. Under the Act they were authorized to take water for this purpose from the Thames to an amount of one million gallons a day. Section 2 of the Act incorporated therein certain general Acts, including the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, and the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to the breaking-up of streets for the purpose of laying pipes. Section 30 provided that the company should construct all proper works, apparatus, and conveniences necessary to secure the return to the River Thames of all waters taken therefrom and used by them immediately after the use of the same for the purposes of the said Act. Section 31 provided that the said company should not at any time supply water to be used for any purpose other than as a motive force, and that if they should supply water at any place contrary to the said enactment they should for every such offence forfeit to every company then incorporated by Act of Parliament for the supply of water within the district the sum of £20. By section 38 the company was authorized to supply within their district motive power by hydraulic pressure to any persons or company. The London Hydraulic Power Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict., c. 72), by section 9 imposed a penalty on any person who, being supplied by the said company with pressure water under the powers of the said Act, should use the water so supplied for any other purpose than as a motive force. By the London County Council (Subways) Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 202), it was enacted that it should be lawful for the London County Council to require a company to lay in or remove into a subway of the Council any pipes belonging to the said company where the Council had a subway in the same street. By section 5 it was provided that it should be lawful for the Council to make on the company using any subway a charge for the use of the subway according to a scale to be determined. And it was provided that, in the case of any water or gas company having statutory powers to break up streets, regard should be had only to such saving (if any) as might result to such company by reason of the pipe being laid and accessible in a subway instead of being laid or remaining under a street, and to any other saving resulting to such company by reason of the subway. By section 10 of the Acts power was given to the Council to make and enforce by-laws, and to fix the scale of fees and charges to be paid by any company or person using any subway. A scale of charges was accordingly drawn up. One table consisted of the charges to be made on water and gas companies having power to break up streets, and the other of the charges for companies, bodies, and persons other than water or gas companies having power to break up streets. The latter was on a higher scale. The pipes of the company have been laid in the subways under the streets named. A question arose between the Council and the defendant company as to the scale of charges applicable. The question for the Court was on which scale the charges were to be made. The Divisional Court held that the defendants were not a water company, and should therefore be charged upon the higher scale. They accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Loehnis appeared for the defendants; Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the only thing that made him doubt at all in this case was the hesitation felt by Mr. Justice Kennedy in the Court below and by Lord Justice Collins in this Court. Speaking for himself he thought the case perfectly clear. The defendants were a company for the purpose of supplying water power for lifting weights and similar purposes. They were prohibited from supplying water for ordinary purposes. Were they a water company? In his opinion they were not. They used water for hydraulic purposes and for nothing else. Section 5 of the Subway Act of 1893 made a special exception as to charges in the case of gas and water companies, and all other companies were to pay the ordinary charges as laid down in the by-laws.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY delivered judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. During the argument he shared the misgivings felt by Mr. Justice Kennedy in the Court below. The point he had a difficulty about was not whether this was an ordinary water company, but what was the meaning of the term "water company" as used in this Subway Act and in the by-laws. This company equally had a right to break up the streets for the purpose of laying pipes. But he came to the conclusion that for some reason which he did not understand the Legislature had placed ordinary gas and water companies upon a different and better footing than other companies.

SOUTHWARK AND VAUXHALL WATER COMPANY V.
HAMPTON DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Rating—Rateable value—"Land covered with water"—Reservoir of water company—Public Health Act, 1875, sec. 211, subs. 1 (b).

rates. The question was whether a large reservoir belonging to the company was "land covered with water" within the meaning of section 211, subsection 1 (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875. That section enacts that certain classes of hereditaments, among them being "land covered with water," are to be rated at one-fourth of their net annual value. The justices held that the reservoir in question was not land covered with water, but was in the nature of an artificial tank, and that it was, therefore, rateable at its full value. The water company obtained a statement of this special case.

Mr. CRIPPS, Q.C., and Mr. RYDE, appeared for the water company and cited "Reg. v. Birmingham Waterworks" (1 B. and S., 84), "Reg. v. Newport Dock Company" (2 B. and S., 708), and "East London Waterworks Company v. Leyton Sewer Authority" (L.R., 6 Q.B., 669), cases decided under the corresponding provisions of the Public Health Act of 1848, as authorities to show that this reservoir ought to be treated as "land covered with water" and rated at one-fourth of its net annual value.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE, Q.C., and Mr. COURTHOPE LUNBROE appeared for the district council, and admitted that there was a difficulty in asking their Lordships to overrule the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench which had been cited. The matter, however, was an important one, and it was desired to obtain the opinion of the Court of Appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in giving judgment, said that no doubt the case raised an important question, and it was one on which, if there was no authority, they might possibly take a different view from that taken by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of "East London Waterworks Company v. Leyton Sewer Authority." Sir Edward Clarke, however, admitted that the present case could not be distinguished from that case. This Court must, therefore, follow it, and the appeal would be allowed, but there would be leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred.

WHEELER V. FRADD.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Undertaking to repay an advance on company going to allotment.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wills at the trial of the action without a jury. The action was brought to recover £1,000 under the following circumstances:—In November, 1896, the defendant was engaged upon a scheme for the formation of a company to purchase a certain business, and in connexion therewith the plaintiff was introduced to the defendant. The defendant had entered into a contract to purchase the business for £70,000—£1,000 to be paid down as a deposit, which was to be forfeited if the purchase was not completed, and £69,000 to be paid on March 1, 1897. On November 23, 1896, the plaintiff advanced £1,000 to the defendant, and the defendant on the same day signed the following letter addressed to the plaintiff:—"In consideration of your having advanced £1,000 in connexion with the business to be purchased, 'I hereby undertake to repay the same with £1,000 bonus . . . such payment of £2,000 to be made by me to you after allotment as and when I receive payment from the company." The defendant tried to get the shares in the proposed company underwritten, but the purchase did not come off and the company was never registered, and therefore no allotment of shares was ever made. The plaintiff then sued to recover the £1,000. Mr. Justice Wills gave judgment for the defendant.

Mr. WITT, Q.C., and Mr. J. CORNER appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. DICKENS, Q.C., and Mr. BOXALL who were not called upon, for the defendant.

The COURT yesterday dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the letter of November 23, 1896, so far as material, meant that the defendant would repay the £1,000 after allotment if and when he received payment from the company. It was said that there was a contract by the defendant to register the company. His Lordship could not find any such contract. If, however, such a contract was made out, it by no means followed that the plaintiff could recover the £1,000, because it did not follow that the company would ever have gone to allotment. Both parties contemplated that the company would be brought out. All that the defendant undertook was to do his best to bring out this company, to convert this business into a living company, and the learned Judge found as a fact that the defendant did his best to bring out the company, and the evidence showed that he had committed no breach of his contract. The judgment must be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

IN RE STOCKPORT RAGGED, INDUSTRIAL, AND REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.*

Charity—Commissioners—Jurisdiction—Exemptions from—Charitable Trusts Act, 1883, sec. 62—Charity maintained partly by voluntary contributions and partly by endowment.

This was a petition presented by the trustees of the above-named charity under the provisions of Sir S. Romilly's Act (52 Geo. III., c. 101), asking for the sanction of the Court to a proposed mortgage of part of the property vested in the trustees. The Stockport Industrial Schools were established by a trust deed in 1866, the school buildings being conveyed to trustees upon trust to permit them to be used as a ragged, industrial, and reformatory school under a committee of management. The trustees were empowered to sell the original buildings and apply the proceeds of sale in providing larger schools. The petition stated that the situation of the schools was now unsuitable and the buildings were too small for the purposes of the trust. Notice had been given by the Government inspectors that unless the buildings were enlarged the number of children must be reduced. Under these circumstances the trustees proposed to sell the existing buildings and apply the proceeds, together with other moneys in hand and a further sum to be raised upon mortgage of the new premises, in buying a new site and building larger schools. The petition came before the Court on November 6, 1897, when his Lordship gave the necessary sanction, but at that time the Charity Commissioners had not been served with notice of the petition and did not appear. Subsequently they became aware of the order which had been made, and on December 1, 1897, they applied to the Judge to stay the drawing up of the same in order that they might have an opportunity of submitting that the presentation of the petition required their sanction under section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853. The drawing up of the order was accordingly stayed, and the matter again came before the Court on January 12 last, when the question of the jurisdiction of the Commissioners was fully argued.

Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the Charity Commissioners; Mr. Ingle Joyce for the Attorney-General; Mr. Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Mr. Henry Johnston for the petitioners; and Mr. H. Greenwood for respondents to the petition.

At the conclusion of the arguments judgment was reserved.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment said that the sanction of the Charity Commissioners had not been obtained either to the mortgage or the application, the petitioners maintaining that the charity was exempted from the jurisdiction of the Commissioners by section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853. The Commissioners disputed this, and, having been served with the petition at the request of the Attorney-General, appeared and opposed the petition in order that the question, which was one of some importance, might be judicially determined. The income of the charity was derived from a Government grant, contributions from School Boards, boards of guardians, and other public authorities, subscriptions from residents in the neighbourhood, and the earnings of the school children in their industrial occupations. From the evidence it appeared that all donations or bequests made to the schools were applicable by the committee of management in aid of the voluntary contributions which constituted their main support, and that every donation or legacy had been so applied. By section 66 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, the expression "endowment" meant and included "all lands and real estate whatsoever of any tenure . . . and all . . . personal estate whatsoever which shall for the time being belong to or be held upon trust for a charity or all or any of the purposes thereof." It was decided by the Court of Appeal in "In re Clergy Orphan Corporation" (L.R. [1894], 3 Ch., 145) that those words must receive their natural meaning, and that all property of every description belonging to or held in trust for a charity, whether held upon trusts or conditions which rendered it lawful to apply the capital to the maintenance of the charity, or upon trusts which confined the charitable application to income, was an "endowment" within the meaning of the Act. Section 62 of the Act, however, contained certain exemptions from the jurisdiction and amongst others the following:— "Where any charity is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income arising from any endowment, the powers and provisions of the Act shall, with respect to such charity, extend and apply to the income from endowment only, to the exclusion of voluntary subscriptions and the application thereof; and no donation or bequest unto or in trust for any such charity as last aforesaid, of which no special application or appropriation shall be directed or declared by the donor or testator, or which may legally be applied by the governing or managing body in aid of the voluntary subscriptions, shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the said Board or the powers or provisions of the said Act." It was also held, in the case above referred to, that in the case of a charity partly maintained by voluntary subscriptions and partly by the income of any endowment, bequests and donations for the general purposes of a charity which might be lawfully applied as income consistently with the terms of the gift were exempt, and that such gifts and the income thereof were not brought within the jurisdiction by being invested by the governing body. That decision, said His Lordship, would govern the present case were it not that section 62 contained the following proviso:—"Provided always that the said exemption shall not extend to any cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other schools." It was contended on behalf of the Charity Commissioners that that proviso excluded all schools from the exemption found in section 62. The trustees, on the other hand, contended that only cathedral, collegiate, and chapter schools and other schools of a similar kind were so excluded. His Lordship had come to the conclusion that the narrower construction ought to prevail. He pointed out that the charities enumerated in section 62 were of an extremely miscellaneous kind; and if the intention was that all such charities should be excluded from the exemption so far as they consisted of schools it would have been easy and more natural to express it by saying simply, "Provided that the said exemption shall not extend to any school whatever." His Lordship added that if the argument on behalf of the Charity Commissioners were well founded, Roman Catholic schools must, down to the passing of the Roman Catholic Charities Act in 1860, have been subject to the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, a result which did not seem to be in accordance with the legislation on the subject of those charities. His Lordship accordingly directed the order, which had already been made, to be drawn up, the Court being of opinion that the school in question was not within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners.

THE QUEEN V. TOWMAN AND OTHERS, JUSTICES.*

Licence—Conditions on granting—Justices—Jurisdiction—Mandamus.

Application granted for a mandamus to justices who had granted licences on condition that the applicants paid certain sums for public purposes.

This was the continuation of the arguments in this case, which were reported in The Times of March 14. It was a motion for a certiorari and a mandamus to justices of South Shields who had granted licences to applicants on condition that they paid certain sums to the magistrates for some public purposes.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. R. V. Banks appeared for the publican, who had paid £1,000 for his licence; Mr. Crump, Q.C., and Mr. Rowsell (Mr. Grain with them) appeared for the justices; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. Blacklock appeared in support of the rule for one publican; Mr. R. Cunningham Glen for another publican whose case was to be bound by the decision herein.

Mr. ROWSELL continued his arguments. This was a discretionary writ and would only be granted if (1) the applicant could show he had a legal right to a mandamus; (2) if there had been a refusal by the justices to hear, which there was not in this case; and (3) if the mandamus could be practically effective. He cited "R. v. West Riding of Yorkshire Justices" ([1896] 2 Q.B., 386), and "R. v. Griffiths" (5 B. and Ald., 731).

Mr. ASQUITH, in support of the rule, submitted that there had been no serious attempt to justify the course followed by the justices. In the interval between the two applications the various applicants came to the clerk to the justices and deposited certain sums. In two cases these had been returned and the licence refused. This applicant deposited £1,000. No authority could be cited to support the course taken by the magistrates. In 1758 an authority to the contrary could be found. "R. v. Athay" (2 Burrow, 653). It could not be that there was no remedy applicable. In the whole of the licensing legislation there was no definition of the right of objectors to licences. But the fact that notices had to be given to the public pointed to the inference that any one could come before the Court and point out objection. He referred, on the point, to "Boulter v. Justices of Kent." As to criminal proceedings, an improper motive was necessary to be shown. It was not alleged here that the justices had any improper motives. Therefore that was no remedy in this case. The case of "Sharp v. Wakefield" ([1891] A.C., 473) showed that a judicial discretion must be exercised. How could it be said that the justices who had imposed this illegal condition had heard and determined properly.

The Court then intimated that he had better turn his attention to the question whether his client was interested.

On this he cited "Boulter v. Justice of Kent" ([1897] A.C., 556), where at page 569 Lord Herschell said:—"Every member of the local community might object." If he had a right to object and did not receive a proper hearing he had a legal right to apply for a mandamus.

The Court discharged the rule as to the certiorari, but affirmed the rule for a mandamus.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the case was one of importance, but of no difficulty as soon as the facts were ascertained. The result was perfectly clear. Any member of the public had a right to be heard to object to the grant of a licence, and he was therefore entitled to be heard according to legal principles. If illegal consideration, having no bearing whatever on the case before the justices, formed a distinct element in their decision against the objector, the objector could not be said to have been heard according to law. The justices had stated that they proposed to grant the licence on conditions which would be announced at the adjourned meeting. These terms turned out to be the surrender of three licences and payment of £1,000. He would express no final opinion on the question whether the condition as to the surrender of the three licences was a proper condition or not. But it was quite possible that that should be perfectly legal. It was germane to the matter under the consideration of the justices. As to the condition for the payment of £1,000, the justices had in fact no more right to demand it for public purposes than they had to ask it for themselves for their own purposes. If such a system as this were allowed in two years all granting of licences would be decided by auction. It would be a system open to the greatest abuses and as objectionable as could be conceived. It was perfectly clear that the condition attached had influenced the decision of the justices in granting the licence. The publican would not have had his licence if he had refused to pay the £1,000. The magistrates thought they were doing a good stroke of business, but it could not be permitted. They could not be said to have given a real hearing. The applicant had a right to be heard by a tribunal which would disengage its mind from considerations such as these. The mandamus must therefore go.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. The justices had done a thing which possibly in a few years they might be by law allowed to do. They had done a thing which had often been suggested as a suitable thing to be done by legislation. But the authority of Parliament had not yet been given to such a course. If it were given there would be a careful specification of the objects for which the money should be applied. The justices had apparently read theoretical treatises and approached the matter with views on unearned increment which they wished to apply. That could not be done. See the case of "Reg. v. Adamson and others (Justices of North Shields)" (1 Q.B.D., 201), where the justices of North Shields had views on the Tichborne case. Then Chief Justice Cockburn said:—"I think it very probable that they thought they were doing what was right, and that they were influenced by their distaste for the views and doctrines promulgated at the meeting, and thought that the sooner the matter was buried in oblivion the better. But these were considerations which ought not to have influenced them at all, and under the circumstances I think they must be taken to have declined jurisdiction." The justices here had acted not on the ordinary grounds, but on considerations which they ought not to have taken into account. It made no difference that their object might be perfectly laudable. They had not decided on the grounds upon which they ought lawfully to have decided.

IN RE THE WEST LONDON AND GENERAL PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY.*

Building Society—Rules—Construction—
Members withdrawing—Death of members—
Widows and children of deceased members.

This was an appeal of Mrs. Elizabeth Thomson from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright (sitting as an Additional Judge of the Chancery Division), dated November 10 last. The above-named society was established in May, 1866, under the provisions of the Building Societies Act, 1836 (6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 32), for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary operations of a building society. The society was never incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict., c. 42). Its shares consisted of two classes—namely, deposit or unadvanced shares and anticipated or advanced shares. In September, 1893, the society was ordered to be wound up under the Companies Acts as an unregistered company upon a petition presented by a depositor. In the course of the proceedings a petition was presented to obtain the sanction of the Court to a scheme of arrangement between the creditors and the contributories of the society. The scheme as approved by the Court in 1894 provided that the residue should be divided amongst the unadvanced shareholders. It was not then anticipated that there would be any residue, and no question arose as to the rights and priorities of the members. It afterwards, however, appeared that, when all claims were discharged, there was a surplus of about £2,800 for division amongst the unadvanced shareholders. An application was accordingly made to Mr. Justice Wright, and his Lordship ordered that the surplus assets should be distributed rateably amongst all the unadvanced shareholders other than those that had compromised and released their claims. From that decision Mrs. Thomson now appealed, and the Court of Appeal after hearing arguments came to the conclusion that the surplus assets ought to be distributed according to the legal rights of the shareholders. The decision of Mr. Justice Wright on this point was consequently reversed. The question then arose whether the widows and children of deceased members were entitled to precedence, and, if so, whether they must claim under a nomination. This question turned upon the construction of the following clauses in the society's rules:—

 "22.—Members Withdrawing.—That any member desirous of withdrawing his or her investments, and having been a member one year, shall, by giving one month's notice in writing to the directors, at any monthly meeting, be entitled to receive back his or her net monthly subscriptions, with simple interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and, in addition thereto, after the second year, such portion of the profits as shall be declared by the directors at the date of withdrawal. That if more than one member shall give notice to withdraw at one time they shall be paid in rotation, according to the priority of notice; provided always that the widows and children of deceased members shall always have the precedence. . . ."
 "25.—Death of Members.—That, in case of a member dying, his or her share or shares and interest shall belong to or be distributed among his or her executors or administrators, or other the person or persons hereinafter mentioned, and such executors or administrators may vote and act in all cases whatsoever as fully as the deceased member whom they represent might have done if living. . . .
 When on the death of any member of this society, without leaving a will, a sum of money not exceeding £50 shall become payable, such sum shall, in default of letters of administration being taken out to the deceased member, be paid by the trustees to any person nominated by the deceased in writing deposited with the secretary (such person being husband, wife, father, mother, child, brother or sister, nephew or niece, of such member), and in case there shall be no such nomination, or the person so nominated shall have died before the deceased member, or in case the member shall have revoked such nomination, then such sum shall be paid to the person who shall appear to the said trustees to be entitled under the statute of distributions to receive the same, without taking out letters of administration in England or Ireland, and without confirmation in Scotland. . . ."

Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. Romer were for the appellant; Mr. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. A. R. Ingpen, Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. W. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. Clauson were for the several persons who represented the various classes of shareholders interested; Mr. T. Bateman Napier was for the Official Receiver and liquidator.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that, although the rules were extremely obscure, he thought he saw his way to a tolerably plain conclusion on them. The Court had to deal with the shares of deceased members. It must ascertain who were the persons the society must recognize on the death of members. It came to this—that, according to Rule 25, the society must recognize the executors or administrators of deceased members. If there were neither the society must look further and must recognize any person nominated by the deceased to take the share. If there were neither executors nor administrators, and if the sum of money payable did not exceed £50, and there was no nomination, then the society must recognize the person entitled under the Statute of Distributions to receive the money. What were such persons to take? Mr. Bramwell Davis had said that they could not take anything without having given notice to withdraw. That was a startling proposition, and not warranted. There was nothing requiring notice of withdrawal to be given. Whether a member gave notice to withdraw or not, on his death he ceased to be a member. Rule 22 referred to withdrawing. It did not refer to members who were dead. It contained a proviso "that the widows and children of deceased members shall always have the precedence." His Lordship had at first thought that that proviso meant widows and children of those members who had given notice to withdraw, but, on consideration, he did not think that that was meant. He came to the conclusion that, whenever there was a competition between persons who had given notice to withdraw, and the widows and children of deceased members, the widows and children should always have precedence. It did not mean those whom the society was not bound to recognize under Rule 25. It meant those the society had to recognize, so that if there was a competition between withdrawing members and widows and children whom the society was bound to recognize under Rule 25, they were to have precedence. That appeared to his Lordship to make the best sense that was possible of these exceedingly ill-drawn rules.

IN RE KENT COALFIELDS SYNDICATE (LIMITED) (IN LIQUIDATION).*

Company—Liquidation—Register—Inspection.

Section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, as to inspection of the register does not apply to a company in liquidation.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Grantham at Chambers, upon the application of Mr. William S. Ogle under section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, directing the Kent Coalfields Syndicate (Limited) (in liquidation) and the liquidator forthwith to produce to the applicant for his inspection the register or registers of the members of the Kent Coalfields Syndicate (Limited). The syndicate was incorporated as a limited company under the Companies Act, 1862, and was now in voluntary liquidation. Subsequently to the voluntary winding-up, Mr. Ogle, who was neither a creditor nor a shareholder of the company, applied at Chambers for an order for inspection of the register, which Mr. Justice Grantham ordered as above. The company and the liquidator appealed. It was admitted for the purpose of this case that the company had ceased to carry on business.

Mr. F. EVANS, for the appellants, contended that section 32, which gave a right of inspecting the register to any member of the company gratis and to any other person on payment of one shilling, did not apply where the company was in voluntary liquidation. That section only applied to a living company, and it imposed a penalty on the company in case of refusal to allow inspection. The section occurred in Part II. of the Act, which did not refer to a winding-up. Part IV. dealt with the winding-up of companies. When a company was being wound up the register was in the possession and custody of the liquidator, and the company ceased to have any control over it. Sections 138 and 156 gave a right to a contributory to inspect the register in the case of a company being voluntarily wound up, and in that case the Judge who had jurisdiction to make an order for inspection was the Judge who had jurisdiction under the Companies

Mr. SWINFEN EADY, Q.C., and Mr. J. R. ATKIN, for the respondent, contended that section 32 did not come to an end with the voluntary winding up. The obligation to keep a registered office under section 39 of the Companies Act, 1862, did not cease upon a voluntary winding up, though the penalty provided by that section for not keeping a registered office only applied as long as the company carried on business. Sections 32 and 33 must apply after a voluntary winding up. It was in many instances necessary that the liquidator should have power to make new entries in the register, and it was very important that the power of inspection given by section 32 should be upheld even after a voluntary winding up. Section 32 was absolute in its terms, and was not confined to going companies. All the reasons for granting inspection existed, though not in the same degree, in the case of a voluntary winding up.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether or not an order could be made, in the case of a company in liquidation and not carrying on business, under section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, for inspection of the company's register. In his opinion the inspection mentioned in section 32 referred to an inspection in the case of a going company. Take the penalty clause for not allowing inspection, why should a company incur a penalty if it was in liquidation? It seemed to him unreasonable to read the section as applying to a company in liquidation as well as to a going company. In his opinion the learned Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order for inspection under section 32.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY delivered judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

HARWARD v. GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE HACKNEY UNION AND FROST, RELIEVING OFFICER.*
Lunacy—Removal of lunatic to workhouse—Relieving officer—Lunacy Act, 1890, sec. 20—Construction—"Satisfied," meaning of.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Hawkins after the trial of the action with a special jury. The action was brought by Mr. Theodore Bulwer Harward, who formerly practised as a dentist and resided at Clapton, to recover damages from the guardians of the poor of the Hackney Union and their general relieving officer, Julius Bernard Frost, for false imprisonment, in having forcibly removed him from his house to the workhouse infirmary and having detained him there as a dangerous lunatic. The defendants pleaded that whatever steps were taken with regard to the removal of plaintiff to the workhouse infirmary were taken in good faith and in discharge of their duties under the Lunacy Act, 1890. At the trial the learned Judge held that there was no case against the guardians, but the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff as against Frost for £25, on the ground that Frost did not take reasonable care to satisfy himself that the plaintiff was a dangerous lunatic. After hearing the case on further consideration the learned Judge said that, inasmuch as the jury had found for the plaintiff, the most convenient course would be to enter a verdict for him, and let formal judgment be entered for him, and to stay execution until after the parties had gone to the Court of Appeal. The case is reported in The Times of January 20 and January 24. The defendant Frost appealed.

Mr. HORACE AVORY (with whom was Mr. Rowsell) appeared in support of the appeal, and said that Frost justified his conduct under section 20 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. There was no evidence to support the finding of the jury, neither did the finding itself entitle the plaintiff to judgment. The earlier sections of the Act dealt with the making of reception orders for lunatics. Such orders were made on petition, and the duty was imposed on the judicial authority constituted by the Act to decide whether the alleged lunatic ought to be detained. Section 20 was one of a group of cases dealing with urgency cases, and was as follows:—"If a constable, relieving officer, or overseer is satisfied that it is necessary for the public safety or the welfare of an alleged lunatic with regard to whom it is his duty to take any proceeding under this Act, that the alleged lunatic should, before any such proceedings can be taken, be placed under care and control, the constable, relieving officer, or overseer may remove the alleged lunatic to the workhouse of the union in which the alleged lunatic is, and the master of the workhouse shall, unless there is no proper accommodation in the workhouse for the alleged lunatic, receive and relieve and detain the alleged lunatic therein, but no person shall be so detained for more than three days, and before the expiration of that time the constable, relieving officer, or overseer shall take such proceedings with regard to the alleged lunatic as are required by this Act." The learned Judge told the jury that the question for them was whether Frost was honestly satisfied that it was necessary for the public safety or the plaintiff's welfare that he should be removed to the infirmary. It was necessary to draw the distinction between being honestly satisfied and being satisfied on reasonable grounds. The section clearly protected a relieving officer who was honestly satisfied, even though a jury might find that he had not taken reasonable care to satisfy himself. The evidence showed beyond doubt that the plaintiff acted honestly, and in fact it was not seriously alleged that he was actuated by any improper motive. The verdict ought to be disregarded, and judgment entered for the defendant.

Mr. HARRIS, Q.C., and Mr. T. C. JARVIS, for the plaintiff, contended that the verdict and judgment ought to be allowed to stand. In order to justify himself under section 20 the defendant must show that there was an alleged lunatic, a person deemed to be a lunatic, and the defendant must have been judicially satisfied that that person was a dangerous lunatic. Here there was no alleged lunatic, no person deemed to be a lunatic. The wife of the plaintiff never said he was insane, she merely said he was ill. The defendant did not himself go to see the plaintiff, he simply accepted the report of another relieving officer and said he was satisfied. That was not a compliance with the statute.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion Mr. Justice Hawkins had taken the correct view of this case, though he had not acted upon it, but had accepted the verdict of the jury and had invited an appeal to this Court. The action was brought against a relieving officer of the Hackney Union for false imprisonment. The plaintiff complained that he had been wrongfully detained for three days as a dangerous lunatic in the workhouse infirmary, and the jury returned a verdict in his favour for £25 damages. It was now said on the part of the plaintiff that the defendant was liable to have judgment entered against him by reason of that verdict. The question turned on section 20 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. That section said that if a relieving officer was satisfied that it was necessary for the public safety or the welfare of an alleged lunatic that the alleged lunatic should immediately be placed under control, he might remove the alleged lunatic to the union workhouse. It was argued that there was no evidence that the plaintiff was an alleged lunatic or was deemed to be a lunatic. His Lordship, after referring to the evidence of Mr. Fenton, who was another relieving officer of the Hackney Union, to the written answers given by the plaintiff's wife to questions placed before her by Mr. Fenton, and to the evidence of the defendant himself, said that in his opinion there was ample evidence that the plaintiff was alleged to be a lunatic and was deemed to be a lunatic. Under those circumstances it was the defendant's duty, in pursuance of the section, to remove the plaintiff to the workhouse. The section said nothing about its being the duty of the relieving officer to take reasonable care to satisfy himself that it was necessary to remove the alleged lunatic. It said simply that he was to be satisfied that it was necessary to take that course. To say that he must be honestly satisfied was only another way of saying that he must be in fact satisfied. A dishonest satisfaction would be no satisfaction at all. The learned Judge told the jury over and over again that the question for them was whether the defendant was honestly satisfied. In his opinion, if the jury had found that the defendant was not honestly satisfied, it would have been the duty of the Court to set such verdict aside, because there would have been no evidence to support it. He thought that the verdict which they had returned must be set aside and that judgment must be entered for the defendant.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said he was of the same opinion. The case depended on section 20 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. He thought it was impossible to say that this section was curtailed by section 330, or that the requirement of good faith and reasonable care could be imported from section 330 into section 20. Under this section the relieving officer had to act on the spur of the moment, and the only requirement was that he should be satisfied that the alleged lunatic was a dangerous lunatic. The learned Judge had added the word "honestly," and no doubt a sham or dishonest satisfaction would not do. There was abundant evidence here that the defendant was honestly satisfied; in fact there was no real suggestion that he had acted dishonestly. The verdict had been given on a question which was not put to the jury, and it could not be allowed to stand.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he entirely agreed, and, as they were really affirming the view of Mr. Justice Hawkins, he did not think it necessary to add anything.

ALLHUSEN V. Baling and South Harrow Railway Company.*

Lands Clauses Acts—Notice to treat—Part of a road—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. 1845. sec. 92.

Held, that the defendants, who required for their railway a portion of a private road forming the approach to a house and grounds belonging to the plaintiff, could not be compelled to take the whole of the property under sec. 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

The question in this case was whether the defendants, who desired to purchase, for the purpose of making their railway, a small portion of a private road forming the approach to a house and grounds belonging to the plaintiff, could be compelled to take the whole of his property. The case came on upon a motion by the plaintiff for an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding with the purchase of part of the plaintiff's mansion house, known as Twyford Abbey, which was comprised in a certain notice to treat served by the defendants and dated January 21, 1898, without the purchase of the remaining portion of the plaintiff's said mansion house. Twyford Abbey, mentioned in the notice of motion, is a mansion house of considerable size, situated between Baling and Sudbury, and standing in grounds surrounded principally by hedges but partly by a fence. In this fence are entrance gates close to which stands a lodge. Leading from the lodge to a public highway, known as Hanger-lane, is a private road about 620 yards in length, having trees on each side and forming an attractive approach to the house. At the end of the road next to the highway is an outer lodge. Within the grounds of the mansion stands a parochial church or chapel, with a burial ground. This chapel is from time to time, but not regularly, used as a place of public worship, and interments still take place in the burial ground. The mansion and grounds and the private road, together with lands on each side of such road, originally formed part of an estate known as the Twyford Abbey estate, and were formerly the property of a Mr. Willan. By a deed dated November 6, 1890, the devisees under that gentleman's will conveyed to the plaintiff the mansion house and grounds and the site of the private road, together with the advowson of the church or chapel, and all such right and title as the vendors had in or could dispose of in the said church or chapel, subject to a reservation to the vendors and other persons claiming under the will of Mr. Willan of a right of way over and along the private road, and also a right to make and maintain openings into the private road for the purpose of access thereto from any adjoining lands forming part of the Twyford Abbey estate; and also subject to a reservation to the vendors and persons claiming under the will, and generally to all persons lawfully frequenting or going to and from the church and churchyard, of a right of way with horses and carriages from the outer to the inner lodge, and of a right of way on foot from the inner lodge to the church and churchyard. The plaintiff had ever since been, and still was, in occupation of the property so conveyed to him. The defendant railway company was incorporated by an Act of Parliament passed in August, 1894, for the purpose of making a railway between Baling and South Harrow, and with this Act the Lands Clauses Acts and the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, Part I., were incorporated. On January 21, 1898, the defendants served the plaintiff with notice to treat for a portion of the private road (at a point distant from the inner lodge about a quarter of a mile) comprising 2r. 31p., stating that the land in question was required solely to enable the company to construct a bridge for the purposes of their railway over the same, and that the roadway would be lowered 5ft. under the bridge so as to give a headway of 15ft., and that during construction access would be preserved to Twyford Abbey; and they expressed their willingness, instead of purchasing the said lands, to accept and purchase an easement for the purposes aforesaid. On January 29, 1898, the plaintiff gave notice that he required the defendants to purchase and take the whole of the house within the meaning of and pursuant to section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. On February 7, 1898, the defendants gave notice of their intention to issue a warrant for summoning a jury to determine the value of the plaintiff's interest in the lands described in the notice to treat, and the amount of compensation for the damage to be sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the execution of the works authorized by the Act. Thereupon the present action was brought, and the notice of motion served. The question was whether that portion of the road which the railway company desired to take was part of Twyford Abbey within the meaning of section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Moon appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Beale, Q.C., and Mr. R. F. Norton for the railway company.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving his considered judgment, said that in deciding the question he thought no regard was to be paid to the note annexed to the notice to treat, though it might well be that such works as were there mentioned or other works would have to be executed by the company in order to satisfy the obligations imposed by sections 53 and 63 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and to avoid payment of a large sum by way of compensation for injuriously affecting the plaintiff's lands by severance or otherwise. It had been decided by a series of cases that the word "house" in section 92 included whatever would pass under a conveyance of the house by that description. It had also been settled that under the word "house" the curtilage and garden passed, the reason being that those were matters of necessity, and not merely of pleasure, to the house. It was further held in "Doe v. Collins" (2 T. R., 498) that a coal pen on the opposite side of a public road passed as part of a house, upon the ground that the coal pen was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the house. On the other hand, it had been held in "Pulling v. the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company" (3 D. J. and S., 661) that lands adjoining a house used simply for the purposes of pleasure and for keeping cows did not constitute part of the house. That being the state of the law it seemed to his Lordship that in some cases the soil of a piece of land used as a road might pass under the conveyance of the house. To take, for example, a house standing in the middle of a garden enclosed by a ring fence, and approached by a drive leading from the entrance gate to the front door, there the soil of the drive would be as much part of the garden, and therefore, legally speaking, of the house, as the grass plots or flower beds. The same would be true of a road leading through or along a kitchen-garden to the back of the house, as appeared to have been decided in "Barnes v. Southsea Railway Company" (L. R., 27 Ch. D., 536). On the other hand, in "Pulling v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company," Lord Justice Turner was clearly of opinion that if a mansion stood in a park, the park would not pass by a conveyance of the mansion, and it seemed to his Lordship that if matters now stood as they did in 1890, before the sale to the plaintiff, a conveyance of this mansion by the devisees of Mr. Willan would not, without more, have passed either the adjoining lands or the soil of the private road, though it might possibly have passed a right to use the road. A way was certainly "of necessity" to a house, but the question was whether the soil of the way was also "of necessity." In no reported case was there any suggestion to that effect.

His Lordship had great difficulty in seeing why it should be. Avenues and roads such as that which formed the approach to Twyford Abbey were by no means of infrequent occurrence in the country, and sometimes extended to the distance of a mile or more; and if the land proposed to be taken by the defendants was part of Twyford Abbey, the same thing must be true of a piece of road situate, it might be, more than a mile from a house. That went far beyond anything which had yet been decided. Even if the plaintiff's property consisted only of a house with garden and outbuildings there would be great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the soil of this road would pass by a conveyance under the simple description of a "house," though his Lordship thought it highly probable that a right of way over the road would so pass. The plaintiffs' property, however, included an interest in the church and churchyard, which in any view could hardly be part of a "house." It also included a field containing 6a. 2r. 32p. as to which, regard being had to the authorities, it seemed open to great doubt whether it would pass under such a conveyance, and there being substantial property of the plaintiff which would not so pass, the difficulty of holding that the soil of the road affording access to the whole of such property passed under a conveyance of the house would be increased. Seeing that his Lordship was now dealing with the case upon an interlocutory application he thought the motion should be refused.

HARROP AND OTHERS V. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF OSSETT.*

Nuisance—Hospital—Erection of smallpox hospital—Quia timet action dismissed.

The above case (which was reported in The Times of March 18 and 21) was a quia timet action based on private nuisance. The plaintiffs, who were the trustees of an estate and also the owners of a shoddy warehouse and factory, claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from using a hospital as a smallpox hospital. The hospital was a small one, having room for some eight patients. As yet only one smallpox patient had been received there. The hospital was some 250 yards distant from a valuable mansion belonging to the plaintiffs, 100 yards from the privies of the factory and about the same distance from the warehouse, and about 170 from a dwelling-house, occupied by its owner. A six-foot wall enclosing an open space of 40ft. surrounded the hospital. The plaintiffs raised no objection to the hospital being used for infectious or contagious diseases other than smallpox. Their principal contention was that any smallpox hospital must be necessarily a source of danger to persons in its neighbourhood, because that disease was disseminated, inter alia, by air-borne infection or what was called aerial convection. Numerous members of the medical profession were called, who stated their views on this much vexed question. The medical officers of Sheffield, Leicester, and Bradford stated that they had become converts to the theory from their actual experience. The plaintiffs, in their reply, submitted that, whether the theory of aerial convection was sound or not, the evidence showed that a smallpox hospital was in fact undoubtedly a source of danger to its neighbourhood.

*Reported by R. B. SCHOMBURG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh Clare, appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. J. G. Wood for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER said that the principles applicable to claims for relief in quia timet actions were well known. In order to sustain such an action the plaintiff must establish a strongly or extremely probable case that the apprehended mischief must arise. The evidence here was most conflicting, and he did not intend to weigh one side against the other. He could only say that, to his mind, the short result was that the plaintiffs had not established a case entitling them to an injunction. He should give no opinion about the point about which the experts differed so much—namely, the aerial convection of smallpox. All that he should say was that on the balance of testimony a smallpox hospital might be a source of danger if badly conducted, and further he thought that where a smallpox hospital was established there was a tendency for cases to arise in its immediate neighbourhood, especially when the hospital was large and its neighbourhood crowded and ill-ventilated. But he was not satisfied that when such a hospital was well-conducted it was such a substantial source of danger as to constitute it a legal nuisance, and it was certainly not so when the hospital was one like the present, a small one. Taking into consideration the small size of this hospital, its situation, and general nature, he was not satisfied that it would be such a substantial source of danger as would justify the granting of an injunction. Moreover for several years previously there had actually been a smallpox hospital in the immediate neighbourhood and no ill result had ever flowed from it, either to the plaintiffs or others. It was said that the hospital might prove a source of danger when the plaintiffs' land was built upon. It was not necessary to deal with that until the case arose. He was satisfied that, to persons using the land in its present state, there was no substantial source of danger. He also thought there was no source of danger from drainage. All the witnesses, moreover, agreed that vaccination offered complete protection, and he thought that the Court should consider that by taking such reasonable precautions the plaintiffs and others in the neighbourhood could protect themselves. The case, moreover, was not one of public nuisance but of private nuisance. He therefore dismissed the action with costs.

The defendants asked for an order for solicitor and client costs under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

HIS LORDSHIP, after a full argument, held that under the Act he had no discretion and that the defendants were entitled to solicitor and client costs, and made an order accordingly.

Bill of Sale—Validity—Date.

A bill of sale is not voided by the omission of the date in the copy filed on registration.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Fitz Roy Cowper, sitting as Deputy Judge at the Marylebone County Court. The question (which arose upon an interpleader issue) was whether a bill of sale is void if the copy which is filed upon registration omits to state the date of the bill of sale. The bill of sale itself was dated November 10, 1897, but in the copy filed the date was omitted. The Deputy County Court Judge held that the bill of sale was void. The claimant under the bill of sale appealed.

Mr. Turrell appeared for the claimant; Mr. Frank Mellor for the execution creditor.

The Court held that the bill of sale was not voided by the omission of the date in the copy filed. The cases which held that the affidavit filed on the registration of the bill of sale could not be looked at to correct an error in the original bill of sale did not apply to the copy filed upon registration of the bill of sale. Any creditor who looked at the affidavit would find the date accurately given. He could not be misled as there was no inconsistent date in the copy. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed and case remitted to County Court for evidence to be taken upon certain points not dealt with by the Court.

HEMMING AND OTHERS V. DAVIES.*

County Court—Remitted action—Bankruptcy of plaintiff—Security for costs.

A County Court Judge has no jurisdiction to order the trustee of bankrupt plaintiffs in an action remitted from the High Court to give security for costs under sec. 94 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff Sharp, the trustee in bankruptcy of the plaintiffs Hemming and Johnson, from an order of the Judge of the Birmingham County Court ordering the plaintiff Sharp to give security for the costs of the action. In May, 1897, the action, which was for £57 8s. 6d., the price of goods sold and delivered, was commenced in the High Court. On June 5 leave to defend was given and an order made remitting the action to the County Court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888. On August 30 the plaintiffs Hemming and Johnson became bankrupt and on October 7 Sharp was appointed trustee. Upon December 31 an order was made upon Sharp's ex parte application under R.S.C., order 17, rules 4 and 5, adding him as a plaintiff. On January 14, 1898, the writ and the order remitting the action were lodged in the County Court, and on January 24, 1898, the County Court Judge made the order for security for costs to be given by Sharp under section 94 of the County Courts Act, 1888. From that order the present appeal was brought.

MR. BOYDELL HOUGHTON appeared for the appellant and submitted that the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order. The action remained in the High Court till January 14, 1898, the date at which the remitting order was lodged, and the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction to order a trustee appointed by the High Court to give security for costs.

MR. S. HUTTON appeared for the defendant, and submitted that the County Court Judge had jurisdiction to make the order. Sections 65 and 94 of the County Courts Act, 1888, must be read together.

The Court held that the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order. The action was fully constituted in the High Court, and was not liable to abatement, and the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction to cut it down. The action was never within section 94.

THE FIELD STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V. BURR.*
Insurance—Marine—Policy on ship.

Underwriters on an ordinary policy on ship held not liable for expenses incurred by the shipowner in disposing of a cargo damaged in a collision and rejected by the cargo-owners as worthless.

Judgment was delivered in this case, which was tried on the 15th and 16th inst. The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Elmfield to recover a partial loss, under a policy of marine insurance upon the steamship, under circumstances which are fully stated in his Lordship's judgment. The question raised was, shortly, whether the underwriters on a ship are liable under a policy in the ordinary form to pay expenses incurred by the shipowner in discharging and disposing of a cargo which has been so damaged in a collision that it has become worthless and has been rejected by the cargo-owners.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Lewis Noad appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM read the following judgment. —This was an action brought to recover a partial loss alleged to be due by the defendant under a time policy on the plaintiffs' ship Elmfield. The policy was "on hull and materials, on machinery and boilers," valued at £10,000, and the perils insured against were, amongst others, "of the seas . . . and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said . . . ship, &c., or any part thereof." During the currency of the policy the vessel was carrying a cargo of cotton seed on a voyage from Alexandria to London under a charterparty made by the plaintiffs with Messrs. Barnett Brothers, acting for the charterers. On December 20, 1896, she arrived in the Thames, when a vessel called the Derwent came into collision with her, and caused such serious damage to her hull below the water-line that it became necessary to run her ashore in order to prevent her from sinking in deep water. During the next ten days part of her cargo was put into lighters, and by this means she was sufficiently lightened to enable her to be towed to the Tilbury Dry Dock, where she was temporarily patched. On January 5, 1897, she was towed to Millwall Dock, where it was intended that the remainder of her cargo should be discharged. It was proved, however, that, by the action of the water and mud which had found their way into the ship in consequence of the casualty, the cargo had become rotten and offensive, and was a nuisance, and thereupon the sanitary authorities, acting under the powers of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, ordered the ship to abate the nuisance and to remove the cotton seed. In the meantime the owners of the cargo had abandoned the cargo to their underwriters, and neither the cargo-owners nor their underwriters would pay freight or take delivery, alleging, as the fact was, that the cargo had ceased to be cotton seed and had become worthless. The cargo-owners and their underwriters were justified in taking up this position. See "Asfar and Co. v. Blundell" (1 Com. Cas., 71). In these circumstances the plaintiffs made a contract with a firm of Samuel Williams and Sons, who are the owners of a pier at Dagenham, near the mouth of the river, to discharge the cargo and to spread it out on some land at a short distance from the pier at a charge of 5s. per ton, and so to get rid of it. The ship accordingly left the Millwall Dock for Dagenham Pier, and was there discharged by Messrs. Samuel Williams and Sons. The claim against the defendant and his co-underwriters on the hull was a very large one, amounting to many thousands of pounds, but all disputes in connexion with it have been settled between the parties, except as to items amounting in the aggregate to £1,046 12s. 10d. These items may be divided into two classes—(1) the charges incurred in dealing with the cargo between the date of the casualty and its arrival at Dagenham, amounting to £237 2s. 10d., and (2) the charges of Messrs. Williams and Sons amounting to £759 10s. for discharging and disposing of the cargo at Dagenham. The question is whether the defendant and his co-underwriters are under any liability to recoup the plaintiffs any and, if so, what part of this expenditure. The matter in the first instance passed into the hands of Messrs. Robert Lindley, Sons, and Davison, a firm of average adjusters of great experience, who were of opinion that the charges in question ought not to fall on the underwriters on ship, but ought to be paid by the Indemnity Club, in which the plaintiffs' ship was entered. After some correspondence they appear, however, to have modified their view, and to have suggested that perhaps the underwriters on ship should be held liable for what the average adjusters called the "bare cost of removing the damaged cargo from the ship." This suggestion did not satisfy either the Indemnity Club or the underwriters on ship, and thereupon this action was brought in the name of the shipowners to get the dispute settled. Mr. Joseph Walton, who represented the plaintiffs, contended that the expenditure in question was recoverable as having been caused by perils, which had come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the ship, within the meaning of the policy. He admitted that, as between the shipowner and the cargo-owner, it would have been the duty of the former, had the cargo arrived as cotton seed, to put it out of the ship, and to have borne the cost of doing so; but he said that when, as in this case, that duty did not arise, by reason of the cargo-owner being relieved from the correlative duty of receiving the cargo, the ship in the circumstances of this case became injured or damaged by the presence of a large mass of useless matter due to the incursion of the water and its action on the cargo, and that the cost of dealing with it and disposing of it in accordance with the law was as much part of his clients' loss by the perils insured against as the cost of repairing the hole in the ship's bottom. He further suggested that the repairs to the bottom of the ship could not be executed until the cargo was put out, and that therefore he was entitled to the cost of discharging the cargo; and finally he said that, in any event, he was entitled to the difference, which he alleged was considerable, between what it would have cost to discharge cotton seed and the actual cost of discharging the putrid mass in the ship. His argument went so far as to suggest that, even if the structure of the ship had not been injured at all, his clients would have been entitled to recover; as, for instance, if the sea water had got to the cargo through the hatches, and had brought about consequences similar to those which had in fact happened in this case. I think his contentions were not well founded. There are cases in which the underwriters on a policy such as this may be liable, although the vessel suffers no physical injury, as, for instance, where part of the cargo is jettisoned and it becomes necessary to make good the loss in general average, or perhaps, where money has been spent under the suing and labouring clauses. But these are cases which depend upon different considerations. I think that, where the insurance is upon the hull, materials, and machinery of a ship, it is essential before any claim at all can be made against the underwriters, either that the shipowner should be deprived of his ship, or of the use of her, or that physical damage should happen to it by the direct action of one of the perils insured against. It is not enough for the shipowner to say, "The perils of the sea have caused loss to me." He must go further, and show that they have caused the loss of, or damage to, his ship. Take an instance:—The perils of the sea, storms and adverse winds, may delay a ship on her voyage causing her to occupy twice the time she otherwise would do. This is a grievous loss to the shipowner, but it is clear he gets no compensation from his underwriter, either for the cost of keeping the ship during the delay or for the extra wear and tear she undergoes; and the reason is because the underwriter only promises to indemnify him against loss or damage to the thing insured which may happen from the perils included in the policy, amongst which are not those ordinary incidents of a voyage which a ship must encounter when she sails the ocean. Neither the wages, nor the provisions, nor the damages arising from the long user of the ship form any part of the thing insured; and I think the cases show, and I am satisfied that the practice in business points the same way, that, even when the ship suffers actual physical damage from the perils insured against, the underwriter's liability is to be limited to what may reasonably be regarded as the cost of making good the particular damage in question. Consequential damage which the shipowner may suffer the underwriter is not responsible for. (His Lordship referred to the cases of "Robertson v. Ewer" (1 T.R., 127) and "De Vaux v. Salvador" (4 A. and E., 420) as being in point, and also to Park on Marine Insurance, 8th ed., p. 115, Arnold, 6th ed., pp. 727-730, 800, and Benecke, p. 462.) Now, applying the law as laid down in those authorities to the present case, I come to the conclusion that the cost of dealing with and unloading and disposing of the cargo, or, as Mr. Walters calls it, the filthy mass into which the cargo has been changed, is not a loss which has happened to the thing insured by any of the perils insured against. Sea perils or no sea perils, the shipowner has to empty his ship if he ever intends to use her again, and therefore the cost of doing it cannot be said to be rendered necessary by reason of the perils insured against; it has to be incurred any way, and the fact that in the one case the shipowner would, by discharging the cargo, become entitled to his freight, whereas in the other case he cannot get his freight, seems to me not to concern the underwriters on ship at all; and if he is not entitled to the cost of discharging it follows a fortiori that he is not entitled to the cost of dealing with or disposing of the cargo. As to the contention that the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid the difference between what would be the cost of discharging the cotton seed and the actual cost of discharging the material which was in the ship, I think that also is too remote. It constantly happens that cargo arrives so damaged by sea-water as to make it more difficult and expensive to handle in the discharge than it otherwise would be. But who has ever heard of a claim against the underwriter on hull for such a loss as that? The claims are, in my opinion, too remote and cannot fairly be regarded as forming part of the cost of repairs. I find, as a fact, that the plaintiffs have been fully paid by the underwriters for all that can properly be called the cost of repairing. They have, as it seems to me, incurred further consequential loss, but it is a loss for which the defendant is not in any way liable.

Judgment for the defendant with costs.

Ship—Bill of lading—Quantity shipped—Short delivery—Estoppel.

Shipowners held not precluded by the terms of the bill of lading from showing that part of the goods were not shipped.

This was an action brought to recover a balance of freight due on the carriage of a cargo of sleepers on board the plaintiffs' vessel from Riga to West Hartlepool. The claim was admitted subject to a counter-claim for short delivery. It was admitted that there was in fact a short delivery, the question being whether under the terms of the charterparty and bills of lading the plaintiffs were liable for the short delivery. The charterparty which was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants provided that the cargo was "to be brought to and taken from alongside ship at merchant's risk and expense," and that "the bills of lading should be conclusive evidence against the owners of the quantity shipped on board as stated therein." The usual perils were excepted. The bill of lading for one parcel upon which the question arose stated in the body of the bill of lading that 5,300 whole sleepers and 1,062 half-sleepers had been received on board, and there was the following entry in the margin:—"Hereof about 1,000 half pieces and about 400 whole pieces lost through weather as per protest dated Riga, 5-17 Nov., 1897." The sleepers were made into rafts, in accordance with the usual practice at Riga, some distance from the vessel, and then rafted down and left alongside. It appeared from the protest referred to in the bill of lading that a large number of the sleepers had been lost, by reason of a storm, before shipment on board.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. H. F. Manisty appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton for the defendants.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON contended that the shipowners were bound by the figures in the body of the bill of lading ("Fisher, Renwick, and Co. v. Calder," 1 Com. Cas., 450). The note in the margin in the present case only stated what was admitted to be the fact in that case. He also referred to "Lishman v. Christie" (19 Q.B.D., 333).

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that, looking at the whole of the bill of lading, he could not say it amounted to an estoppel. It did not amount to such a clear statement of the quantity taken on board as to justify him in holding that the owners of the ship were precluded from showing that part of the goods were not shipped on board the vessel. The bill of lading referred to the protest, which must therefore be looked at, and from that document it appeared that part of the goods mentioned in the bill of lading were never shipped on board the vessel. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1898.
Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) } March 23.

MANNERS V. S. PEARSON AND SON.*

Account—Action for—Moneys payable under a contract in Mexican dollars—Depreciation in Mexican dollar.

Moneys were payable to M. from time to time in Mexican dollars, under a contract with defendants. M. died, and no one became his legal personal representative till two years afterwards, when the plaintiff took out letters of administration.

In an action by plaintiff for an account, held that such account should be taken on the relative values of the English and foreign currencies at the date of taking the account, and not at the dates when the moneys became payable (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting).

This was an appeal from a decision by Mr. Justice Kekewich. The action was brought for an account of what was due from the defendants to the plaintiff as the legal personal representative of a Mr. Morison under a contract entered into between him and the defendants. By that contract certain sums of money in Mexican dollars had to be paid by the defendants to Morison, and the question at issue was how the account ought to be taken in this country and at what times the sums payable in Mexican dollars ought to be reckoned in English money, and how the equivalent sums in English money ought to be calculated. The contract was dated October 6, 1891. It was in the English language, and was made between Morison, described as of the City of Mexico, of the one part, and the defendants, described as of 10, Victoria-street, Westminster, and thereafter called the contractors, of the other part, and by it the defendants agreed to pay Morison (1) £595 17s. 6d. in English money on the execution of the agreement; (2) 1c. in Mexican currency for every cubic metre of certain excavation works mentioned in the agreement. This money was payable from time to time as and when the same should be received by the defendants from the junta or committee of management of the drainage works of the city and valley of Mexico. The contract also provided as follows:—"3. The contractors shall within one month from the date of this agreement, and monthly thereafter, make and furnish to the said A. D. Morison a statement in writing of the total number of cubic metres of excavation which shall have been done by the contractors and paid for by the junta to them as aforesaid up to the date of such account and of the amount then payable to the said A. D. Morison at the rate of 1c. per cubic metre, and the contractors shall be entitled to take credit for and deduct therefrom all sums paid by them to the said A. D. Morison on account thereof as per statement attached, and they shall immediately thereafter pay the balance appearing by such account to be due to him. 4. Subsequent payments shall be made by the contractors to the said A. D. Morison as and when the contractors shall from time to time receive from the junta payment for excavation done by them" as therein mentioned. The £595 17s. 6d. was duly paid, and so long as Morison lived the defendants paid him all that became due to him under the contract. He died in June, 1894, and no one became his legal personal representative until May, 1896, when the plaintiff took out letters of administration to his estate. In June, 1896, the plaintiff brought this action for an account. It came on for trial on November 4, 1897, and the Court then declared, inter alia, that the plaintiff was entitled to have an account taken of what was due and payable to him as Morison's legal personal representative under and by virtue of the above agreement, and in taking such an account the defendants were to be credited with a certain sum of £327, as to which no question arose. The defendants had always kept proper accounts of the sums payable to Morison's estate in Mexican dollars, and the plaintiff accepted these accounts as correct. According to them a balance of $19,366 was due from the defendants to the plaintiff. On the accounts two questions arose. First, the plaintiff contended that the dollars ought to be turned into English money whenever any dollars ought to have been paid by the defendants; whilst the defendants contended that the ultimate balance only ought to be turned into English money; secondly, the plaintiff contended that even if the defendants were right in their first contention, this balance ought to be turned into English money on August 31, 1896, when the excavating work was finished and paid for by the Spanish Government. At that date Mexican dollars were worth 2s. 6d. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that the balance ought to be turned into English money on November 13, 1897, when the amount due was first ascertained and when the dollar was worth only 22½d. In these circumstances the plaintiff served the defendants with a notice of motion to give effect to his views. The learned Judge refused the motion with costs. The plaintiff appealed. The case was argued on March 2 and 3, when judgment was reserved.

Mr. H. Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. Cecil Walsh were for the plaintiff; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., Mr. Bardswell, and Mr. Tanner were for the defendants.

The Court dismissed the appeal, Lord Justice Vaughan Williams dissenting.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after stating the facts as above, continued as follows:—Before considering the questions raised by this appeal it is necessary to ascertain the grounds on which any judgment or order for payment in English money can be properly made in a case where the plaintiff sues upon a contract to pay in the currency of a foreign country. The terms of the contract confer no right to payment in English money. If the defendants had tendered to their creditors either in Mexico or wherever they demanded payment the amounts due from them in Mexican dollars at the proper times they would have offered to perform their obligations in strict accordance with their contract. The necessity for considering what amount the defendants ought to pay in English money arises simply from the fact that the plaintiff, having the right to sue the defendants in this country for a breach of their contract, has chosen to sue them here instead of in Mexico; and speaking generally the Courts of this country have no jurisdiction to order payment of money except in the currency of this country. Whatever sum is ordered to be paid, whether for principal, interest, or damages, must be expressed in English money, or such order cannot be enforced by the ordinary writs of execution. Whether before the Debtors Act an order in Chancery for the payment of so many Mexican dollars could have been made and could have been enforced by attachment I do not pause to inquire. With this possible exception the above statement is correct and affords the true explanation of the necessity for considering how much money in English currency the defendants ought to pay the plaintiff. If the defendants were within the jurisdiction of any other civilized State and were sued there, as they might be, the Courts of that State would have to deal with precisely the same problem, and to express in the currency of that State the amount payable by the defendants instead of expressing it in Mexican dollars. If this be the true explanation of the necessity for expressing in English money what the defendants ought to pay, it follows that such necessity does not arise until the Court orders payment. But it does not follow that the sum to be inserted in the order is the equivalent at that time of the moneys payable by the terms of the contract, for the defendants may be liable, not only to pay those sums, but also damages in the shape of interest or otherwise for not having paid them at the proper time. The obligations, if any, of the defendants in this respect must be determined before the amount for which they are liable can be calculated and expressed in any order for payment. The foregoing considerations furnish the principles on which the present case must be decided; and that principle was clearly expressed by Lord Eldon in "Cash v. Kennion" (11 Ves., 314). At page 316 he said:—"I cannot bring myself to doubt that where a man agrees to pay £100 in London on January 1 he ought to have that sum there on that day. If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him the law of that country ought to give him just as much as he would have had if the contract had been performed." The application of this principle to various circumstances is illustrated by other decisions (e.g., "Cockerell v. Barber," 16 Ves., 461; "Scott v. Bevan," 2 B. and Ad., 78; "Bertram v. Duhamel," 2 Moo., P.C., 212); but it is unnecessary to refer to them at length, and I pass to the facts of the present case. It must be borne in mind that for two years after Morison's death he had no legal personal representative to whom the defendants could pay anything. During all that time the defendants did not break their contract in not making the payments which they had agreed to make, and, there being no breach of contract, damages for non-payment during that time are out of the question. Moreover, there is no evidence that interest is payable by the law of Mexico on debts in respect of which there is no contract to pay interest, as is the case here. When in May, 1896, the plaintiff became Morison's administrator he became entitled to demand from the defendants—first, payment at once in Mexican dollars of all arrears due under the contract; secondly, payment in future, in Mexican dollars and at the stipulated times, of the amounts which should thereafter become due under the contract. Failure by the defendants to make these payments would be breaches by them of their contract, and would expose them to claims for damages in some shape or other. How these damages would have to be ascertained by an English Court if it became necessary to assess them is a question of some difficulty, as will be seen by turning to Story's Conflict of Laws (§§ 308 et seq.) and Sedgewick on Damages (3rd ed., p. 250). But, for reasons which I proceed to state, I am of opinion that no claim by the plaintiff to damages in any shape can be supported in the present case. The order of November 4, 1897, was the judgment on the trial of the action, and it limits the right of the plaintiff to an account of what is due to him from the defendants under their agreement with Morison. This judgment excludes all claim to damages for non-payment of particular sums charged against the defendants in taking the account. If the plaintiff wanted to charge the defendants with damages in taking the account he should have obtained some declaration or inquiry entitling him to such damages. Before the Judicature Acts no one ever heard of investigating damages in taking an account in Chancery of money due under a contract. Since the Judicature Acts damages can be given in the Chancery Division where they could not have been given before; but even now a judgment or order for an account of what is due under a contract does not involve an inquiry as to damages in taking the account. The absence from the judgment of November 4, 1897, of any declaration or inquiry as to damages is easily explained by the long delay in obtaining letters of administration to Morison's estate, during which time no damages could be payable by the defendants; but even as to damages since the plaintiff obtained letters of administration the judgment pronounced is fatal to the plaintiff's first contention, that he is entitled to have all sums payable by the defendants turned into English money at the times when those sums became payable according to the terms of the contract. Such a contention can only be supported on the theory that the defendants are liable for damages for default in payment. To substitute English money for Mexican dollars every time a payment ought to have been made is not to take an account of what is due under the contract, but to give damages for every breach of it which the plaintiff can prove that the defendants committed, which is a totally different matter. Even as regards the balance of 19,600 dollars found due to the plaintiff, I see no grounds for awarding him damages for the non-payment of that sum before it was ascertained. The plaintiff urges that it now appears that this sum ought to have been paid on August 31, 1896; but how could it have been paid then when no one then knew what the amount payable was? The sum in question is the balance due on taking the whole account. Under the judgment of November 4, 1897, the defendants are not chargeable with damages for delay in accounting, any more than they are chargeable with damages for not punctually paying sums properly placed to their debit in taking the account. Moreover, no undue delay in accounting was proved so far as we know. As soon as the balance was ascertained the defendants offered to pay it to the plaintiff either in Mexican dollars or in English currency equal to their then value, as the plaintiff might prefer. This offer the plaintiff declined. In my opinion the defendants have been in the right throughout in this particular controversy, having regard as we must to the terms of the contract and to the judgment of November 4, 1897, which is not appealed against. The appeal in my opinion fails and ought to be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY gave judgment to the like effect.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS differed. He said,—The only question argued before us in this case has been as to what is the proper mode of taking the account ordered in an action brought in this country by a creditor to have an account taken of moneys payable abroad by the defendant in foreign currency, whether such account should be taken on the relative values of the English and foreign currencies as of the date of taking the account, or as of the dates when the debts became payable, or as of some other and what date or dates. It was not questioned on either side but that the total debt ordered to be paid after taking the account must be expressed in English currency and that the amount in English currency must be arrived at by taking the real value in English currency of the foreign currency at the place where payable as a purchasable commodity—i.e., in practice, according to the rate of exchange existing at the particular time between the currencies. The only question has been as to what that particular time was. Now I will first consider the question irrespective of the form of action. It seems clear that, in an action in whatever form in the English Courts for the recovery of a debt payable in foreign currency, the amount of the English judgment or order must be expressed in English currency, and that, unless the relative values of the respective currencies are fixed by statute or some authority binding the English Courts or by the agreement of the litigants, the amount of the English judgment or order must be based on the quantity of English sterling which one would have to pay here to obtain in the market the amount of the debt payable in foreign currency delivered at the appointed place of payment—i.e., the amount payable according to the rate of exchange. After referring to “Scott v. Bevan” (2 B. and Ad., 78) and “Suse and Pompe” (8 C.B., N.S. 538), his Lordship continued,—It seems plain that this mode of computing the value of foreign currency in English sterling and that converting the one currency into the other is based upon damages for the breach of contract to deliver the commodity bargained for at the appointed time and place, and, if this is so, it follows that the date as of which that value must be ascertained is the date of the breach, and not the date of the judgment. If this is the general rule in actions for the recovery in English Courts of sums payable abroad in foreign currency, I see no reason why a different rule should be applied in a case where the form of action is, as it is in this case, an action for an account. It may be that in the present case it might have been troublesome to ascertain the dates at which the various sums payable as commission in dollars became payable, but this would not in my judgment have been a sufficient reason for fixing the amount of the result of the account in English sterling according to the value of the dollars at the date of the completion of the taking of the account. This difficulty, however, does not arise in the present case, because the plaintiff is willing that the value shall be taken of the dollars as on August 31, 1896, the date as of which the defendants in fact rendered their account, including all the sums now claimed by the plaintiff. His Lordship then discussed the authorities on the subject and concluded as follows:—I think that the order of Mr. Justice Kekewich ought to be amended by declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to have the amount of Mexican dollars found to be due by the account of August 31, 1896, converted into English money sterling at the rate of exchange prevailing between the said currencies on that day. It seems to me that to hold otherwise would make the plaintiff's remedy for the recovery of what is due to him differ according to the form of procedure and according as he brings his action in the Queen's Bench Division or in the Chancery Division.

IN RE HANNAN'S KING (BROWNING) GOLD MINING COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Share register—Rectification—Refusal to register transfer—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 35.

Where directors refuse to register a transfer, an applicant for rectification under sec. 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, must show that there is no just cause for such refusal.

This was an appeal from the refusal of Mr. Justice Stirling to rectify the register of shareholders of the above-named company by removing the name of the applicant Mr. Clayton and inserting the name of the applicant Mr. Irvine as the holder of 50 fully-paid shares of the company. Mr. Clayton was the transferor and Mr. Irvine was the transferee of these shares. The transfer was executed in July, 1897. The directors refused to pass the transfer and declined to give any reason for their refusal. They based their case upon clause 27 of the articles of association, which provided as follows:—“The directors may, without assigning any reason, decline to register any transfer of shares, fully paid or partly paid, made to any person not approved by them, or made by any member jointly or alone indebted or under any liability to the company, or any transfer of shares, whether fully paid up or not, made to an infant or a person of unsound mind.” The company was formed in March, 1896, for the purpose of acquiring certain mining properties. The capital was £100,000 in shares of £1 each, of which 20,000 were issued as fully paid up and 80,000 with 17s. only paid up. The case made by the applicants was that the refusal to register the transfer was due to the fact that the persons having the management of the company's affairs held a large number of the partially paid up shares and were desirous of preventing the fully paid up shares from being put upon the market. It appeared that the whole of the fully paid up shares came into the hands of two gentlemen named Cookson and Burge, and on January 14, 1897, Mr. Cookson issued to the shareholders a circular purporting to come from the Stock Exchange Agency, whereby fully paid up shares were offered to the shareholders at 10s. per share. On January 19, 1897, the secretary issued a circular to the shareholders in reply to Mr. Cookson's circular, in which he stated that the fully paid up shares were not the ones usually dealt in, which were paid up to the extent of 17s. per share, and that it was only these latter shares that were marketable and able to be negotiated on the Stock Exchange. Mr. Cookson complained of this circular and objected further that there had been a refusal by the company to register transfers of fully paid up shares, and he threatened to take legal proceedings in respect of this latter ground of complaint. In reply the directors stated that no transfer of fully paid up shares had recently been refused, and it appeared from the evidence that a considerable number of transfers which had been laid before the company for approval since the commencement of the year 1897 had been passed, and that only a small proportion had been postponed or refused. Mr. Justice Stirling, from whose judgment these facts are taken, came to the conclusion that there was no sufficient evidence to justify the application, and the motion was refused with costs. The applicants appealed.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Austen Cartmell were for the applicants; Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. Vernon were for the company.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after referring to section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, and to article 27, said that it was incumbent on the applicants to prove that the name of the transferor had been continued on the register and the name of the transferee kept off the register without just cause. An attempt had been made to shift the onus on to the directors and to say that it was for them to prove that the reason of their refusal was that the transferee was a person not approved by them, but, in his Lordship's opinion, this was contrary to “Ex parte Penney” (8 Ch., 446) and to every principle of fairness between man and man. Their Lordships did not sit there as a Court of honour; the question was whether the applicants had made out that the transferee was being improperly kept off the register. There was no evidence of that beyond such as might be inferred from some squabble which took place between the different classes of shareholders six months before the transfer was executed. It was suggested that there was a determination on the part of the directors not to sanction the transfer of any fully paid up shares, but that suggestion was not supported by the evidence. The Court ought, as a matter of honesty between man and man, to presume that the directors were acting within their powers unless the contrary was proved; but that was not proved by casting unfounded aspersions upon them. The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

PAGET V. PAGET.*

Married Woman—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Husband's debts—Exoneration—Indemnity against husband—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, sec. 39.

Action for a declaration of indemnity dismissed, affirming decision of Kekewich, J. ([1898] 1 Ch., 47).

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mrs. Paget, from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich dated November 16 last. The action was brought by the plaintiff, suing in respect of her separate estate, against the defendant, her husband, claiming a declaration that he was liable to indemnify her against two mortgages under which she had, with the sanction of the Court, charged her life interest under the will of her grandfather. At the date of her marriage, which took place in January, 1877, the plaintiff was entitled under that will to receive during her life for her sole and separate use, and without power of anticipation, the net residue of the annual income of a moiety of certain warehouse property situated in Manchester, and of a sum of £100,000. Under a settlement made on the marriage the defendant was entitled to an annual income of £2,000. By two orders dated respectively June 28, 1882, and August 11, 1887, and made under section 39 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, it was ordered that the life interest of the plaintiff under her grandfather's will should be charged for the purpose of raising two sums of £23,000 and £22,000. These sums were to be expended in payment of the debts and liabilities of the defendant. Since May, 1893, the plaintiff and the defendant had been living apart. It was decided by Mr. Justice Kekewich that it could never have been intended by the plaintiff or by the Court that she should have a remedy against her husband not reserved by the orders. The action was accordingly dismissed, but without costs. From that decision the plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. A. à Beckett Terrell were for the appellant; Mr. Cozens Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. John Henderson were for the respondent.

At the conclusion of the arguments on the 1st inst. their Lordships reserved judgment, which was delivered affirming the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich and dismissing the appeal with costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS read the following judgment of the Court:—This is an appeal by the plaintiff, Mrs. Paget, against a judgment of Mr. Justice Kekewich dismissing an action brought by her against the defendant, her husband. The object of the action was to obtain a declaration that the plaintiff's husband was liable to indemnify her against two charges for £23,000 and £22,000 created by her on her separate property for the payment of his debts. The case is reported in [1898] 1 Ch., 47. The material facts are there set out, and it is unnecessary to repeat them at length here. It is sufficient to state that Mr. and Mrs. Paget were married in January, 1877. The husband was entitled to some reversionary property. His interest in this property was settled on the marriage, but this property produced no income to him. The wife was a lady of fortune and the bulk of her property was settled on her for her life for her separate use with power of anticipation. The sum of £2,000 a year derived from her property was, however, settled on her husband for life, but so that if he attempted to alienate it, or if he became bankrupt this annuity became payable to his wife. The other provisions of the settlement need not be referred to. The husband and wife moved in good society and, large as their income was, they lived far beyond it. So recklessly extravagant were they that five years after their marriage £23,000 was sorely needed to relieve them from the pressure of debts for which the husband was legally liable; but which debts had been contracted to defray the expenses of the extravagant mode of living which they both apparently enjoyed. It is impossible, in our opinion, to read the evidence in the case without coming to the above conclusion. The affidavits filed in support of the plaintiff's application in June, 1882, for the order to which we will refer presently leave no doubt, in our minds, that these debts had been contracted not for purposes of the husband with which the wife had little to do, but in order to enable them both to live in the style they both thought suitable and perhaps necessary to enable them to maintain and enjoy that high social position which they both so greatly desired. We attach more importance to what the wife said in these affidavits than we do to what she said some 15 years later when examined in this action and when she was endeavouring to support her present claim. In the affidavits sworn by her and her solicitor in 1882 there is nothing to lead to the inference that any of the debts which then had to be met were incurred by her husband for purposes of his own as distinguished from the purposes of himself and his wife as already stated. In her affidavit of June, 1882, the plaintiff referred to the debts as contracted by her husband and herself as "our debts." It is true she said that until 1880 her attention was not called to the fact that she and her husband were getting into difficulties; but her affidavit shows that after she knew of those difficulties all that she really cared about was to increase the net income of herself and her husband, and to maintain their position in society. Her solicitor's affidavit leads to the same conclusion. On June 28, 1882, the plaintiff applied for and obtained an order under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, enabling her to mortgage her life interest to secure £23,000 and interest and the premiums of a policy on her life. We do not think it necessary to refer in detail to the arrangements made for raising this sum nor to its application when raised. It is sufficient to say that the money was raised as authorized by the order, and except as to £3,600 was applied in paying the debts intended to be paid off by its means. The £3,600 not so applied was misappropriated by the solicitor who raised the money. Five years afterwards another sum of £22,000 was wanted for similar purposes. Another application was made to the Court, supported by further affidavits by the plaintiff and her then solicitor, and on August 11, 1887, another order was made enabling the plaintiff to mortgage her life interest for £22,000 and interest and for the premiums on another policy. This sum was accordingly raised and applied as authorized by the order. The plaintiff's affidavit filed on this occasion, July 28, 1897, referred to what had been done in 1882 and to the misappropriation of £3,600, and to the fact that debts had been contracted to pay off the creditors who ought to have been paid off with that sum, and to the impossibility of avoiding bankruptcy and loss of social position if the arrangements then contemplated were not carried out. The plaintiff stated her desire to raise this sum of £22,000, and she spoke of the debts as "our debts" as she had done in 1882. She represented the debts to be hers quite as much as her husband's, and she treated his income and hers as one which it was desirable to maintain as far as possible. These transactions of 1882 and 1887 having been completed, the question arises whether Mrs. Paget is entitled to be indemnified by her husband against these sums of £23,000 and £22,000 when called in and in the meantime against the interest and premiums charged on her life interest by the above orders. The fact that the plaintiff and her husband were separated in 1893 explains how this controversy has arisen, but does not, in our opinion, affect the question of law which has to be considered. The plaintiff's rights, whatever they are, were not created in 1893, but arose in 1882 and 1887, although she might not care to enforce them whilst she and her husband lived happily together. What, then, were her rights in 1882 and 1887? In this action she has given evidence and has stated that nothing was ever said about her giving anything to her husband, that he managed all her affairs and she did not understand them and did not want to do so; that in making her former affidavit in 1882 she ought not to have used such expressions as "our debts" and "my debts"; that she herself was not living beyond her income; that some of the debts which had to be paid were not for money spent for her and her husband's joint benefit. But when pressed on this point it seems tolerably plain that there is no reason for saying that the statement contained in her affidavit of 1882 did not disclose the true state of things and ought not now to be believed, although she evidently wishes to minimize the effect of it. What she now says, however, is that all she knew was that her husband was in danger of being made bankrupt and that she wished to save him from such a disaster. Her attempt to dissociate herself from her husband's racing debts was not successful. As regards the transaction of 1887, she admitted that the financial situation which needed treatment then was very much the same as in 1882 and arose from the same cause. She also stated that in 1887 her husband was in America and that Mr. Justice Chitty, who made both orders, saw her in his private room and was told by her how these new difficulties had arisen, what the debts were, what the money was wanted for, and so on. The learned Judge was, no doubt, greatly influenced on both occasions by her own statements as to her own indebtedness. Bearing in mind this evidence we have to consider the effect in equity of the transactions in 1882 and 1887, to which we have alluded. The authorities bearing on the subject, beginning with "Huntingdon v. Huntingdon" (2 Wb. and Tnd., 6th Edit., p. 1,147), and coming down to "Hudson v. Carmichael" (Kay, 613), show that if a married woman charges her property with money for the purpose of paying her husband's debts and the money raised by her is so applied, she is prima facie regarded in equity, and as between herself and him, as lending him and not giving him the money raised on her property, and as entitled to have her property exonerated by him from the charge she has created. This doctrine is purely equitable, and the authorities which establish it show that it is based on an inference to be drawn from the circumstances of each particular case: the prima facie inference being in such a case as that supposed that both parties intended that the wife's assistance should be limited to the necessity of the case and should not go beyond such necessity. But even where the wife charges her property with money to pay her husband's debts incurred without reference to her there may be circumstances which prevent any inference from arising in her favour. Thus, if a settlement is made by the husband on his wife at the time she charges her estate he is regarded as purchasing her assistance; and the inference that the parties intended that the wife's property should be exonerated by the husband does not arise (see "Lewis v. Nangle," Amb., 150). "Clinton v. Hooper" (1 Ves. J., 173, and 3 Bro. C.C., 201) is the leading authority to show that the doctrine in question is based on an inference to be drawn in each case from all the facts of that particular case. It was long ago settled that, although under the old law a husband became liable for the ante-nuptial debts of the wife, she had no right in equity to compel him to exonerate property of hers charged with those debts, even although he had expressly covenanted to pay them; see "Lewis v. Nangle" (Amb., 150), and "Earl of Kinnoull v. Money" (3 Swan., 202n.). This shows the importance of not confounding the wife's debts with the husband's debts when considering such cases as those to which I am alluding. To say that in all such cases there is a presumption in favour of the wife, and that it is for the husband to rebut it, is, in our opinion, to go too far and to use language calculated to mislead. The circumstances of each case must all be weighed in order to see what inference ought to be drawn; and until an inference in favour of the wife arises there is no presumption for the husband to rebut. If this is forgotten, error may creep in. The circumstances here we take to be those disclosed by the plaintiff in her affidavits, especially her representations of her own indebtedness, as well as of her husband's; and we will add to these her recent statement that nothing was ever said about giving anything to her husband. Neither was anything said about lending him anything. She had a large income, and, although restrained from anticipation, she might have accrued income in respect of which she could contract debts. There is no reason to suppose that she had no debts and could contract none. She represented herself as pressed by her creditors, and we see no reason to doubt the truth of her statements. The plaintiff was as extravagant and reckless as her husband, and was quite as desirous as he of maintaining her position in society. This object, so dear to both of them, might have been entirely frustrated if she had the right against him which she now asserts. That right would, in point of law, have been her separate estate, and she might under pressure have assigned it and her assignee might have enforced it against her husband whether she liked it or not. She had plenty of debts enforceable against any separate estate she had or might have, besides income which she could not anticipate. Those circumstances, and the peculiar position of her husband with respect to his £2,000 a year, lead us to the conclusion that no inference ought in this case to be drawn in her favour of any right to be indemnified by her husband. This conclusion is arrived at apart from the orders of the Court to which Mr. Justice Kekewich attached so much importance, and the effect of which we will now consider. They are based on section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. [His Lordship read it, and continued.] Unless the wording of the section is attended to, there is danger of regarding the section as merely authorizing the Court to remove the restraint against alienation which is so frequently imposed on married women when property is settled on them for their separate use. But it is to be observed that what binds the estate of a married woman is not what she does when the restraint is removed, but the order made by the Court. The language of the section is that the Court may—by judgment or order—bind her interest. The Court is empowered to do this where it appears to the Court for her benefit so to do, and with her consent. A question at once arises whether the doctrine which is applicable to charges created by a wife to pay her husband's debts is to be applied to charges created not by her, but by an order of the Court. The learned Judge in the Court below has held that the doctrine in question has no application to such a case, and that where orders are obtained under that section charging her property with money to be applied in paying her husband's debts the order should show on the face of it that her husband is to be liable to indemnify her if he is to be under any such liability. It certainly might be convenient if such orders were so drawn as to show what was intended in this respect. But these orders are usually made without hearing the husband, and we are not prepared to say, as a matter of law, that an order silent as to the wife's rights against her husband is fatal to the existence of such rights. The circumstances under which the order was made might show that a right on her part to be indemnified by her husband ought to be inferred although the order did not allude to it. The absence of all allusion to such right is, however, a circumstance to be considered, and in this particular case the form of the orders of 1882 and 1887 tells against the plaintiff when regard is had to the statements made by her in order to obtain them. It was urged that it could not be for her benefit that she should be deprived of her right to indemnity, but the force of this observation depends on the tacit assumption that she had the right. The question comes back to the proper inference to be drawn from all the facts, including the orders themselves. And bearing in mind that the plaintiff's paramount object was to save her and her husband's joint income, and thus, as far as possible, to preserve her and his position in society, and that this object might have been defeated if she reserved a right to be indemnified by him, the proper inference to be drawn is, in our opinion, adverse to the evidence of such right. In our opinion, therefore, the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

On the application of the respondent's counsel, their Lordships made an order under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, that the cost of the appeal should be paid out of the property of the appellant although subject to a restraint on anticipation.

IN RE GIBBS.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Apportionment—Settled estate duty—Incidence—Duty borne by the general residue—Finance Acts, 1894 and 1896—Construction.

A somewhat curious point arose in this case as to the incidence of the settlement estate duty upon a legacy of £150,000 settled by the will of the testator, who died in May, 1896. The question turned upon certain provisions contained in the Finance Acts of 1894 and 1896. The settlement estate duty was imposed by the Act of 1894, and in 1896 it was decided by Mr. Justice North in the case of "In re Webber" (L.R. [1896], 1 Ch., 914) that when pecuniary legacies or shares of the residue of a testator's personal estate are settled by his will no part of either the estate duty or the settlement estate duty imposed by the Finance Act, 1894, is to be borne by the settled legacies or shares, but the whole of those duties must be borne by the general residue. That rule, however, was altered by the Act of 1896, which provided, by section 19, that "the settlement estate duty leviable in respect of a legacy or other personal property settled by the will of the deceased shall (unless the will contained an express provision to the contrary) be payable out of the settled legacy or property in exoneration of the rest of the deceased's estate." Section 24 provided that Part IV. of the Act (embracing sections 14-24) should come into operation on July 1, 1896; and the same section further provided that "the expression 'the deceased person' means a person dying after the commencement of this part of the Act"; so that, if the expressions "the deceased" used in section 19, and the "deceased person," which was interpreted by section 24, were taken to be equivalent the one to the other, then section 19 would not apply to the will in the present case. But it was contended on behalf of persons interested in the residue that the two expressions must have different interpretations put upon them in consequence of other provisions contained in the Acts. It was pointed out that section 39 of the Act of 1896 provides that Part IV. of that Act shall be construed together with Part I. of the Act of 1894; and that by section 22, which occurred in that part of the Act of 1894, it is declared that the expressions "deceased person" and "the deceased" mean a person dying after the commencement of that part of the Act—viz., August 1, 1894. So that, reading the two Acts together, the result would be that the will of the testator in the present case was brought within the operation of the Act of 1896, and duty instead of being borne by the residue would fall upon the settled legacy.

Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. Medd appeared for the trustees; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., Mr. Rashleigh, Mr. Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Mr. E. J. Parker for persons interested in the settled legacy; and Sir R. Webster (Attorney-General) and Mr. Ingle Joyce for the residuary legatees, some of whom were charities.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING said that, looking at the Act of 1896, if that had to be interpreted alone no one would suppose that the Legislature had intended to make a distinction between the expressions "the deceased" and "the deceased person." By the Act of 1894 the Legislature had no doubt given an interpretation to be placed on both expressions, but no distinction was drawn between them. Why, then, if the Act of 1896 was to be read as part of that of 1894 was any such distinction to be drawn? His Lordship failed to see, and consequently he held that the Act of 1896 did not apply, and accordingly that the interpretation of the 1894 Act as settled by the case of "In re Webber" applied, and the duty must in the present case be borne by the residue.

ANDERSON V. MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY—MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY V. ANDERSON.*

Railway Company—Statutory powers—Demised premises—Purchase of reversion—Covenant for quiet enjoyment.

A railway company, acting under statutory powers, purchased the reversion of premises let on a lease containing a covenant for quiet enjoyment; held that they could not be sued for a breach of the covenant.

*Reported by W. W. KNOX, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the first of these actions the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant company from interfering with the support of a certain passage or otherwise with the peaceable enjoyment by the plaintiff of his right of user of such passage, and he claimed damages in respect of that matter as well as in respect of the injury done by the company in excavating the ground adjoining the plaintiff's premises, whereby, as he alleged, they had caused the walls and ceilings of his premises to crack. The plaintiff was the lessee and occupier of No. 1, Goldhurst-terrace, Hampstead, under a lease dated April 7, 1894, and made between James Findlay of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, whereby the premises in question, together with a right of way in common with all other parties then entitled or thereafter to be entitled to a like right over the passage above mentioned at the side of the premises, were demised to the plaintiff for a term of 21 years from March 25, 1894, determinable at the option of the tenant at the end of seven or 14 years, at a yearly rent rising from £180 to £250 and subject to the covenants and condition contained in the lease. The lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessor that the lessee, on paying the rent reserved and performing the covenants, might peaceably hold and enjoy the demised premises without any interruption by the lessor or any person claiming through him. By the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway (Extension to London) Act, 1893, the defendant company were authorized to make and maintain a certain railway, and for that purpose were empowered to enter upon, take and use the property demised by the lease, but that property did not form any portion of the actual site of the railway as constructed. The company, however, acquired by agreement the reversionary interest of the plaintiff's lessor in the demised premises, and by an arrangement made in October, 1895, the lessor assigned the property to the company subject to the plaintiff's lease. The company proceeded with the construction of their railway in pursuance of its statutory powers, and in the course of such construction it to some extent injured the structure of the plaintiff's premises, but, as was admitted, without negligence on the company's part. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to damages for such injury on the ground that the company, by taking an assignment of the reversion, had rendered itself liable under the covenant for quiet enjoyment. The second action was brought by the company against Anderson for rent due under his lease, and in this action the defendant set up the covenant for quiet enjoyment as a defence, and counter-claimed for damages for its breach.

Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Arnold Statham were for the plaintiff, Mr. Anderson; and Mr. Eve, Q.C., the Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. S. A. Sampson for the railway company.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE delivered judgment to the effect following:—The plaintiff does not dispute that but for the covenant for quiet enjoyment he would not be entitled to sue for damages in respect of the injury, but would be relegated to such remedy as he might have under section 6 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, and section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845; but he says that the company, having neglected to acquire his interest in the property, and having put itself into the position of an assignee of the reversion, is liable by reason of the existence of the covenant. Had the plaintiff's land been required for the actual construction of the railway the question would not have arisen, because the railway company could not have constructed their works without acquiring the plaintiff's interest in the property. The land in which he had an interest is, however, land which the company was entitled to take compulsorily, and, although it has acquired the reversion by agreement, I do not think that any distinction can be drawn on this ground having regard to the authorities bearing on the matter. The precise point that I have to determine is, so far as I am aware, new, but there are authorities which it is necessary to consider in order to arrive at a proper conclusion. His Lordship then discussed the cases of "Kirby v. School Board for Harrogate" (L.R. [1896], 1 Ch., 437), "Clark v. School Board for London" (L.R., 9 Ch., 120), and "Baily v. De Crespigny" (L.R., 4 Q.B., 180), and proceeded as follows:—In each of the cases to which I have referred the point now raised is not precisely involved, because what has happened is not that the covenantor has sold to the railway company adjoining land in respect of which he has entered into restrictive covenants, but that he has sold his reversion in the same land included in the lease containing the covenant for quiet enjoyment; and a distinction is also pointed out in that, in the present case, the lease was granted to the plaintiff and the assignment to the company was executed after the passing of the Act under which the company has done the acts complained of. In my judgment, if the lease had been granted to the plaintiff prior to the passing of the Act the principle of the cases to which I have referred would have been clearly applicable to the present case, although the assignment had been made subsequently to that date, but I have to consider the other question—viz., What is the effect of a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in a lease granted after the passing of an Act of Parliament authorizing, but not requiring, the taking of the land demised? Lessor and lessee must both be deemed to know when they enter into the contract that the land may or may not be taken by the railway company and that the interest of either of them may be so taken without the interest of the other being also acquired. Lessor and lessee also know that their respective interests may be injuriously affected by the railway company in carrying out its statutory obligations and acting strictly within its statutory powers, and both parties know that, should their or either of their interests be injuriously affected, there are statutory provisions providing for compensation being paid. First, as between lessor and lessee, What is the true meaning of a covenant for quiet enjoyment in the terms of the covenant in the present case? Under such circumstances, do the parties mean and intend that the lessor is to be liable in the event of disturbance by the company in the legitimate exercise of its Parliamentary powers, or do they mean that, subject to such exercise of the statutory power, the covenant is to apply? I think that the true intent and meaning of the covenant is that the covenantor will be answerable for his own acts and for the acts of his assignees, but not that he will be answerable for the acts of the railway company in the exercise of its statutory powers, the company not being in the true sense his voluntary assignee at all, although he conveys to the company and it is not put to the actual exercise of its compulsory power. If then the lessor would not be liable, how can his assignee, the railway company, be liable in the absence of a fresh bargain on its part to be liable? It is reasonably clear that the company cannot be liable. But, although I have expressed this view as to the liability of the lessor, it is not in my judgment necessary for the decision, because in the present case it is not the lessor but the railway company against whom relief is sought, and I am of opinion that, even if the plaintiff were entitled to sue the lessor upon his covenant, he is not entitled to sue the railway company, the lessor's compulsory assignee. I think that a railway company taking lands under statutory powers, and constructing works within such powers without negligence, is entitled to take the interest of any person having an interest in land without incurring liability in respect of any existing covenant entered into by the owner, whose interest the company acquires, so far as the enforcement of such covenant would impose a burden upon the company in derogation of its statutory rights and obligations. It is not necessary to say or decide that the covenant is gone for all purposes. On the other hand, I think that for some purposes it still exists. Nor is it necessary to consider how far the acts done by the railway company, if amounting to a destruction of the subject-matter of the lease, might or might not afford a good answer to an action for rent or in respect of other covenants of the lease. It has been urged on behalf of the plaintiff that it seems anomalous and unfair that the company can take the interest of a lessor with all such lessor's rights, and at the same time be free from the obligations imposed by the lease upon the lessor. The question can only arise in rare instances. If the land is really required for the purpose of the undertaking it is, of course, as necessary, if not more necessary, in most cases to take the interest of the lessee than that of the lessor, but it may happen that the interest of one or other of the parties interested in the land may be bona fide taken by the company before it discovers that it does not require the land. There has been a suggestion in the present case that the plaintiff took his lease with a view to the profit he might make upon the land being taken by the company. I am bound to say that I see no justification upon the evidence for the suggestion; on the other hand the plaintiff has rather endeavoured to hold up the railway company as oppressive, declining to take his property from sinister motives. I have nothing to do with these matters, but have only to consider the legal position. I think the company has acted within its legal rights, and that the plaintiff must look to his statutory right to compensation for such remedy as he is entitled to. This involves the dismissal of the plaintiff's action so far as his claim in respect of injury done to the structure of his house is concerned, and it also disposes of the counter-claim in the second action, and both must be dismissed with costs, except as to the costs of the first action down to the time of the amendment, which I allowed at the trial; those costs, I consider, ought to be borne by the railway company.

His LORDSHIP gave judgment for the company for the rent claimed, but stayed execution on the terms of an appeal being promptly brought.

Limitations, Statute of—Acknowledgment—Letters—Parol evidence admitted to connect two letters.

In this action, Mr. John Knight M'Guffie claimed from Mr. Sampson Burleigh £1,838 6s., the balance of an account for money lent and interest thereon. The defence relied on was the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I., c. 16). The plaintiff said that the defendant had given a written acknowledgment which under Lord Tenterden's Act, 1828, was sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

Mr. P. Rose-Innes appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. Gore Browne for the defendant.

The action came on for trial before the learned Judge and a common jury. It appeared from the evidence for the plaintiff that on October 25, 1891, he wrote to the defendant, saying, "If you can spare money to travel about, surely you can try to liquidate your debt, even by small payments. . . . If I do not hear from you within a week or ten days, to do what you have promised—to meet me in town and arrange a settlement at my lawyer's, I shall let the law take its course." The letter was addressed to "Dear Sam," and was signed "M'G." On November 3, 1891, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff:—"Dear M'Guffie,—I shall be in London on Friday and will meet you at Bodega, Mark-lane, at 1 o'clock, and go with you to your lawyer's and settle matters to your satisfaction. In great haste, yours ever, S. BURLEIGH."

At the close of the plaintiff's case, Mr. DICKENS submitted that the letter of November 3, did not give an unconditional acknowledgment from which there could be inferred an unconditional promise to pay. The letter might have reference to any kind of transaction. There was no reference in it to any other letter, and therefore this was the only letter that the Court could consider. Even if the two letters were taken together there was not a sufficient acknowledgment, but the first letter not being referred to in the second was not incorporated therewith, and therefore could not be looked at. A document not under the defendant's hand could not be a memorandum in writing within the statute. The general terms of defendant's letter did not show any acknowledgment of a debt. If the letter might refer to several things the Court had no right to infer that it referred to a debt.

Mr. ROSE-INNES, for the plaintiff, said that the Court might take into consideration oral evidence connecting the two letters. There was evidence that the second letter was a reply to the first. He referred to "In re Buskin, ex parte Farlow" (15 R., 117). This case came within that decision. There was evidence to go to the jury that there had been an acknowledgment of the debt.

Mr. DICKENS, in reply, said that in the case cited by his friend the writing referred to "the debt."

Mr. ROSE-INNES referred to "Firth v. Slingsby" (58 L.T., 481), and "Green v. Humphreys" (26 C.D., 474).

In answer to his LORDSHIP, Mr. DICKENS said that he would rest his case on the point he had argued.

Mr. JUSTICE BRUCE.—There is no question for the jury then.

Mr. ROSE-INNES said that it was a question for the jury whether or not there had been an acknowledgment. He cited "Morrell v. Frith" (3 M. and W., 402). If there were extrinsic facts throwing light on the document, its construction was for the jury.

Mr. JUSTICE BRUCE said that that was a question of law, and there was therefore nothing for the jury. In delivering judgment, his Lordship said that the question raised was whether there was a sufficient acknowledgment in writing to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. [His Lordship then read the two letters referred to above.] If these two letters were read together they were a sufficient acknowledgment. The defendant did not in terms refer in the second letter to the previous one, and it was said on his behalf that the two letters could not be read together and that parol evidence was inadmissible to connect them. There was parol evidence showing that the second letter was written in reply to the other one. The sole point, therefore, was whether parol evidence was admissible to connect the two letters. He was of opinion that it was. [His Lordship then referred to the words of Lord Tenterden's Act.] "Hartley v. Wharton" (11 A. and E., 934) showed that parol evidence could be admitted to supply deficiencies in the writing. "Spickernell v. Hotham" (Kay, 669) was an authority to the same effect. Having cited "Edmunds v. Downes" (2 C. and M., 459), the learned Judge said that he had come to the conclusion on these authorities that parol evidence was admissible to connect the letters. During the argument reference was made to the decisions under the Statute of Frauds that parol evidence was not admissible to connect two documents so as to constitute a memorandum within the statute. He did not think that the decisions under the Statute of Frauds were applicable to Lord Tenterden's Act. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff for £1,586 16s. 8d., being the amount claimed less certain deductions. The costs would follow the event.

BRYANT V. HANCOCK AND CO.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenant—Construction.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Lawrence in an action to recover damages for breach of a covenant contained in a lease, dated October 16, 1874, of the Princess Royal Hotel, at Grangemouth, Cardiff. The lease was for 21 years and was granted by the plaintiff to John Biggs, who in March, 1890, assigned it to the defendants. The covenant was that the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns would conduct the business of the hotel in a proper and orderly manner so as to afford no ground or pretence for discontinuing the licences thereof; and would not wilfully do or suffer any act or thing which might be a breach of the rules and regulations established by law for the conducting of licensed publichouses or be a reasonable ground for the withdrawing or withholding of all or any of the licences for the sale of beer, ale, wine, and spirituous liquors therein; and would from time to time apply for and do or cause to be done all and whatsoever should be requisite for obtaining the renewal of such licences, and would at the end of the term deliver up the licences. It appeared that on one occasion some cases of drunkenness had occurred on the premises while they were in the occupation of a monthly tenant of the defendants, and that the justices at Brewster sessions had refused to renew the licence for the house on the application of the tenant. The applicant appealed to the quarter sessions, and, on their refusal to hear the appeal on the ground that the notices were not in proper order, obtained a mandamus for them to hear and determine it. After they had heard it the applicant again applied for a mandamus, and, on failing to obtain it in the Queen's Bench Division, appealed unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. At the trial a verdict and judgment were entered for the plaintiff for £5,300. The defendants appealed, on the ground that there was no evidence of any breach of the covenant. It was contended on their behalf that their tenant had not forfeited any existing licence, nor done any act which was a ground of forfeiture, and that he had done all that he possibly could do for obtaining a renewal of the licence.

Mr. B. F. Williams, Q.C., Mr. Arthur Lewis, and Mr. S. T. Evans appeared for the defendants; Mr. Abel Thomas, Q.C., and Mr. Tudor Howell for the plaintiff.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the judgment of the Court as follows:—In this case the plaintiff sues the defendants for breach of covenant, and has recovered damages to the amount of £5,300. The defendants appeal upon the ground that upon the true construction of the covenant sued on, when applied to the proved facts of the case, no breach thereof has been committed by them. The material facts are these. By lease dated October 16, 1874, the plaintiff demised to John Biggs and his assigns the Princess Royal Hotel, at Grangemouth, near Cardiff, for a term of 21 years. Upon March 31, 1890, Biggs assigned to the defendants the residue of the term granted by the lease of October 16, 1874, and it is not disputed that the defendants as assignees became liable to the covenant sued on by the plaintiff. After the defendants had entered into possession of the hotel as such assignees, they let the same to a Mrs. Evans as tenant for a short part of the term vested in them. Mrs. Evans thus became under-tenant to the defendants, and in our opinion it cannot be said that she became an assign of either Biggs or the defendants within the meaning of the covenant sued on. It has been held that an assurance for a period less than the whole term is an underlease and not an assignment—"Cottee v. Richardson" (7 Exch., 143); though an assurance purporting to be an underlease, but which comprises the whole term, may be an assignment—"Langford v. Selmes" (4 K. and J., 220), "Beardman v. Wilson" (L.R., 4 U.P. 57). It has also been held that a covenant not to assign is not broken by the granting of an underlease—"Crusoe v. Bugby" (3 Wils., 284). In the case of "Taite v. Gosling" (11 Ch. D., 273) Mr. Justice Fry held that a lessee for a term of 99 years could take advantage as an assign of mutual covenants where the assignees of a covenant were to have the same benefit as the covenantees had. This is a very special case upon the particular meaning of the word "assign" in the particular covenant, and does not trench upon the well-known distinction between an under-lessee and an assignee. Mrs. Evans whilst tenant to the defendants as above-mentioned upon one occasion permitted drunkenness to take place upon the premises. It is not in our judgment necessary to go through the many steps in the litigation which then took place; it is sufficient to say that it is clear that the defendants took all possible steps to obtain a renewal of the licence, which the justices refused to renew at the next general annual licensing meeting, their ground for refusal being that Mrs. Evans had upon one occasion permitted drunkenness upon the premises upon the occasion above-mentioned. It was thus that the licences of the Princess Royal Hotel were lost. In these circumstances the defendants are sued as being assignees of Biggs for the residue of the term contained in the lease of October 16, 1874, and it is upon the true construction of the covenant therein contained that this case depends. Whether the covenant sued on is one covenant or different covenants is not material, for it is clear that there are three separate and distinct parts of the covenant, under each of which a different obligation is undertaken by the covenantor. The first part commences, "And further that he the said John Biggs," and ends with the words "for discontinuing the licences thereof." In our opinion this part of the covenant relates to the forfeiting of the licence when existing as distinguished from the renewal thereof, which is dealt with in the second part of the covenant. It would be wholly unreasonable to hold that both the first and second parts of the covenant referred to the same thing, so that both an absolute and qualified covenant existed as to the same thing. This first part in our judgment is an absolute covenant by the covenantor, his executors, administrators, and assigns against the forfeiture of an existing licence of the Princess Royal Hotel, and does not embrace the question of renewal of such licence. The second part of the covenant is a limited covenant, and is confined to the covenantor, his executors, administrators, and assigns wilfully doing or suffering anything which should be a reasonable ground for withdrawing or withholding the licences—i.e., which should afford a reasonable ground for the justices refusing to renew. This is clearly not an absolute covenant. And the third part of the covenant is a covenant by the covenantor, his executors, administrators, and assigns to apply for and do all that shall be reasonably requisite for the renewal of the licence, and that when renewed he will deliver up the same at the determination of the term. This is not an absolute covenant. Now, as regards the first part of the covenant, no liability attaches to the defendants, for the simple reason that the then existing licences have not been forfeited. As regards the second part, the covenantor or his assigns have not wilfully done or suffered anything which should be a reasonable ground for the justices refusing to renew the licence. If the covenantor or his assigns are to be liable for a tenant of an assignee causing the licence not to be renewed, it seems to us there should either be a clear and absolute covenant that they would be so liable, or a covenant that such tenant would do nothing to jeopardize a renewal. We give no opinion upon whether Mrs. Evans's act was such as to afford reasonable ground for the justices refusing to renew. As regards the third part of the covenant the facts show that the defendants have done all in their power to obtain a renewal, but without avail. For these reasons we are of opinion that when the covenant sued on is correctly read no breach has been established against the defendants, and that this appeal therefore must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants, with costs here and below.

WARD V. PORTSMOUTH CORPORATION.*

Burial Ground—Burial Act, 1863, sec. 6—“New burial ground”—Approval of Secretary of State.

In this case the plaintiff, Mr. William Ward, being then the owner of certain land in the parish of Portsea, in August, 1889, agreed with the burial board for the parish of Portsmouth for the purchase of the land for £6,270, of which £100 was to be (and, in fact, was) paid at the time, and the balance on completion of the purchase on June 24, 1896. Before the agreement was entered into the consent of the Portsmouth Vestry was obtained, as required by section 26 of the Burial Act, 1852. In January, 1895, the Corporation of Portsmouth, as the urban sanitary authority, passed a resolution under section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1894, in pursuance of which the corporation became the statutory successors of the burial board on June 11, 1896. The corporation intimated to the plaintiff, Mr. Ward, that it did not intend to complete the contract.

The land had been agreed to be bought for the purpose of enlarging the then existing cemetery for the parish of Portsmouth, but the Home Secretary had refused to give to the corporation the approval required by the Burial Act, 1863. The plaintiff contended that this refusal did not justify the corporation in refusing to complete their contract to purchase, and brought the present action for specific performance of the contract, or, alternatively, for damages.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Methold were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. George Williamson for the corporation.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE, in delivering judgment, said the object for which the land was wanted was to use it as burial ground. The board had already a burial ground, and this land was adjacent to it and was required as an addition to it. The contract was not to be completed for some years, and in the meantime the plaintiff was to be entitled to make some use of the land. The corporation had succeeded the board, and was now to be considered as the contractor with the plaintiff. The real question arose in the following manner:—Section 25 of the Burial Act, 1852, required every burial board with all convenient speed to provide a burial ground for the parish, and also provided that “no ground not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be appropriated as a burial ground, or as an addition to a burial ground, under this Act, nearer than 200 yards to any dwelling-house, without the consent in writing of the owner, lessee, and occupier of such dwelling-house.” The proviso had since been repealed; but it was legitimate to refer to it to see whether other statutory provisions related to the acquisition of property wanted, as in this case, as an addition to an existing burial ground. The first part of the proviso referred to an existing burial ground, and the second to an addition thereto. Section 26 of the same Act said that, for the providing such burial ground, it should be lawful for the board, with the approval of the vestry, “to contract for and purchase any lands for the purpose of forming a burial ground, or for making additions to any burial ground . . . as such board may think fit.” The section also empowered the board to purchase existing cemeteries for providing burial grounds, and the rest of the section was immaterial. By section 28 the board was empowered, with the approval of the vestry, to sell lands purchased under the Act in which no interment had taken place, and which it appeared to the board might be properly sold. Having regard to these sections, it appeared that section 25 required burial ground to be provided which might or might not be new ground, for the board might acquire an old burial ground and add new ground to it, or might provide fresh land only. The repealed part of the section was for the protection of adjoining owners, and referred to grounds not already used or appropriated as burial ground which were not without such owners' consents to be within a certain distance from their houses. The Act of 1852 was not dealing with cases where the Secretary of State might interfere. The approval of the vestry was only a safeguard, and this had been obtained. By section 6 of the Burial Act, 1863, where by any such Order in Council as was mentioned in the Act it was ordered that no new burial ground should be opened within the limits therein mentioned without the previous approval of the Secretary of State, no “new burial ground or cemetery” should be “provided and used” within such limits without such previous approval. On one side it was said that, notwithstanding there was such an Order in Council, as there was an existing burial ground, and it was only desired to get an addition thereto, it was unnecessary to obtain the Secretary of State's approval before entering into the contract.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

But what was meant was that, when once an Order in Council had been made, no new burial ground—meaning ground to be used either alone or in addition to an old burial ground—was to be provided and used without the previous approval of the Secretary of State. Section 6, in his Lordship's judgment, applied to an addition to a pre-existing burial ground as well as to a burial ground which was entirely new. The action must therefore be dismissed with costs.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. THE MAYOR OF SWANSEA.*

Municipal Corporation—Borough fund—Action to restrain application—Opposing Bill in Parliament—Borough Funds Act, 1872—Injunction granted.

This was a motion on the part of the Swansea Gas Company, the relators in this action, and who were suing as ratepayers, for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant corporation from applying the borough funds in opposing a Bill, promoted by the relators in Parliament, without having first obtained the consent of the owners and ratepayers of their district and the sanction of the Local Government Board to such expenditure, in accordance with the provisions of the Borough Funds Act, 1872. The motion was opened on Friday of last week and continued on Saturday after the unopposed business, but not heard out, and accordingly stood over till yesterday; the Bill was first in the list for consideration by a committee of the House of Lords which sat on Monday. The Bill came before the committee, and the corporation opposed, on the ground that several clauses were not proper and other provisions ought to be inserted. Certain amendments, proposed by the corporation, were accepted by the promoters, for instance, the insertion of an auction clause applicable to issue of capital and loan capital, the dropping of a sliding scale, the prevention of an increase in the reserve fund by reason of conversion of capital limited to 15 per cent. dividend into double the amount limited to 5 per cent. dividend, and a provision extending to the existing area of the borough a price below that charged to consumers outside the limits of the borough; and the corporation gave up opposition on certain points—four points of opposition only were gone into on committee—namely, (1) as to the additional capital; (2) as to a place for testing gas away from the works; (3) as to having an independent auditor; and (4) as to a clause generally saving the rights of the corporation. These were all decided by the committee against the corporation, and the Bill as amended was approved. The question was whether the expenditure objected to was such as would have been allowed previously to the Borough Funds Act, 1872—an Act which enables local authorities to apply their funds in opposing or promoting Bills in Parliament provided the previous consent of owners and ratepayers and the sanction of the Local Government Board has been obtained; or whether the proposed Bill did not affect the rights or property of the corporation so that it was only by virtue of that Act that the opposition in Parliament by means of the corporation funds was legal. The principal justification by the corporation was that the Bill contained before it went into committee various provisions affecting the price of gas, and therefore their right and duty as to public lighting.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Macmorran, and Mr. E. Knowles Corrie were for the gas company; Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker for the corporation.

Mr. JUSTICE NORTH, in giving judgment, said that the only objection to the Bill on which it was now said that the corporation had an absolute right to oppose the Bill out of the borough fund was that there were clauses in it which might alter the price they had to pay for the gas they consumed for the purpose of lighting the streets and their offices and other premises, which was regulated under the Gas Clauses Act, 1871 (section 24), by reference to the charges made to private consumers. The case of "The Queen v. Corporation of Sheffield" (L.R., 6 Q.B., 652) was a strong authority against their having any such right by reason of its being a purpose of the corporation on which expenditure was authorized by section 92 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, and the corresponding provision of the Act of 1882 now in force. That was a case decided in 1871, which led to the passing of the Borough Funds Act, 1872, in the following year, an Act which enabled a corporation to apply its funds to opposing Bills in Parliament provided the consent of the owners and ratepayers and the sanction of the Local Government Board had been obtained. These formalities had not been observed; the question, therefore, was whether the case came within the exception of section 8 of the Borough Funds Act, 1872, reserving the previous rights and powers of the corporation. Upon this part of the case his Lordship, without dwelling on the particular circumstances involved in the case of "The Attorney-General v. the Mayor of Brecon" (10 Ch. D., 204), read extracts from the judgment of Sir George Jessel in that case dealing with principle, and referred specially to a passage where Sir George Jessel laid it down that, whether he took the view that under the words "expenses necessarily incurred" authorized by the Municipal Corporations Act then in force, or whether he took the view that a corporation occupied the position of "trustees" (to which position they had been reduced by the Municipal Corporations Act) defending their property and privileges, "in either way, if there is an attack by proposed private legislation on the rights, privileges, and duties of a corporation, that corporation is entitled to defend itself before Parliament." It seemed, his Lordship said, to him ridiculous to say that a Bill proposing to alter the general scale of charges for gas, but leaving untouched the mode of ascertaining the special charge to the corporation by reference to the charge made to all the consumers alike, was one that affected the "rights, privileges, or duties" of the corporation, and he granted the injunction.

NEDERLANDSCHE CACAOFABRIK V. DAVID CHALLEN (LIMITED).*

Contract—Sale of goods—Construction—Breach of agreement to take and pay for certain quantities per month.

This was an action brought to recover damages for breach of an agreement made between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the sale of certain quantities of

*Reported by D. FITZGERALD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by R. H. BALLOCH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Helm cocoa manufactured by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs commenced to make this cocoa in Holland in 1894. The cocoa had a considerable sale on the Continent, and in 1896 the plaintiffs, being anxious to introduce it to the English market, entered into negotiations with the defendants which resulted in an agreement made between the plaintiffs and the defendants dated July 30, 1896, whereby the defendants were appointed sole and only agents for the sale of Helm cocoa in Great Britain and Ireland for the space of five years from the date of the agreement. Provision was made for the payment of £2,700 by the plaintiffs to the defendants in certain instalments, to be expended in advertising. The defendants undertook to take delivery of 40,000lb. of Helm cocoa in a period of 18 months at the price of 2s. 3d. per lb. There was no provision as to instalments. On January 27, 1897, this agreement was modified in certain particulars; the plaintiffs undertook to make largely-increased payments for the purpose of advertising, the defendants agreeing to take 100,000lb. of cocoa in a period of two years, 40,000lb. in the first year and 60,000 in the second year and not less than one-twelfth of the yearly quantity to be taken per month. On April 14, 1897, the agreement was again altered, an agreement being made "that, from and after April 1, 1897, in consideration of the plaintiffs advancing on May 1, June 1, and July 1, 1897, £1,000 each respectively, a total of £3,000, for the purpose of further pushing the sale of Helm cocoa, the defendants should take and pay for an average of 6,000lb. weight of Helm cocoa per month as from April 1, 1897, to April 1, 1899." The plaintiffs advanced to the defendants for the purposes of advertisement £7,700 in all. The defendants, as from April 1, 1897, took delivery of very much less than 6,000lb. per month, and in February of 1898, when the action was commenced, they had only taken 24,012lb. in ten months. The managing-director of the plaintiff company stated that the price charged to the defendants gave a profit to the plaintiffs of 1s. per lb., making no allowance for the cost of advertising. The plaintiffs claimed £1,800 damages. The defendants contended, on the construction of the contract, that there had been no breach and denied the damages.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. F. W. Hollams appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. P. Rose-Innes for the defendants.

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that there was not much doubt about the meaning of the agreement, although the grammar used in it left something to be desired. It appeared that the plaintiffs had for a considerable time been supplying the defendants with their Helm cocoa under their contract in small quantities, daily, weekly, and monthly; they desired in the early part of the year 1897 to change their contract, and the question arose between the parties whether the increased deliveries should be increased as to daily, weekly, or monthly quantities, and a long correspondence passed between them on the matter. The result of the discussion was the written agreement of April 16, 1897, altering the original contract. What was the meaning of that agreement? His Lordship read the words set out above, and continued,—In his opinion those words meant that the defendants were to take monthly deliveries; that was the first point. Secondly, those monthly deliveries were not to be rigidly fixed at 6,000lb. each, they might be something more or something less, but still something that might be fairly and reasonably described as "an average of 6,000lb." If the defendants did not take delivery of a quantity that in a fair and reasonable and commercial sense could be described as "an average of 6,000lb. per month" they committed a breach of their contract. They had, in fact, taken in the ten months in question about 36,000lb. less than 6,000lb. per month. On the view of the contract taken by him (the learned Judge) that was a clear breach of the contract. That was a breach that could not be healed by taking larger quantities in succeeding months. The plaintiffs were therefore entitled to recover damages. Calculating the loss of profit at 9d. per lb., and making a deduction of £100 on the ground that the defendants were only bound to take, in these particular months, something less than 6,000lb. a month, the damages they had suffered came to £1,250.

Judgment for the plaintiffs for £1,250, with costs.

COPPEN V. MOORE.*

Merchandise Marks Act, 1887—False trade description—"Scotch" ham—Invoice.

This was a special case stated by magistrates of the borough of Richmond, Surrey, on a question arising out of a conviction by them under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vic., c. 28).

Mr. Bonsey appeared for the appellant; Mr. Buszard, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. David for the respondent.

The appellant is a grocer trading as the London Supply Stores at 42, George-street, Richmond, and other places. He was charged with selling in the shop at Richmond a ham to which a false trade description was applied. The facts were that the respondent, an inspector of the Bacon Curers' Association of Great Britain, went to the appellant's shop and asked for an English ham. An assistant outside the shop pointed out a shelf with some hams on, and said, "Those are Scotch hams." The respondent said he would have one. Thereupon the assistant passed the ham through the open window and called out to another in the shop, "Weigh up Scotch ham 8½d." The price was 6s. 5½d. On the invoice, which was made at the request of the inspector, there was no description given of the ham. The respondent did not take it, but asked the assistant to put the word "Scotch" on it as he had bought it as such. This was done. The respondent then paid for it. The ham was proved to be an American ham. For the defence it was shown that a notice had been sent to the manager expressly prohibiting these particular hams from being called or described as anything but "breakfast" hams. The assistants in question admitted having seen this notice. The justices convicted. They held that the appellant had not taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act.

Mr. BONSEY contended that no offence had been committed, because the word "Scotch" was not applied as a false trade description within the Act. He distinguished between this case and that of "Budd v. Lucas" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 408), which was a case of delivery of an invoice with a cask. That case only decided that an invoice might be a trade description. What happened here was that the purchase was over, and that it was at the request of the purchaser that the description was written. Further, section 5 showed that a false description must be in writing. Section 2 affirmed this view. The circumstances of this case might come within the Sale of Food and Drugs Act. That being so, the severity of the penalty under the Merchandise Marks Act should be considered. Before convicting justices must find either that the defendant knew or connived at the false description. Here he had done all he could to prevent it. A master was not liable criminally for his servants' acts in a case such as this.

Mr. BUSZARD argued that a mere verbal description was within the Act. It was within the policy of the Act. The words were very wide. At any rate, here there was the written description of "Scotch" on the invoice before the payment was made. As to reasonable precautions, the justices had found as a fact that the appellant had not taken them. A man who kept a number of shops must take his chance.

The COURT were of opinion that the question of the liability of the master was of such importance that it ought to be determined by a special Court. No decision, therefore, was given on that head on the present occasion.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, dealing with the other questions, said that in his opinion the Act did not apply to verbal descriptions only. The whole Act, except section 20, was apparently intended to apply to visible descriptions of articles. There was no authority suggested to the contrary. The question then arose whether this was a case of a verbal order. In his opinion it was more, for the word added to the invoice amounted to a trade description. The case of "Budd v. Lucas" was an authority that an invoice might be a false trade description. This was an invoice of that nature. It was not open to the Court, on the point whether all reasonable precautions had been taken, to disturb the finding of the justices.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred.

IN RE BROOKE AND FREMLIN.*

Married Woman—Mortgagee—Conveyance to purchaser.

A married woman, who is a mortgagee of real estate, can execute a conveyance thereof without the concurrence of her husband.

In this case a question of considerable interest and importance, both to conveyancers and generally, as to the power of a married woman to convey land under the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 75), came before the Court on a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874. It appeared that a contract had been entered into for the sale of land by Mr. Brooke to Mr. Fremlin for £550. Upon the investigation of the title to the property it appeared that it was subject to a mortgage made on November 28, 1895, in the usual form, by Brooke to a married lady, to whom the mortgage moneys belonged absolutely as part of her separate estate. The purchaser required that the conveyance to him should be acknowledged by this lady under the Fines and Recoveries Act, and that her husband should concur in the deed, notwithstanding the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, it being contended that the case was governed by the decision of Mr. Justice North in "In re Harkness and Allsopp's Contract" ([1896] 2 Ch., 358), to the effect that the Act of 1882 does not enable a woman who is a trustee of real estate to convey to a purchaser except with the concurrence of her husband, and by deed acknowledged. Thereupon the vendor took out this summons, asking for a declaration that such acknowledgment and concurrence were not necessary, it being contended, on his behalf, that the decision of Mr. Justice North did not apply to the case of a married woman who was a mortgagee, and not a trustee.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Harry Greenwood appeared for the applicant; and Mr. Ashton Cross for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said that it must be borne in mind the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was intended, not merely for the alteration, but for the simplification of the law. The point raised was a new one, but in truth the only question to be decided was whether the decision of Mr. Justice North in "In re Harkness" was applicable. His Lordship loyally accepted that decision, and, without criticizing it in any way, would merely say that the Act might more conveniently have been interpreted in a different way. That decision, however, dealt solely with the case of a married woman who was in the position of a trustee, and the question was whether a married lady, entitled to a mortgage of real estate as her separate property, was a trustee within the meaning of that decision. There was no doubt that on receiving payment of principal, interest, and costs she would become a bare trustee. In that case no difficulty could arise, because under section 16 of the Trustee Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 53), a married woman who was a bare trustee could convey as if she were a feme sole. But could she, as a mortgagee, convey, notwithstanding the decision in "In re Harkness"? In order to create a trust three things were requisite—a person in the character of trustee, a person in the character of cestui que trust, and property which the one person might hold on trust for the other. There was no difficulty in a case of this kind in finding a possible trustee and a possible cestui que trust—namely, the mortgagee and the mortgagor. But what property did the mortgagee hold in trust for the mortgagor? There could be only one answer to that question, and that answer was in favour of the purchaser. A mortgagee is not a trustee of the mortgaged property for the mortgagor until the mortgagee has been paid his principal, interest, and costs, and then, being denuded of any beneficial interest, he becomes a bare trustee for the mortgagor. Until then the mortgagee holds the mortgaged property and estate for his own benefit only to secure to him his principal, interest, and costs, and subject to redemption on payment. The result was that the decision of Mr. Justice North was not applicable and that this lady, to whom this mortgage of real estate was made after the commencement of the Act of 1882, was by virtue of that Act competent to deal with the security, including the legal estate in the land, as if she were a feme sole, and the purchaser would get a good title without the concurrence of her husband or acknowledgment of the deed of conveyance by her.

GAGE V. BREALEY.*

Metropolis—Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, sec. 9—Carriage of "advertisements."

This was a case stated by an alderman of the City of London on an information laid against James Gage, for that he on November 11, in Throgmorton-street, did unlawfully distribute certain prints, to wit handbills, by way of advertisement.

*Reported by G. I. FOSTER COOKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by H. BUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Danckwerts (Mr. Spenceley with him) appeared for the appellant; Mr. Leycester for the respondent.

By the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vic., c. 134), section 9, it is provided as follows:—
“No picture, print, board, placard, or notice, except in such form and manner as may be approved of by the Commissioner of Police, shall, by way of advertisement, be carried or distributed in any street within the general limits of this Act. . . This section shall not apply to the sale of newspapers.” The facts were these:—The appellant is a lad in the employ of the proprietors of the Financial Times, and on November 11 he distributed gratuitously in Throgmorton-street the following print:—

“Special. The Financial Times, November 11, 1897. The following cablegrams were received after to-day's issue had gone to press:—

‘From our own Correspondent.

‘Johannesburg, Nov. 10, 1897.

‘A motion was carried in the Raad to-day by a majority of three accepting the committee's recommendation reducing railway tariffs on mining commodities by two hundred thousand pounds annually.’”

The paragraph went on dealing with the same subject and was followed by another headed “Later.” The whole print was about 30 lines in length and on a small piece of paper. No leave had been given by the Commissioner of Police for the distribution. The alderman convicted and fined the appellant 10s., holding, as a fact, that the print was not a newspaper and that the object of the said distribution was to advertise the Financial Times. The contention for the appellant was that this was not a “print” or anything else within the section, and that there was no evidence that it was an advertisement. No offence had therefore been committed.

MR. LEYCESTER said the permission of the police had not been given nor even applied for. The section prohibited advertisements. It was clear that this leaflet was handed about to make known the Financial Times, and was an advertisement. The proviso excepted the sale of newspapers. But this was not a newspaper; and if it were, there was no sale, as the prints were given away gratuitously.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said he would hesitate long before saying the leaflet was not a print. He could, however, say at once it was not a newspaper.

After some further argument, the COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that the magistrate had not found that this was an advertisement. There was no evidence that it was. It was in itself a publication of news. It would be wrong to hold that because the object of distributing these papers was the obtaining of notoriety they must therefore be advertisements. The section was directed against things which in themselves were advertisements, not against the way of doing a thing which obtained the consequences of an advertisement.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith) 1898.
and Collins, L.J.J.) March 28.

REG. V. LEIGH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.*
Rate—Retrospective rate—Power to levy—Mandamus granted.

This was an appeal from an order of a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrance, making absolute a rule for a writ of mandamus. In January, 1893, an agreement was entered into between the Tyldesley Urban District Council and the Leigh Rural District Council, by which the Tyldesley District Council was to supply the Leigh District Council with water at a fixed minimum quantity per annum at a specified rate of payment. The Leigh District Council was to be at liberty to take a greater quantity of water on paying an extra charge. The Tyldesley District Council was to put up a water meter and keep it in repair. A supply of water was provided, and was continued till May 6, 1895. It was then discovered that, in consequence of some default in the working of the meter, a very much larger quantity of water had been supplied than had been registered. The Tyldesley District Council demanded payment for the extra water, in excess of the fixed minimum quantity, which had in fact passed through the meter. The Leigh District Council declined to make this payment on the ground that the mistake had arisen from the wrong working of the meter, which the Tyldesley District Council was bound to keep in repair. A correspondence ensued between the two councils, which occupied a considerable time, and in March, 1897, the Tyldesley District Council commenced an action against the Leigh District Council to recover the sum of £92 which was alleged to be due. The defendants counter-claimed for breach of agreement to keep the meter in repair, and ultimately, on May 15, 1897, judgment was entered for the plaintiffs for £63 13s. 5d. The Tyldesley District Council then obtained a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus directed to the Leigh District Council commanding them to issue their precepts to the overseers to levy a rate to pay the judgment debt. The Leigh District Council contended that they had no power to levy a retrospective rate. The Divisional Court made the rule absolute. The Leigh District Council appealed.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Tindal Atkinson appeared for the Leigh District Council; Mr. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. Horridge for the Tyldesley District Council.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the question in this case was whether, where a just debt was due from a rural district council, and the council had no funds and would not levy a rate to pay the debt justly due, it was necessary that a mandamus should be moved for within the rating year, or otherwise the creditor would have to go without his debt. It seemed to him that it would be, he would not say monstrous, but wrong, if the law was such that the answer to that question must be yes. He thought that the true answer was no. The appellants said that the mandamus called upon them to make a retrospective rate for the purpose of paying a debt which became due on May 6, 1895. But a debt was not due till it was ascertained, and this debt was not ascertained till May 15, 1897. The mandamus was moved for in October, 1897; it was therefore moved for well within the rating year. But in his opinion there was no hard-and-fast rule preventing the granting of a mandamus in a case where the rating year had expired. He thought that in such a case excuses might be given explaining the delay which had occurred, and in the present case there was ample excuse for the delay which had occurred before the action was brought. The mandamus, therefore, had been rightly granted, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

THE QUEEN V. ROBINSON AND ANOTHER, JUSTICES, AND KIRKHAM—EX PARTE CORBISHLEY.*

Bastardy—Affiliation order—Application for summons—Time within which it must be made—Former application dismissed.

This was a motion for a certiorari to justices of Staffordshire to quash an affiliation order of December 29, 1897. The motion raised a question whether a woman by applying to several justices within the year could take out successive summonses for an affiliation order more than 12 months after the birth of the child.

Mr. Hume Williams appeared to show cause against the rule on the part of the mother; Mr. Montague Lush appeared in support of the rule. The justices put in an affidavit which was read out.

The facts and dates are these. On October 10, 1896, Annie Kirkham, a single woman, residing at Stanley, in Staffordshire, who had been delivered of an illegitimate child on September 9, 1896, laid an information against H. Corbishley to show cause why he should not contribute towards the support of the child. A summons was granted by Mr. Nicholson, a justice of the division, returnable on October 21, 1896. On that day the sessions considered that service had not been properly effected on the alleged father, and accordingly no order was made. On the same day the mother laid three fresh informations before three different magistrates, Messrs. Robinson, Phillips, and Brierly. No summons was then issued on either of them, as it appeared that service could not then be effected. The object of this was that the woman might be able to get a summons even if one of the justices had died or was unavailable when the defendant could be served. On July 28, 1897, the woman applied for a fresh summons based on the old application to Mr. Brierly. The summons was granted by him, and ultimately came on upon November 3, the summons having been personally served on the alleged father in the interval. On this hearing the justices disagreed and no order was made. The chairman stated that the summons was not dismissed on its merits, and if the applicant could bring fresh evidence she was told she could apply again. On November 10 a further summons, returnable on November 17, was granted by Mr. Robinson. On that day, no proof of service having been given, the case could not be gone into. On the same day a fresh summons was issued by Mr. Robinson. It recited that it was granted in pursuance of the application of October 21, 1896. The summons came on on December 1. After hearing evidence the case was adjourned till December 29. When it came on the defendant was represented by a solicitor, who raised the point that it was too late, inasmuch as the old application was exhausted by the hearing on November 3. The magistrates, however, made an order for 3s. a week. It was that order which was now impugned.

Mr. HUME WILLIAMS appeared for the mother and urged the hearing of November 3 was not an exhaustion of the application. He cited "Reg. v. Lancashire Justices" ([1874] 38 J.P., 215). As the hearing did not exhaust the application a new summons might issue. At any rate a new summons might be taken out on one of the after applications which had not been exhausted. That had been done, and it was the determination thereon which was now attacked. He relied on "Reg. v. Gaunt" (L.R., 2 Q.B., 466).

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH said, if this order was good, the limit imposed by the statute would be altogether destroyed. The woman might make a dozen applications and then keep on getting summonses on the strength of the unexhausted applications, whatever length of time might have elapsed. If any one application were exhausted the others, which were merely duplicates, were also exhausted. The only reason why three applications could properly be made was lest one of the justices should be dead or abroad. The statute required that the justice to whom the application was made should be the justice to grant the summons. He referred to "Potts v. Cumridge" (27 L.J., M.C., 62) and "Reg. v. Thomas" ([1863] 8 L.T., N.S., 460), which was a case of one application to one magistrate, which was held to be exhausted. "Reg. v. Chugg" ([1870] 34 J.P., 469, 22 L.T., 556); "Staples v. Staples" ([1879] 41 L.T., 347).

The COURT made the rule absolute.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said he should have been very glad if he could have supported the order of the justices, because it looked much as if the defendant had kept purposely out of the way, and thereby prevented the applicant from making out her claim. But he could not do so. The case was put in two ways—it was first said that the determination of the justices on November 3, 1897, was not a hearing of the application, and that therefore the case came within the principle of "Reg. v. the Justices of Lancashire" (38 J.P., 215). What the justices did say was that they had not sufficient evidence, and that the mother might come again. However, that was not a matter which depended on the will of the magistrates. Without their consent, if she was within the period of 12 months she had a right to come again. The learned Lord Chief Justice felt bound by the cases of "Reg. v. Thomas" and "Staples v. Staples." When a distinction was drawn between the case where there had been a hearing and where there had only been a dismissal on a preliminary point, "Staples v. Staples" governed this case. It did not come within the principle of "Reg. v. Lancashire Justices," where justices who might have amended the information for a wrong recital had instead dismissed it and that dismissal was held not to be a hearing exhausting the original application. The last summons in this case taken out must be treated as a fresh summons. The facts were that the birth took place on September 9. The three applications were made to three different magistrates on October 21, 1896, on November 10, and again on November 17, 1897, a summons was granted by Mr. Robinson and on that summons the order now in question was made. On July 28, 1897, Mr. Brierly had granted a summons, which came on on November 3, 1897, and had been dismissed. If those three applications of October 21 had been one it must have been held that it had been exhausted by the decision of November 3 on Mr. Brierly's summons. In the opinion of the learned Judge they were to be treated as one, except that the effect of having made three applications to different magistrates gave the applicant an opportunity of making a choice to which magistrate she would apply. These summonses were really duplicates. If one was used up they were all three exhausted. It would be straining the law to hold otherwise.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW concurred. He had hoped that the terms on which the summons had been dismissed would have enabled the Court to say that it had not been exhausted. But what appeared to have been intended was that a fresh summons could be issued. He hoped that in doubtful cases magistrates would adjourn and not dismiss.

IN THE GOODS OF JOHN STEVENS, DECEASED.*

Probate — Administration — Grant — Widow of deceased missing—Grant of administration to deceased's son without citing the widow.

This was a motion for a grant of administration to the deceased's son without citing the widow.

Mr. LIPSCOMB said that the deceased died intestate on March 9 last, leaving issue one child, the applicant, William Alfred Stevens, who is of full age and the only next of kin and heir-at-law. The deceased had, 36 years ago, married Louisa Morhen, but she had contracted habits of intemperance, and after 20 years of marriage she left her husband and eloped with another man.

The PRESIDENT.—If you could prove that the wife had eloped that would be one thing; but I do not well see how the Court can deal with that matter unless the widow is cited.

Mr. LIPSCOMB.—I should like to call your Lordship's attention to the case of "In re Boddan" (28 L.T., 368), when Sir James Hannen passed over the widow and made a grant to the son, the facts proved being that the husband had separated from his wife some time before his death, and she had been subsequently convicted of felony, and was at the date of the motion leading a life of prostitution.

The PRESIDENT.—Yes; but there every effort had been made to find the widow, though without success.

Mr. LIPSCOMB.—Again in an earlier case of "In re Anderson" (3 S. and T., 489) (which was cited in "In re Boddan"), Sir J. P. Wilde, in granting a similar application, said:—"It has been always held that the widow upon good cause may be set aside." In the present case the property was a very small one, and if the widow was cited practically the whole estate would go in law costs. The son did not even know if the widow was alive, and it would be a great hardship to compel him to cite her. He was quite prepared to set aside her share (one-third) of the estate until it was ascertained what had become of her.

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said.—I feel some doubt about the matter, but the Court has no doubt gone a long way in the case of "In re Anderson," and having regard to the evidence of the deceased's wife having eloped, and to the length of time she left her husband, I think that in the special circumstances of this case the widow may be passed over and that the grant may go to the son. There must, however, be justifying security as to the widow's share (one-third) of the estate.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith,)

IN RE GOETZ, JONAS, AND CO.—EX PARTE THE TRUSTEE + Bankruptcy—Order and disposition—Debts—Reputed ownership.

This was an appeal by the trustee from an order of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Bruce) reversing an order of the County Court Judge of Manchester sitting in bankruptcy. The facts and arguments are stated in the judgment hereunder.

Mr. E. Sutton and Mr. F. Mote appeared for the trustee; Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Muir

Mackenzie appeared for the respondents, Messrs. Armstrong and Co.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—Upon May 13, 1896, Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co., who then carried on the business of general shippers at Manchester, were adjudicated bankrupts upon their own petition, they having called their creditors together upon the 7th of that month. At this date certain Spanish customers to whom Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. had sold and consigned goods were indebted to them in sums amounting in all to £1,936, which sums were payable to Goetz, Jonas, and Co. at different dates, according to the times at which the respective credits expired. The question is whether these debts were upon May 7, 1896, in the order and disposition of the bankrupts with the consent of the true owners thereof within the meaning of section 44 subsection 2 (iii.) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, so as to be divisible amongst the creditors of the bankrupts, or whether they belonged to Messrs. Armstrong and Co., bankers in London, who had financed the bankrupts as hereinafter mentioned. The course of business between Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. and their Spanish customers, as appears from the evidence, was this. Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. purchased goods from the manufacturers in England and then sold and consigned them to, amongst others, customers in Spain. The terms of credit were as follows:—The Spanish customers had six months' credit from the date of invoice, and for the first three months from that date were under no obligation to accept any draft for the goods purchased. They had what has been called an open credit for these first three months, though if they liked they might remit in cash during that period. It is said that they sometimes did so. Why, I do not understand, nor has the learned counsel been able to explain why they should do so, but such appears on occasions to have been done. Upon the expiration of the first three months from the date of invoice the customers were bound to come under acceptance for the price of the goods purchased and to accept the draft of Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. upon them at three months. Contemporaneously with this course of business between Goetz, Jonas, and Co. and their Spanish customers the former sought financial aid from Messrs. Armstrong and Co., who are bankers in London, the terms agreed upon between them being as follows:—Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. drew a draft upon their Spanish customer at six months from date of invoice, and then handed this draft to Messrs. Armstrong, together with a copy invoice and duplicate bill of lading. Upon receipt of this draft at six months Messrs. Armstrong handed to Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. their acceptance at three months for something less than the invoice price, which draft Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. were at liberty to discount and thus place themselves in funds. When three months from the date of invoice arrived, Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. then drew a bill at three months upon their Spanish customer for the value of the goods sold and consigned to him, and handed it to Messrs. Armstrong for them to get it accepted by the Spanish customer, who returned it accepted to them, and when met Messrs. Armstrong handed back the unaccepted draft at six months to Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co., its function having then been exhausted. It will be seen that during the first three months, whilst the six months' draft was running, Messrs. Armstrong could not call upon the Spanish customer to accept this six months' draft, nor any other bill, and this six months' draft was but a security to the bankers for the due performance by Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. of their engagement with them—that is, at the termination of the first three months to draw at three months upon their Spanish customer and hand the bill so drawn to them (the bankers) in order that they might get it accepted by the Spanish customer and at maturity obtain the proceeds thereof. At the date of the bankruptcy the position of Messrs. Armstrong and Co. was this. Their acceptances which they had given to Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. had been discounted by them, and Messrs. Armstrong and Co. were either under cash advances, or were liable upon their acceptances. They held the six months' draft of Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. unaccepted by and unrepresented to the Spanish customers, copy invoices, and duplicate, but not the original, bills of lading. In these circumstances the question arises, were the debts owing by the Spanish customers to Goetz, Jonas, and Co. at the date of the bankruptcy in the order and disposition of the bankrupts? That they were "debts due or growing due to the bankrupts in the course of their trade or business" is clear. For these debts the Spanish customers had accepted no bills and unquestionably they were debts for which Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. could give the Spanish customers valid discharges, and I do not doubt that they were in the order and disposition of the bankrupts at the date of the bankruptcy. But it is said that although this might be so they were not debts in the order or disposition of the bankrupts in their trade and business by the consent and permission of the true owners under such circumstances that they (the bankrupts) were the reputed owners thereof. It is not suggested that the bankers gave notice to the debtors of the assignment of the debts to them by means of the six months' drafts handed as they were by Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, and Co. to them, but it is said that this was not necessary because these six months' drafts were negotiable instruments and consequently no notice of the assignment need be given. It is not disputed that absence of notice to a debtor by the assignee of a debt leaves a debt within the order and disposition and reputed ownership section of the Bankruptcy Act, but it is said that if the assignment of the debt be by a bill of exchange it is otherwise because of the negotiability of the instrument. If the six months' drafts had been accepted before bankruptcy by the Spanish debtors for their debts owing to the bankrupts, this would be so, and, as it appears to me, the reason why notice of such an assignment is not required is that by accepting the bills the debtor has notice of the assignment, and what is more, if more be necessary, he has agreed to pay the debt not to the original creditor, but to the assignee, that is, to the holder of the bill. Cases have been cited as to bills accepted by the debtor constituting an assignment of a debt, so as to take the case out of the order and disposition section; but none have been cited to show that an unaccepted draft without notice to the debtor completes an assignment so as to take the debt of such debtor out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt. Assignment coupled with notice to the debtor is equivalent to taking possession of the debt by an assignee, and this takes the debt out of the reputed ownership section, but there has been no notice to the debtors in the present case. It was further argued for the bankers that the debts owing by the Spanish creditors were not within the reputed ownership section; because reputation of ownership may be excluded by a well-known custom of trade, such for instance as in a wine merchant's trade, whereby it is well known to all that wine the property of another is constantly left with the wine merchant, so that a bankrupt wine merchant in such a case is not the reputed owner of the wine left in his possession—"In re Conston, ex parte Watkins" (L.R., 8 Ch. 520). There are many cases based upon notorious customs applicable to other trades. It is argued that the reputation of ownership by the bankrupts of the debts in question was excluded by a custom in the Spanish trade. The analogy is certainly ingenious, if not far-fetched, but I think Mr. Sutton for the trustee pointed out one fallacy lurking in the suggestion which is a sufficient answer to this point. In the case put the custom is notorious to all the world, whereas in the present case the custom spoken to by Praga and Strong is known only to those who deal in a particular market, and it appears to me that such a limited custom cannot affect persons who know nothing of the custom, and do not deal in the particular market. There is no evidence that the manufacturers, who sold their goods to the bankrupts and who through the trustee in bankruptcy are now seeking to get the £1,936 in question to part pay them for their goods sold to the bankrupts, knew to what part of the world or to what markets the bankrupts were about to consign the goods, nor that they were going to Spain, nor knew anything whatever of the particular custom. The usual course of retaining the bills of lading until the drafts of the sellers are accepted by the purchasers has not been followed in this case by the bankers. If this had been done, all would have gone well, but as it was not, these debts were in the order and disposition of the bankrupts upon May 7, 1896, and in my opinion the trustee's title is superior to that of the bankers, and that the learned County Court Judge was right when he so held, and that this appeal from the Queen's Bench Division must therefore be allowed with costs here and below.

*Reported by J. H. MURPHY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

†Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

BROWNSCOMBE V. JOHNSON—KRUSE V. SAME.*

Local Government—By-law—Validity.

This was a case stated by justices for Kent raising a question as to the validity of a by-law made by the Kent County Council in restraint of music and singing on the highway.

Mr. Robson, Q.C. (Mr. Hohler with him), appeared for the appellant; Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. A. Gill for the respondent.

The superintendent of police, the respondent, preferred an information against the appellant, Walter Brownscombe, for that he on Sunday, October 17, 1897, at Leeds, in Kent, did sing in a certain highway within 50 yards of a dwelling-house, after being required by a constable of the said county to desist, contrary to a by-law made by the Kent County Council under section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888. The justices convicted the appellant and fined him 40s. The by-law in question was No. 4:—
"No person shall sound or play upon any musical or noisy instrument, or sing in any public place or highway, within 50 yards of any dwelling-houses, after being required by any constable or by an inmate of such house personally or by his or her servant to desist." The appellant was conducting an open-air religious service at about 5.45 p.m., and did with others congregate within 50 yards of a dwelling-house, and commenced to sing a hymn, in which those with him joined. After singing two or three lines of the hymn he was requested by a constable to desist, but he continued singing. It was proved that the singing was an annoyance to the occupier of the house, but he had not personally requested the appellant to desist, although he had complained to the police about it. It was contended that the by-law was invalid on these grounds:—

(a) That it was unreasonable; (b) that it was not limited to cases of persons playing or singing to the annoyance of residents; (c) that it creates a new offence and is repugnant to the general law of the land. The by-laws were made under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which was made applicable to counties by the Local Government Act, 1888. That section allowed by-laws for the "good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner."

Mr. ROBSON contended that the by-law was too wide. It did not allege that the act prohibited was one done to the annoyance of inmates, or occupiers, or any one else. It simply gave a constable a right to remove any one singing or playing in the street. A by-law ought not to leave to the discretion or caprice of a particular official to enforce the law. He cited "Everett v. Grapes" ([1861] 3 L.T., N. S., 669), a case about a by-law as to keeping swine. He said that no cases before 1882 were of much value because the Act of 1882 was the foundation of all by-laws of this sort. He also cited "Johnson v. Mayor of Croydon" (16 Q.B.D., 708), "Munro v. Watson" ([1887] 51 J.P., 660), "Strickland v. Hayes" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 290), "Burnett v. Berry" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 641), and "Teale v. Harris" (60 J.P., 744). The local law was not to be allowed to override the general principles of the general law. Any prohibition ought to explain that it was a nuisance that was prohibited. As to by-laws against betting, the Legislature considered a betting business carried on on a large scale as a nuisance. Therefore, by-laws against the practice were placed on a somewhat different footing from others.

Mr. DICKENS urged that the by-law was good. The offence was the continuing to play or sing after a request to desist. It was not merely singing that constituted the offence. He cited some observations from the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice in "Walker v. Stretton" ([1896] 60 J.P., 313). It was inconsistent with the primary purpose of a highway that people should stand about and sing and play thereon. It was a reasonable restriction to prohibit it after a request to desist. The words "after being required to desist" were equivalent to saying "to the annoyance of" the person so requesting. The word annoyance was not necessary to a by-law. "Wanstead Local Board v. Wooster" ([1873] 37 J.P., 403).

In the result the COURT disagreed; the conviction and the by-law, therefore, for the present stand affirmed. It was arranged, however, after the judgment had been delivered that the second case, "Kruse v. Johnson," in which the facts were the same, should be heard by a special Court, to consist of more than two members.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE delivered judgment at considerable length in support of the by-law. He said he could not but distrust his judgment in favour of the validity of the by-law, because he knew that his learned brother disagreed with him, and that there was in the cases cited, which were, however, distinguishable on their facts, a current of opinion which would seem to point to a different conclusion from his own. Yet, having arrived at a clear conclusion himself, he felt bound to express it, and that all the more because, as there was no appeal in these matters, there had been no opportunity of having the judgments tested by the Court of Appeal. The question here was whether the by-law was valid or not. What was a by-law? It was an ordinance by some authority under statutory powers. It necessarily involved the prohibition of acts but for it legal—in other words, a restriction on the otherwise legal liberty of action by individuals. If a by-law was validly made, it acquired the force of law within the sphere which it affected. This by-law was made by a representative body under the combined effect of the Municipal Corporation Act, 1882, and the Local Government Act, 1888. He then dealt with the sections, and referred to the various safeguards in the manner of confirming or allowing the by-laws. The by-law in this case was one made by the County Council of Kent. Parliament, in the extension of the powers of self-government in 1888, had thought it right to give to the popular representative body, the council for the county, the power of exercising its own judgment as to the orders and rules which concerned the good government of the county. The cases cited on by-laws were for the most part cases of by-laws made by private companies. In such cases the exercise of their powers in making by-laws should be carefully scrutinized. But a by-law made by a representative body such as a county council should be approached from a different point of view to that, and should be supported if it were possible to do so. The object of this legislation was to give the people who elected their representatives a wide discretion through their representatives to make regulations for their better government. It was difficult to see what better attributes the Judges of this Court had to enable them to say what was a reasonable by-law than the county council themselves had. The Court would interpose if a by-law was such a gratuitous interference with private rights that it could not commend itself to the minds of reasonable men, or if it were a partial by-law not affecting all equally. But this by-law did not come within that description. His Lordship read the by-law. The first criticism on it by those assailing it was that it might apply to a person singing who was not creating an annoyance, and that the by-law ought to express that the act was done to the annoyance of some one. If so, the question arose, Who was to decide whether an annoyance had in fact or could have taken place? Would it depend on the varying opinion of a magistrate, or of a policeman, or of the man said to be annoyed? These things were matters of taste. A second criticism was that, under this by-law, power was given to a policeman to say whether singing should be allowed or not. Fancy sketches had been given of the conduct of capricious policemen driving away persons making melody of a desirable character appreciated by persons in the neighbourhood; but that did not impress him much. A policeman was not a person acting without any control, and if he disturbed music contrary to the wishes of the residents in the locality he would probably hear of it from his superiors. The facts of this case were a useful illustration of the practical working of the by-law. The facts were that the appellant and others began to sing a hymn and continued so to do, notwithstanding a request by a constable that he should desist. The occupier proved that, though he had not complained on the day in question, the singing was an annoyance to him, and that he had on a previous occasion complained of it to the police. The policeman, therefore, did not act capriciously or vexatiously. His Lordship then referred to the case of "Slattery v. Naylor" (13 App. Ca. [1888], 446) and said that the general reasoning as to by-laws in the judgment applied to this case and corroborated his views. The Court would interfere if the by-law was such a one as reasonable men could not make in good faith, but would not interfere simply because the by-law was not in the best terms which could be conceived.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW read a judgment holding that the by-law was invalid, though, as the Lord Chief Justice took a different view, he did so with diffidence. He agreed that a large confidence ought to be felt in the local authorities, on the ground that they were likely to behave reasonably. But the question here was whether the particular by-law was reasonable. The question whether it was made in the reasonable exercise of the powers of the authority was for the Court to decide. The Court could not share its responsibility with any local authority. The cases cited indicated that by-laws for "good government" of a locality ought to state that the act prohibited was one which might be an annoyance. From the by-law in this case the condition of annoyance was excluded. It would seem to create a new offence—namely, the disregard of a request to desist from singing or playing. Any constable was made a judge of the time when a person could be requested to stop singing. It was admitted in the course of the arguments that an offence against the by-law would be committed if a man disregarded an admittedly unreasonable request. That was really, in his opinion, an end of the case. He would be loth to sanction this by-law in its present terms. It ought to be amended. He referred to "Strickland v. Hayes" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 290).

RUABON STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V. THE LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.*

Insurance—Marine—Repairs in dock—Dock dues
—Reclassification—Apportionment of dock dues.

A vessel having been docked to repair sea damage was surveyed on the owner's behalf with a view to reclassification.

Held (A. L. Smith, L.J., dissenting), that the principle of "The Vancouver" (11 Ap. Cas., 573) applied, and that the dock dues should be apportioned between underwriters and owners.

Decision of Mathew, J. (13 The Times L.R., 574, and [1897] 2 Q.B., 456), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew, reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 574; [1897] 2 Q.B., 456. The action was brought against the defendants as underwriters to recover the expenses of docking the plaintiffs' steamship Ruabon in connexion with the repair of damage to that vessel caused by perils of the sea insured against. The items of the expenses are set out in the judgment of Lord Justice Chitty. The defendants contended that the expenses in question should be apportioned between the plaintiffs and the defendants. It appeared that the vessel stranded and sustained considerable damage. She was taken to Cardiff, and in order to make the repairs it was necessary to place her in dry dock. After the vessel had been opened up for the purpose of effecting the repairs, the owners thought it advisable to have her surveyed by Lloyd's surveyor for the purpose of retaining her classification, though the time for the renewal of her classification had not arrived, the owners being entitled under Lloyd's rules to anticipate the time. She was accordingly surveyed and her class renewed. No repairs were necessary for the purpose of the renewal of the classification. The plaintiffs claimed from the defendant the whole of the docking expenses as a necessary part of the cost of repair. The defendants contended that the plaintiffs were bound to contribute to this expense as an outlay from which the plaintiffs had derived material benefit. It was admitted that the vessel did not go into dock for the purpose of the survey, but when she was in dock the opportunity was taken to examine her bottom to see if reclassification repairs were necessary, and that docking was necessary for the vessel to pass such survey. Mr. Justice Mathew held that the case was covered by the decision of the House of Lords in "The Vancouver" (11 App. Cas., 573), and gave judgment for the defendants.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Lauriston Batten appeared for the defendants.

The Court, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal, Lord Justice A. L. Smith dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment in which he said that the real and important point which it was desired to have determined in this case was whether, when a ship put into dry dock (in the present case into a wet dock with a pontoon therein) in order to repair damage occasioned by a sea peril for which underwriters alone were liable, the cost of piloting, towing, and other expenses necessary for getting the ship into dock for repair and of getting her out again when repaired were to be borne by the underwriters, or whether these expenses were to be shared between the shipowner and the underwriters of the ship, after the ship was in dock and the shipowner took advantage of her being there to get her surveyed so as to enable her to keep her class or for any other purpose of his own. It was said on behalf of the underwriters that the principles laid down by this Court and affirmed in the House of Lords in "The Vancouver" (11 App. Cas., 573) showed that these expenses were to be shared. It became, therefore, necessary to ascertain the principles laid down in that case, because unless they covered this case he had no doubt that these expenses would fall wholly on the underwriters. In his view the question of sharing the pilotage, towage, and other expenses necessary to take the ship into and out of dock was not under consideration in that case. The only question argued and determined was the sharing of the dock dues after the ship had arrived therein, which dues were incurred during that portion of time when the concurrent operations of the shipowner and underwriters on the ship were going on. "The Vancouver," therefore, was no authority upon the question of the pilotage, towage, and other expenses of getting the ship into dock. It was said that the principles underlying the decision covered the point now raised. The decision in "The Vancouver," was that where a ship was insured against perils of the sea and was placed in dry dock in order to carry out repairs which the shipowner for his own purposes desired to execute (i.e., scraping and painting the ship's bottom), which expenses the shipowner alone had to bear, yet if, when the ship got into dry dock, it was discovered that by reason of a peril insured against damage had been occasioned to the ship which had to be repaired at the expense of the underwriters alone, the dock dues incurred during those concurrent operations for the respective purposes of shipowner and underwriters must be shared between them. It was said by the plaintiffs that the Ruabon put into dock solely to repair damage for which the underwriters were alone liable and not for any purpose of the shipowner's, and that the pilotage, towage, and other expenses were incurred solely on the underwriters' account. It was said by the underwriters that if these expenses had not been incurred the ship would not have been in dock and the shipowner would not have had the benefit of her being there to get her surveyed for her class. But "The Vancouver" did not lay down that whenever a person incidentally obtained a benefit he must necessarily share expenses which had not been incurred on his account. As regarded the dock dues, he agreed that these must be shared, for they had been incurred by reason of the common user of the dock for the purpose of the two. If the £25 claimed in this case were for dock dues, then "The Vancouver" case covered them, but the pilotage, towage, and other expenses were outside the decision and principles laid down in "The Vancouver." The underwriters now for the first time, so far as he knew, set up that where there was an expenditure solely on their own behalf, this expenditure was nevertheless to be divided or otherwise shared between them and the shipowner. His Lordship did not agree with that contention. The principle upon which "The Vancouver" was decided was that, if there be an employment for two purposes and expenses for these two purposes were incurred in common, then each person who utilized the occasion must bear his share of the expenses incurred; but if the employment was only for one purpose, then the old principle, that he for whom the employment took place must pay the cost, was left untouched. What he had said as to taking the ship into dock applied to taking her out. If all or any part of the £25 were for dock dues whilst the common user was going on, those, as before stated, would come within the decision in "The Vancouver," but that was not the real point the parties wished to have decided. He differed with regret from Mr. Justice Mathew and the other members of this Court, but in his opinion the appeal should be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read a judgment in which he said that the amount in controversy was small, but the question was one of importance to shipowners and underwriters. It was whether the expenses of taking the steamship Ruahon into and out of the pontoon dock and placing her there, and the dock dues whilst she was there, ought to be apportioned between the owners and the underwriters in the circumstances of this case. The particulars of expenses, amounting to £55, consisted of boat hire to and from the pontoon and Roath basin, piloting the vessel on and off the pontoon, towing the vessel on and off the pontoon, labour taking the vessel from the east dock to the pontoon and taking her from the pontoon to the Roath basin, and docking and undocking, including tide on and tide off and use of patent shoring. This last item (£25) was paid to the Cardiff Pontoon Company, and appeared to be for dock dues. The other items were paid to other persons. It was admitted that all the items were necessarily incurred in connexion with the docking. The shipowners contended that the whole of these expenses fell on the underwriters. If they ought to be apportioned it was conceded that the apportionment should be in equal shares. The ship was taken to and placed on the pontoon for the purpose of repairs, the burden of which fell on the underwriters. While the ship was on the pontoon and after she had been opened out the owners availed themselves of the opportunity of having her surveyed for the purpose of maintaining her classification, and they obtained the required certificate. The time had arrived when they were entitled according to Lloyd's rules to have her examined for classification, though there still remained some months to run before she would have lost her classification if not resurveyed. It was admitted that docking was necessary for the vessel to pass her survey. In the Vancouver case the ship was taken into dock by the owner for the purpose of repairs, the expense of which fell on the owner alone. While there it was discovered that she had sustained injury while at sea to her stern-post. The burden of these repairs fell on the underwriters exclusively. There were three common days while the ship was in dock during which both sets of repairs were being done simultaneously. Neither set of repairs interfered with or delayed the execution of the other. Each set required the whole of the three days. This Court and the House of Lords held that, inasmuch as the dock was in fact being used for both purposes during the three days, the dock dues for those three days had to be borne by the owner and the underwriters in equal shares. The question here was whether this case was governed by the Vancouver case. It was argued in this Court for the appellants that, whatever the decision might be as to the pontoon dues (£25), no part of the expenses of taking the ship to and from the pontoon should be thrown on the shipowners. The Court were informed that in the Vancouver case the expenses of taking the ship into and out of the dock were not in controversy in the action, and that the cost of docking and undocking had before the action been apportioned in the average statement. It appeared to him that the present case was not distinguishable from the Vancouver case. The pontoon dues fell within the actual decision. He understood that decision to be that on the question of actual user of the dock, while the dock was being used simultaneously for shipowners' and underwriters' purposes, it was immaterial for whose purposes the ship was first brought into dock. That did not touch the question as to the expenses of taking her in and out. In his opinion, the principle of the decision covered those expenses. Those expenses were necessarily incurred in connexion with the docking. They were strictly incidental to the operation of docking. They seemed to him to be mere accessories which ought to follow the principal. They were not in any way occasioned by the condition of the vessel or by reason of her having been disabled by sea damage for which the underwriters were liable. Had they been made more onerous in the whole or in part by reason of the ship's disability arising from sea damage, the case would have stood differently, and they would have fallen, in the whole or in part, as the case might be, on the underwriters exclusively. He agreed that, if a ship were disabled at sea at a distance from a port and required the assistance of a tug to tow her, the expenses of any such towage would undoubtedly fall upon the underwriters. He excluded anything of the nature of a voyage, and any expense arising from the disability of the ship within the policy. In his opinion it made no difference whether the necessary expenses of getting the ship in and out were paid to the dock company or to some other person. His Lordship concluded by saying that he differed, though with reluctance, in some respects from the judgment of Lord Justice A. L. Smith. For the above reasons, in his opinion, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

local or private Act"—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. 55), sec. 13 (2).
Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 63), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice Stirling dated November 23 last, and reported in The Times of the following day, also ante, p. 63. The plaintiffs were the London and North-Western Railway and the Great Western Railway Companies, and they claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from connecting certain new sewers of the defendants' in the township of Helsby and parish of Frodsham, in the county of Chester, with certain land drains and ditches belonging to the plaintiffs, and from causing or permitting sewage or water to flow from the said new sewers into the said land drains and ditches of the plaintiffs'. The question at issue in the case was whether the land drains and ditches, which had been constructed by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title on their own lands, were now vested in the plaintiffs, or, as the defendants alleged, had under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, become vested in them as the rural sanitary authority of the district. Section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, enacts that all existing and future sewers within the district of a local authority, except (inter alia), by subsection 2, "sewers made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving, or improving land under any local or private Act of Parliament, or for the purpose of irrigating land," shall vest in and be under the control of such local authority. The plaintiffs were the successors of a railway company constituted by a local or private Act of 1846 (with which was incorporated the Railways Clauses Act of 1845) for the purpose of making a railway from the Chester and Birkenhead Railway to the Manchester and Birmingham Railway. This railway was made about the year 1850, and subsequently by an Act of 1861 was, together with all the rights and obligations of the original company, transferred to the plaintiffs. At the trial the defendants' case was rested on the alleged user of the ditches in question for the purpose of carrying off the sewage from certain houses near the line. This sewage, it was alleged, passed from the ditches into a system of pipes and drains which had been constructed by the plaintiffs for the purpose of land drainage, and consequently it was contended that these had become "sewers" within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, and were now vested in the defendants under section 13 (2). It was decided by Mr. Justice Stirling that the pipes and drains were made under the local or private Act, and in the result, therefore, his Lordship gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Mr. BUCKLEY, Q.C., and Mr. E. P. HEWITT argued in support of the appeal.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Montague Shearman appeared for the respondents.

Their LORDSHIPS, without calling upon the respondents' counsel to argue, affirmed the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling and dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in delivering judgment, said that he could not bring himself to doubt that the judgment appealed from was right, and it appeared to his Lordship that the argument on behalf of the appellants entirely failed. It was plain that the defendants had no right to turn sewage into the land drains and ditches of the plaintiffs unless the same were sewers vested in the defendants. That they were "sewers" within the definition clause of the Public Health Act, 1875, was plain. Every drain was a sewer except that which was plainly defined to be a "drain" within the meaning of that Act. Here the drains and ditches did not come within the definition of a "drain." They were "sewers." Section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, contained certain exceptions, the second of which, in his Lordship's judgment, applied to the present case. The question argued was whether these drains and ditches did or did not come within that second exception. (His Lordship stated the history of the drains and continued.) Were they made under any "local or private Act of Parliament"? The appellants' counsel had argued that the drains and ditches were made under a public statute—namely, the Railways Clauses Act, 1845. (His Lordship referred to the material sections of that Act and continued.) In his Lordship's opinion the drains and ditches were made under the local or private Act. If so, what became of the defendants' contention? It seemed to his Lordship perfectly plain that these particular sewers had not vested in the defendants. The second exception in section 13 seemed to apply, turn it about as you would. The decision of Mr. Justice Stirling was therefore right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Solicitor—Misconduct—Acquittal by Law Society —Conviction by the Court—Assisting persons to secrete a will—Allowing a client to swear a false affidavit.

Decision of Divisional Court (ante, p. 161) affirmed.

This was an appeal by Mr. William Robert Davies, a solicitor, of Dolgelly, from an order of a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Darling. A complaint having been made against Mr. Davies to the Incorporated Law Society, the matter was referred in the usual way to their statutory committee. The committee held an inquiry into the matter of the complaint, and found that though the conduct of the solicitor was extremely reprehensible they were able to receive his explanation, and they did not find him guilty of professional misconduct. An application was then made to the Queen's Bench Division to strike the solicitor's name off the rolls. The Divisional Court ordered that the solicitor should be suspended from practice for two years. The case is reported in The Times of January 15 and ante, p. 161, where the facts are stated at length.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. J. E. Banks appeared for the solicitor; Mr. Carson, Q.C., and Mr. Foote, Q.C., for the complainant, Mr. Meyrick Meredith Williams.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, where, under the present practice, a report had to be made by the committee of the Incorporated Law Society, such report was made in the same way in which a report by a Master used to be made under the old practice, when a solicitor was called upon to answer the matters in an affidavit. It was always open to those who appeared on behalf of the solicitor to challenge before the Court in banc the findings of the Master on the evidence given before him. He thought that the same rule applied to a report of the statutory committee. Although no doubt the greatest weight ought to be attached to the findings contained in such a report, it was competent to the Court to go into the facts for itself and to decide whether or not it agreed with those findings. The complainant in this case was Mr. Meyrick Meredith Williams, and what he alleged was this—that if the will of Ann Hartley, which was dated November 19, 1868 (she dying in February, 1886), had been produced, he would have come into possession of a moiety of a valuable estate on March 18, 1891, on the death of his brother, Thomas Humphrey Williams, who was tenant for life of that moiety under the will. But by reason of that will being suppressed, he knew nothing of its existence till 1896. He alleged that Robert Nanney Williams and Sarah Williams secreted the will, and that the solicitor from July, 1893, aided and abetted them in so secreting it by taking active measures to prevent the knowledge of its existence coming to persons interested in its production. That was the substance of the charge. The complaint as laid before the committee contained a charge of fraud and conspiracy. The committee held that such charge was not made out, and he quite agreed with that. But the charge of assisting his clients to secrete the will and so keep persons out of property to which they were entitled remained. The question now was whether this charge was made out. The solicitor had bought the business of another solicitor who had died, and through his widow he became possessed of a parcel of papers, among which was Ann Hartley's will. He first saw the will in July, 1893, and from that time he knew that, if the will was a good one, his clients were not entitled to the whole of the estate of which they were in possession, but that the complainant was entitled to a moiety of it. He showed the will to his clients, Robert Nanney Williams and Sarah Williams, and also to the trustees of Thomas Humphrey Williams, but at the instance of his clients he refrained from communicating it to any one else. It was said on his behalf that his clients forbade him to disclose the will. If he had done nothing but keep the will in a box, his conduct would not have been so much to blame. But the facts showed that, having information that his clients were not rightfully entitled to the estate of which they were in possession, he actively assisted them in keeping out persons who were rightfully entitled to it. From 1893 to 1896 he was actively engaged in taking steps which had for their object the suppression of this will. With regard to the sale of a piece of land for an intermediate school, the correspondence showed that the solicitor was purporting to sell to the school authority land which he knew did not belong to Robert Nanney Williams, but to the complainant. He required the purchaser to assume that Thomas Humphrey Williams was at his death seized in fee simple of the property sold, which he knew not to be the fact. It was suggested that he had done this in order to deter purchasers, but his Lordship could not accept that suggestion. Then there was the lease from Robert Nanney Williams to Mrs. Jones for 21 years. That was a completed transaction, and the solicitor knew perfectly well that Robert Nanney Williams could not grant such a lease. That was comparatively a small matter, but there remained a very serious one. The solicitor was a party to allowing Sarah Williams in an administration action in Chancery to swear an affidavit which she and he knew to be untrue. He warned her that the affidavit would be untrue unless reference was made to Ann Hartley's will. She, however, insisted on swearing it without such reference, and he allowed her to do so. It was impossible for the Court to say that in so acting he had not been guilty of professional misconduct. The committee found that his conduct was reprehensible, but expressed the belief that he had acted bona fide. He himself could not understand how a solicitor could possibly be said to have acted bona fide in knowingly allowing a client to swear a false affidavit. He could not admit that the solicitor was bound in the interests of his clients to act as he did. When he saw that his clients were going to insist on suppressing the will his duty clearly was to withdraw from the matter and say he would have no more to do with it. Even when he was advised by counsel that this was his duty he continued to secrete the will, and the complainant was kept in ignorance of it until Robert Nanney Williams on his deathbed determined to disclose it. He could not agree with the report of the committee, and he thought that this was a case for suspension, and that two years was not too long. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS also concurred.

MARTEN V. THE NIPPON SEA AND LAND INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Insurance—Marine—Reinsurance—Incorporation of clauses of original policy—Loss occurring after termination of risk.

The plaintiff's claim in this case was upon a policy of reinsurance on goods per Adonis from Liverpool to any ports on the west coast of South America. The policy of reinsurance was expressed to be subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy and to pay as might be paid thereon. The commencement and termination of the risk were defined as follows in the reinsurance policy:—"From and immediately after the loading thereof on board the said ship or vessel and so to continue and endure until the same shall be discharged and safely landed at the aforesaid port." The original policy contained the following clause:—"Including all risks whatsoever by land and water and (or) inland conveyances and (or) of transshipment from the place whence despatched whilst waiting shipment and until safely delivered to consignees." The Adonis sailed on the voyage mentioned in the policy with the goods in question, and arrived at Guayaquil, a port on the west coast of South America, and completed her discharge on September 19, 1896. The goods, being dutiable goods, were placed in the customs warehouses, where they were held by the customs authorities in the name of the consignees and to their order subject to payment by them of the duties and storage and other charges and subject to compliance with the custom-house formalities. Various formalities have to be gone through at the Guayaquil Custom-house before consignees can get delivery of their goods, and, owing to a block of business consequent on a civil war in Ecuador which had only just terminated, affairs in the custom-house were in arrears. On October 6, 1896, the goods while in the customs warehouse were totally destroyed by fire. At the time of the fire the consignee of these goods had not been able to get possession of them, although he had done all that he could in that direction. The plaintiff paid a total loss under the original policy. The defendants contended that the "warehouse to warehouse" clause in the original policy was a clause of such an unusual character that it could not be read into the reinsurance policy unless disclosed at the time of effecting the reinsurance, which had not been done. On this point evidence was given on both sides. Further it was contended that even if the "warehouse to warehouse" clause applied, the risk had terminated at the time when the fire took place.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. B. A. Cohen for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that he must give judgment for the defendants. The first question was whether the warehouse to warehouse clause was to be read into the policy of reinsurance. His Lordship found as a fact that, at all events at Lloyd's, it was customary to have in a policy of this kind this particular clause. In his Lordship's opinion the clause was incorporated into the policy of reinsurance, because it was such a common clause that the defendants ought to have known that it was in the original policy. The second point raised by the defendants was that even if this clause was incorporated, nevertheless the defendants were not liable on the ground that the loss occurred after the risk insured had terminated. Now, under the warehouse to warehouse clause the risk attached until the goods were delivered into the warehouse of the consignee. These goods arrived at Guayaquil, and in accordance with the practice there the first thing that happened to them was that they got into the hands of the custom-house authorities, by whom the goods were placed in a warehouse and there held to the order and disposition of the consignees. His Lordship found as a fact (if it was a question of fact) that as soon as that happened the transit of the goods was over. Owing to delay in the working of the custom-house, the consignees had not, at the time of the fire, obtained actual physical possession of the goods, but in his Lordship's opinion the underwriter's risk was not to be extended beyond the end of the transit by occurrences of that kind. The goods were in the customs warehouse as a warehouse for the purpose of keeping the goods for the consignees in exactly the same way as if it was the consignees' own warehouse, and his Lordship found as a fact that for the purpose of the custody of the goods the warehouse was the warehouse of the consignees. Therefore, the risk had come to an end before the fire took place, and there must be judgment for the defendants with costs.

THE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA v.
THE NORTH CHINA INSURANCE COMPANY.*

Insurance—Marine—Reinsurance policy—Attachment of risk.

Judgment was delivered in this case, which was heard before his Lordship on March 29 and 30.

The action was brought to recover a loss under a marine contract of reinsurance on goods, the question raised in the case being whether or not the contract of reinsurance attached to goods which were being carried on board the steamship Harden from the Black Sea to London. The facts and arguments appear from the judgment of the learned Judge.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Carver, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Lord Robert Cecil for the defendants.

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said:—On February 5, 1894, the plaintiffs granted an open policy of marine insurance to Carl Grubnau of New York to cover goods which might be consigned to him; this policy continued in force until April 1, 1897. On January 1, 1897, the plaintiffs effected an open cover with the defendants by way of reinsurance. In December, 1896, some shippers at Novo Rossiisk, a port in the Black Sea, were desirous of making a consignment of wool to Grubnau, and in order to carry this out they agreed with one Scaramanga, of that place, that he should undertake the carriage of the goods at a through rate of freight of 45s. per ton from Novo Rossiisk to New York, via London. Scaramanga had at this time an arrangement with the Wilson Furness Leyland Company, an English company running a line of steamers from London to New York, by which that company undertook to carry goods for Scaramanga from London to New York at a fixed rate. Scaramanga had, however, no arrangement with any shipowner for the carriage of goods from Novo Rossiisk to London, and he was therefore compelled to look for a vessel to carry the goods over that part of the journey. He found at Novo Rossiisk a steamer called the Harden, and he shipped the goods in her for carriage to London. The Harden was a general ship on the berth for London, seeking freight, a "tramp steamer." When the goods were shipped on board the Harden, Scaramanga signed and gave to the correspondents of Grubnau a through bill of lading from Novo Rossiisk to New York, and himself took from the master of the Harden a bill of lading (which has been called in this case the local bill of lading) for the carriage of the goods to London. This latter bill of lading Scaramanga forwarded to his agents in London so that on the arrival there of the Harden they might obtain the delivery of the goods and tranship them into whichever vessel of the Wilson Line might then be ready to take them. As I understand, the Wilson Company were not interested in any of these arrangements, except under their contract with Scaramanga for the carriage from London to New York, and whatever profit there might be after payment of freight to the Harden and cost of transshipment in London and freight to the Wilson Company belonged to Scaramanga. On January 2, 1897, the Harden sailed, and on January 4, 1897, Grubnau declared his interest in the shipment to the plaintiffs, who thus came on risk in respect of the same. If the Harden had completed her voyage she would have arrived in London about January 22, 1897, and the goods would then have been transhipped into the Cambrian, a steamer of the Wilson Line bound for New York. The Harden, however, was with her cargo totally lost off the coast of Sicily on or about January 8, 1897. The plaintiffs paid Grubnau the amount of his insurance, and the question now is whether, under the reinsurance cover of January 1, 1897, the defendants are liable to indemnify the plaintiffs. The answer depends on the construction which is to be put on the cover note. The contention of the plaintiffs is that the goods were on risk while on board the Harden; the defendants on the other hand contend that the risk never attached at all. Now the cover note in the first place specifies the time during which it is to be current, "to take all sailings on and after January 1, 1897, and on or before December 31, 1897." No difficulty arises as to that. It next proceeds to describe the voyages contemplated. They are "at and from ports in the United Kingdom and (or) the Continent of Europe (including the Mediterranean), and (or) the Baltic, and (or) the Black Sea to ports on the Atlantic seaboard." It then fixes the pecuniary limit of the risk—viz., "to take $30,000 excess of $30,000," and, finally, it mentions the steamers in which the goods at risk are to be carried, per steamers of National Line, Arrow Line, and other lines "excluding (certain lines of which the Wilson Furness Line was not one)." The reason why the latter lines were excluded was that the defendants had already issued other covering notes to the plaintiffs in respect of those lines. It was said on the part of the plaintiffs, and I agree with them, that there are no lines of steamers trading between the Black Sea and the Atlantic seaboard. It was then argued that that being so the only possible way in which a voyage described in the cover note as from the Black Sea to the American seaboard could be performed was by means of a vessel such as the Harden, which should carry the goods from the Black Sea to some port, such as London, from which liners sailed, and that therefore carriage by such means was contemplated and covered by the insurance. It was further said that the reference in the cover note to the National and other lines was only introduced for the purpose of indicating that the excess over $30,000 was to be ascertained by reference to the total value in the vessel which might perform the part of the voyage across the Atlantic. I do not agree with this view. The general words describing the voyage, although they do not apply to the existing state of business, because, in fact, there is at present no line running from the Black Sea to the American seaboard, would apply if, at any time, such a line came into existence, and it is therefore not true to say that they are meaningless unless they can be applied to the facts of the present case; and as to the reference to the National Line, I think that was introduced in order to define the character of the ships in which the goods should be carried—a most important matter in considering the risk and the wisdom of undertaking it. So far as the intention of the defendants is evidenced by the cover note before me, I am of opinion that they never contemplated or meant to take a risk by such a vessel as the Harden. Their risks were intended to be confined to the vessels of regular trading lines, and were not to extend to vessels which could not in any sense be so described. The view I take is strongly confirmed by the words of one of the clauses attached to the cover-note, which is in these terms:—

"It is agreed that in the event of any claim arising on interest in craft or on shore prior to shipment or on board the vessel before completion of loading, the excess shall be ascertained by taking into account the whole of the interest shipped or intended to be shipped by the vessel declared, and the loss shall be settled pro rata."

That passage in my opinion clearly shows that no risk is undertaken in addition to risk on the liners themselves except (1) risk on shore prior to shipment; (2) risk in lighters (craft) during shipment; (3) risk on the liner before completion of shipment.

Judgment for the defendants.

CORMULY and JEFFERY MANUFACTURING COMPANY
 v. NORTH BRITISH RUBBER COMPANY and ANOTHER.*

Patent—Infringement—Bicycle tire—Attachment of tire to wheel rim.

The arguments in this appeal were heard by a House constituted as above on December 6, 7, and 13 and February 10 last, and the hearing by the Court of Appeal is reported 13 The Times Law Reports, 217; 14 Rep. Pat. Cas., 283. The action was by the respondents against the appellants to restrain the infringement of a patent, and Mr. Justice North found that the letters patent of the respondents were valid and that the appellants had infringed them. The main interest in the case consists in the Lord Chancellor's observations in moving the dismissal of the appeal. The following brief statement of the patent and of the appellants' infringing article is taken from the judgment of Lord Watson:—

The patented invention relates to the tire or felloe of wheels which may be used for cycles or other vehicles. It is described by the patentee in connexion with, or in its application to, tires which are composed of these three units—(1°) a circular metal rim or plate which is rigidly connected to the spokes of the wheel; (2°) an outer circular cover of gutta-percha, that part of the cover which comes into contact with the soil over which the wheel travels when in motion, being generally made of hard gutta-percha; and (3°) an inner pneumatic tube interposed between the metal rim and the outer cover and fitted with a device for inflating it with air. The leading and in this question the only important claim made by the patentee is for "the combination of a grooved rim or metal tire, and an arched tire of indiarubber or other flexible material held in the groove by the pressure of an inflated tube within the area which forces its edges against the sides of the groove, substantially as described."

The construction of the tire manufactured by the appellant company, of which the respondents complain, differs in certain respects from the construction of the tire shown in the specification as illustrating the application of the invention. These differences consist—first, in the manner in which the edges of the metal rim are bent and adjusted for the purpose of holding the ends of the outer cover; and, secondly, in the use of an inner pneumatic tube of pure indiarubber without any admixture of cloth or threads to limit its expansibility. The edges of the metal rim are not merely bent in the direction of the outer cover until they stand at an angle to the inner surface of the rim, but are bent over until the inner parts of them are nearly parallel to the inner surface of the rim. Each edge of the rim, when so treated, presents approximately the form of a hook. In the appellants' tire the pneumatic tube of pure rubber, in so far as concerns the holding in position of the outer cover, performs a function precisely similar to that which is fulfilled by the cloth and indiarubber tube in a tire constructed in conformity with the description given in the specification. It presses these ends against and into the interior of the hook, and when the ends are prolonged or terminate in a pad or lug it presses them against that part of the inside of the metal rim which is between the hooks.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. J. C. Graham were for the appellants; Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Bousfield, Q.C., Mr. Roger Wallace, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case I have had an opportunity of considering the judgment prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, and, as I entirely concur in every word of that judgment, it does not appear to me to be material that I should add anything myself. At the same time, I am desirous of expressing my great regret that a case which apparently turned, as may be seen from the judgment of the Court below, in a great measure upon two or three sentences in the specification should have taken the period of time which it has taken, both in the original Court and in the Court of Appeal, to have a question which.

as I say, turns upon five or six lines determined. Having regard to the extravagant and extraordinary consumption of time which was involved in the determination of this case, witnesses of great eminence being called on both sides and evidence given which amounts in the book which I hold in my hand to 500 printed quarto pages, it is no wonder that, if a case so simple in its character is so protracted, there is what is called a "block" in the Courts of law. My lords, I can only say for myself that I regret very much that, while complaints are reaching me constantly of the difficulties of suitors in ordinary litigation in having their cases determined, it should be thought necessary in cases of this kind to waste so much time as was wasted in this case. I think it is worthy of the consideration of those engaged in such cases to remember that the Legislature has provided a tribunal for protracted scientific investigations, to which cases of this sort will have to be remitted if this case is to be taken as an example. The question to be determined in this case by a Court of law is comparatively a short one, but if professors on every subject under Heaven are to be brought to confront each other and give evidence on questions of this sort it is quite manifest that the ordinary principles which guide Courts of justice cannot be adhered to, and what is called the scientific part of the case will have to be remitted to a totally different tribunal. I throw this out for the consideration of those who are engaged in something which is called litigation whether what I have suggested renders it possible to continue to try patent cases in the ordinary course of law. Every one knows it is most satisfactory that they should be so determined, but if it becomes impossible by the ordinary process because the Courts of Chancery and Courts of common law are blocked up by cases of this sort it is manifest that such a system cannot be permitted to continue. My Lords, for the reasons about to be given by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson I think this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON, after detailed description and criticism of the rival inventions, concluded as follows,—I have come to the conclusion, with both Courts below, that the appellant company have in point of fact appropriated and used the pith and marrow of the patented invention. The alterations which they have made upon the shape of the bent edges of the metal rim, which aid in holding the ends of the outer cover, are, in my opinion, mere modifications of the device for accomplishing the same purpose which is shown in the specification. Having regard to the evidence bearing upon the liability of the ends of the cover to blow out, when the patented device is used in combination with an inner tube of pure india-rubber, I am disposed to think that the appellant's device holds these ends more firmly, and is in that sense, and to that extent, an improvement on the device shown in the patent. But that circumstance cannot avail the appellants, if they have taken the essence of the patent as the basis of their improvements. Such improvements may involve so much inventive ingenuity as to entitle them to the protection of a patent; but, whether they do so or not, and whether they are patented or not, their author cannot use them without the licence of the original patentee or his assigns, during the currency of their letters patent. I have only to add that, in this case, the patented invention, although it is explained and illustrated in the body of the specification in its application to tyres which have an inner tube of cloth and india-rubber, is not, by the terms of the patentee's claim, limited to tyres of that class. I am, for these reasons, of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be affirmed with costs.

LORD MORRIS concurred.

LORD SHAND, whose judgment was read in his absence by LORD WATSON, after expressing his concurrence with the motion, said,—This grip is the value of the invention. It depends on the combined effect of the flanges, and the ends of the outer tire constructed as shown in the sketches annexed to the specification; and though the pressure of the inflated tube is a factor in producing the result, the existence and application of an inflated tube, more or less expansible, which had been known and used in practice before, is not of the essence of the invention. This view being taken of the invention, it follows, I think, that the appellants have infringed the patent. The metal hooks they use to catch or grip the ends of the outer tire serve the purpose of the turned-in flanges in the respondents' patent. There is, I think, substantially what has been called dovetailing action in both cases; and the respondents' design has been appropriated, whether the appellants' combination is to be regarded as, strictly speaking, a mechanical equivalent for the respondents' tire ends, and flanges enclosing them, or not. It appears, I think, that in some respects the appellants' combination is an improvement on that of the respondents', for even if a pure india-rubber inner tube is used with its greater power of expansion, the outer tire is not liable to be blown off in the use of the wheel at times when the respondents' tire would or might be. But I agree in thinking that the respondent's invention is used, though the appellants may have improved on it.

IN RE MAYFAIR PROPERTY COMPANY (LIMITED)— BARTLETT V. MAYFAIR PROPERTY COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Borrowing powers—Debentures—Uncalled capital—Companies Act, 1879, sec. 5.

Decision of Wright, J. (ante, p. 118), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the holder of a debenture issued by the above-named company, and charging its uncalled capital, from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright to the effect that the debenture created no charge on that part of the capital of the company which could only be called upon the winding up of the company (see ante, p. 118). The appeal raised a question of great importance upon the construction of section 5 of the Companies Act, 1879. Section 5 provides as follows:—

"An unlimited company may by the resolution passed by the members when assenting to registration as a limited company under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1879, and for the purpose of such registration or otherwise, increase the nominal amount of its capital by increasing the nominal amount of each of its shares; provided always that no part of such increased capital shall be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up; and in cases where no such increase of nominal capital may be resolved upon an unlimited company may by such resolution as aforesaid provide that a portion of its uncalled capital shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up. A limited company may by a special resolution declare that any portion of its capital which has not already been called up shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purpose of the company being wound up, and thereupon such portion of capital shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up."

The facts as stated by the MASTER of the ROLLS were as follows:—The company was formed and registered as a limited company on August 16, 1892, with a nominal capital of £50,000 divided into 5,000 shares of £10 each. The memorandum of association stated that one of its objects was to borrow money and issue debentures charged on "the property and rights of the company, both present and future, including its uncalled capital." By the articles of association full power was given to the directors to issue debentures charging all the assets of the company, including its uncalled capital. Before this power was exercised—viz., on October 12, 1892—a special resolution was passed, and it was thereby declared "that such portion of the company's capital as consists of £5 per share remaining uncalled upon all the ordinary shares of the company shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purpose of the company being wound up in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1879." In June, 1894, it was resolved by the directors to create and issue debentures for £50,000 bearing interest at 6 per cent., and 160 debentures for £100 each bearing interest at 6 per cent. were created and issued accordingly under the seal of the company. By these debentures the company bound itself to pay the principal moneys and interest secured by them, and the company as beneficial owner charged with such payments "its undertaking and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being." At the time these debentures were issued £4 5s. per share had been called up. There remained to be called up £5 15s. per share, of which, however, £5 could only be called up on the winding up of the company. On August 8, 1896, an action was brought against the company by a debenture-holder suing on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders, and on August 12 he obtained judgment in the form usual in such actions and a receiver was appointed. On the same August 12, 1896, the company was ordered to be wound up and a liquidator was appointed. By this time 15s. of the £5 15s. before referred to as uncalled up when the debentures were issued had been called up by the directors; so that on August 12, 1896, when the winding-up order was made, £5 per share had been called up by the directors and £5 more—i.e., the reserve capital—only remained to be called up for the purposes of the company being wound up. The liquidator has called on the contributors for payment of this £5 per share. The assets of the company, including the reserve capital called up by the liquidator, would not be sufficient to pay the costs of the winding up and the creditors of the company. The question, therefore, arose whether the debentures created a valid first charge on the reserve capital so as to entitle the holders of them to payment out of that fund in priority to the other creditors and to the costs of the winding up. In November, 1897, the plaintiff in the debenture-holders action applied by summons that this question might be determined, and Mr. Justice Wright determined it against the plaintiff, holding that the company had no power to create any charge on that portion of its capital which by the Companies Act, 1879, could only be called up "in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up." The plaintiff appealed. The appeal was heard on March 24.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. R. F. Norton were for the appellant; Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. George Henderson were for the respondent, the official receiver and liquidator.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after stating the facts and referring to sections 4, 5, 6, and 10 of the Companies Act, 1879, continued,—The contention on the part of the appellant is that a limited company can validly charge its uncalled capital if authorized so to do by its memorandum of association or by its articles; and that the capital or money which under the Act of 1879 can only be called up in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up is part of the capital of the company in the full and proper sense of that word; and that there being no prohibition against creating charges upon it the power to create such charges necessarily follows. This argument is based on "In re Pyle Works" (44 Ch. D., 534), which finally settled that uncalled capital of a limited company governed by the Companies Act, 1862, could be validly charged in favour of particular persons. It is further contended that the payment of the secured debts of a company is as much a purpose of the company as the payment of its other debts; that there is no necessary implication requiring the Court to hold reserve capital to be incapable of being charged with the payment of particular debts; and that it may be ruinous to a company to prevent it from obtaining relief from perhaps temporary pressure by raising money on the security of its most valuable asset. Cogent as this argument is, I am convinced that it is unsound, and that to yield to it would defeat and not carry out the purpose with which the Act of 1879 was passed. When the "In re Pyle Works" case was decided I foresaw that the decision might be pressed further than I was prepared to go, and I pointed out that, in my opinion, it did not authorize mortgages of reserve capital formed under the Act of 1879. I adhere to that view now that I have carefully re-considered it. In order properly to interpret any statute it is as necessary now as it was when Lord Coke reported Heydon's case (2 Co. 18), to consider how the law stood when the statute to be construed was passed; what the mischief was for which the old law did not provide; and the remedy provided by the statute to cure that mischief. The Companies Act, 1879, was passed in order to remedy some defects in the law relating to unlimited companies, and which defects, although long known to lawyers, startled the public when the City of Glasgow Bank stopped payment in 1878. The members of unlimited companies were in this position. First, they were liable to calls on their shares to their nominal amounts. This was the only liability which could be enforced by the company or by its directors whilst the company was carrying on business. This liability, but no liability beyond, was an asset of the company with which the company could deal. But, secondly, in addition to this limited liability the members were under an unlimited liability to the creditors of the company; and this unlimited liability could be enforced by creditors, although it was not an asset of the company which the company or its directors could charge alien or dispose of in any way whatever to the prejudice of any creditor. What was wanted was power to form a company with a reserve capital which should be limited in amount, which should be available for creditors in the event of a winding-up, and which should not be under the control of the directors any more than the funds were which the creditors could obtain, but the directors could not, under the old law. This amendment in the law was made by the Act of 1879. It appears to me plain that Section 5 was framed with a double object—viz., first, to preserve for the general creditors of the company the funds which the members were liable to pay, but which the directors could not call up, and, secondly, to enable the members to limit the amount of their liability on a winding-up to pay the creditors more than the amount preserved for them. Now if the appellant's contention is right the first of these objects will be entirely defeated, although there is not a sign of any intention on the part of the Legislature to effect so great a change in the law, and although such a change would or might be ruinous to the great body of a company's creditors and be destructive of the credit which the preservation intact of reserve capital gives to those companies which avail themselves of the Act of 1879. To effect such a change in the law applicable to unlimited companies which avail themselves of the Act of 1879 some provision is wanted to confer on companies carrying on business power to deal with what the members are only liable to pay when the winding-up takes place. Such a power would be a complete novelty, and cannot be inferred from the absence of any words prohibiting it. I have dwelt on the effect of the Act of 1879 on unlimited companies, which take the benefit of it because the effect on them and the effect on limited companies are to be gathered from the use of exactly similar language. It was obviously desirable to enable companies originally formed and registered as limited companies to have reserve capitals and not to confine that advantage to unlimited companies registering themselves as limited companies. The object of the last part of the section is exactly the same as the object of the first part. Both classes of companies are put on the same footing so far as reserve capital is concerned. The prohibition against calling up the reserve capital in the case of limited companies is inserted for precisely the same purpose as in the case of unlimited companies—viz., to preserve such capital for the general purposes of the company when wound up. To interpret the section so as to enable a company to defeat this object by pledging or otherwise disposing of its reserve capital is, in my opinion, entirely to miss the real meaning of the Legislature as expressed in the language it has used. Neither the Act of 1879 nor the other Companies Acts give a company power to dispose of assets which cannot come into existence until it is wound up. To hand over the reserve capital or any part of it when called up to a prior assignee, or to a mortgagee who has no claim against the assets until he has realized or given up his security, is not to apply the reserve capital for the purposes of the company being wound up within the true meaning of that expression as used in Section 5, but to prevent such application. This was the view of Mr. Justice Wright, and it is mine also. With respect to the case of "Newton v. Debenture-holders, &c., of Anglo-Australian Investment Company" ([1895] A.C., 244), on which counsel for the appellant so much relied, I need only observe that it was not a decision on the Act of 1879, but a decision on an article of association, so worded as not to preserve, nor indeed to show any intention to preserve, the reserve capital for the benefit of the general creditors in the event of liquidation. I cannot regard that case as an authority against the view which I take of the Act of 1879. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CLYDE CYCLE COMPANY V. HARGREAVES.

Infant—Contract—Necessaries—Racing bicycle.

This was an appeal by the defendant against a decision of the County Court Judge of Leicester, and raised the question whether a racing bicycle could in certain circumstances be a necessary for an infant. The defendant, who was a young man of 19, apprenticed to a scientific instrument maker in Leicester, and earning 21s. a week, had bought a racing bicycle of the plaintiffs at the price of £12 10s. The defendant paid £2 on the occasion of the purchase, kept the bicycle for some months, during which he used it, and subsequently returned it to the plaintiffs, who agreed to allow him £8 for it. The present action was brought to recover the balance of £2 10s. The defendant pleaded infancy. It appeared that the defendant had used the bicycle for racing and had won several prizes, and he admitted that he had occasionally used it on the road. It appeared also that a roadster bicycle of similar quality with the usual accessories would have been slightly higher in price. The learned County Court Judge found that the bicycle was an article of utility suitable for the station in life and circumstances of the defendant and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Mr. FRANKER appeared for the defendant in support of the appeal, and argued that a racing bicycle was a mere luxury and, having regard to the circumstances of the defendant, could not be regarded as a "necessary." He referred to "Peters v. Fleming" (6 M. and W., 42), "Harrison v. Fane" (1 M. and G., 550.)

Mr. C. B. Marriott, who appeared for the plaintiffs, was not called upon to argue.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said cases might easily be put in which, having regard to the character of the thing sold, there could be no doubt that it was not a necessary—for example, if a lad working in a factory were to order diamond studs worth £10 or £20, or if the defendant in this case had bought a horse. But, taking the facts in the present case, and remembering that the use of bicycles by persons in the defendant's position was common in his neighbourhood, could it be said that a Judge trying the case with a jury would have been bound to stop the case and decide as a question of law that the bicycle could not be a necessary? That was what the defendant must make out in order to succeed, for the learned County Court Judge was acting as both Judge and jury, and if the case was a proper one to have been left to a jury the decision of the learned Judge could not be reviewed. His Lordship thought that the case was one in which it was impossible to say that the County Court Judge was not justified in holding that the bicycle was a necessary. And he thought he himself would probably have come to the same conclusion if he had had to try the case.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY concurred.

distribution differing from articles of association.

This was an application by the liquidator of the company for the direction of the Court as to the distribution of certain shares and debentures (of the Amalg-mated Pneumatic Tyre Companies, Limited) registered in the name of the Beeston Company amongst the members of the Beeston Company in accordance with an agreement dated June 1, 1897, between the Beeston Company and the Birmingham Traders (Limited). The Beeston Company was registered in March, 1895, its objects being (inter alia) to acquire the undertaking of another company and also to sell its own undertaking for a consideration consisting of the shares and stock of any other company. The capital was originally £30,000 in £1 shares, of which 20,000 were preference shares as regarded both capital and income, and the rest were ordinary shares, there being power to increase the capital by the addition of shares having preferential rights. By article 72 provision was made for binding the holders of any class of shares, by extraordinary resolution at a meeting of such holders, to an abandonment of any priorities or preferential rights. Article 134 was as follows:—

"If, upon the winding up of the company the surplus assets shall be more than sufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, the excess shall be distributed among the members, in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up, other than amounts paid in advance of calls. If the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital such surplus assets shall be distributed, so that as nearly as may be the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up, other than amounts paid in advance of calls. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions."

Under clause 135 the liquidator on any winding up might with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution divide the assets among the creditors in specie. Clause 136 was as follows:—

"Any such liquidator may (irrespective of the powers conferred upon him by the Companies Acts and as an additional power) with the consent of a special resolution sell the undertaking of the company, or the whole or any part of its assets, for shares fully or partly paid up or the obligations of or other interests in any other company, and may by the contract of sale agree for the allotment to the members direct of the proceeds of sale in proportion to their prospective interests in the company; and in case the shares of this company shall be of different classes may arrange for the allotment in respect of preference shares of this company, of obligations of the purchasing company, or of shares of the purchasing company with any preference or priority over or with a larger amount paid up than the shares allotted in respect of ordinary shares of this company, and may further by the contract limit a time at the expiration of which shares, obligations, or other interest, not accepted or required to be sold, shall be deemed to have been refused, and be at the disposal of the liquidator or the purchasing company."

The capital of the Beeston Company was increased to £150,000 in £1 shares, of which 40,000 were preference and 110,000 were ordinary shares. By an agreement of June 1, 1897, after a recital of this increase of capital, the Beeston Company agreed to sell its undertaking and assets (with certain exceptions) to the Birmingham Company, and as the consideration for the sale there was to be paid to the Beeston Company a sum at the rate of £4 per ordinary share in the Beeston Company and a sum at the rate of 2s. for each preference share therein, such sums to be satisfied in the shares and proportions therein pointed out by the issue of debentures and shares in an intended company afterwards registered as the Amalgamated Pneumatic Tyre Companies (Limited). There was excepted out of the property sold a sufficient amount to pay a dividend of 20 per cent. on the ordinary shares in the Beeston Company and 6 per cent. on the preference shares due up to June 24, 1897. The agreement did not, as construed by his Lordship, point out how the preference shareholders and ordinary shareholders were to divide the consideration, but the mode of distribution was explained in a circular sent with notices of a meeting held on July 22, 1897. On that day an extraordinary general meeting of the Beeston Company approved the agreement and authorized the directors to carry the same into effect with any necessary modifications. By an agreement of August 5, 1897, the excepted dividend of 20 per cent. was reduced to 10 per cent. on the ground that the larger figure had been erroneously inserted. The benefit of the two agreements was sold by the Birmingham Company to the Amalgamated Company about September, 1897, and the consideration payable to the Beeston Company was to be a large sum of debenture stock and a number of ordinary shares in the Amalgamated Company. In the meantime (August and September, 1897) special resolutions had been passed for the voluntary winding up of the Beeston Company, and in this liquidation the question as to how the assets should be distributed was raised, having regard to the fact that under the terms of the agreement the preference shareholders were to have a different interest than that given them by the articles.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith were for the liquidator; Mr. F. Whinney for the preference shareholders; and Mr. Kirby for the ordinary shareholders.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said the case was nearly, if not quite, without precedent. After referring to the clauses of the memorandum and articles above mentioned and the terms of the agreement of June, 1897, his Lordship said that agreement had been adopted at a general meeting, and as an agreement between the two companies it was not impeached, nor was the Court asked to give effect to it. But the consideration having been paid over to the liquidator, the Court had to say how that consideration was to be distributed. There was in effect an unwritten agreement by the shareholders by their adopting the written agreement. Every shareholder who had notice of the meeting knew what was going to be done, and, notwithstanding that notice, the agreement had been adopted. It must, therefore, be inferred that the agreement was that the shares should be distributed in the manner pointed out by the circular issued when the meeting was convened. The liquidator now asked whether he could give effect to the resolution. It seemed to his Lordship that "Somes v. Currie" (1 K. and J., 605) enabled him to do what was suggested by the ordinary shareholders as right. In that case a distribution had been made in a manner not authorized by the company's charter, Vice-Chancellor Wood drawing the inference that an agreement had been come to for a different mode of distribution. That case had been often cited, but never disapproved. It was referred to in "Sheppard v. Scinde, Punjab, and Delhi Railway Company" (36 W. R., 1), when it was pointed out that "Somes v. Currie" depended on special circumstances. In "Somes v. Currie" the principal fact from which the inference of an agreement was drawn was the mode of distribution of dividends which had been adopted for some years. The present was a stronger case, because an actual agreement was approved by resolution at a meeting of which notice had been duly given. His Lordship thought he was warranted in following "Somes v. Currie" and giving effect to the agreement, but in so doing he did not intend to lay down any general rule. "Griffith v. Paget" (L.R., 5 Ch. D., 894) was said to be an authority against the ordinary shareholders' contention, but in that case Sir George Jessel seemed to have thought such an arrangement possible, for at p. 900 he said:—"There is another alternative presented to me by the counsel of the defendants. They say they are giving a bonus to the preference shareholders, and that every one of the deferred shareholders consents to that. There would then be no objection to their passing a resolution to that effect." [Solicitors—Markby, Stewart, and Co.; Morley, Shireff, and Co.]

THE QUEEN V. JOHN HUMPHREY.*

Gaming—Betting Houses Act, 1853—"Place" used for betting—Archway.

This was a case stated for the consideration of the Court for Crown cases reserved by the Recorder of Leeds raising a question as to what is a "place" within the meaning of the Betting Houses Act, 1853. John Humphrey was tried at the quarter sessions for Leeds on January 6, 1898, upon an indictment charging him (under 16 and 17 Vic., c. 119) with having on October 20 and November 3, 4, 5, 9, and 24, 1897, opened, kept, and used a certain place, to wit an archway in Princess-street, in the city, for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto upon certain events and contingencies of and relating to horse-races.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. George T. Banks appeared for the appellant; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. C. Felix Palmer appeared for the Crown.

The facts were that on the days in question Humphrey had been present in the archway, between 12.30 and 2 p.m., and had on each occasion there made bets upon horse-races, receiving money, giving tickets, and making entries in a book with several persons resorting thereto and varying in number from 13 to 40. When the bets were made Humphrey was standing sometimes on the high side and sometimes on the low side, and he had on the first of such occasions also made several bets in Princess-street, outside the archway. The archway was a private thoroughfare, the property of certain millowners and was the only means of access from Princess-street into a yard at the back of the mills, containing four dwelling-houses, three stables, and five workshops, which were also their property. Humphrey had no right in the archway, nor had any one except for the purpose of passing through the same into the yard and the houses, &c., therein. The archway was 29ft. 9in. long by 10ft. 11in. wide and 12ft. high. At the conclusion of the case for the prosecution counsel for the defence submitted that there was no evidence upon which it could properly be found that Humphrey had used for the purpose of betting any place akin or equivalent to a "house, office, or room," that there was therefore no evidence of any offence within the statute. The Recorder, however, directed the jury that the archway was a place within the statute and that if they believed that Humphrey had on the days specified in the indictment used it for the purpose of betting they ought to find him guilty. The jury convicted and the Recorder fined him £20.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON said the question was, Was this a place? He admitted that the Recorder's direction was unimpeachable, unless it came within the principle of "Powell v. Kempton Park Race Course Company" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 242). He submitted that under that case the conviction was wrong.

The COURT affirmed the conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that in effect the Court were asked to say whether the verdict was supported by adequate evidence. The argument for the appellant mainly rested on the decision of the case of "Powell v. Kempton Park Race Course Company" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 242). Without expressing any opinion whether that was an authority which the present Court would be bound to follow, it was clear that the opinions of the learned Judges of Appeal therein must be treated with deference and respect. The question then arose, Was that case one which should oblige this Court to say that no offence against the statute had been committed? It would be matter for the greatest regret if that were taken to be the effect of the Kempton Park case. In the opinion of the learned Judge it had no such operation at all. It was necessary to state the facts of that case in order to explain this view. In that case betting took place on a racecourse, to which multitudes resorted for purposes of sport. On that racecourse was an enclosure of large area which afforded opportunities of seeing the races, and in which there were constructions affording shelter from weather. Any one who chose to pay the admission price was allowed to enter. The numbers varied. Some went there as bookmakers, others to "back their fancy," others merely to see the races. There was no appropriation of any distinct part of that large enclosure for the purpose of betting therein. The mere statement of those facts marked the difference between that case and the present. In this case there was a gateway open to the street at one end and a courtyard at the other. Its dimensions were about 29ft. by 10ft. The defendant habitually resorted to it, and "held the bank against all comers," for the purpose of betting of the worst class. It was betting away from the racecourse, and had no reference to sport. In that gateway he lay in wait—in wait for the express purpose of carrying on the business of betting with those who would bet with him. It had been admitted that this might be properly described as a place within the Act. It was obvious that it was so, and was capable structurally of being regarded as a place. Was it then used as a betting place? The answer to that was that the defendant habitually attended there alone as a bettor against all comers. There was therefore in existence everything to create the offence charged—both the place and the purpose. The conviction was therefore properly arrived at. He desired to add that it was not to the public advantage that there should be the ambiguity which existed as to the law on this matter. It was impossible to reconcile all the varying authorities. The cases that from time to time were brought up showed that there was urgent need for legislation on the subject, and that speedily all ambiguity should be removed.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS concurred in everything that the Lord Chief Justice had said in respect of the case before the Court. It was in accordance with the decision in "Hawke v. Dunn" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 379) and "Reg. v. Freedy" at the Old Bailey. As to "Powell v. Kempton Park," the circumstances of that case were very peculiar, and, while treating the decision with all respect, no word of his must be taken as expressing approval of it. He agreed that legislation ought to take place, and was of opinion that some mode of arriving at a knowledge of the necessary facts ought to precede legislation. The present ambiguity was unfortunate and unseemly.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the general principle laid down in the Kempton Park case was that one test for decision of cases of this kind was the combination of cir-circumstances relating to the characteristics of the spot, and the other test was the user of the spot. That as a general proposition could not be denied. Both elements of the offence were present in this case. The archway had every physical characteristic which was required to make it fall within the Act. The user was identical with that which it would have been if the place had been boxed in and placarded up like any office. How could it, then, be said that there was no evidence for a conviction? Speaking of the Kempton Park case, of course, that case being a decision of the Court of Appeal, it was entitled to the highest respect, and he was not prepared to say that this Court might not be bound by it; but he much regretted the circumstances of the manner under which it came before the Courts. It was an action brought for a purpose. Both parties to it were desirous to get rid of "Hawke v. Dunn." Both parties agreed to a statement that the particular kind of betting carried on on the spot had existed since the beginning of the century. That statement made it difficult to see how such betting could come within the Act. (The Act passed in 1853 recited "Whereas a kind of gaming has of late sprung up.") It could not, it was true, be said that the judgment was based on that statement, but it was a material fact, possibly true, but collusively stated. It was very unfortunate that such a case should have come before the Court of Appeal to be the leading case. The counsel who argued it had done so with much zeal and ability, but they were bound by the admissions of their clients. In the view of the learned Judge there was urgent need for legislation. It was scarcely short of a scandal to have the leading authority on the subject obtained under the circumstances pointed out.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred. He thought the present decision in no way conflicted with the Kempton Park case. It was therefore unnecessary to say anything more about it. He referred to the case of "Liddell v. Lofthouse" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 291), approved of by Lord Justice A. L. Smith in the Kempton Park case, as being undistinguishable from the present. He agreed in the importance of legislation on the subject, because questions on these points were continually being raised before the inferior Courts all over the kingdom.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY concurred with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, and had nothing to add.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,) 1898.
Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.J.J.) April 4.

THE PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY (LIMITED) AND THE DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY (LIMITED) v. THE TUBELESS PNEUMATIC TYRE AND CAPON HEATON (LIMITED).*

Patent—Infringement—Bicycle tires—Action to restrain infringement dismissed.

Decision of Romer, J., affirmed (Rigby, L.J., dissenting).

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Mr. Justice Romer's dated December 8 last and reported in The Times of the following day. The action was brought to restrain the infringement by the defendants of the plaintiffs' patents for cycle tires, No. 16,783 of 1890, granted to W. B. Bartlett, and No. 19,990 of 1890, granted to W. Golding. It appeared that the action also sought relief for the infringement of the plaintiffs' patent No. 10,607 of 1888, granted to J. B. Dunlop; but the plaintiffs stated at the hearing that, although they did not abandon their rights as to the question of the infringement of that patent, they did not intend to raise it in the present action, and they also subsequently confined the question to that of Bartlett's patent, Golding's invention being somewhat similar to Bartlett's. The defendants were the owners of what is known as the Fleuss tire. They submitted that the essential part of Bartlett's invention consisted of an inner, separate, and detached inflatable rubber tube (as was shown by the judgment of the Court of Appeal, which was delivered by Lord Justice A. L. Smith, in "North British Rubber Company v. Gormully and Jeffery Manufacturing Company" (13 The Times Law Reports, 217; 14 R.P.C., 283), where the validity of Bartlett's patent was upheld by the Court of Appeal), whereas the Fleuss tire contained within it a circular band of rubber forming a flap in lieu of a tube, and they contended that the flap was not an infringement of the tube, although the operation of both articles for the purpose intended depended on the locking together of the two parts of the tire by the pressure of the air. Mr. Justice Romer, agreeing with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in "North British Rubber Company v. Gormully and Jeffery Manufacturing Company," considered that the substance and essence of Bartlett's patent was the use of a separate air-tight inflatable tube. That being so, his Lordship thought that it left it open to any one, if he could, to invent a means by which he could dispense with the inner tube and leave the outer cover only to be pressed against the rim by means of air. If he could solve that problem he would not be within Bartlett's patent, but would be entitled to say that he had made an independent invention. This, in his Lordship's opinion, had been successfully done by Fleuss, who had dispensed with the inner tube, and, in truth, with any tube at all, by means of an ingenious arrangement which made the outer cover, which was not a tube, hold on to the rim by pressure of the air within it. The action accordingly failed and was dismissed with costs.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Roger Wallace, Q.C., Mr. J. C. Graham, and Mr. A. J. Walter were for the appellants; Mr. T. Terrell, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., Mr. C. E. H. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. W. P. Rylands were for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments on the 3rd ult. their Lordships reserved judgment, which was delivered (Lord Justice Rigby dissenting) affirming the decision of Mr. Justice Romer and dismissing the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS read the following judgment.—This is an action brought for the infringement of a patent granted to Bartlett in 1890. The validity of the plaintiffs' patent is not in dispute. The only question is whether the defendants have infringed it. Mr. Justice Romer has held that they have not, and from this decision the plaintiffs have appealed. In this, as in all disputes about patents, the first thing to do is to turn to the specification and ascertain what the patentee's protected invention really is. For this purpose the whole specification must be carefully studied; and in order to understand it, some knowledge of the subject-matter to which it relates is always essential. Bartlett's specification is for "improvements in tires or rims for cycles and other vehicles." At the date of the patent several sorts of tires were known and their practical defects were known. It was known that the best form of tire was the pneumatic tire, which consisted of an inflated tube of indiarubber; but the known modes of fastening this on to the circumference of a wheel did not admit of easy repair if the tube was cut or punctured so as to let out the air. Another form of tire, but one in some respects not so good as the pneumatic, was the cushion tire, which consisted of a thick continuous flat belt of indiarubber doubled up in the middle and having its sides passed into the grooved circumference of the wheel so as to make a cushion or arch with more or less air in the space between the parts pressed into the groove. Another form of tire was the solid tire, which consisted of a solid continuous belt of india rubber fastened into the grooved circumference of the wheel. This was the earliest of all, but it jolted much more than the others, and was nothing like so fast. Bartlett's invention, as I understand it, was a combination of the first two of these sorts of tires with certain improvements which resulted in a tire superior to either of them and superior to any other tire then known. [His Lordship read the specification, and continued.] It appears to me perfectly plain that the invention here described and claimed consists of the combination of an easily-detachable arched tire or cover put over a separate and distinct and easily-detachable inner tube, both of which are kept in their place by the pressure of air in that tube against the sides of the metal circumference of the wheel, which is itself so shaped as to hold the outer tire or cover firmly in its place. The combination is of three things—viz., (1) the loose arched tire or cover; (2) the loose inner tube; (3) the shape of the groove to hold both. But to this combination must be added the great merit of Bartlett's invention, which was to show that the pressure of air in the inner tube could be so utilized as to keep all the loose parts of the tire in their place without any other fastening whatever. This is his strong point in this litigation, and I fully appreciate it. But, giving him every credit for this discovery, I cannot read his patented invention as not depending on the use of the loose inner tube. The use which he makes of it is, in my opinion, the most essential part of his invention as described and claimed. This was the view taken by this Court when it had to consider the construction of Bartlett's patent in "The North British Rubber Co. v. Gormully" (14, Pat. Ca., 283), and it is the view which I take of the patent now that our attention has been more pointedly called than it was in that case to the detachable inner tube. If this be the true construction of Bartlett's specification it is clear that the defendants have not infringed the plaintiff's patent. The defendants have very likely been led by Bartlett's specification to try and avail themselves of air pressure to keep on an inner rubber tire of a different construction; and they have succeeded in producing a tire which will keep on by air pressure without any inner loose air tube at all. They have one tire with a thin indiarubber lining; not two tires—viz., a loose arched tire or cover over a loose inner air tube. It is very true that when the defendants' tire is on it forms a tube which is kept on the wheel by air pressure, but unless the plaintiffs' patent can be construed as a patent for keeping indiarubber tires on wheels by air pressure, it is impossible to say that the defendants have infringed the plaintiffs' patent. I will not repeat my reasons for rejecting this construction. It is not in my judgment warranted by the language of either of Bartlett's claims. Mr. Wallace referred to what Baron Alderson said in "Jupe v. Pratt" (1 Webs. P.C., 146)—viz., that if a patentee discovers some new principle and describes some mode of carrying it into effect he is entitled to protect himself from all other modes of carrying the same principle into effect. But in the first place it is necessary to ascertain what the patentee has claimed as his invention, and, in the next place, if he has claimed the principle and all modes of applying it his claim will be undistinguishable from a claim to the principle itself, and will be too large, as pointed out by Baron Alderson himself in "Neilson v. Harford" (1 Webs. P.C. 342 and 355). This subject will be found discussed and put on its proper footing in "Automatic Weighing Machine v. Knight" (6, Pat. Off. Reps. 297, see pp. 304, 308). Colourable imitations—i.e., imitations with trivial or immaterial additions or subtractions or substitutions of one thing for another known to answer the same purpose, are infringements, and are more frequently met with—and are more vigilantly looked for when a patentee has invented some new principle than when his invention involves no such merit. But whether a patentee has discovered a new principle or whether he has not, his monopoly is confined to what he has really invented and to what he has claimed as his invention. Bartlett was no doubt well advised to limit his claim to what he had really invented and not to risk his patent for his great improvement by enlarging the scope of his claim so as to cover all methods of keeping on tires by air pressure. In my opinion Mr. Justice Koser's judgment is perfectly correct, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs. His Lordship added that he had written the foregoing judgment before he had read the opinions of the House of Lords in "North British Rubber Company v. Gormully and Jeffery Manufacturing Company" (ante, p. 335); but what he had written was, he thought, consistent with those opinions.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read the following judgment, differing from the conclusions arrived at by the Master of the Rolls:—This case seems to me to raise again the very same point of construction of Bartlett's specification that was determined by the Court of Appeal in the Gormully case ("North British Rubber Company v. Gormully and Jeffery Manufacturing Company"), though it has now to be applied to a different part of the description contained in the specification. In that case it was urged upon the Court that the inflated tube used as the air-tight tubular chamber by the defendants did not fall within the claim made by Bartlett, because it was not made of cloth and indiarubber, but of indiarubber only, which was indefinitely expansible. This was not a matter of small importance, for there could be no doubt that Bartlett introduced the word "cloth" with the distinct object of confining within narrow limits the expansibility of this tube, and it was shown that, if an indefinitely expansible tube were substituted for a cloth and rubber tube in tires formed according to the drawings to Bartlett's specification, the effect of inflating the tube beyond a very moderate extent would be to blow off the cover instead of holding it on. This was a very formidable contention. Another contention was that Bartlett purposely confined himself to the details of his specification in order to avoid the risk of making his claim too wide. The argument was renewed here without any additional evidence to support it. Both contentions were dealt with in manner shown by the following passage in the judgment of the Court of Appeal pronounced by Lord Justice A. L. Smith:—"It was strongly urged before us that the words 'substantially as described' tied the patentee down to the dovetailed groove, the horseshoe arched cover, and the composite rubber and cloth tube mentioned in the specification. These details are mere examples showing how the invention can be applied in practice. Again, it was urged that the invention was useless for a highly elastic inflated tube, and that instead of showing how to use such a tube the directions in the specification exclude its use and are misleading if applied to it. But this again is only true if the patent is construed so narrowly as to miss the true invention and to confine the patentee to the particular mode of applying it which he has described. It was also urged that unless the specification and claim were thus construed the patent would be void for want of novelty. But the evidence does not bear this out, for no one had realized the importance of making a tire of a loose cover kept in its place by the pressure of an inflated tube beneath it. Bartlett realized this and showed how to do it." In the present case there is no question as to an indefinitely expansible tube, for by fastening that which is in working to form an inner tube (or air-tight tubular chamber, to use an expression in Bartlett's specification) to the cover the indefinite expansibility is controlled. The question here is whether the fact of the substitution of a fixed lining to the cover in place of a separate tube departs so much from Bartlett's specification as to render the defendants free from the charge of infringement. Once more the question arises how "substantially as described" is to be construed in this particular specification, and having regard to the nature of the invention disclosed. To me it seems that the whole of the reasoning contained in the passage above quoted applies with at least equal force to the case of an undetached tube, and there are additional reasons which lead me to hold that the present is a stronger case for the plaintiffs than the Gormully case. I will first clear away the question of the difference between the horseshoe shape of the plaintiffs' cover and the ultimately circular shape of that of the defendants by pointing out that in the Gormully case the flaps which turned the horseshoe cover into one which became in action a tube, when once it was shown that they had no real effect in holding the cover on, were held to be unimportant. Then I say that, assuming a separate tube to be sufficiently indicated in Bartlett's specification, which is by no means free from doubt, yet when the tube has once been inflated it is not only similar to, but identical with, that of the undetached tube in the defendants'. Each then forms an air-tight tubular chamber transmitting the pressure of the air so as to clamp the cover against the in-turned rims and by the air pressure hold it in its place. The detached tube in Bartlett's specification, still assuming that to be shown, cannot move any more than the tube formed by the lining in the other. It is not a case of a mechanical equivalent, but of the same effect produced in exactly the same way. Unless, therefore, it can be stated with truth that Bartlett was absolutely and in all cases tied down by his specification to a detached tube, I see no possible way in which consistently with the reasoning in the Gormully case it can be held that there is no infringement. If, as it was there held, the patentee was not tied down to a composite tube of cloth and indiarubber, I am unable to see how he can be tied down to a separate and detached tube. I am aware that the judgment of the Court of Appeal refers in many passages to a separate detached tube in a manner which at first sight might appear to conflict with the conclusion at which I have arrived. But all those passages seem to me to bear a meaning quite different from that attributed to them by the defendants here. Bartlett's specification pointed, I still assume, to a detached tube. But the alleged infringement also contained a detached tube. As to the separateness of the tube, no difference arose, or could arise; the Court had nothing to decide with regard to the separateness of the tube, and the words seem to me to have been used as descriptive only and for the purpose of identifying clearly the thing spoken of. The separateness of the tube is only one part of its description inferred from the advantage attributed to it; the material of which it is to be made is another part expressly mentioned in the specification. I cannot understand how one part of a description can be treated as not being of the substance whilst the other is. There is no part of the judgment which says that the separateness is essential. Suppose that an alleged infringer had produced a tire corresponding exactly in every detail with the description given by Bartlett in the letterpress and drawings of his specification, and then by a proper solution joined the cover and tube together. Could he be said not to have taken substantially what was covered by the patent? It seems to me that he could not, and on this point I agree with Mr. Justice Romer. It is true that he would have been throwing away part of the collateral advantage indicated by the patentee—viz., the easier separability of the tire. A man, however, may infringe if he takes a substantial part of an invention, though he does not take the whole. Here the defendants may have shown invention and might be entitled to a patent as for an improvement upon Bartlett, but on the construction already given to the specification I think that they have taken in substance a material part of the invention, and that makes them infringers. Since the writing of the above judgment the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Gormully case has been affirmed on appeal in the House of Lords on grounds which appear to me applicable to the present case. (See ante, p. 335.) The construction there placed on the specification, in my judgment, shows that the scope of the patent is not by reason of the words of reference "substantially as described" contained in the claim to be limited to the very words of the descriptive letterpress exclusive of the description of the drawings, so as to be incapable of comprising anything not answering in every respect to those words. That being so, we find as shown by the description of the drawings, (a) an outer tire of indiarubber or other elastic material, (b) a metal tire or rim, (c) an air-tight tubular chamber, and (d) the filling tube. In this part of the description there is nothing from which the separateness of the internal tube can be inferred. Every one of these elements (a) to (d) is found in the alleged infringement when the inner tube is inflated. Regard being had to the construction put upon the words of reference "substantially as described," the defendants have, in my judgment, taken the very combination described in the first claim, and so infringed the patent. In my opinion the appeal ought to succeed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read a judgment in which he concurred with the decision of the Master of the Rolls.

IN RE CHELSEA COUNTY COUNCIL ELECTION PETITION—WILLES AND OTHERS V. HORNIMAN AND ANOTHER.*

Election Law—County Council—Petition—Allegations of treating—Particulars—Form of order.

This was an appeal by the respondents to the election petition from an order by Mr. Justice Grantham at Chambers. The petition alleged that before and during the County Council election for Chelsea, which was held on March 8, 1898, the respondents, Mr. Ensle J. Horniman and Mr. James Jeffery, who were declared duly elected, were by themselves and their agents guilty of the corrupt practice of treating, and also alleged general treating at common law, and the petition prayed that the respondents were not duly elected. The respondents took out a summons for particulars of the charges of treating, and Mr. Justice Grantham at Chambers made an order that the petitioners should, on or before April 6, deliver to the respondents the names of all persons, "if known," alleged in the petition to have been treated, and by whom, and the place or places where each act of treating was alleged to have been committed, and that the petitioners should be precluded at the trial from going into any case in respect of which the aforesaid particulars had not been duly delivered "unless for good cause shown."

Mr. ASQUITH, Q.C., and Mr. ROSKILL, for the respondents, contended that the words "if known" in the order were contrary to the practice. Under section 1 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, the petitioners must show that the person treated was a person to whom the section was applicable. The respondents were entitled to know the names of the persons who were alleged to have been treated. It was stated that only one occasion of treating would be relied upon. In "Maude v. Lowley" (L.R., 9 C.P., 165) the words "so far as known" were added by the Court by consent, but since "Lenham v. Barber" (10 Q.B.D., 293) those words had been omitted. It was desirable to have uniformity of practice. Again, the words "unless for good cause shown" ought not to be inserted.

Mr. JELF, Q.C., and Mr. S. H. DAY, for the petitioners, contended that there was no substance in the appeal. It was stated before the Judge at Chambers that the petitioners would rely in support of their case upon the giving of an entertainment at which the two respondents and various voters were present. It would be most difficult to specify the names of all the voters treated on that occasion. He did not admit that the practice since "Lenham v. Barber" had been to omit the words "if known" or "so far as known." The present was a very special case.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that this was an application to strike out certain words from an order for particulars, but in his opinion, if those words were not there, they would probably in this case be read in. He found that in "Maude v. Lowley" the words were inserted by the Court, though in "Lenham v. Barber" they were omitted. There was nothing in the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

IN RE THE SALE HOTEL AND BOTANICAL GARDENS
COMPANY (LIMITED). *

Company—Winding up—Promotion money—
Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, sec. 10.

This was an appeal by Mr. James R. Hesketh from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright sitting as an additional Judge of the Chancery Division, dated December 14 last. In May, 1894, the voluntary winding-up of the above-named company was ordered to be continued under the supervision of the Court. In the course of the proceedings a summons was taken out by the liquidator under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, against Mr. Hesketh, who had been secretary pro tem. of the company, asking that he might be ordered to contribute to the assets £250 alleged to be promotion money improperly received by him from the vendor to the company when he was himself a promoter and officer of the company. Mr. Justice Wright was of opinion that Mr. Hesketh was a promoter who might be held liable for making a secret profit, so far as the shareholders of the company were concerned, while in a fiduciary position; and that he was therefore guilty of "fraud" within the meaning of section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, and was not protected thereby. But in declaring Mr. Hesketh liable to pay £250 and costs, his Lordship said that he had not been guilty of any "moral fraud," for what had been done was done with the knowledge of the directors.

Mr. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. Younger were for the appellant; Mr. Asbury, Q.C., and Mr. E. S. Ford were for the respondent.

Their LORDSHIPS reversed the decision of Mr. Justice Wright and allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that having regard to the facts showing how Mr. Hesketh had occupied his time in getting up the company, in every sense of the words he was a "person who had taken part in the formation or promotion of the company" within section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. He was not a mere clerk or subordinate agent of the company, such as a printer. It did not follow that on that ground he was liable to repay the money he had received. (His Lordship stated the facts of the case and continued.) His Lordship failed to see any legal obligation on Mr. Hesketh to account for the money to the company. It was nothing to the company at all that he had received it. It was not incumbent upon him to tell the company that he had received it. It was not money in the widest sense had by him for the use of the company. His Lordship was not prepared to put a narrow construction on the 10th section of the Act. But putting the widest construction on its language his Lordship looked in vain for any material to make Mr. Hesketh liable to hand over the money to the company. Section 10 did not say a word about fraud. The real question was whether the company was entitled to the money. In his Lordship's judgment it was not. The whole case against Mr. Hesketh therefore failed, and the appeal must be allowed with costs.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

IN RE GYDE—WARD V. LITTLE.*

Charity—Gift to—Construction—Gift for charitable purposes void for remoteness—Absence of general intention—Cy-près.

This was an originating summons taken out by the executors of the will of the late Mr. Edwin Francis Gyde, who died in March, 1894, to determine whether a legacy of £10,000 and a residuary gift bequeathed for a particular charitable purpose as soon as land should at any time be given or obtained for that purpose were void for remoteness, or whether the will of the deceased indicated such a general intention to devote the bequests to charitable purposes that the Court would uphold the gifts and administer them cy-près, notwithstanding the failure of the particular objects indicated by the testator. The testator bequeathed the sum of £10,000 to his trustees upon trust to transfer the same to trustees to be appointed by them or the trustees for the time being of his will (such appointed trustees to be not less than three or more than six in number) to be held by them upon trust as soon as any land should at any time be given or obtained for the purpose to employ the same in erecting almshouses. The testator bequeathed his residue

*Reported by E. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by D. PITCAIRN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"upon trust to pay or transfer the same, as soon as they should be appointed, to trustees to be nominated and appointed by the trustees for the time being of his will, to be held upon trust as soon as any land should at any time be given or obtained for the purposes thereafter declared, to employ the same sum in erecting and maintaining at Painswick aforesaid an orphanage and institution to be called 'The Gyde Orphanage and Blind and Deaf and Dumb Asylum.' " After making provision as to the appointment of the trustees, the testator declared "that the produce of his real and personal estate devised and bequeathed in trust for sale should be so marshalled and dealt with that the produce of the real estate and of any impure personality should be used in payment of legacies and annuities to friends and others, so that the charitable legacies should be paid exclusively out of such part of his personal estate as might by law be bequeathed for charitable purposes, and he thereby expressly declared that in no case should any part of the said legacies respectively be applied in the purchase of land."

Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Ingpen were for the plaintiffs, the executors.

Mr. SWINFEN EADY, Q.C., and Mr. ROWDEN, for next-of-kin, argued that the will contained no general indication of devotion of the funds bequeathed to charitable objects apart from the particular objects indicated, which would or might be impossible to fulfil till a period that was obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities, and that therefore the gifts were void and there was an intestacy.

Mr. Stokes was for the heir-at-law.

Mr. INGLE JOYCE (the Attorney-General, Sir R. Webster, Q.C., with him) contended that there was a general intention by the testator to devote the bequests to charitable purposes, and that the Court would apply the funds cy-près, in case the particular object failed or till it could be provided.

The case was argued in January.

Mr. JUSTICE NORTH said that, in considering the law applicable to the present case, it was only necessary to refer to one case—that of "Chamberlain v. Brockett" (L.R., 8 Ch., 206), in which the Court of Appeal took a different view from Lord Romilly, who had decided the case in the Court below. The Court of Appeal agreed with the Master of the Rolls in the principle of law he laid down, but were able to find, looking at the will before them as a whole, that the testatrix there had indicated a general intention to apply a legacy given in terms very similar to the gifts now before the Court to charitable purposes; but had they not been able to find a general expression of charitable purpose they would have agreed with the then Master of the Rolls and held the gift void for remoteness. His Lordship in this will could find no general intention to devote the bequests to charitable purposes, and must therefore hold them void for remoteness.

BENSING V. RAMSAY.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lodger—Protection from distress—"Lodger," who is—Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871.

This was a special case stated by Mr. Plowden, the metropolitan police magistrate, raising the question whether a distress for rent had been properly levied on the appellant's goods, or whether those goods were entitled to the protection afforded to the goods of lodgers by the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871. The appellant had in May, 1897, taken lodgings at No. 1, Duke-street, Portland-street, of which a Mrs. Snepp was lessee, from one Parsons, who was in possession of the premises. The distress in question was for rent due from Mrs. Snepp to her superior landlord, and the substantial question in the case was whether the circumstance under which Parsons was in possession of the premises prevented the appellant from being entitled to the protection afforded to lodgers by the Act. Parsons had in February, 1897, entered into a verbal agreement with Mrs. Snepp for the assignment of her leasehold interest to him; and thereupon Parsons was let into possession of the premises and was handed the keys, but it was agreed that possession should not be considered to be actually given until after the execution of the assignment. The assignment was prepared and executed by Mrs. Snepp, and a day in April was fixed for the execution by Parsons. On that day Parsons attended for the purpose of executing the assignment, but a dispute arose owing to certain sums being claimed from him which he refused to pay; he therefore did not execute the assignment, and the negotiations with Mrs. Snepp went off. Parsons, however, remained in fact in undisturbed possession of the premises until the distress in question was levied. When the distress was levied the appellant served on the respondent, the certified bailiff levying the distress, the declaration and inventory provided for by the Act; but the respondent proceeded with the distress. The appellant then took out a summons against the respondent under section 2 of the Act. The learned magistrate, on the hearing of the summons, held that Parsons was a tenant on sufferance of the premises, and that a tenant on sufferance could have no lodger within the meaning of the Act, and he dismissed the summons subject to the present case.

Mr. Wildey Wright appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Lincoln Reed for the respondent.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that, in his judgment, the learned magistrate was wrong. In this case the superior landlord, from whom Mrs. Snepp held, was seeking to obtain arrears of rent due from Mrs. Snepp out of the goods of the appellant, who claimed protection under the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871. The facts were that there was an arrangement that Mrs. Snepp's lease should be assigned to Parsons. No agreement in writing was, however, come to between Mrs. Snepp and Parsons, and there was a dispute in consequence of the refusal of Parsons to comply with certain requirements as to a half-quarter's rent and as to payment for certain fixtures. It was immaterial who was right in that dispute; the dispute occurred, and the negotiation went off. But during the negotiation Parsons was let into possession and was given the keys. He was therefore in possession much in the character of an intending purchaser let into possession pending the completion of the sale. He remained there long enough to be rated as the occupier, and he had executed certain repairs to the premises. He was therefore in ostensible legal possession of the premises. It was immaterial whether he was a licensee, a tenant on sufferance, or a tenant at will. In that state of things Parsons, who had been in possession from February, 1897, in May let the rooms to the appellant. That clearly created the relation of landlord and lodger between them. Parsons was in ostensible legal possession with the assent of Mrs. Snepp. It might be that under the agreement between them he was not to be deemed to have possession, but in fact he had possession under circumstances in which he could not be deemed a trespasser. The appellant continued as a lodger to Parsons for some time, and then this distress was put in. On that the appellant had served the declaration and inventory provided for by the statute and claimed the protection of the statute. That claim was clearly right. The Act provided that if a superior landlord should levy a distress on goods of a lodger for arrears of rent due to the superior landlord from his immediate tenant the lodger might take certain steps, whereupon the distress was not to be proceeded with. Here the distress was levied by the superior landlord for rent due to him from his immediate tenant; and it could not be doubted that as between the appellant and Parsons the appellant was lodger and Parsons landlord, the appellant would be stopped from denying that. If the relation of lodger and landlord in fact existed, the case fell within the Act.

SAUNDERS V. THORNEY.*

Licensing Acts—Offences—Opening house for sale on prohibited day—Sunday Closing (Wales) Act, 1831—Purchase on Saturday—Delivery on Sunday.

This was a special case stated by the justices of the Miskin Higher Division of Glamorganshire, who convicted the appellant of unlawfully opening licensed premises on a Sunday contrary to the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act, 1831. The appellant was licensed in respect of premises in Aberdare, known as the Lord Nelson, to sell by retail beer to be consumed on or off the premises. The facts set out in the case were as follows. On Sunday, December 14, 1897, about 10 o'clock at night, a girl was seen by a police-constable to come out of the appellant's house by the front door, and upon going up to her he found she had two bottles of porter. He took her back to the appellant's house, saw the appellant, and asked why he had supplied the porter. He said he had not done so. His wife, who was present, said she had supplied the girl with the two bottles for Mr. Watkins, and there were ten more to come as he had ordered and paid for a dozen there yesterday. It was explained on behalf of the appellant—and the justices accepted the explanation—that Mr. Watkins had ordered of the appellant's wife, and paid 2s. for, a case of a dozen bottles of porter on the Saturday evening, which she (the appellant's wife) arranged to deliver at Watkins's house on the Saturday, but having met with an accident by falling down and spraining her arm she had forgotten to give instructions for the delivery thereof. Watkins on the Sunday night finding the porter had not been delivered as arranged sent over his servant, who was the girl caught by the constable, to the appellant's house, and requested the appellant to let him have two of the bottles of porter. The justices were of opinion that the sale of the porter referred to was not complete until delivery, and that in delivering the two bottles referred to on the Sunday the appellant opened his house for the sale of intoxicating liquors within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. S. T. EVANS appeared for the appellant, and Mr. W. D. BENSON for the respondent. The cases of "Pletts v. Campbell" (L.R. [1895], 2 Q.B., 229),

"Pletts v. Beattie" (L.R. [1896], 1 Q.B., 519), and "Brewer v. Shepherd" (36 J.P., 373) were referred to.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that in his judgment the magistrates were right. He should express his judgment upon the exact facts of the particular case, and the decision would not be a decision except upon the exact facts of the case. The charge in the case was based on section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874, which provides that any person who "during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed by or in pursuance of this Act . . . opens or keeps open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors" shall be liable to a penalty. The particular offence was committed in the Principality of Wales, in which was in operation the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act, 1831, which provides that in the Principality all premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold or exposed for sale by retail shall be closed during the whole of Sunday, and applies the provisions of the Licensing Acts, 1872 and 1874. That threw the Court back on section 9 of the Act of 1874. The charge was of opening the house for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The facts were that on the Saturday a customer of the house had ordered a dozen bottles of porter. It was contemplated that the delivery should be made on the Saturday night, but owing to an accident to the lady of the house, and her forgetfulness consequent on the accident, the delivery did not take place as had been arranged. Then on Sunday the customer's servant was sent to the house, and she fetched away some of the porter. What was the legal effect of that. The transaction of Saturday was simply a contract by the licensed victualler to sell and deliver a case of a dozen bottles of porter, and that contract would have been satisfied by the delivery of any 12 bottles of porter answering the description of that agreed to be sold. There was no appropriation of any specific goods to the purposes of the agreement. The matter therefore rested entirely in contract. No property passed. What happened on Sunday was that the delivery was sought, and that the house was opened for the purpose of the delivery of goods previously unappropriated and the property in which had not passed. Was that not evidence that the house was opened for the sale of intoxicating liquor? His Lordship had come to the conclusion, not without some hesitation, that it was. It could not be doubted that the delivery of the porter was a material act in the carrying out of the contract made on the Saturday. It was the completion of a transaction which had on the Saturday rested in contract only. There was, therefore, his Lordship thought, evidence which justified the justices in taking the view they had taken. If one looked a little beyond the words of the Act, to its object, there could be no doubt that it ought, if the words admitted, to be construed in the manner he had adopted, for it was clear that if a publican were to be allowed to defend proceedings for opening a house during prohibited hours on the ground that the house was merely open for the delivery of goods in pursuance of contracts previously made, it would open the door to contrivances which would tend to defeat the object of the Legislature. But for the expression of opinion of Chief Justice Cockburn in "Brewer v. Shepherd" (36 J.P., 373) his Lordship would have felt little doubt on the subject. That opinion was, however, not a decision binding on the Court, but was a mere opinion. The appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL agreed. He thought that a person opened his premises where he opened them for the purpose of carrying out any material part of a contract of sale.

DENABY AND CADEBY COLLIERY COMPANY V. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE DONCASTER UNION.*

Rating—Rateable value—Colliery—Proper method of rating—Evidence as to receipts.

This was a special case stated by Mr. Littler, Q.C., as arbitrator on a rating appeal to the West Riding of Yorkshire Quarter Sessions, raising an important question upon the proper method of rating a colliery.

Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C. (Mr. Alfred Young with him), appeared for the Assessment Committee; Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Edward Boyle for the appellants.

The appellants own two distinct collieries in the Barnsley coalfield; one, the Denaby Colliery, has been in existence for years, and may be regarded as fully developed. The Cadeby Colliery is newly commenced, and is very far from having reached what may be regarded as its normal output. The Denaby Colliery is rated in four parishes. The totals in the four parishes for Denaby Colliery are—gross, £26,058; rateable value, £23,919. The totals for Cadeby Colliery are—gross, £10,354; rateable value, £9,641. The universal custom in the Barnsley field is to let on leases of considerable duration at a rate of so much per acre, payable (subject to a minimum per annum) as and when the coal is won, which price neither increases nor diminishes with the price of coal or any other circumstance, and is frequently fixed much in the dark before the field has been fully proved. In the case of both collieries the mines are held on leases having 50 or more years to run, containing no unusual clauses, and the rent received after providing for the minimum (which has been passed in both collieries) is calculated as above indicated at per acre of coal gotten as and when it is so gotten, the tenant paying all outgoings and maintaining the underground workings, &c., in good condition at his sole cost. The area of coal leased was very large, amounting to some 4,000 acres in the case of each colliery, and the price actually paid under the lease for coal work averaged in the case of Denaby about £207 per acre, the tenant doing all repairs and bearing all other outgoings, and in that of Cadeby about £138 per acre. The collieries have been rated by the respondents at the before-mentioned amounts on an estimate based on the rent which a tenant would in the judgment of the assessment committee be willing to give on lease, and no allowance being made from that rent, and adding thereto the annual value of the surface buildings on a valuation based on their present condition, from which latter the usual deductions are made. At the hearing the appellants contended that the best, and, indeed, the only, fair method of arriving at the net annual value was that of ascertaining the receipts in the year and then deducting therefrom the expenses, allowances for tenant's capital, &c. If this proposition was admissible in principle, it was not disputed that the method on which it was worked out was substantially correct, subject to amount, as to which the parties differed. It was objected that the arbitrator ought not to receive this evidence, but he admitted it subject to the case. Evidence was given that this was a practicable method. It was admitted that coal experts could in each year ascertain the average selling price of coal and also could accurately estimate what the fair working expenses per ton of such a colliery ought to be. If the evidence was admissible in law the arbitrator found as a fact that this method is not only a practicable, but the best and fairest, method to both parties. The respondents contended that he had no power to adopt this principle. The appellants contended that it was impossible to find a tenant from year to year at a rent certain. If the mine were rated at the sum proposed by the respondents it would be carried on at very little profit, if not at an actual loss. If, on the other hand, their system were adopted, in good time the owners would escape their fair share of the burdens of the rate. Every colliery has its distinctive advantages and disadvantages, as, for example, its proximity to a port of shipment, its depth, liability to great fires, cost of maintenance, ease of obtaining labour, and many other considerations. There being no collieries let from year to year, there are no means of comparing the appellants' collieries with others for the purpose of ascertaining what a tenant would give from year to year. There was a second point raised. In three of the valuations in the rate-book the same figure appears in the gross and in the rateable column. In this instance there are no surface works, and wherever that is so the parishes make no difference between the gross and rateable, inasmuch as the tenant, as before mentioned, pays the outgoings. The appellants contended that the gross must necessarily include the outgoings, and that when the parish has inserted a gross value the appellant is in all cases entitled to accept that and to claim to deduct therefrom all amounts necessarily expended to maintain the rent, whether these outgoings are in fact paid by the tenant or not ("Reg. v. Wells," L.R., 2 Q.B., 592). The questions for the Court were:—(1) Is the evidence put forward by the appellants admissible? (2) Is the rent on lease, whether actual or estimated, under such circumstances binding, or any evidence in ascertaining the value for rating purposes? (3) Are the appellants, on such a rating as the three above named, where the gross and rateable are entered at the same amount, entitled to claim to deduct from that gross as shown in the rate-book outgoings by whomsoever paid and so arrive at the net value, which in such case must necessarily be less than the gross? The arbitrator postponed making his award until the judgment of the Court should be received.

Mr. BOSANQUET cited "The Coltness Iron Company v. Black" (6 App. Cas., 315), "Reg. v. Westbrook" (10 Q.B., 178), "Dodds v. Southshields" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 133), "City of London Brewery Co. v. London County Council" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 392), "Reg. v. Aylesford Union" (26 L.T., 618). Upon the point about gross value he referred to 37 and 38 Viet., c. 54, and urged that there should be no deductions from the gross value, but that the rateable value should be ascertained without reference to the gross.

Mr. CRIPPS admitted that what a tenant would be likely to give was the real test. It was as to the method of arriving at it that the difference arose. In respect of coal mines the rent could be arrived at only, as there were no similar hereditaments to compare it with by some such method as that suggested by the appellants. Coal mines were an exceptional class of property. The evidence of receipts was therefore admissible. As to the second question, he agreed that a rent on lease was not binding, but it was some evidence. Lastly, to arrive at the rateable value, deductions must be made from the gross.

The COURT adopted the views of the appellants.

Mr. JUSTICE DAY said that, in his opinion, the evidence of the receipts taken in the year was admissible. This was an exceptional case. The umpire knew of no colliery let by the year, and there was therefore no similar property with which such a colliery could be compared. It must therefore be dealt with exceptionally. The system proposed by the appellants was the most practical. The second question had been disposed of by agreement—namely, that the rent was some evidence, but not binding evidence. As to the third, he did not see how the rateable value could be arrived at without first getting at the gross.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE was of the same opinion. The colliery was such an exception that it could only be rated in an exceptional way. With respect to the third question, he thought the ratepayers were entitled to the benefit of the finding of the assessment committee. Deduction should be made from the gross value.

AUCKLAND AND BRUNETTI V. COLLINS.

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Music-hall agent—Commission on "future engagements."

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs against a decision of his Honour Judge Addison, Q.C., sitting at the Southwark County Court. The action was brought by the plaintiffs, a firm of music-hall agents, to recover commission alleged to be due to them from the defendant, Miss Marie Collins, the well-known music-hall singer. The commission was claimed under an agreement in the following terms:—"Auckland and Brunetti, musical and variety agents—Memorandum of agreement made July 15, 1891, between Mr. Brighten (for Mr. Kirk), afterwards called the manager, of the one part, and Marie Collins, afterwards called the artiste, of the other part, in which the said manager agrees to engage the said artiste as serio and dancer to appear nightly at the Oxford Music-hall from April 18, 1892, at £5 weekly, and the said artiste accepts the above engagement and agrees to fulfil it under the above conditions, subject to the rules and regulations of the said establishment. In the event of the above hall closing through any unavoidable cause this contract is to be considered cancelled. In consideration of your having obtained me this engagement I hereby agree to pay you a commission of 10 per cent., and to pay you the same commission on all future engagements at the Oxford or with ——. Commission is due weekly. I hereby authorize you to apply to — for your commission and I hereby authorize him to pay the same out of my first or any subsequent week's salary. Bill matter to be sent to the management 14 days before date of opening.—(Signed) Marie Collins." It will be observed that, although the agreement was expressed to be between Mr. Brighten, acting for Mr. Kirk, and Miss Collins, the latter part of the agreement was between her and the plaintiffs. At the time when the agreement was made the Oxford was being carried on by Mr. Kirk, Mr. Brighten acting as his manager. In May, 1892, the Oxford was purchased by a limited liability company, and in June, 1892, it was pulled down and rebuilt. The commission was claimed on salary, amounting in all to upwards of £750, earned by the defendant under engagements at the Oxford entered into subsequently to the rebuilding of the hall. These engagements had been obtained for the defendant by Mr. H. J. Didcott. The learned County Court Judge held that the Oxford, at which the defendant was re-engaged, was not the establishment mentioned in the agreement of 1891, and so was not within it; and on that ground he gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs appealed. It appeared that, although the Oxford had changed hands since 1891 and had been rebuilt, the character of the entertainment given there had not been substantially altered.

Mr. Counsel appeared for the appellants, and Mr. Bandon for the respondent.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, after adverting to the facts, said that what the Court had to consider was the meaning of the agreement of 1891. The material part of the agreement provided that the defendant should pay commission on all future engagements at the Oxford. Then there followed certain provisions to which no effect could be given because the blanks had not been filled in. If these blanks had been filled in with specific names, though that might not have controlled the construction of the agreement, still it might have given some colour to the suggestion that the agreement should be confined to engagements at the Oxford under a particular management. But, as it was, the words of the agreement were absolutely general. One must, in construing the agreement, have regard to what would be the rights as between a commission agent and a person for whom an engagement was procured by him apart from express agreement. The ordinary rule was that the agent had to show that the engagement originally obtained was obtained upon the introduction of the agent, and as regards subsequent engagements that they were so connected with the original engagement that they would be said to have flowed from it. In such a case, if it appeared that the subsequent engagement had been obtained not through or upon the basis of the original agreement, but independently, the agent would have no claim. That statement of the law showed the difficulties likely to arise in the absence of express agreement; for example, suppose that, after the original engagement in 1891, the plaintiff, having made some reputation, had arranged a fresh engagement for herself, then apart from express agreement, the question would have arisen as to how far the subsequent engagement was the consequence of the original introduction. The parties here had, it appeared to him, intended by making an express agreement to quiet all such questions, and to agree that for the purposes of commission all future engagements of the defendant at the Oxford should be treated as referable to the introduction. The learned county court Judge had assumed that in favour of the plaintiffs; but he had based his judgment on the ground that the Oxford referred to in the agreement of 1891 had ceased to exist. In that his Lordship thought the learned Judge was wrong. The proprietorship of the hall had changed, and its outward form had been altered; but it was still identifiable with the old Oxford, and the entertainment, though perhaps improved, had undergone no substantial change in character. Under these circumstances he had come to the conclusion that the defendant, though possibly she had entered into an improvident bargain, was liable.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL delivered judgment to the same effect.

KELLY V. CROFT.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Claim for commission after determination of agreement.

* Reported by E. HARRINGTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

This was a special case, and the question for their Lordships' decision was whether on the true construction of an agreement made between the parties the plaintiff was entitled to certain commission after the determination of the agreement.

Mr. SAMUEL GREEN, who appeared for the plaintiff, said that his client entered into an agreement with the defendant (trading as Croft and Co.) on March 1, 1892, under the terms of which the plaintiff was appointed agent for the defendant. He undertook to obtain custom for the defendant, and was to receive 2½ per cent. commission on all orders from customers whom he introduced to the firm. It was a term of the contract that the agreement might be determined by mutual consent, six months' notice to be given by either party. The relations between the parties continued satisfactory for five years, and then the agreement was determined by the defendant, and the plaintiff was dismissed. The defendant admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to commission up to the time of his dismissal. The plaintiff claimed that he was still entitled to commission on orders obtained through his introduction after his dismissal. Counsel cited "Bilbee v. Hasse" (5 The Times Law Reports, 677), "Boyd v. Tovill Paper Company" (4 The Times Law Reports, 332), "Salomon v. Brownfield" (12 The Times Law Reports, 239).

Mr. HERBERT CHITTY (who appeared for the defendant) referred to "Boyd v. Mathers" (9 The Times Law Reports, 443), but was not called on to argue.

Mr. JUSTICE DAY held that the defendant was entitled to judgment. This was not a case in which the defendant could have dismissed the plaintiff without his consent. The agreement was to last until determined by mutual consent. It had been so determined, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to receive commission after such determination.

Mr. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE concurred.

Judgment accordingly.

ALHUSEN V. THE EALING AND SOUTH HARROW RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Lands Clauses Acts—Notice to treat—Part of a road—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 92.

Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 307), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of Mr. Justice Stirling dated March 22 last and reported ante, p. 307. The question raised was whether the defendants, who desired to purchase, for the purpose of making their railway, a small portion of a private road forming the approach to a house and grounds belonging to the plaintiff, could be compelled to take the whole of his property. The case came on before the learned Judge upon a motion by the plaintiff for an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding with the purchase of part of the plaintiff's mansion house, known as Twyford Abbey, which was comprised in a certain notice to treat served by the defendants and dated January 21, 1898, without the purchase of the remaining portion of the plaintiff's said mansion house. Twyford Abbey, mentioned in the notice of motion, is a mansion house of considerable size, situated between Ealing and Sudbury, and standing in grounds surrounded principally by hedges, but partly by a fence. In this fence are entrance gates close to which stands a lodge. Leading from the lodge to a public highway, known as Hanger-lane, is a private road about 620 yards in length, having trees on each side and forming an attractive approach to the house. At the end of the road next to the highway is an outer lodge. Within the grounds of the mansion stands a parochial church or chapel, with a burial ground. This chapel is from time to time, but not regularly, used as a place of public worship, and interments still take place in the burial ground. The mansion and grounds and the private road, together with lands on each side of such road, originally formed part of an estate known as the Twyford Abbey estate, and were formerly the property of a Mr. Willan. By a deed dated November 6, 1890, the devisees under that gentleman's will conveyed to the plaintiff the mansion house and grounds and the site of the private road, together with the advowson of the church or chapel, and all such right and title as the vendors had in or could dispose of in the said church or chapel, subject to a reservation to the vendors and other persons claiming under the will of Mr. Willan of a right of way over and along the private road, and also a right to make and maintain openings into the private road for the purpose of access thereto from any adjoining lands forming part of the Twyford Abbey estate; and also subject to a reservation to the vendors and persons claiming under the will, and generally to all persons lawfully frequenting or going to and from the church and churchyard, of a right of way with horses and carriages from the outer to the inner lodge, and of a right of way on foot from the inner lodge to the church and churchyard. The plaintiff had ever since been, and still was, in occupation of the property so conveyed to him. The defendant railway company was incorporated by an Act of Parliament passed in August, 1894, for the purpose of making a railway between Ealing and South Harrow, and with this Act the Lands Clauses Acts and the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, Part I., were incorporated. On January 21, 1898, the defendants served the plaintiff with notice to treat for a portion of the private road (at a point distant from the inner lodge about a quarter of a mile) comprising 2r. 31p., stating that the land in question was required solely to enable the company to construct a bridge for the purposes of their railway over the same, and that the roadway would be lowered 5ft. under the bridge so as to give a headway of 15ft., and that during construction access would be preserved to Twyford Abbey; and they expressed their willingness, instead of purchasing the said lands, to accept and purchase an easement for the purposes aforesaid. On January 29, 1898, the plaintiff gave notice that he required the defendants to purchase and take the whole of the house within the moaning of and pursuant to section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. That section enacts that "No party shall at any time be required to sell or convey to the promoters of the undertaking a part only of any house or other building or manufactory, if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof." On February 7, 1898, the defendants gave notice of their intention to issue a warrant for summoning a jury to determine the value of the plaintiff's interest in the lands described in the notice to treat, and the amount of compensation for the damage to be sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the execution of the works authorized by the Act. Thereupon the present action was brought, and the notice of motion served. The question was whether that portion of the road which the railway company desired to take was part of Twyford Abbey within the meaning of section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Mr. Justice Stirling was of opinion that it was not; and seeing that he was dealing with the case upon an interlocutory application he thought the motion should be refused. From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. E. Moon were for the appellant; Mr. Beale, Q.C., Mr. Freeman, Q.C., and Mr. R. F. Norton were for the respondents.

Their LORDSHIPS affirmed the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling, and dismissed the appeal, with costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the case turned after all upon the true construction of section 93 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. [His Lordship read that section, and continued.] It had been laid down ever since that Act was passed that the word "house" in section 92 did not mean a mere building, but included whatever would pass under a conveyance of the house by that description. It was very seldom, however, that a conveyance of a house was drawn without some sort of context to enable you to see what was actually conveyed. It did not follow that every ground was part of a house. In the present case what the Court had to get at was whether this railway company was taking part of a house. [His Lordship referred to the facts of the case, and continued.] In his Lordship's opinion the avenue in question was not part of the house at all. It would be stretching language to say that the avenue, situated as it was, was part of the house or would be included in a conveyance of Twyford Abbey as part of the house if the Court had nothing else. It was, however, said that the authorities were too strong for that view, and the Court was pressed with authorities which went step by step. The strongest case appeared to be "Furniss v. the Midland Railway Company" (L.R., 6 Eq. 473). But his Lordship was satisfied that no one looking at the plan of this property could bring it up to the scratch and say that a person crossing that avenue was dealing with part of the house. The case was not within the decisions on section 92, and the Court would be making a bad precedent and getting right away from the section if it held this avenue to be part of the house. The appeal must accordingly be dismissed, with costs.

HESS V. LABOUCHERE.*

Practice—Discontinuance—Answers to interrogatories—Discretion.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Justice Bruce at Chambers. The action was brought in respect of an alleged libel published in Truth. The defendant in his defence justified the alleged libel. The defendant, having in his possession certain documents which had been brought from Pretoria and which related to the subject matter of the libel, took out a summons for an order directing the plaintiff to answer interrogatories with regard to those documents. The plaintiff, having come to the conclusion that it would be advisable not to proceed further with the action, took out a summons for leave to discontinue. The two summonses came on to be heard together before Mr. Justice Bruce, and the learned Judge made an order directing that the plaintiff should answer the interrogatories within seven days, and dismissing the plaintiff's summons for leave to discontinue the action. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Carson, Q.C., and Mr. Colefax appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. E. Banks for the defendant.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the suggestion on the part of the defendant was that the documents from Pretoria were in his possession temporarily, and that, if the plaintiff were allowed to discontinue the action without being compelled to answer the interrogatories, the documents would have to be returned to Pretoria, and then in all probability the plaintiff would commence another action, in which case irremediable injury would be done to the defendant. There was however, no evidence as to how the documents came to be in this country, and no evidence that they were going to be sent back to Pretoria. Under those circumstances, why should not the plaintiff be allowed to discontinue the action? Generally, in allowing a plaintiff to discontinue his action, the Court would consider whether they should not make it a condition that he should not be at liberty to bring another action. Here, however, the defendant's counsel distinctly expressed his wish that such a term should not be imposed upon the plaintiff. He was of opinion that the plaintiff should be allowed to discontinue the action without having to answer the interrogatories. The order as to the interrogatories would therefore be reversed, and the plaintiff would have leave to discontinue on payment of the costs of the action.

THE MANCHESTER BREWERY COMPANY (LIMITED) v.
THE NORTH CHESHIRE AND MANCHESTER BREWERY COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Trade Name—Imitation—Name of Company—
Companies Act, 1862, sec. 20.

Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 83) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne, reported ante, p. 83. The action was brought for an injunction to restrain the defendant company, its agents, and servants, from using or carrying on business under its present name, style, or title, or any other style or name which included the plaintiff company's name, or so nearly resembled the same as to be calculated to deceive the public, or induce the belief that the business carried on by the defendant company was the same as the business carried on by the plaintiff company, or in any way connected therewith. The plaintiff company was incorporated early in 1888, and had a large business, principally in and about Manchester, its brewery being in that city. There was also in existence in 1888 a company called the North Cheshire Brewery Company (Limited), which carried on business in and about the town of Macclesfield, where its brewery was. It also had some business in Manchester, at one time a good one, but this subsequently declined. This North Cheshire Company sold its business to one, Mr. Rhodes, who got up a new company (the defendant company) to carry on the old business and add to it, and this company was registered in October, 1897. Mr. Justice Byrne came to the conclusion upon the evidence that the directors of the defendant company in adopting the word "Manchester" as part of the title of the company had no intention to interfere with the business of the plaintiff company and that there was no sufficient ground for supposing that the public would be deceived by the similarity of the names of the two companies, and he, therefore, dismissed the action. The plaintiff company appealed. The question turned primarily upon the construction to be placed on section 20 of the Companies Act, 1862, which provides that "no company shall be registered under a name identical with that by which a subsisting company is already registered, or so nearly resembling the same as to be calculated to deceive, except in a case where such subsisting company is in the course of being dissolved, and testifies its consent in such manner as the registrar requires."

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh-Clare were for the plaintiff company; and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith for the defendant company.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that he was unable to adopt the view taken by the learned Judge below. After referring to section 20 of the Act of 1862, his Lordship continued,—"The short outline of the facts was this. In October, 1897, there were two brewery companies in the north of England, both registered as limited companies under the Act of 1862. One was the North Cheshire Company, which had its brewery at Macclesfield, and the other was the Manchester Brewery Company, having its brewery at Manchester. These two towns were not very far apart, and there might have been competition between the two companies. In that state of things several gentlemen formed a syndicate for the purchase of the business of the North Cheshire Company and registered a new company, with the consent of the North Cheshire Company, as the North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Company. The question was whether they had a right, without consulting the Manchester Company, to take the whole of its name. The peculiarity of the case was that, although the names of the two companies were not identical, the defendant company had nevertheless taken the whole of the name of the plaintiff company. The name of the defendant company, to any one who knew of the existence of the two original companies, one in Macclesfield and one in Manchester, would suggest that these two companies had been amalgamated and that the Manchester Company had ceased to have any independent existence. In his Lordship's opinion the defendant company had adopted a name so nearly resembling the name of the plaintiff company as to be calculated to deceive within the meaning of section 20 of the Companies Act. It was true there was no evidence of actual deception, which might be due to the short time which had elapsed since the registration of the defendant company, but there was evidence that business people would infer from the title of the defendant company that the business of the plaintiff company was being carried on by the defendant company. His Lordship did not mean to imply that the defendant company had any monopoly in the word "Manchester," but in his opinion one company was not entitled to take the whole of the name of another company and combine it with its own, because that would lead to the inference that there was some connexion between the two companies. Such a proceeding was not justified either by law or by fair dealing.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC V. THE VESTRY OF THE PARISHES OF ST. MARGARET AND ST. JOHN, WEST-MINSTER.*

Rating—Rateability—Exemptions—"Society instituted for purpose of . . . the fine arts" —Royal College of Music—6 and 7 Vict., c. 36.

Decision of Divisional Court (ante, p. 136) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment (reported ante, p. 136) of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Hawkins and Mr. Justice Channell) on a special case stated by order of a Judge raising the question whether the Royal College of Music was exempt from rating under the Scientific Societies Act, 1843 (6 and 7 Vict., c. 36). Section 1 of that Act provided that no persons should be assessed or rated "in respect of any land, houses, or buildings, or parts of houses or buildings, belonging to any society instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively, either as tenant or owner, and occupied by it for the transaction of its business and for carrying into effect its purposes, provided that such society shall be supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions and shall not, and by its laws may not, make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members." The Royal College of Music was incorporated by Royal charter on May 23, 1883, and was governed by the charter and two amendments thereof. The college and its affairs were carried on wholly in accordance with and for the purposes of the charter and amendments, and wholly in accordance with the regulations. The recitals in the charter stated:—

"The purposes for which the corporation is founded are—first, the advancement of the art of music by means of a central and examining body charged with the duty of providing musical instruction of the highest class and of rewarding with academical degrees and certificates of proficiency and otherwise persons, whether educated or not at the college, who on examination may prove themselves worthy of such distinctions and evidences of attainment; secondly, the promotion and supervision of such musical instruction in schools and elsewhere as may be thought most conducive to the cultivation and dissemination of the art of music in the United Kingdom; and, lastly, generally the encouragement and promotion of the cultivation of music as an art throughout our dominions."

At the college there were pupils, some of whom were scholars and exhibitioners and other students. The college was not allowed to make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members. It was also provided that no graduate competing for, entitled to, or holding a fellowship from or in the gift of the corporation should, while he was competing for or entitled to or holding such fellowship, be a member of the Corporation. By the regulations it was provided that the buildings of the Royal College of Music should be used exclusively for the transaction of its business and the carrying into effect the purposes of the charter and the amendments thereof. The building of the college is situated in Prince Consort-road, in the parish of St. Margaret, and is built upon land demised to the institution by an indenture dated December 30, 1891, by the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1881 for 999 years at a nominal annual rent of £5. The lease provided for the erection of the college and its use solely for the purposes of the charter. The building was duly completed out of funds provided by private munificence, and was the subject of the rates now in question. The college was supported in part by annual voluntary subscriptions from a number of individuals and from the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, and an annual subscription from her Majesty out of a grant voluntarily voted to her Majesty by Parliament for that purpose. The revenue account of the college showed annual subscriptions of £1,132, dividends and interest from investments of donations made to the college upon trust for scholarships, prizes, &c., £4,639; fees from pupils, £11,535; Government grant, £500, &c. It was stated that the fees from candidates and pupils were insufficient to defray the expenses of examinations and tuition, and teaching by the college was not carried on at a profit, or with a view of making a profit over and above the expenses. The college did not train either teachers or professional musicians or singers as such, having no course of instruction arranged with that view, but taught the science and art of music in all its branches to all its pupils alike, and imparted the same courses of musical instruction to all. Without the annual voluntary contributions, the donations, and the dividends from invested funds the college could not meet its expenses. The college had not made, and did not make, any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members. The Divisional Court gave judgment in favour of the college, holding that it came within the exemption. The vestry, as the rating authority, appealed.

Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., and Mr. E. Cunningham Glen, appeared for the appellants; Mr. Danckwerts (with him Mr. A. Neilson) for the respondents.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the respondents, dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the question raised in this case was whether this society was instituted for the purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively. In his opinion the charter, coupled with the facts stated in the special case, showed that the society was instituted for the purposes of fine art exclusively. The purposes for which the corporation was founded, as specified in the charter, were plainly purposes of a fine art—viz., music, exclusively. What was the meaning of saying that a society was instituted for the purposes of music? It must mean that it was instituted for the purpose of advancing music, or of disseminating music, or of propagating music. This could only be done by some means, and one of the means by which music could be advanced or disseminated or propagated was by teaching it. It was suggested that the real object of this society was to teach music to persons some of whom intended hereafter themselves to follow the profession of teachers of music. But in his opinion the object was not less for music exclusively, because the means adopted for advancing or disseminating music was to be by way of teaching it. He therefore entirely agreed with the judgment of Mr. Justice Hawkins. But now it was argued further that this society was taken out of the exemption clause by reason of the provision which said that a society, in order to be exempted, must be one which "shall not, and by its laws may not, make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members." Reliance was laid on the fact that payments of money were made by the society to its professors, who were members of the society; and it was suggested that such payments came within the word "division" in the section. But in his opinion "division" could not possibly include a payment for services rendered. He thought that the words "dividend, gift, division, or bonus" meant some payment by way of distribution out of the funds of the society for the benefit of the members. It was also said that some of the graduates got a benefit out of the society by being the holders of fellowships. But the charter expressly provided that a graduate while holding a fellowship should not be a member of the corporation. It was therefore impossible that any payment made in respect of a fellowship could be a division unto or between any of the members of the society. For these reasons he thought that the appeal must be dismissed.

BAXTER V. LECHE AND OTHERS.*

Licensing Acts—Licence—Renewal—Notice of Objection—Validity—Licensing Act, 1872, sec. 42.

This was a special case stated by the quarter sessions for the county of Chester on an appeal against a refusal by the justices sitting at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting at Broxton, on September 28, to renew the licence held by Jane Baxter in respect of the house known as The Brown Cow, at Waverton. It raised a question as to the validity of a notice of objection to a renewal of a licence served after the date of the original annual licensing meeting, but in due time before the adjourned meeting, and also as to the form of a notice by the justices.

Mr. Clement Higgins, Q.C., Mr. Trevor Lloyd with him, appeared for the appellant; Mr. E. H. Lloyd for the objectors; Mr. S. Moss for the justices.

The quarter sessions had dismissed the appeal subject to the case. The appellant was tenant of the house, which was a fully-licensed house. On August 31, the day appointed for the general annual licensing meeting for the Broxton division, within which the house was situate, the appellant attended and applied for a renewal of her licence. No notice in writing of an intention to oppose the renewal had been served on the appellant prior to August 31, nor had any notice been served on her requiring her attendance at the meeting. At the meeting of August 31 the chairman called attention to the fact that there were convictions against the house, one of which had been endorsed on the licence, and thereupon the matter was adjourned to the meeting to be held on September 28. On September 3 the appellant was served with a notice requiring her to attend at the meeting on the 28th. She appeared with her solicitor at the meeting on September 28 and formally applied for the renewal. The solicitor for the respondents also appeared and objected to the licence in accordance with a notice of objection served on September 20. It was objected by the appellant's solicitor that the respondents had no locus standi, as no notice of objection to the renewal of the licence had been served seven days prior to the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting, and also that no notice of objection purporting to be served by the direction of the justices had been served on the appellant. The justices overruled the objection. After hearing evidence, they being equally divided, the renewal was refused. The appellant appealed to the quarter sessions. The notice served by the clerk to the justices was in the following form:—"On behalf of the licensing justices . . . I hereby give you notice to attend at the adjourned annual licensing meeting for the said division . . . when the renewal of the licence now held by you will be taken into consideration." It was objected before the quarter sessions on behalf of the appellant that no notice of objection was served on the appellant seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting; that the notice, dated September 3, served by the clerk of the justices, was a mere notice to attend the adjourned meeting and did not contain any notice of objection to the renewal of the licence by direction of the justices nor state any grounds of objection; and that the notice of September 20 served by the objectors was had in that it was not served seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting. Section 42 of 35 and 36 Vic., c. 42, the Licensing Act, 1872, provides that when a licensed person applies for a renewal, the justices should not entertain any objection to the renewal unless written notice of an intention to oppose has been served on the holder not less than seven days before the commencement of the General Annual Licensing meeting, provided that the licensing justices may, notwithstanding that no notice has been given, on an objection being made, adjourn the granting of any licence to a future day, and require the attendance of the holder of the licence on such day when the case will be heard and the objection considered as if the notice herein before prescribed had been given.

MR. CLERMONT HIGGINS contended that the justices were wrong to refuse the renewal. He cited "Reg. v. Anglesea Justices" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 850); "Reg. v. Anglesea Justices" ([1895] 65 L.J., M.C., 12; 59 J.P., 744), which was a case decided by Mr. Justice Hawkins and threw doubt on the right of justices to start an objection. He referred to the Alehouse Act of 1823, 9 Geo. IV., c. 61, section 12, which provided for the adjournment of the licensing meetings. He also referred to "Reg. v. Altrincham" ([1894] 11 Times L.R., 3), which was distinguishable because the objection had in fact been made within the proviso; and "Daykin v. Parker" ([1894] 2 Q.B., 273). The justices could not by taking the point that there were convictions against the house open the case to the whole world to raise objection to the renewal. If the notice were not given by the direction of the justices it was wrong. "Whiffen v. Malling Justices" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 362). Here the notice of September 20 was not given by the direction of the justices, and that of the 3rd did not sufficiently state the fact. "Reg. v. Merthyr Tydvil" (14 Q.B.D., 584), "Reg. v. Eales" (42 L.T., 737) were also referred to.

THE COURT, without calling on the counsel for the objectors, decided that the refusal of the justices of quarter sessions must be upheld.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the first thing was to look at the words of section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872. Sometimes too great an abundance of authorities on a section was an inconvenience. The proviso to that section was in very wide terms. Under it the justices, notwithstanding that no notice had been given, might require the attendance of the holder of the licence at the adjourned meeting, when the case would be heard and the objection considered as if the notice had been given. The case of "Reg. v. Farquhar" (L.R., 9 Q.B., 258) showed that the justices might start the objection themselves in open Court, and then adjourn to another meeting, as had been done here. The justices must then require the attendance of the applicant, and the notice requiring him to attend must purport to come from them. Here the notice was declared specifically to be on behalf of the licensing justices. Now, what was to happen when the applicant did attend? "Daykin v. Parker" ([1894] 2 Q.B., 556) showed that the justices were not bound originally to state any specific ground of objection, but still natural justice required that the applicant should know a reasonable time beforehand what he had to meet. In the case of "Whiffen v. The Malling Justices" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 362), the justices adjourned the meeting giving direction to the superintendent of police to give notice of objection. The justices then decided on a ground not mentioned in the notice of objection. There was an appeal to quarter sessions, which Court gave the go-by to that ground of objection and decided on another ground which was included in the original notice. The Court of Appeal upheld their decision. In that case the applicant had a notice of the objection. If, in fact, the applicant had not reasonable notice of what he had to meet it seemed to be assumed in the case that the matter should be adjourned to give him an opportunity of answering it. In the present case the applicant had notice of objections given by persons other than the justices, though in that notice appeared the objection taken by the justices. The applicant knew what grounds would be relied on. That would appear to be sufficient, but there was the further point that the applicant's solicitor might be said to have waived the objection. He took this line. He objected to the validity of the notice, and considered that he was not properly before the Court, and therefore refused to cross-examine the witnesses. Yet after this he put in his own witnesses and examined them. On all these grounds the appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred. The justices had not done anything contrary to the Act. The notice given to the applicant by the clerk to the justices was a proper notice, on the face of it purporting to come from the justices, of the fact of the adjournment and that the applicant was to attend. In the case of "Whiffen v. Malling Justices" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 362) there was no statement that the notice was made by the authority of the justices, or that the applicant was required to attend. It was said in the present case that the notice of objection by persons other than the justices ought to have stated that it was given by the authority of the justices, but that would be adding something to the section. If the applicant had no notice of the objections to be raised against him at the adjourned meeting, he might get an adjournment, or if the justices thought it was too late to adjourn they might refuse to consider the objection. The fact of the notice of September 20 was not an essential to the case. But, however that might be, the applicant had notice and appeared and took an objection which was bad. No injustice had been done. The point before the Court was whether there was any jurisdiction in the justices to refuse. No good grounds had been established for impugning it.

Leave to appeal was given.

IN RE WAVERLEY TYPEWRITER (LIMITED).
Company—Winding up—Priority of debts.
Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 1897, held not retrospective.

In this case the commencement of the winding up of the company and the commencement of a debenture-holders' action against it both took place before July 15, 1897, the date when the Royal Assent was given to the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict., c. 19); and the question which now arose for decision was whether the Act applied, or only applied in cases where liquidation commenced after July 15, 1897. The Act is silent as to the date of its coming into operation. It gives priority, in respect of workmen's wages and other classes of debts mentioned in section 1 of the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888, over the claims of debenture and debenture stock holders having a floating charge created by a company.

Mr. C. T. Mitchell was for the plaintiff in the debenture-holders' action; and Mr. Percy F. Wheeler for the workmen claiming priority.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered judgment to the effect following. This case is very much on the line, but on the whole I think the Act of 1897 is not retrospective. The reasons for my opinion are two. Prima facie the Act is not retrospective, although the terms of section 2 are ambiguous. And, having regard to the terms of section 3, prima facie that provision is prospective. The observations of Lord Selborne on "Main v. Stark" (L.R., 15 App. Cas., 384) support the contention that the Act is not retrospective, and the case of "In re Joseph Suche and Co." (L.R., 1 Ch. D., 48) is a strong one in support of the same view. In the case last mentioned Sir George Jessel went out of his way to decide as he did. He said in his judgment:—"Since this question came last before me I have consulted several of the other Judges," and, referring to section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, he said, "I prefer on this occasion to rest my decision on the more general grounds that the section was not intended to apply to any winding up which had been commenced before the Act came into operation. I so decide because it is a general rule that when the Legislature alters the rights of parties by taking away or conferring any right of action its enactments, unless in express terms they apply to pending actions, do not affect them. It is said that there is one exception to that rule—namely, that where enactments merely affect procedure and do not extend to rights of action they have been held to apply to existing rights, and it is suggested here that the alteration made by this section is within that exception. I am of opinion that it is not. This is an alteration, not merely in procedure, but in the right to prove for a debt, which is not distinguishable in substance from a right of action before winding up, being simply a legal proceeding to recover a debt against a company in liquidation." In this case the Legislature has interfered with the rights of debenture-holders if they have not taken steps to realize their securities before the passing of the Act, but it has not gone so far as to interfere with their rights when they have already taken those steps. The Act of 1897 seems to form part of the Act of 1888, which in terms only applies where a winding up has commenced after the commencement of the Act. The case of "In re Anglo-French Co-operative Society" (60 Law Times Rep., 754) turned on the particular language of a different statute. No such words occur in the Act of 1897, and in this case I must hold that the workmen are not entitled to the priority which they claim.

HORNER V. LEWIS.*

Medical Practitioner—Fees—Coroners Act, 1887, sec. 22 (2)—"Public hospital," what is.

This was an appeal from a County Court raising a question as to the right of a medical officer of a cottage hospital to a fee for a post-mortem examination of a patient made by order of a coroner.

Mr. F. Marshall, Q.C., and Mr. Samuel Fleming appeared for the plaintiff, the appellant; Mr. Naldrett (Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., Mr. Braxton Hicks with him), for the defendant.

The appeal was from the decision of the County Court Judge at the Brentwood County Court. The plaintiff's claim was for two guineas, fees alleged to be due to him under section 22 of the Coroners Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vic., c. 71), for making a post-mortem examination by order of the coroner for East Essex (the defendant in the action) and for attending the inquest under subpoena to give evidence as a medical witness. The facts were these. On August 25 the defendant held an inquest at the Leyton, Walthamstow, and Wanstead Children's and General Hospital at Walthamstow on the body of a child aged seven months who had died in the hospital on August 22. The plaintiff, Dr. Charles Julian Horner, is honorary medical officer to the hospital, and receives no remuneration for it either by way of fees or honorarium or otherwise. He attended on the deceased while a patient in the hospital, and by order of the coroner made the post-mortem examination, and attended at the inquest under a subpoena and gave evidence as to the condition of the child when she was brought into the hospital and as to the cause of death ascertained by means of the post-mortem examination. He applied for his fees to the coroner, but none had been paid to him, and the coroner based his refusal on section 22 (1) and (2) of the Coroners Act, 1887. The case was brought to obtain a decision on the question in order that, if the money were payable, the coroner might obtain the payment from the county council. The action was a friendly action, and it was agreed that each party should pay their own costs. The hospital was founded in 1878. It was for the free admission and relief of patients, irrespective of creed and party, from all parts of Leyton, Walthamstow, and Wanstead; and in accordance with the deed of gift of the freehold house and grounds known as Holmcroft for the purposes of a hospital, at least two-thirds of the number of beds were to be reserved for children under 16 years of age. By one of the rules patients from Leyton, Walthamstow, and Wanstead were to be admitted by a governor's letter free of charge. Patients from neighbouring parishes might be admitted by governor's letters and a payment of not less than 5s. per week. Section 22 of the Coroners Act, 1887, provides that a legally qualified medical practitioner who has attended at a coroner's inquest in obedience to a summons of the coroner under this Act shall be entitled to receive such remuneration as follows—namely, for making a post-mortem examination, two guineas; and for attending to give evidence, two guineas. The material subsection

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(2) of the section is as follows:—"Where an inquest is held on the body of a person who has died in a county or other lunatic asylum or in a public hospital, infirmary, or other medical institution, whether the same be supported by endowments or by voluntary subscriptions, the medical officer whose duty it may have been to attend the deceased person as a medical officer of such institution as aforesaid shall not be entitled to such fee or remuneration. The County Court Judge held that the fee was not recoverable.

MR. MARSHALL said there were two questions—(1) Was the Cottage Hospital a public institution within the section; (2) was the plaintiff a medical officer of the institution within the section, he being a purely honorary officer. The Act of 1887 was a reproduction in substance of 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 89. At that date cottage hospitals were not in existence. The hospital was a small institution, and only about ten beds would be available for adults, the rest were devoted for children. It could not be called a public institution. The plaintiff was not a medical officer within the section. In a cottage hospital there was no regular paid house surgeon always there. There was no legal duty on the plaintiff, who received no remuneration for his services, to attend to the deceased. He did not, therefore, come within the section.

The COURT dismissed the appeal, holding that the institution was a public hospital, and the plaintiff was a medical officer of such institution whose duty it was to attend on the deceased.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the question was not whether one liked or disliked the effects of the Act of Parliament which had to be interpreted. He regretted that a medical man should be obliged to perform duties without receiving payment for them, but that would not affect his decision. There was no doubt that this hospital must be considered a public hospital within the statute. He would not attempt to define the line between public hospitals and others, but in connexion with this hospital there was a published list of governors and subscribers, and there was a medical staff, annual meetings were held, patients were admitted by governors' letters, and all other elements were present which were found in any of the great London hospitals, which no one would deny were public hospitals. It was true the patients were restricted to inhabitants of a certain area. That, however, did not prevent its being a public hospital. It was the case with certain of the great hospitals. The next question was whether the plaintiff was a medical officer whose duty it was to attend on the deceased within the section. It was said that he had no legal duty to attend. But it was clear that it was his duty, a duty of imperfect obligation, it was true, to do so. That duty brought him within the section. There could be no doubt that he was a medical officer of the hospital. He was that none the less because he was not paid for it.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred. He thought the subscribers to the hospital would be much surprised if they heard the hospital described as a private hospital. It was a public hospital notwithstanding the fact that there was a limited area from which its patients were to be derived. On the second point it was obvious on the face of the documents that the plaintiff was a medical officer of the hospital. It was clearly his duty, having accepted that unpaid office, to attend on the deceased. To put it negatively, it would have been contrary to his duty not to have attended. If in 1887, when the Act was passed, it had been intended to provide that unpaid officers should be excluded from the proviso of section 22 (2), it would have been easy to have added some words to that effect. The appeal must be dismissed.

HOWLAND V. DOVER HARBOUR BOARD.*

Nuisance—What amounts to—Noise and vibration—Interference with comfort and trade of plaintiff.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Romer reported in The Times of December 6. The action was brought by a lady who was the owner of a private hotel in Waterloo-crescent, Dover, known as Connaught-house, for an injunction and damages in respect of nuisance and injury caused by the defendants' works on an open space immediately in front of her premises. It appeared that the defendants, who were the Harbour Board and their contractor, were using the space for works in connexion with the construction of the new breakwater, and the plaintiff complained of the noise and vibration, &c., which, she said, had caused cracks in the fabric of her house and driven away her customers. Mr. Justice Romer, although satisfied that the plaintiff had suffered considerable annoyance, held that it did not amount to a nuisance at law, and he dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed, but she did not either in the Court of first instance or upon the appeal insist upon her right to an injunction.

MR. FARWELL, Q.C., and MR. W. H. COZENS-HARDY were for the plaintiff; MR. LEVETT, Q.C., and MR. GATEY were for the Harbour Board; and MR. NEVILLE, Q.C., and MR. MULLIGAN, Q.C., for the contractor.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS thought that the learned Judge had minimized the evidence of nuisance adduced on behalf of the plaintiff. The Harbour Board were authorized by Act of Parliament to construct a new harbour, and for this purpose huge blocks of concrete were required. The contractor had obtained from the Harbour Board a piece of land where he manufactured these blocks of concrete, and he also obtained from them the right to use the piece of vacant land in front of the plaintiff's house for the purpose of storing the concrete blocks. The mere fact that this vacant piece of land was turned into a stoneyard caused a considerable amount of damage to the plaintiff's business as an hotelkeeper, but for that she had no right to damages because there was no actionable injury. The contractor had done no more than was reasonably necessary for the purpose for which the land was acquired. It was necessary, in order to move these heavy blocks, to lay down a tramway and to employ steam-engines and steam-cranes, and the result of all this had been very serious to the plaintiff. Quite apart from the loss of amenity arising from the change of the character of the land there had been a substantial interference with the comfort of the house as a dwelling-house. The use of this piece of land for the defendants' works necessarily involved an unusual amount of smoke and dirt and noise and vibration. The principles to be applied in a case of this kind were laid down by Lord Justice Mellish in "Ball v. Ray" (8 Ch., 487) as follows:—He said,—"I entirely agree with what has been said by the Lord Chancellor, that when, in a street like Green-street, the ground floor of a neighbouring house is turned into a stable, we are not to consider the noise of horses from that stable like the noise of a pianoforte from a neighbour's house, or the noise of a neighbour's children in their nursery, which are noises we must reasonably expect and must to a considerable extent put up with. A noise of this kind, if it materially disturbs the comfort of the plaintiff's dwelling-house and prevents people from sleeping at night, and, still more, if it does really and seriously interfere with the plaintiff's trade as a lodging-house-keeper, beyond all question constitutes an actionable nuisance." Applying that test, his Lordship thought that the evidence showed clearly and distinctly that both the comfort of the plaintiff's house and also the plaintiff's trade as a lodging-house-keeper had been seriously interfered with by the defendants' operations, quite apart from the annoyance which the plaintiff had suffered by having a stoneyard next her house instead of a vacant piece of land. Then the question was, who was liable? The injunction had been waived, and it was a question of damages only. The contractor was liable, of course; but were the board liable also? If a contractor was employed to do a piece of work the employer was not liable for what might be called collateral negligence on the part of the contractor. But here there was no question of negligence. The principle upon which the board were responsible was that they had allowed the contractor to use this piece of land for the very purpose to which he applied it, and the necessary consequence of that, in the ordinary business sense of the word "necessary," was a nuisance. In other words, the board committed the nuisance by their contractor. The appeal should be allowed, and judgment should be given for the plaintiff against both defendants, the amount of the damages to be assessed by an official referee.

IN RE THE REGISTERED TRADE MARKS NO. 27,850 AND NO. 72,790 OF JOHN BATT AND CO.*

Trade Mark—Registration—Trade mark registered without intention to use—Rectification of register.

This case raised a novel point under the Patents and Trade Marks Acts. It was a motion on behalf of Messrs. Carter and Co., the well-known seed merchants, for an order that the register of trade marks might be rectified by removing therefrom the above-mentioned trade marks, being figures of butterflies. The mark No. 27,850 was registered by the respondents, Messrs. Batt and Co., on March 13, 1882, in several classes of goods, including the whole of Class 42. The mark No. 72,790 was registered by them on February 16, 1888, in class 42. Class 42 comprises substances used as food, or ingredients in food. In 1837 Messrs. Carter and Co. applied to register certain butterfly marks in Class 42 for oats, and subsequently received from the Comptroller a notice calling attention to the above-mentioned marks of Messrs. Batt and Co., and intimating that, in accordance with section 72 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, as amended by section 14 of the Act, 1888, Messrs. Carter and Co.'s marks would appear incapable of registration, and that their application could not be proceeded with. Section 72 of the Act of 1883, as amended, is as follows:—"Except when the Court has decided that two or more persons are entitled to be registered as proprietors of the same trade mark, the Comptroller shall not register in respect of the same goods or description of goods a trade mark identical with one already on the register with respect to such goods or description of goods." After communications between Messrs. Carter and Co. and Messrs. Batt and Co., notice of the above motion to expunge was given by Messrs. Carter and Co. and also notice of motion for an order on the Comptroller to proceed with Messrs. Carter and Co.'s application to register. The applicants based their claim on the ground that the respondents had never used the two marks in question for oats or any goods in Class 42 and never had any bona-fide intention of so using them, and it was asked that either the respondents' marks should be expunged or their registration limited so as not to cover oats. The respondents stated that they were exporters of and dealers in many kinds of goods, including articles of food, and that they had in fact used the said marks for certain articles of food, and they also denied that they had no bona-fide intention of using the marks for goods in Class 42, and submitted that if their marks were rightly registered there was no jurisdiction to remove them from the register on account of non-user.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. J. Austen-Cartmell appeared for the applicants; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian for the respondents and Mr. Ingle Joyce for the Comptroller.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER said that he took it to be clear that if persons registered new trade marks which they said they intended to use they must at the date of registration have a bona-fide intention of using these trade marks in respect of the goods for which they registered them. (See "Edwards v. Dennis," L.R., 30 Ch.D., 454, per Lord Justice Cotton, p. 474.) One could not help seeing the evils which might result from allowing trade marks to be registered broadcast, there being no real intention of using them or only an intention possibly of using them in respect of a few articles. The cost and inconvenience of such a practice would be very great, and it would lead in some cases to absolute oppression, for persons would be enabled to use the position they had got as registered owners of trade marks, which were not really bona-fide trade marks, for the purpose of trafficking in them and using them as weapons to obtain money from subsequent persons who might want to use bona-fide trade marks in respect of some classes of goods for which they found the bogus trade marks registered. In fact he was sorry to say that it appeared from the evidence given before him by several experts that such a system of traffic was carried on. These latter observations did not apply to the respondents. But they had registered over 40 trade marks in the year 1882. When he looked at the variety of these trade marks and the variety of goods against which they were registered it was at least difficult to suppose that there could have been a bona-fide intention on their part to use all these trade marks in respect of all the classes against which they were registered. With regard to the two marks in question he came to the conclusions of fact that there was no real user at any time before registration; that there had been no real user since registration in respect of the articles in Class 42, and that at the date of registration there was no bona-fide intention to use these trade marks for any of the goods in that class. He therefore ordered the two marks to be expunged and the respondents must pay costs of the motion to rectify. With regard to the other motion he ordered the Registrar to proceed with the application to register and that the applicants pay the Comptroller's costs on that motion.

LEICESTER COUNTY COUNCIL V. LEICESTER ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE.*

Rating—Poor-rate—Rateability—Police—Chief constable's residence—Exemption.

This was a special case stated under 13 and 13 Vict., c. 45, section 11, after notice of appeal against a poor-rate made on the chief constable's residence at Leicester. In 1867 the police premises, including the chief constable's residence, had been assessed to the poor-rate of St. Martin's parish, Leicester. The justices of the county appealed against the assessment, and a case ("Reg. v. St. Martin's, Leicester," L.R., 2 Q.B., 493) was stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, which Court decided that the justices were not liable to poor-rates for such premises. Since then neither the justices nor the county council had been rated for the premises till the rate in question was made on April 3, 1897. The rate was only in respect of the portion of the police buildings used exclusively for residential purposes. The property belonging to the appellants comprise a building consisting in part of certain rooms occupied by the chief constable of the county in his official capacity for the purpose of residence. The rest of the building is occupied for ordinary police purposes, and comprise a strong-room for records, a police library, office for chief constable, office for superintendent and clerk, and office for recruits and public. The chief constable resides in the portion of the building occupied by him rent free, and it was a condition that he should reside there. His residence and the portions occupied for ordinary police purposes are not structurally severed and constitute one building. On April 1, 1889, by virtue of section 64 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vic., c. 41), the property of the justices, including the said premises, passed to and became vested in the county council. The police of the county of Leicester are inspected annually by a Government officer. If his report is satisfactory one-half of the cost of the pay and clothing for the preceding year is chargeable on the "Exchequer contribution account" in substitution of the grant previously made by the Exchequer.

Mr. E. W. Garrett (Mr. S. Everard with him) appeared for the appellants; Mr. Hugo Young and Mr. C. B. Marriott for the respondents.

Mr. GARRETT contended that no part of the premises should be rated. He referred to the case of "Reg. v. St. Martin's" (L.R., 2 Q.B., 493). It was clear that police offices were exempt. Was it possible to draw any distinction between residence by policemen and occupation for police purposes? "Reg. v. Stuart" (8 E. and B., 27, L.J., M.C., 81) showed that a wife and family might be included without the exemption being lost. He cited "Gambier v. Lydford" (3 E. and B., 346, 23 L.J., M.C., 69). There was a distinction drawn in some cases between a house within the walls and a house at some distance off. Here the residence was one with the police offices. He also cited "Martin v. West Derby Assessment Committee" (11 Q.B.D.) and "Reg. v. Lancashire JJ." (27 L.J., M.C., 209, E.B. and E.).

Mr. YOUNG, on the other side, contended that there was a distinction between the old cases and the present. For one thing the ownership had been transferred from the justices to the county council. Moreover, the Court of Appeal in 1896 had decided that in looking at a building used partly for Crown purposes and partly for administrative county cases the building might be split up according to the purposes for which each portion was used. He submitted that these buildings might be divided up for rating purposes. He cited "County Council of Middlesex v. Assessment Committee of St. George's Union" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 64) and "Worcestershire County Council v. Assessment Committee of St. Nicholas, Worcester" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 480). The question for the Court was whether this portion was occupied for Crown purposes exclusively ("Greig v. University of Edinburgh," L.R., 1 H.L., 348).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said it was clear that premises used exclusively for police purposes were exempt from rating. The question here was whether the occupation by the chief constable was an occupation exclusively for police purposes. The chief constable was required to live there so that he might be always at hand ready to discharge his duty. In the learned Judge's view the chief constable's residence there was exclusively for police purposes. Now, did it make any distinction that his wife and family lived with him? It would be an absurdity to say so. A wife and family might practically be considered as a necessary appendage. The learned Judge appreciated the point that the old decisions had ceased to be conclusive because there had been a change in the possession, and the principle of severing one building into portions had been laid down. Premises occupied by the justices and therefore exempt might not be exempt when occupied by the county council.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred.

THE QUEEN V. LYON AND OTHERS.*

Licensing Acts—Licence—Notice of intention to apply for—Validity—Application by secretary of a company.

This was an appeal by Mr. H. R. Carter from an order of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Darling) directing a writ of mandamus to issue to the licensing justices for the division of Lower Bramber, in the county of Sussex, commanding them to hear and determine an application by Thomas Skinner, the secretary to the Crawley and Horsham District Licensed Victuallers' Wholesale Supply Company (Limited), for a certificate to hold an excise licence to sell wines to be consumed off the premises at a shop, No. 15, East-street, Horsham. It appeared that at the general annual licensing meeting, held on August 28, 1897, Skinner applied for a certificate authorizing him to hold various excise licences, amongst others an excise licence to sell wine, in pursuance of the Act 23 Vict., c. 27, section 3, to be consumed off the premises at the shop in question. The application was opposed by Carter, and the justices refused it, there being a dispute as to the ground upon which the application was refused, it being stated by the present appellant that the justices refused the application upon the ground that Skinner was not a shopkeeper within section 3, which provides that "every person who shall keep a shop for the sale of any goods . . . shall . . . be entitled to take out a licence under this Act to sell by retail . . . in such shop foreign wine not to be consumed on the premises where sold." It appeared that the company were the owners of the shop, and carried on business as grocers there. The licensing meeting was adjourned to September 25, when Skinner again applied for a certificate authorizing him to hold an excise licence to sell wine to be consumed off the premises at the shop in question, on this occasion inserting in the notice of the application, after his signature, the words "Secretary for the Crawley and Horsham District Licensed Victuallers' Wholesale Supply Company (Limited)," and he produced an authority from the company to apply for the certificate. The justices again refused the application, the present appellant stating that the application was refused upon the ground that it was an application by Skinner for a licence to himself, and not to the company, the mere addition to his signature, stating that he was secretary of the company, not being sufficient to make it an application on behalf of the company. In a letter written by the clerk of the justices it was stated that the ground of the refusal was informality in the notices of intention to apply for the licence. The Divisional Court made the rule absolute for a mandamus as above, holding that the justices, as appeared from the letter written by their clerk, had not heard the application on its merits, but had decided it upon a preliminary point and had decided that point wrongly, and that therefore the justices must hear and determine the application. Carter appealed.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. BOWEN ROWLANDS, Q.C., and Mr. FOULKES GRIFFITHS, for the appellant, contended upon the affidavits that the justices had gone into the merits of the case, and had refused the application upon the ground that the notice of Skinner's intention to apply was given on behalf of himself, he not being qualified as a shopkeeper, and that the addition of the words after his signature, "Secretary for" the company, did not make it an application on behalf of the company. That was what the justices meant when they said that they had decided upon the ground of an informality in the notice. The mandamus was therefore wrongly issued.

Mr. BOXALL and Mr. W. W. GRANTHAM, for the respondent, contended that the application was in proper form and complied with all the requirements of section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869. It was not necessary that Skinner should describe himself as a shopkeeper in the application. He had properly applied for a licence for himself, as a company could not apply for or hold a licence. Further, by stating that he was secretary "for" the company he showed that he was applying on behalf of the company. They referred to "Reg. v. Justices of Over Darwen" (39 L.T., 444). The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that he had no doubt that the justices had declined jurisdiction upon a preliminary point—that is, upon an informality in the notice. They held that the notice was bad. The question therefore was whether this was a bad notice. He would only take the second notice. Was this notice so obviously bad that the justices could refuse to proceed further with the matter? The Crawley and Horsham District Licensed Victuallers' Wholesale Supply Company (Limited) were grocers and carried on business at the shop in question. They wanted a wine licence under section 3 of 23 Vict., c. 27. The limited company could not ask for a licence for themselves. They had a secretary named Skinner, and they sent him to make the application, and he gave the notice in question. In his opinion, the true construction of this notice might well be that Skinner on behalf of the company was applying for this wine licence. The justices decided that this notice was bad because Skinner was not a shopkeeper. He could not think that this notice necessarily led to the conclusion that Skinner would apply for the licence for himself. It might fairly mean that he was applying on behalf of the company. The notice, therefore, was not necessarily bad. The mandamus accordingly must issue. All the points might be raised before the justices. One point, which was taken here, was that the secretary of the company could not apply for the licence. His Lordship would not decide that point, but he thought that a secretary could apply for a licence on behalf of a limited company.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. In his opinion, this notice was sufficient. It was conceded that if it was stated in the body of the notice that Skinner was applying for the licence for and on behalf of the company the notice would be good. One must not scrutinize these notices as closely as one used to do the old forms of pleading. Skinner added to his signature "Secretary for" the company. The right conclusion was that Skinner there stated that he was applying on behalf of the limited company. It was conceded that the company could not hold the licence. His Lordship was not prepared to say that the company could not apply by Skinner, their duly authorized agent, the notice stating that he applied on their behalf. He did not decide that point, but left it open. The question also, if it should arise, whether Skinner did keep a shop within the meaning of section 3 of the Act, was also left open for the justices to deal with.

HIGH WYCOMBE CORPORATION V. THAMES CONSERVATORS.*

River—Thames Conservancy—Pollution of river —"Wilfully" suffer, meaning of—Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, sec. 92.

This was a case stated by the justices of the borough of Chipping Wycombe, otherwise High Wycombe, before whom the appellant corporation were charged, on information preferred at the instance of the respondents, for that they on December 7, 1897, did unlawfully wilfully suffer a large quantity of washing or other substance produced in the making or supplying of gas to flow or pass into the Wye stream, a tributary of the River Thames, in the borough of High Wycombe, contrary to section 92 of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894. The facts were substantially as follows:—The appellants, as the urban authority of their borough, have control of the sewage outfall works and of the sewage farm connected therewith. The sewage outfall works consist of two tanks, together capable of holding 34,250 gallons, and a sludge pit. The sewage passes into the tanks, in which the sludge is deposited, and from which the sludge is from time to time removed into the sludge pit. The sewage water passes from the tanks through pipes called "carriers" to and over some one or more of the several portions into which the sewage farm is divided, for the purposes of filtration and cultivation, which portions are called "lands." The sewage farm comprises 19 such lands, separated from each other by open channels. The water percolates through the earth of these lands and ultimately passes into the Wye stream.

*Reported by A. F. JENKIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There are 11 such "lands" on the north side and eight on the south side of the Wye stream. These "lands" are used for the purification of the sewage water by turns, several being so used at one time, while others which have been previously so used are allowed to rest. On the morning of December 7, 1897, a large quantity of an offensive liquid substance from the works of the High Wycombe Gas Company, which works are situated nearly one-and-a-half miles above the sewage works, was discharged into the sewers. The substance was highly offensive, and largely consisted of liquid ammonia. The offensive substance began to reach the tanks about 10 o'clock in the morning, and continued to flow until about noon, passing continuously out of the tanks into the "carriers," and thence into the soil or earth of the five "lands" used on the date in question, as is mentioned below, for arresting and purifying sewage matter. It was of rather less specific gravity than the bulk of the sewage, and tended to rise to the surface and to overspread the surface as a film. About half-past 10 the same morning the attention of the borough surveyor was called to a highly offensive smell proceeding from a manhole of the sewers in the High-street of the borough, and, in consequence thereof, he later in the morning visited the sewage farm, which is situate within the borough, but he did not reach the farm till about noon, nor did he give the foreman any instructions as to dealing with the offensive matter. About a quarter to 1 he went to see the manager of the gas company, but nothing was said as to the proper manner of disposing of the substance. On the same morning the foreman in charge of the sewage outfall works was on duty as usual, and gauged from time to time the sewage overflow. He noticed an unusually offensive smell from the sewage, and scattered disinfectants on the ground near the tanks, but made no change in the treatment of the sewage itself, or the outflow thereof from the tanks and through the "carriers" to and over such "lands" of the sewage farm as were then in use. On that morning five "lands" were in use for the purification of the sewage water. The lands were those used for the purifying ordinary sewage on the day in question, and there would have been no difficulty in passing the offensive matter over more "lands" than were used. This was the first time such an event had happened, and the foreman called the attention of the borough surveyor to it when he came down at noon, but took no steps to communicate with him or obtain his instructions previously, although the liquor had been coming down for two hours or thereabouts. Large quantities of dead earthworms were observed on the surface of the five "lands" in use on the morning of December 7 by the conservancy inspector when he visited the farm two days afterwards. Large quantities of the offensive substance also passed into the Wye stream. A large number of fish in the stream were killed by it. If the sewage water charged with such offensive substance had been distributed over a larger number of "lands" its offensive quality would have been mitigated. The chief inspector of the Thames Conservancy, who was called for the prosecution, stated that the foreman in charge of the sewage farm should, in the circumstances of the case, have consulted his superior officer, the borough surveyor. The borough surveyor and the foreman of the sewage works stated that no special precautions were taken to deal with the offensive matter, although each recognized its extremely offensive character. At the close of the case for the prosecution it was submitted by counsel for the appellants that no offence within the statute had been made out, but the justices decided that there was evidence of such offence, and called upon the appellants to proceed with their case. On behalf of the respondents, it was contended that the appellants had wilfully suffered the offensive substance to flow or pass into the Wye stream within the meaning of the above-named section. On behalf of the appellants, it was contended—(1) that the offensive substance had been unlawfully and wrongfully discharged into their sewers by other parties, and that the appellants were not liable under the Act for the consequence of such unlawful act of other parties; (2) that the foreman of the sewage outfall works and the borough surveyor had been taken by surprise; that, in dealing with the offensive matter, no precaution had been neglected which was reasonable or possible under the circumstances, which circumstances were of an unusual character; (3) that the word "wilfully" ought to be construed as wantonly or causelessly; and (4) that, in order to be brought within the section, there must have been some exercise of volition on the part of the appellants or the borough surveyor or the foreman of the sewage works; that no volition had, in fact, been exercised, the appellants' officers having been passive throughout the proceedings complained of, and the proceedings having been involuntary so far as concerned them. The justices convicted the appellants, and inflicted a fine of £2, and stated the present case, the question for the Court being "whether the appellants did, by reason of the facts proved, wilfully suffer a large quantity of washing or other substance produced in the making or supplying of gas to flow or pass into the Wye stream, a tributary of the River Thames, in the borough of High Wycombe, contrary to the provisions of section 92 of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894." It appeared from the statements of counsel that the gas company had been proceeded against under the Act by the respondents in respect of the occurrence in question; and that they had pleaded guilty and been fined. Section 92 of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, provides that "If any person without lawful excuse . . . wilfully causes or suffers any washing or other substance produced in making or supplying gas or any other offensive matter, whether solid or fluid, to flow or pass into the Thames or into any tributary . . . he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding £20, and to a daily penalty not exceeding £10."

Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. David appeared for the appellants; and Mr. J. Eldon Banks for the respondents.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said the case was anything but free from difficulty, and was very near the line. That the offensive matter was not wilfully sent into the stream by the appellants there could be no doubt. It was wilfully sent by the gas company, who had been properly convicted and fined. But for some reason the Conservancy had not been content with the conviction of the gas company, and had proceeded against the local authority for what was at best a mere error of judgment on the part of their officers. He should have thought the proceedings in any case unnecessary; but that was immaterial; the question was whether the offence charged against the local authority had been made out. Looking at the facts, however, he thought the respondents had failed to show that the appellants had "wilfully" suffered the deleterious matter to pass into the Thames or any tributary. What had happened was that unexpectedly the foreman in charge of the sewage farm at 10 in the morning found that the sewage was more offensive than usual. He did not know what caused it; he might have suspected the reason, but there was nothing to show that he knew. He at once applied disinfectants to mitigate the smell. At that time there were five "lands" in use for deodorizing and filtering the sewage water; and it had been found by experience that five "lands" in use at one time sufficed for the sewage of the town. The Court must assume that the foreman supposed that the five "lands" were sufficient to deodorize and filter the whole of the sewage on the day in question though it was more offensive than usual. It did not appear that the sewage was greater in quantity than usual; if it had appeared that the sewage was much increased in quantity there would have been more ground for contending that the foreman ought to have known that he must use more "lands." But, as the facts stood, there was nothing to show that the foreman ought to have known that more "lands" ought to have been brought into use. The magistrates had found that if the sewage water had been distributed over more "lands" its offensive quality would have been mitigated; therefore, all that would be suggested against the appellants was that they might have mitigated the evil. But in his Lordship's opinion it did not follow because the authority did not do what might have mitigated the offensive quality of the deleterious substance that they were guilty of wilfully suffering that substance to pass into the stream. Without questioning the authority of "Smith v. Barnham" (L.R., 1 Ex. D., 419), though he would not be disposed to go as far as Lord Justice Bramwell did in that case, his Lordship thought that to establish a "wilful" suffering more must be proved than one omission to do something which science showed might have mitigated the evil. The appeal therefore must be allowed with costs, and the conviction quashed.

BLENKINSOP V. OGDEN AND CO.*

Master and Servant—Neglect to fence dangerous machinery—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, sec. 82—Injury to servant.

This was a case stated by Horace Smith, Esq., a metropolitan police magistrate, on the hearing of an information and complaint preferred by the appellant, one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Factories, against the respondents, the occupiers of a factory, under section 82 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. That section provides that "if any person is killed or suffers any bodily injury in consequence of the occupier of a factory having neglected to fence any machinery required by or in pursuance of this Act to be securely fenced . . . the occupier of the factory . . . shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £100, the whole or any part of which may be applied for the benefit of the injured person or his family, or otherwise as a Secretary of State determines." The present proceedings were taken under the section in respect of an accident occurring to a boy named Wright, who was employed in the respondent's factory, and who, while working at a machine there, caught his hand in the wheels of the machine and lost a finger. The learned magistrate found that the machine in question was not securely fenced, but that the injury to the boy was caused by his own carelessness and wilful disobedience to orders, and that if he had done as he was told the accident would not have happened; and the learned magistrate was of opinion that as the injury was caused by the boy's own carelessness and wilful disobedience to orders the respondents were not liable under the section, and he dismissed the summons, subject to the present case.

MR. HENRY SUTTON appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., and Mr. Forman for the respondents. The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said he had no doubt that the learned magistrate was wrong and ought to have inflicted a fine. It had been argued that the section was only applicable where the injury was not due to negligence on the part of the person injured, but he would not adopt that construction. If there were a hole in a road and a boy playing in the road, carelessly it might be, fell into the hole and were killed the accident would be in consequence of the existence of the hole. Again, if a man out of his mind laid his head on a line of rails and was killed by a passing train the death would be in consequence of the passing of the train. So where injury resulted from a neglect to fence machinery the injury was a consequence of the neglect, though there might have been negligence on the part of the person injured. The object of the section was to punish persons who neglect to fence machinery where injury or death ensues, and there was no reason for adopting the narrow construction suggested.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered judgment to the same effect.

James of Hereford) April 25.

THE LONDON TRAMWAYS COMPANY (LIMITED) V. THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Practice—Appeal—House of Lords—Jurisdiction. It is an inflexible rule that the House of Lords will not review its own decisions.

Their Lordships met for the despatch of judicial business this morning for the first time since the Easter recess, for which they adjourned on April 1.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal, of which the ostensible purpose was to obtain the reversal of the decision of the Court of Appeal with respect to the basis upon which the undertaking of the appellants was to be acquired and paid for by the respondents. But the only question argued, and that upon which their Lordships gave their decision, was whether the House of Lords was bound by its former judgments in the cases of "Edinburgh Street Tramways Company v. Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh" and of "London Street Tramways Company v. the London County Council." These decisions were pronounced on July 30, 1894, and were reported in 10 The Times Law Reports, 625-630; [1894] A.C., 456; 63 L.J., Q.B., 769. On those occasions the House was constituted of Lord Herschell (then Lord Chancellor), Lord Watson, Lord Shand, and Lord Ashbourne. The latter dissented from the judgment of the majority.

SIR R. T. REID, Q.C., and Mr. SEWARD BRICE, Q.C. (Mr. J. R. Paget with them), whilst they contended that the present appeal was distinguishable from the others, urged that the House was not bound to follow such construction of the language of section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, as was adopted in the previous cases. In support of their argument they quoted a dictum of Lord Eldon in "Perry v. Whitehead" ([1801] 6 Vesey, 547), that a rule of law laid down by the House of Lords must remain until altered by the House of Lords, thereby implying that the House was not bound by its own decisions. In "Bright v. Hutton" ([1852] 3 H.L. Cas., 341-388), in "Wilson v. Wilson" ([1854] 5 H.L. Cas., 40; 23 L.J., Ch., 697), and in "Scott v. Maxwell" (1854) (1 Macq., 791), Lord St. Leonards claimed for the House the same inherent power of correcting an error into which it might have fallen which was enjoyed by other tribunals. But they admitted that in other cases which they cited a contrary view had been expressed by noble and learned lords. If the House should have interpreted a statute contrary to its real meaning, the right view was that the statute had by anticipation repealed the construction of the House, and the House might in a subsequent case correct its own error.

Mr. Freeman, Q.C., and the Hon. Alfred Lyttelton, for the respondents, were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal should be dismissed with costs, said their Lordships were much indebted to the learned counsel for the appellants for the candour with which they had argued the appeal. It had been admitted that there was upon this very question a decision of their Lordships' House. For his own part, he was prepared to adhere to the language held upon this question by Lord Campbell, and assented to by Lord Wensleydale, Lord Cranworth, Lord Chelmsford, and others, to the effect that a decision of that House once given upon a point of law was conclusive upon the House itself, and that it was impossible to raise such question again. There had been no real decision to the contrary of the practice which had now been settled for centuries. It was not competent to rehear and reargue a question which had already been decided. The only trace of authority in favour of the appellants were certain dicta of Lord St. Leonards, and he entertained some doubt whether that noble and learned lord was satisfied as to the logic of his own reasoning. It would be absurd to disregard the whole current of authority and to permit each litigant in turn to reargue a question already decided. He did not deny that cases of individual hardship might arise; there might be decisions contrary to abstract justice, but the evil in such a case was not comparable to the disastrous consequences which would arise in the dealings of mankind if settled questions were always open to review. There could be no finis litium if such a practice were permitted. It had been ingeniously argued that the House might have omitted to notice the existence or the repeal of a particular Act of Parliament. But that would be a pure question of fact and had no relation to the proposition that the same question of law might, after decision by the House of Lords, be reopened and reargued. The long-established principle, upon which their Lordships would do well to act, was that a decision of that House upon a question of law was conclusive, and that nothing but an Act of Parliament could set that right which it was alleged the House had decided wrongly.

The other noble and learned lords concurred, and the appeal was dismissed with costs.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. DONNELLAN.*

Railway—Charges—Siding rent—Arbitration of "differences"—London and North-Western Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891.

Decision of Divisional Court (ante p. 290) reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from an order of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Darling) reversing the decision of the Deputy County Court Judge at Crewe, reported ante, p. 290. The action was brought to recover siding rent. The defence was that the County Court had no jurisdiction, on the ground that under the London and North-Western Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., c. cxxi.), the jurisdiction was given to an arbitrator to be appointed by the Board of Trade. The County Court Judge held that he had no jurisdiction, and entered judgment for the defendant, thinking that the reasonableness of the charge should be determined by an arbitrator. He found that the defendant always refused to pay the siding rent claimed and in fact had never paid it, and that he had always told the company's servants that it was "exorbitant and unjust." It appeared that in January, 1895, the railway company had issued a circular to all their traders, including the defendant, stating that a charge would be made for the accommodation of trucks when standing on the company's sidings for more than four days. Evidence was given that a charge of 8d. a day per truck after four days had elapsed was made on all traders over the system of the London and North-Western Railway Company. The same charge was made by other railway companies. By section 5 of the schedule to the order scheduled to the above Act "the company may charge for the services hereunder mentioned:—when rendered to a trader at his request or for his convenience, a reasonable sum by way of addition to the tonnage rate. Any difference arising under this section shall be determined by an arbitrator to be appointed by the Board of Trade at the instance of either party. Provided that when, before any service is rendered to a trader, he has given notice in writing to the company that he does not require it, the service shall not be deemed to have been rendered at the trader's request or for his convenience." Among the services specified were—"(iv.) the detention of trucks or the use or occupation of any accommodation, before or after conveyance, beyond such periods as shall be reasonably necessary for enabling the company to deal with the merchandise as carriers thereof, or the consignee or consignee to give or take delivery thereof." In the present case the trucks, which belonged to the defendant, remained on the company's sidings for more than four days, and the company claimed 8d. a day per truck after the first four days. The Divisional Court held that the County Court Judge was wrong and gave judgment for the amount claimed.

Mr. T. W. CHITTY (Mr. Gilchrist Alexander with him), for the defendant, contended that the defendant having disputed the reasonableness of the amount of the charge, as the County Court Judge had found, a "difference" had arisen within the meaning of section 5, and the tribunal appointed to settle that difference was an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade. If the company rendered the service they could charge a reasonable sum for that service, and what was a reasonable sum was a matter for arbitration, each case depending upon its own facts. The decision of the Divisional Court was therefore wrong.

Mr. C. A. RUSSELL, Q.C., and Mr. J. NOBLE, for the plaintiffs, contended that there must be a difference as to the reasonableness of the amount of the sum charged so as to oust the jurisdiction of the Court. That was the only question for the arbitrator. The question as to the time when the charge was to commence was not a matter for arbitration any more than the question whether the company could make any charge at all. No difference had arisen in this case as to the amount charged. The County Court Judge had not found that there was such a difference. The defendant was disputing his liability to pay any charge at all, and that was not a difference to be determined by arbitration within the meaning of the section. The right of the company to make a charge did not depend upon this section; it existed independently of the section; and therefore there was no "difference" within the section. The claim of the company was not made under the section, and the defendant objected to the charge in toto. They referred to the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, section 24.

The COURT said that they would hear the next case before giving judgment.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY V. BILLINGTON (LIMITED).

This case raised the same question as the last. The County Court Judge at Chester had, however, found in this case that the defendants knew of the charges and accepted the services, though protesting against the charges, and made no complaint as to the reasonableness of the charges so as to enable the company to apply to the Board of Trade for the appointment of an arbitrator, nor did the defendants themselves apply for the appointment of an arbitrator, and that therefore the defendants must be taken to have agreed to the charges. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the Divisional Court affirmed his judgment.

Mr. T. W. Chitty and Mr. Gilchrist Alexander appeared for the defendants; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. W. J. Noble appeared for the plaintiffs. The COURT allowed both the appeals.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was what was the true construction of section 5 of the Provisional Order. The Provisional Order came into existence under section 24 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, which dealt with the revised classification of traffic and schedule of rates, and subsection 10 made the rates and charges, specified in a Provisional Order and confirmed by Act of Parliament, those which the company should be entitled to charge and make. Therefore the rates and charges which the company were entitled to charge and make were those specified in the Provisional Order now before the Court. In his opinion, as regards sections 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the order, the Legislature had enacted that differences arising thereunder should be settled by arbitration, and not taken into a Court of law. Decisions of the Divisional Court had been cited, where Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Wright seemed to think that the reasonableness of the amount of the charges was the only matter for arbitration. With great respect to those learned Judges he could not think so. Section 5 had a number of subsections, in each of which the words "services rendered to a trader at his request or for his convenience," which occurred in the first part of the section, must be considered as repeated. What was the true meaning of the words "any difference arising under this section"? The railway company asked them to read in the words "as to the reasonableness of the amount of the charges." Those words were not in the section. The words, in his opinion, included all matters which arose under the section and which were in dispute between the parties. Take subsection (i.), which dealt with services rendered by the company at or in connexion with sidings not belonging to the company. The arbitrator must first find out whether the sidings belonged to the company or not before he could find out whether the charge was reasonable. So as to subsection (ii.), which dealt with the collection or delivery of merchandise outside the terminal station, the arbitrator must first find out whether the services rendered were outside the terminal station or not. It was said that these questions must first be decided by a Court of law, and then the arbitrator must be called in to decide whether the amount of the charge was reasonable. He could not adopt that view. So as to subsection (iv.), in finding out what was a reasonable charge for the services there specified, the arbitrator must ascertain what was the period reasonably necessary for enabling the company to deal with the merchandise as carriers thereof, or the consignor or consignee to give or take delivery thereof. The arbitrator who was called in to settle the dispute must settle the whole dispute. The same observation applied to sections 6, 7, and 8, which were part of the same group of sections. For those reasons, looking at those sections, in his opinion the arbitrator must settle the whole matter, and not merely fix the amount of the charge, leaving the rest to a Court of law. That being, in his opinion, the true construction of the statute, the facts in the first case showed that the defendant objected to the charge in toto, saying that it was exorbitant and unjust. The defendant thought that four days for unloading the trucks were not enough, and he refused to pay. That constituted a dispute under section 5, subsection (iv.), as regards the detention of the trucks. Therefore the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the dispute. The same reasons applied also to the second case. The defendants refused to pay the charges, and the section said that the arbitrator was the proper tribunal to determine that dispute. It was no more the duty of the trader to invoke the assistance of the arbitrator than it was the duty of the railway company. In his opinion judgment must be entered for the defendants in each case.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. There was no such limit to the words in section 5 "any difference arising under this section" as was suggested on behalf of the company. They were not limited to the reasonableness of the amount of the charge. The words included all that was material with reference to the various subsections which followed. All matters which were material to the decision of the difference arising under the section, whatever that difference might be, were for the arbitrator. The company contended that the matters should be split up, some going before a Court of law and some before an arbitrator. In his opinion the Legislature had said that this was a class of case which had better be determined by a skilled arbitrator than by a Court of law, and it never intended that the matters should be split up.

occupier is the person liable to proceedings for non-repair.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the decision of the County Court Judge of Sussex sitting at Worthing. The action was brought under section 25 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1894, which provides that "where a highway repairable ratione tenuræ appears on the report of a competent surveyor not to be in proper repair, and the person liable to repair the same fails, when requested so to do by the district council, to place it in proper repair, the district council may place the highway in proper repair and recover from the person liable to repair the highway the necessary expenses of so doing," to recover the cost of repairs executed by the plaintiff council to two foot-bridges, which it was alleged the defendant was liable to repair ratione tenuræ, as owner of two farms. The learned County Court Judge held that a liability to repair the foot-bridges attached to the farms in question, and he further held that under section 25 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1894, proceedings might be taken against the owner of lands to which such an obligation attached, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed.

Mr. R. E. MOORE appeared for the defendant and contended that proceedings under the enactment in question could only be taken against the occupier of the lands subject to the liability; and he cited "Reg. v. Barker" (L.R., 25 Q.B.D., 213), "Baker v. Greenhill" (3 Q.B., 148).

Mr. DICKENS, Q.C., and Mr. BOXALL, on behalf of the plaintiffs, argued that although an indictment for non-repair can only be preferred against the occupier, still the ultimate liability is upon the owner, who is liable to reimburse the occupier the expenses incurred in repairing the way. They pointed out that in "Baker v. Greenhill" Lord Denman spoke of the owner as the person who "ought to have repaired." They also cited "Reg. v. Bucknell" (7 Mod., 55).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said he failed to understand the argument for the respondents, and felt no doubt on the matter. At the passing of the Local Government Act, 1894, it was well established law that the occupier of land subject to a ratione tenuræ liability for the repair of highways is the only person who can be made to perform the obligation. As Lord Coleridge said in "Reg. v. Barker" (L.R., 25 Q.B.D., 213), that proposition had been established from the time of Rolle's Abridgment, where (p. 783, Tit. Chimin, B. 2) it is laid down both in the positive and negative that you must indict the occupier and cannot indict the owner. The passage in Rolle's Abridgment did not in terms refer to highways repairable ratione tenuræ, but in subsequent cases it had been pointed out that it was intended to refer to such highways. There was therefore old authority for the proposition that the occupier is the only person against whom the liability can be enforced. As between the owner and the occupier the occupier no doubt had a right to be reimbursed; but that was a matter as between them with which the public had no concern. It was suggested, on the strength of the chance expression in "Baker v. Greenhill" (3 Q.B., 148), "the owner who ought to have repaired," that there was, what all the authorities had repudiated, a liability on the owner's part to repair, as distinguished from a liability to reimburse the occupier the expenses incurred by him in repairing. But his Lordship could not accept that suggestion. Then section 25 (2) of the Act of 1894 simply provided a new and less umbrous means of getting repairs done and paid for. And it was impossible to suppose, on the strength of the one casual expression which had been referred to, and in opposition to a long chain of authorities, that when the Act spoke of "the person liable to repair" it was intended to create a new liability and give a remedy against a new person. That would be a most forced and strained construction. There was, so far as his Lordship could see, no intention to bring in a new person, but the only object was to give a simpler remedy. It was therefore quite clear that the proceedings were misconceived, and the appeal must be allowed.

Divorce—Practice—Costs against co-respondent—Discretion.

There is no general rule as to condemning a co-respondent in costs. The Court will consider each case on its merits.

This was the petition of Arthur William Robinson for the dissolution of his marriage with Caroline Robinson by reason of her adultery with William Alfred Wilson. The case was heard by his Lordship on April 20 last and a decree nisi was pronounced, but his Lordship reserved the question of giving costs against the co-respondent, as it appeared from the evidence that at the time the misconduct commenced the co-respondent was not aware that the respondent was a married woman. After he did know, however, he continued to live with her.

MR. HEBER JONES, for the petitioner, now applied to his Lordship to condemn the co-respondent in costs. Most of the cases no doubt went to show that where the co-respondent at the time the misconduct commenced was unaware that the respondent was a married woman the Court would not condemn him in costs. The President had so held in "Newby v. Newby and White" (The Times, March 2, 1897, and 77 L.T., 142). In that case the cases of "Priske v. Priske and Goldby" (29 L.J., P. and M., 195) and "Whitlock v. Whitlock and Zaccarti" (The Times, Aug. 13, 1895) were followed and approved. The learned counsel also referred to "Mayne on Damages," and submitted that actions for damages in divorce were by statute substituted for the old action for crim. con. He also cited "Teagle v. Teagle and Nottingham" (27 L.J., P. and M., 55), "Norris v. Norris, Lawson, and Mason" (4 Sw. and Tr., 237), and "Whitmore v. Whitmore and Brettell" (L.R., 1 P. and D., 25). In the present case on July 24 the petitioner had informed the co-respondent that he was living with his (petitioner's) wife, but in spite of that warning on July 26 they were still living together and had continued to do so down to as recent a period as February of this year. She had in December last given birth to a child, and but for the co-respondent's conduct the husband might possibly have forgiven her.

MR. JUSTICE BARNES.—That is hardly probable under the circumstances. The respondent had left her husband the previous year and the child could not well be his. It appears to me that this question of costs is one of discretion, and in that view I am supported by the fact that there are cases each way. There is no uniform practice. His Lordship referred to a decision of the late Sir Charles Butt in "Learmonth v. Learmonth and Austin" (62 L.T., P. and M., 608), and said that there could be no general rule. Each case must be considered on its merits, as there must be extreme cases each way. In the present case he should make no order as to costs.

EHRMANN AND SONS V. FRANK BARTHOLOMEW.*
Contract—Personal service—Negative covenant —Breach.

Application for an injunction to enforce negative stipulation refused.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, who were a firm of London wine merchants, for an injunction to restrain the defendant from engaging or employing himself in any other business than that of the plaintiffs' firm, and from acting as a traveller for Messrs. Marzell and Co., another firm of London wine merchants, and from soliciting orders for them during the term of ten years from August, 1897, mentioned in an agreement of that date. It appeared that by the agreement in question the defendant was engaged by the plaintiffs as a traveller for a term of ten years, determinable on notice by the plaintiffs, and covenanted to devote the whole of his attention and time during usual business hours to the business of the firm, and not to directly or indirectly engage or employ himself in any other business, or transact any business with any other person or persons than the firm during the continuance of the agreement. The defendant had left the plaintiffs' employ and was stated to have entered that of Messrs. Marzell and Co. The question arose as to the validity of the restrictive covenant.

Mr. H. E. Wright appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Buckmaster for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER.—The serious question arises whether the Court ought to enforce such a negative stipulation as is contained in this covenant. It would in terms prevent the defendant, at any rate during the usual business hours, from employing himself in any business other than that of the plaintiffs' and from transacting any business with or for any person or persons other than the plaintiffs. And this for a period of ten years from August 30, 1897, or for so much of that period as the plaintiffs choose. And it is clear that in this clause the word "business" cannot be held limited by the context to a wine merchant's business, or in any similar way. So that the Court, while unable to order the defendant to work for the plaintiffs, is asked indirectly to make him do so by otherwise compelling him to abstain wholly from business, at any rate during all usual business hours. In my opinion, such a stipulation is unreasonable, and ought not to be enforced by the Court. As the present Master of the Rolls stated in "Whitwood Chemical Company v. Hardman" (7 The Times L.R., 325; L.R. [1891], 2 Ch., 416), cases where negative stipulations in contracts of service are enforced by the Court ought not to be extended and are to be regarded as anomalies which it would be very dangerous to extend. To enforce such a general negative stipulation as I find here would be, in my opinion, a dangerous extension, for here the stipulation extends to business of any kind, while the negative stipulations enforced in the prior cases, such as "Lumley v. Wagner" (1 D.M. and G., 604), were confined to special services. For these reasons, I refuse the motion, but, looking at the conduct of the defendant, I do so without costs. Of course, by this order the plaintiffs will in no wise be prevented from enforcing another clause of the agreement, which prohibits the defendant after the termination of his employment from supplying or soliciting the plaintiffs' customers.

HARROLD V. WATNEY.*

Negligence—Personal injuries—Defective fence—
Trespasser—Contributory negligence.

This was an action for personal injuries incurred by the defendant's negligence. The defendant denied negligence and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

Mr. Watson Moyes, Mr. Chamier, and Mr. W. L. L. Bell appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. David for the defendant.

The action was tried on Monday, April 25. The plaintiff was a boy aged four years. The defendant was the owner of a piece of waste land in South-street, Wandsworth, separated from the highway by a wooden fence also belonging to the defendant. The plaintiff alleged that, as he was passing along the street upon June 27, 1897, a part of this fence fell upon him and inflicted the injuries complained of. The defendant contended that the plaintiff was climbing the fence and pulled it down upon himself. The plaintiff was too young to give evidence, but two witnesses for the defence (the only persons called who saw the accident happen) said that the plaintiff "had put one foot on the fence and was going to put the other on" when it fell. As to the condition of the fence there was a conflict of evidence.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in summing up, said that the conduct of the plaintiff, even according to the defendant's story, could not be considered negligence in so young a child. But if the jury believed that plaintiff was climbing the fence he was a trespasser and could not recover. There was no duty upon defendant to supply a fence which might be climbed with safety.

After an absence of upwards of two hours the jury returned with the following verdict:—"We find that the fence was very defective, but actually fell through the child standing wholly or partly on the fence not for the purpose of climbing over. If the plaintiff is entitled to recover, we assess the damages at £45."

Upon this verdict both parties asked for judgment, and MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY adjourned the case for further argument.

MR. MOYES, on behalf of the plaintiff, asked for judgment. It was the duty of any one whose property abutted on the highway to keep it in a safe condition. The defendant knew that children frequented this neighbourhood and ought to have contemplated the natural actions of children. In this case the child was not climbing the fence, which might have disentitled him to recover, but had merely put his foot upon it. The learned counsel quoted "Ponting v. Noakes" ([1894] 2 Q.B., 281); "Lynch v. Nurdin" (10 L.J., Q.B., 73); "Jewson v. Gatti" (2 The Times Law Reports, p. 381, and on appeal at p. 441); "Lay v. Midland Railway Company" (84

L.T., N.S., 80); "Barnes v. Ward" (19 L.J., C.P., 193); and "Clark v. Chambers" (3 Q.B.D., 327).

Mr. DAVID, for the defence, urged that "Jewson v. Gatti" was a case of abnormal user of the highway. In such a case a duty was cast upon the defendant to protect the public from the consequences of such user. Also that was a case of a trap, or at any rate an invitation. Here the child had no business to touch the fence and was a mere trespasser, who could not recover. "Abbott v. Macfie" (33 L.J., Ex. 177); "Mangan v. Atterton" (L.R., 1 Ex., 239).

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in giving judgment, said,—I think that the cases that have been quoted are all very near the line. But this case seems to me to be on the defendant's side of the border. When it appears that the accident was brought about by the plaintiff's wrongdoing he cannot recover. If there had been anything of the nature of an invitation, or even if the plaintiff's touching the fence had been accidental, the defendant would have been liable. But here the trespass was deliberate, as much as if the boy had climbed the fence. Some of the cases which have been quoted concern things dangerous in themselves. But that is not the case here. I think this comes into the same class as "Abbott v. Macfie." There was no invitation on defendant's part, and no trap. The child could have passed safely if he had not chosen to get upon the fence. Judgment for the defendant, stay of execution pending appeal.

CHAPLIN V. PUTTICK AND SIMPSON—LAING, CLAIMANT.*

Practice—Evidence—Commission—Sending article abroad for identification—"Leader v. Smyth" (8 The Times L.R., 612) over-ruled.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Justice Grantham. The action was brought by the plaintiff, Chaplin, against the defendants, Puttick and Simpson, who were auctioneers, to recover possession of a stamp album, which had been placed in the custody of the defendants for sale. The plaintiff alleged that the album was worth £1,000 and had been stolen from him at Johannesburg. The claimant, Laing, alleged that the album was his property, and that he had bought it for £170. The defendants interpleaded, and an interpleader issue was directed to be tried. The plaintiff, having obtained an order for a commission to be sent out for the examination of certain witnesses on his behalf at Johannesburg, made a further application and obtained the order which was now appealed against—viz., an order that the stamp album should be sent out by post to the British Consul at Johannesburg for the purpose of being shown to the witnesses when they were examined.

Mr. G. BLACKWELL appeared for the claimant in support of the appeal, and contended that the Court had no jurisdiction to order the property in dispute in an action to be sent abroad. He cited the case of "Leader v. Smyth" (8 The Times Law Reports, 612), an action of slander, in which the plaintiff complained that the defendant had accused her of stealing a brooch. There the Court refused to order the brooch to be sent abroad to be identified on commission.

Mr. Hansell appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Colam for the defendants.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, the learned Judge had jurisdiction to make this order, and the order itself was a just one. The Court had power to make such an order either under Order 37, rule 5, or Order 50, rule 3. The former rule allowed the Court, in any cause or matter where it should appear necessary for the purposes of justice, to make any order for the examination upon oath before the Court or Judge, or any officer of the Court, or any other person, and at any place, of any witness or person. And the latter rule gave the power of making any order for the inspection of any property or thing being the subject of the cause or matter. As to the case of "Leader v. Smyth," it was impossible to read it without seeing that Mr. Justice Mathew, if he had followed his own opinion, would have held that the Court had jurisdiction to make the order which was asked for. He was prepared to overrule that case and say it was wrongly decided.

ATTENBOROUGH V. JAY.*

Trade Name—Similarity of name of trader—Injunction refused.

This was a trade-name action of a novel character. The plaintiffs were six persons named Attenborough, who were all stated to have some relationship with one Robert Attenborough who came to London about a century ago and established a pawnbroking business. The plaintiffs have among them nine establishments in London, where they severally carry on the businesses of silversmiths, jewellers, and pawnbrokers. They are not connected in business, except that they severally trade under names the principal feature of which is Attenborough. It was stated that except the establishments of the defendants, and one business carried on under a style containing the phrase "late Attenborough" and another carried on under a style containing the phrase "successor to Attenborough," there is no similar business carried on in London under a style of which the name "Attenborough" is part. The defendants have two shops, Nos. 142 and 144, Oxford-street, communicating with one another. No. 144 is apparently a silversmith's shop, with the word "Jay's" on the fascia. No. 142 has, and for many years has had, the name "Attenborough" on the fascia. Adam and Eve-court is by the side of the premises, and up the court are two entrances to the premises, one admitting to an ordinary pawnshop, where pledges for sums not exceeding £10, and therefore within the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, are taken; the other entrance admits to an office, where pledges of larger amount, outside the Act, are taken. This latter business is known as contract business in the trade. The door of the contract office has for years borne the name Attenborough, but over the pawnbroking door, in accordance with statute, the name of the actual licensee, till recently "James Jay," has been placed. Some 40 years ago one Richard Attenborough established a business of silversmith, jeweller, and pawnbroker at what is now 142, Oxford-street. He died in the latter part of 1886. In April, 1887, the late James Jay bought at auction the remainder of the lease of the premises, which had been put up for sale by the executors of Richard Attenborough, and, under options given to the purchaser of the lease as a condition of the sale, James Jay also bought the pledge contracts of the testator and the stock-in-trade on the premises. He carried on a business similar to the business of Richard Attenborough down to his own death in 1896, with the addition that he took the adjoining shop, No. 144, in 1891. He bequeathed the benefit of his shops and business to five persons. These persons associated with themselves two other persons, intended to act as managers, and took steps to form themselves into a limited company under the name, as finally determined, of "Jay, Richard Attenborough, and Co. (Limited)." The plaintiffs brought this action against the seven signatories to the memorandum of association. They claimed, inter alia, an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding with registration of a company under the name "Jay, Richard Attenborough, and Co. (Limited)" or any other name of which "Attenborough" formed part.

Mr. H. Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. Carver (Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., with them) were for the plaintiffs: Mr. Everitt, Q.C., and Mr. T. Douglas for the defendants.

Mr. H. TERRELL, Q.C., in reply, asked only for an injunction to prevent carrying on the business of pawn-broking proper—that was to say, relating to pledges within the Pawnbrokers Act. The evidence, he argued, showed that there had been no acquiescence in the carrying on by the defendants of a business of this character under the name of Attenborough, and, in fact, this part of the defendants' business had never been carried on in the name of Attenborough.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH, having stated the facts of the case, said he did not see what ground there was for interfering by injunction. It was conceded that an injunction could only be granted in respect of the pawn-broking business under the Act. As far as that was concerned, a company could not carry on the business in their own name. If they desired to advance sums under £10 on pledge they must conform to the Act. A licence would have to be taken out in the Christian and surname or names of some one, whose name would have to be used on the premises. He did not see how either a Christian or surname of a company could be put on a licence. He was told that as matter of practice, in the case of a limited company, licences were taken out in the names of directors and the pledge tickets filled up with their names. He did not see, therefore, how the company, when registered, could carry on that part of the business in the name of Attenborough. There was a further difficulty in the plaintiffs' way. He did not see how these plaintiffs, who were in no way connected in business, could combine to get the relief they asked for.

THE HOME MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED) v. SMITH.*

Insurance—Marine—Underwriter's slip—Stamp Acts—Stamp Act, 1891, secs. 91 and 93.

The underwriter's slip issued at Lloyd's cannot be stamped and sued upon as a policy of insurance.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of £350 16s. 5d. under a contract of reinsurance underwritten by the defendant and other Lloyd's underwriters, dated July 26, 1896. The plaintiffs' case was that the defendant agreed to reinsure the plaintiffs to the extent of the excesses over certain amounts upon risks which the plaintiffs had then taken, or might take, on goods by vessels of certain named steamship lines. In June, 1896, goods insured by the plaintiffs per the Golden Fleece, a steamship belonging to one of the named lines, were totally lost, and the plaintiffs paid a total loss in respect of them to the amount of £5,008 4s. 5d. The excess which fell upon the reinsurance contract was £3,808 4s. 5d., of which the defendant's proportion was £350 16s. 5d., the sum claimed in the action. The plaintiffs claimed in the alternative a declaration that under the contract above-mentioned they were entitled to have issued to them by the defendant a duly subscribed policy in respect of the lost goods and to recover under such policy when issued. The defendant contended that the plaintiffs had by their conduct repudiated and terminated the contract of reinsurance, and, further, that there was no contract of reinsurance expressed in a policy sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the 54 and 55 Vict., c. 39, section 93 (the Stamp Act, 1891). The contract sued upon was expressed in words, initial letters, and figures, the signification of which was as follows:—"Open cover. 30-6-97. Dawson Brothers (the plaintiffs' brokers). Cash. Steamer or steamers and steamers. United Kingdom or Continent and (or) America. Reinsurance. Rates as per endorsement." Then followed the amounts taken by each underwriter, and initialled by them. "F.G.A. and York-Antwerp rules. Detention clause. Old or new bill of lading, including all risks from warehouse lighterage and until delivered at destination. Negligence clause. £4,000" (i.e., the limit of the excess taken on any ship). On the back there was a list of the steamship lines on which excesses on goods were insured and the amount of the line reserved by the plaintiffs and the rate of premium in each case. By an order made in Chambers by Mr. Justice Bigham it was directed that the question raised in the defence on the Stamp Acts should be determined before the trial of the action. This question came on for decision yesterday.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Seratton for the defendant.

MR. CARVER and Mr. J. A. HAMILTON contended that either the cover note was a policy of sea insurance within the meaning of the Stamp Act and could be stamped on payment of the proper penalty, or that it was a contract outside the provisions of the statute, and did not require any stamp at all, and was enforceable as a contract to issue a policy.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., contended that the contract did not meet the requirements of the Stamp Act, 1891, the sum insured not being mentioned. The cover only provided the amount which should be taken by the reinsurers in each particular case. It did not provide what the total amount of insurance taken by them should be, and, inasmuch as the stamp duty was payable at so much per cent. on the amount of the insurance, it was impossible to say what the duty on this contract would be.

is referred to in the 55th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862) shall not be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy of sea insurance. (3) A policy of sea insurance shall not be valid unless it specifies the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured, and is made for a period not exceeding 12 months.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment this morning, said that this was a case of importance, and raised for the first time in a Court of law the question whether, under recent changes in the Stamp Acts, the "slip" issued at Lloyd's could be stamped and sued upon as a policy of insurance. (His Lordship then stated the facts, read the cover note or slip, and continued.) There was no question that by the course of business it was the duty of the plaintiffs to declare upon a contract of this kind any excess coming forward by a particular vessel, to provide for the payment of premium and stamps and to obtain a policy signed by the reinsurers. The defendant alleged that that course of business had not been followed by the plaintiffs, that they had failed to make declarations for a long time until the loss in question had occurred, that he and his fellow-underwriters had thereby failed to receive premiums which they ought to have had, and for that reason they had taken the course, which he (the learned Judge) regarded as regrettable, of insisting on a stamp objection. The question now to be determined was whether that objection was well founded and afforded a good answer to the action. It seemed to the learned Judge that the key to the interpretation of the Stamp Acts on this subject was contained in the old statute of 35 Geo. III., c. 63, section 11, which provided that any contract or agreement of insurance in respect of which a duty was by the Act made payable should be "engrossed, printed, or written, and should be deemed or called a policy of insurance," and should specify the rate of premium, the particular risk, the names of the underwriters, and the sums insured. That statute was followed by others in pari materia. At one time it was thought that provisions might be made for stamping a slip, and an Act was passed for that purpose, but it was contrary to the ordinary course of business and the practice of underwriters, and it came to nothing. The Act of 30 and 31 Vict., c. 23, repealed the former Stamp Acts. That Act had been the subject of considerable litigation. Before it came into force it was thought that the slip could not be looked at for any purpose, and great injustice was done in consequence. It was now clear that the slip could be looked at for collateral purposes, and it was equally clear that the slip was not a policy of insurance (see section 7). It was a contract of sea insurance, but was not binding at law, because it was not expressed in a policy. (See "Cory v. Patton," "Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Company," and "Fisher v. Liverpool Marine Insurance Company," ubi sup.) The Act of 39 Vict., c. 6, for the first time enabled a policy of marine insurance to be stamped after execution on payment of a penalty of £100. It did not provide that a slip might be stamped, and there was no indication of any such intention. The Act now in force was the Stamp Act of 1891. (His Lordship read the sections set out above.) That statute once more stated that an enforceable contract of sea insurance must be contained in a policy. It was perfectly clear that this cover note was not a policy; it was not within the language of any of the statutes to which he had referred. If it were a policy, then every party to it would be liable to the penalties imposed by section 97 of the Act of 1891. Neither was it a contract to issue a policy. It was a contract of insurance binding in honour only. There must be judgment for the defendant, but without costs.

REG. V. COTHAM AND ANOTHER, JUSTICES, AND WEBB—EX PARTE SAME.*

Licensing Acts—Licence—Transfer—Validity—
Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61), sec. 4—
Mandamus granted.

This was the argument on the rules for two writs of certiorari and a writ of mandamus to licensing justices for the Prescott Division of Lancashire in respect of a transfer of a licence.

Mr. AVORY and Mr. R. M. Montgomery appeared for the applicant; Mr. MATTINSON, Q.C., and Mr. Thomas Swift for the respondent. The justices were not represented.

The facts were rather peculiar. At Prescott, on December 21, the licensing justices transferred to John Webb the licence granted on August 25 to Joseph Wallace, authorizing Joseph Wallace to apply for and hold an Excise licence to sell by retail at a house situate at Church-street, Farnworth, Widnes, beer to be consumed either on or off the premises. It appeared that the premises in question had been used as a draper's shop, and for a period of 13 years no beer, cider, or other intoxicating liquor had been sold upon them. For ten years Joseph Wallace had not resided in them, though he had yearly obtained a certificate from the justices to hold a licence in respect of these premises. The last of these was taken out on August 25. Mr. Webb did not at the date of the application reside on the premises. In these circumstances the transfer by the justices was said to be illegal. The one rule for a certiorari was to quash the grant of the licence on August 25, the other to quash the transfer in December, and the mandamus was to call on the justices to hear and determine according to law the transfer in December, it being alleged that the justices had no jurisdiction to grant such a transfer.

Mr. MATTINSON, who showed cause against the rule, admitted that Wallace was not the resident occupier. He contended that a certiorari did not lie, and that the applicant was not a person aggrieved. The only ground given for a mandamus was that the justices had decided wrongly. That was not a ground for a mandamus. The justices had heard and determined the case. If the licence was null and void the licensee could be proceeded against for selling without a licence. The case for the applicant was that the licence granted to Wallace was null and void, because under 3 and 4 Vic., c. 61, the licensee must be the real resident holder and occupier of the premises. Neither Wallace nor Webb could be considered the real resident holder or occupier here. If the original grant was invalid the subsequent transfer must be null and void. As to the transfer, the material section was section 4 of the Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61). Wallace was not a person within that section so as to justify a transfer from him. These cases were cited:—"Reg. v. King" (20 Q.B.D., 430), "Reg. v. Sharnan" (14 The Times Law Reports, 269), "Reg. v. Bowman" (14 The Times Law Reports, 303), and "Reg. v. Justices of London" (1895, 1 Q.B.).

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said it was clear that the justices had given a decision which was unsupported by any Act of Parliament or any other authority. There had been an application for a transfer of the certificate, which by the operation of the several statutes depended on section 4 of the Act of 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61). That section provided that it should be lawful to the justices to license such persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns as they . . . should deem fit. In the present case there was a person intending to keep an inn on premises which for ten or 12 years before the application had been licensed in the name of Wallace. But those premises had not been "theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns." Wallace had obtained the licence from the justices for the house, but somebody else had dwelt in it and used it as a draper's shop. That essential part of the section had not, therefore, been complied with. But beyond that Wallace was not "about to remove from such inn." He had not resided there for many years. The justices had acted without jurisdiction. In such a case he would have been inclined to think that a certiorari might be granted, but there had been a decision in the Divisional Court that a certiorari was not the proper remedy. This Court was bound to conform to that decision. The certiorari must therefore be discharged, but without costs. Was it then a case for a mandamus? There was a distinction between an erroneous decision of justices and a failure to hear and determine. The line was often very thin, and cases near the line on each side were to be found. The leading principle was this—that if the justices had confined themselves to the sections and the points properly to be considered in relation thereto it did not matter how erroneously they determined, for no mandamus would issue to review their decision; but certainly when it appeared by direct evidence that they had taken into consideration matters wholly outside their jurisdiction, wholly outside what they should properly consider, the mandamus would go. Take the recent case (reported ante, p. 303) where the justices put up licences practically to auction. In that case a mandamus was held to lie because they had taken into consideration matters entirely foreign to the points properly left to them. Such a thing in the present case was not directly stated in the affidavits. But if the fact was demonstrated by what had taken place the result was the same. Here the justices had granted a licence to a person intending to keep an inn, but not one belonging to a person "theretofore keeping it." The justices must therefore have entered upon some extraneous considerations. There was no question of misconstruction of a statute. No possible construction could make Wallace a person who had theretofore kept the premises as an inn and was about to remove from such inn. The justices could not be said to have confined their attention to those matters only which by law they ought to have considered. The rule for a mandamus must be made absolute.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred on similar grounds. It appeared on the face of the grant of transfer that it purported to be granted in pursuance of the Intoxicating Liquor Licensing Act, 1828, and the Acts amending the same, and it granted to John Webb "the licence now held by Joseph Wallace, a beerhouse keeper." It was clear that Wallace did not come within that section. Under section 4 of the Act of 1828 the grant of the licence was to be regulated "in the manner hereinafter directed." One was therefore referred to the provisions of section 14 of the same Act. That section was the complement and explanation of the fourth. Section 14 gave the cases in which a grant might be made. It provided, amongst others, if any person duly licensed shall "remove from or yield up the possession of the house." Wallace could not be said to have removed from or yielded up possession of the house. It was quite inexplicable on what grounds the justices had granted the transfer. What then was the remedy? Really the justices had acted in a case in which they had no jurisdiction. A certiorari had been held not to be applicable. As to a mandamus, it was apparent from the cases that the Courts had been rather more liberal in granting such writs in licensing cases than in several others. The learned Judge was of opinion that the justices had come within the remedial powers of the Court. They had not heard and determined according to law. The rule for the certiorari would be discharged; that for the mandamus would be made absolute.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS added that he concurred with Mr. Justice Kennedy's remarks on section 14.

FASMORE AND OTHERS V. OSWALD TWISTLE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Sewers—Breach of statutory duty by local authority—Remedy for default.

An action for a mandamus is not maintainable against a local authority for breach of statutory duty to make sewers under section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, there being a remedy provided by sec. 299 of the Act.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal reported 13 The Times L.R., 116, 297; [1897] 1 Q.B., 384, 625; 66 L.J., Q.B., 106, 392. The action was for a mandamus commanding the defendants (respondents in the present appeal) to cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875, and to give facilities for enabling the plaintiffs to carry the liquid proceeding from his factories or manufacturing processes into the sewers under their control. The action was begun by Philip Cadell Peebles (since deceased), who owned and carried on the business of paper making at a factory called the Whiteash Paper Mill, and before it was instituted Mr. Peebles requested the defendants, and the defendants refused, to provide sewers for the reception of the liquids from the paper mill. The claim was based on the Public Health Act, 1875, sections 15 and 21 of which impose on a local authority the duty of providing a proper sewage system. The respondents, however, contended that such obligation was not one towards the appellants or any individual occupier, but for the benefit and purposes of the whole district. They also relied upon section 299 of the Act, which prescribes, as the remedy in such a case, complaint to the Local Government Board. That section enacts that when such complaint is made the Local Government Board, if satisfied after due inquiry that the local authority has been guilty of default, shall make an order limiting a time for the performance of the duty so neglected. That remedy, the respondents urged, was the only and exclusive one in case of any default by the respondents. The case was heard by Mr. Justice Charles on November 11, 1896, and by arrangement the question of law was argued before any evidence was gone into. The learned Judge granted the mandamus, but on March 18, 1897, the Court of Appeal [the Master of the Rolls (Lord Esher), Lord Justice Lopes, and Lord Justice Chitty] reversed that decision and dismissed the action with costs.

* Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. C. A. Bussell, Q.C., were for the appellants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said there was nothing in the Public Health Act which would justify the issue of a mandamus. The whole purview of the Act made impossible the application of such a remedy. The principle upon which the question arose was that a specific remedy was provided of a kind which was very familiar to our law, and the principle was accurately expressed in the "Bishop of Rochester's case" (1 B. and A.). The principle was that performance of a statutory obligation could not be enforced in any other manner than that prescribed by the statute. The obligation was created by this statute, and it was nothing to the purpose to say that there were other statutes creating similar obligations which might be enforced otherwise. It would be exceedingly inconvenient if the jurisdiction placed by the Act in a Government department which is enabled to call upon a district to reform its whole system of sewage and drainage could be taken out of the hands of that department by a private person. He entirely concurred in the judgment of the Court of Appeal and thought the case should be decided according to the familiar principle of law to which he had referred. There was another point dealt with by Mr. Danckwerts to which he would briefly advert, though he should be sorry to rest his judgment upon it. The insufficiency of drainage in this case only extended to a particular manufactory. It was, therefore, within the exact words of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, section 7 of which provided for the grant of facilities for enabling manufacturers to get rid of refuse and enacted that no sanitary authority should be required to give such facilities where the sewers of such authority were only sufficient for the requirements of their district. The duty lay primarily on the manufacturer to get rid of his own refuse, and it would be unreasonable to permit a man to come to a small district and to require the local authority to reconstruct its system for his purposes. But he preferred to rest his judgment on the other point on which the Court of Appeal had decided the case.

LORD MACNAGHTEN read a judgment to the same effect, and the other noble and learned Lords concurred.

TATHAM, BROMAGE AND CO. V. BURR—THE ENGINEER.*

Insurance—Marine—Collision clause—Proviso—Construction.

Decision of the Court of Appeal in "The North Britain" (10 The Times L.R., 104) approved and followed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher and Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Rigby), given on August 6, 1897, which affirmed a previous decision of Mr. Justice Bruce on June 1, 1897. In both Courts formal judgment was given in favour of the respondent on the authority of a decision of the Court of Appeal in 1894 on precisely similar facts in "The North Britain" (10 The Times L.R., 104; [1894] P.D., 77; 63 L.J., P., 33). The question now finally decided is one of great importance to underwriters and shipowners, involving the construction and application of a clause and proviso usually inserted in marine policies. The following is the agreed statement of facts:—1. On June 14, 1895, the plaintiffs (appellants) as owners of the steamship Engineer effected with the defendant (inter alios) a policy of insurance subscribed by the defendant in the sum of £160 on the hull and machinery of the steamship Engineer, valued at £8,500, for 12 months from noon, June 14, 1895, to noon June 15, 1896. 2. Attached to the said policy were certain clauses known as institute clauses, the material one with proviso attached being as follows:—"And it is further agreed that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay and shall pay by way of damages to any other person or persons any sum or sums not exceeding, in respect of any such collision, the value of the ship hereby insured, we, the assurers, will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of such sum or sums so paid as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the ship hereby insured, and in cases in which the liability of the ship has been contested or proceedings have been taken to limit liability with the consent in writing of two-thirds of the subscribers to this policy in amount, we will also pay a like proportion of three-fourths of the costs which the assured shall thereby incur or be compelled to pay; but when both vessels are to blame, then, unless the liability of the owners of one or both of such vessels shall become limited by law, claims under this clause shall be settled on the principle of cross liabilities as if the owners of each vessel had been compelled to pay to the owners of the other of such vessels such one-half or other proportion of the latter's damages as may have been properly allowed in ascertaining the balance or sum payable by or to the assured in consequence of such collision." "Provided always that this clause shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay, for removal of obstructions under statutory powers, for injury to harbours, wharves, piers, stages, and similar structures consequent on such collision or in respect of the cargo or engagements of the insured vessel or for loss of life or personal injury." 3. On April 19, 1896, whilst the said policy was in full force and effect, the s.s. Engineer came into collision with the s.s. Harraton near the entrance to the river Tees, and by reason of the said collision the Engineer was considerably damaged, and the Harraton sank and became a constructive total loss. 4. The place at which the Harraton sank was within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Tees Conservancy Commissioners, who thereupon, under their statutory powers in that behalf, took the necessary steps to remove the obstruction caused by the wreck of the Harraton—in the first place by lighting and watching such wreck and subsequently by dispersing and removing it so as to put the approaches to the river into a safe and proper condition. The total of the charges and expenses incurred by the said Commissioners amounted to the sum of £1,346. 5. An action was begun in the Admiralty Division by the owners of the s.s. Harraton against the owners of the s.s. Engineer, and a counterclaim was entered on behalf of the defendants, but by agreement between the parties in the said collision action both ships were deemed to have been in fault, and the damages suffered by both parties to the suit respectively as assessed by the Registrar of the Admiralty Division, assisted by merchants, were duly paid by each to the other. 6. The plaintiffs, as owners of the s.s. Engineer properly paid to the owners of the s.s. Harraton under the said agreement £673, being a moiety of the said £1,346 for removing the obstruction caused by the wreck as being a loss or damage sustained by the owners of the s.s. Harraton incidental to and arising out of the said collision, and thereafter the plaintiffs sought to recover the moiety aforesaid from their underwriters (including the defendant), but they declined to pay any part thereof, alleging that they are expressly excepted from liability in respect of the said sum by the terms of the proviso set out in paragraph 2 of the statement of facts. The question for the determination of the Court is whether the defendant is liable under the said policy to pay to the plaintiffs such proportion of three-fourths of the sum of £673 in paragraph 6 hereof mentioned as the defendant's subscription bore to the value of the ship. The Court of Appeal, in conformity with the decision of Lords Justices Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Davey in "The North Britain," held that the respondent was not liable, as the proviso exempted him from indemnifying the appellants for payments made directly or indirectly for removal of obstruction under statutory powers.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Carver, Q.C., appeared for the appellants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton, for the respondent, were not heard.

Their LORDSHIPS, expressing their concurrence with the decision and reasoning of the Court of Appeal in "The North Britain," affirmed the decisions of the Courts below, and dismissed the appeal with costs.

GRAHAM V. ELI, GRAHAM V. HUGHES, AND GRAHAM V. BARLOW.*

Patent—"Patent agent"—Person knowingly describing himself as patent agent—Penalty—Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1888, sec. 1.

These were cases stated by Sir John Bridge and Mr. Lushington, metropolitan police magistrates, upon the dismissal of information laid against the respective respondents for knowingly describing themselves as patent agents in contravention of section 1 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1888.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Corrie Grant appeared in each case for the appellant; Mr. Woodfin for Eli and Hughes; and Mr. Shackleton for Barlow.

Section 1 (1) of the Act above referred to provides as follows:—"After the first day of July, 1889, a person shall not be entitled to describe himself as a patent agent, whether by advertisement, by description on his place of business, by any document issued by him, or otherwise, unless he is registered as a patent agent in pursuance of this Act." Subsection 4 provides a penalty in the case of a person knowingly describing himself as a patent agent in contravention of the section, and subsection 5 defines "patent agent" as meaning exclusively a patent agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom. The case against Eli was that on December 2, 1897, he was in occupation of the first floor of No. 76, Chancery-lane. On the outside were the words "Designs," "Trade Marks," and "Patent Office," and on a plate at the entrance were the words "Patent, Designs, and Trade Marks Office," and on the street door of the premises were the words "Office for Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks—Foreign and Colonial." Inside the entrance were the words "Patent Office," and on a glass case the words "Inventors' Medium." The respondent's name was also proved to have appeared on specifications as agent of the applicant. It was also proved that on December 2 a man named Barlow said to the respondent, "If you want a patent agent, I am the man for you," and "If you do not want me, here is Mr. Eli (the respondent) who is ready to do anything for you." The respondent was not at the time registered as a patent agent in pursuance of the Act above mentioned. The case against Hughes was similar to that against Eli, with whom he was in partnership. It was proved in addition that he issued partnership notices in which he described himself and his partner as "patent experts," and that his name had been struck off the register by order of the Board of Trade. The case against Barlow was that he described himself in certain specifications and documents and on his place of business as a "patent expert," and that he had been introduced personally, by a man named Waller, to several persons as a patent agent, and further that he had never been registered as a patent agent under the Act. The magistrates dismissed all the information on the ground that there was no evidence that the respondents had in any of the cases in terms described themselves as patent agents. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that, in order to constitute an offence under the section, it was not necessary for the respondent to describe himself as a patent agent in terms, if it was proved that he in fact held himself out as a patent agent.

The Court dismissed the appeals upon the grounds given by the magistrates.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said that any man was entitled to hold himself out as willing to do work in connexion with bringing out patents. The Act only prohibited such a man from using the term "patent agent." The object of those who wished to give to this term a peculiar sanctity was better served by this construction of the Act than that for which the appellant had contended.

AFTHORPE V. PETER SCHOENHOFEN BREWERY COMPANY.*
Revenue—Income-tax—English company—Brewery carried on at Chicago—Trading in England.

This was a revenue case stated under 43 and 44 Vic., c. 19, section 59, by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income-tax Acts for the City of London, for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division. The question raised was as to the liability for income-tax of a brewery situate at Chicago carried on by an English company.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Danckwerts appeared for the Crown; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the respondents.

At meetings of the Commissioners on October 15, 1896, and May 6, the Peter Schoenhofen Brewery Company (Limited) appealed against assessments made upon them of £66,266 for the year ended April 5, 1896, and of £63,970 for the year ended April 5, 1897, under Schedule D of the Act 16 and 17 Vic., c. 34. The respondent company is an English company registered on July 30, 1889, under the Joint Stock Companies Acts, with memorandum and articles of association, and with a registered office at No. 57, Old Broad-street, in the City of London. The respondent company was formed for the purpose of acquiring a brewery, malthouse, and establishment the property of a brewery company called the Peter Schoenhofen Brewery Company of Chicago. This brewery was established by Mr. Peter Schoenhofen in the year 1860, and had been managed by him continuously since that time. The American company was formed by him, and consisted of five persons, who by contract dated June 25, 1889, became vendors of all except three of the shares in and the property, plant, and business of the American company to the respondent company. In order to avoid any difficulty in connexion with the Illinois State laws, which prevent alien corporations and persons from holding real property in the said State, it was agreed between the respondent company and the vendors that the American company should be kept on foot, and that the whole of the capital stock of the American company, except three shares of $100 each, should be acquired by the respondent company, so that in substance the respondent company became the owners of all the property and assets of the American company. The amount of profits made by the brewery business, after allowing all proper deductions of the cost of administration and otherwise, were assessed at the sum of £96,266 for the year ended April 5, 1896, and £63,970 for the year ended April 5, 1897. Out of the moneys appearing in the balance-sheets of the respondent company there was remitted to England between April 8, 1895, and February 3, 1896, the sum of £2,561 18s. From this amount the sum of £625 was applied in payment of the respondent company's expenses, and the balance of £1,936 18s. was distributed as dividend amongst the shareholders. Out of the same moneys there was remitted to England between April 13, 1896, and March 25, 1897, the sum of £3,256 3s. 4d. From this amount the sum of £710 was applied in payment of the respondent company's expenses, and the sum of £2,481 12s. was distributed as dividend. The breweries at which the profits are made are situate at Chicago, in the State of Illinois, U.S.A., where the manufacture of beer and other liquors is carried on which results in the profits accruing to the respondent company. The beer and other liquors are sold in the State of Illinois and other neighbouring States, and the trade is exclusively carried on there. All the officials and workmen who assist in the manufacture and sale and the carrying on of the trade are located at Chicago aforesaid. The respondent company raised and found the capital for the purpose of carrying on the business at Chicago. A large number of shareholders in the respondent company reside in England, but the larger number of shares are held in the United States. The affairs of the brewery and of the American company can be, if necessary, directed from and administered at the registered office of the respondent company by the board of directors of the latter, who have the entire right of control and the entire directing power over the affairs of the American company and of the staff and business at Chicago. In fact, however, the directors of the respondent company delegated their power to the managers of the brewery at Chicago who were the directors of the American company. The board of directors meet in England and have power to dismiss any or all of the managers, officials, and others carrying on the business in Chicago, and have in fact the power to exercise absolute control not only of the company in general but of the business carried on in Chicago. The Commissioners found as follows on the facts:—1. That the business carried on at Chicago was in fact carried on by and was the business of the respondent company and that the profits made were the profits of the respondent company. 2. That the head and seat and directing power of the respondent company were at the respondent company's registered office in the City of London, and that if the business at Chicago and the profits made thereby were technically the business and profits of the American company, the American company was for such purpose the agent of the respondent company. The Commissioners, however, considered themselves bound by the decision in "Bartholomay Brewing Company v. Wyatt" ([1893] 2 Q.B., 499), and they accordingly reduced the assessment to the amount of the remittances to England—viz., for the year ending April 5, 1896, the sum of £2,561 18s., and for the year ending April 5, 1897, to the sum of £3,256 3s. 4d. The Surveyor of Taxes expressed his dissatisfaction with the determination of the Commissioners, and required a case to be stated.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL contended that the Commissioners were wrong. The power in the English company to dismiss officials and exercise control over the business in Chicago showed that the company traded in England. He distinguished the case of "Bartholomay Brewing Company v. Wyatt" ([1893] 2 Q.B., 499) from the present. He referred to "Colquhoun v. Brooks" (L.R., 14 App. Cas. 493), and observed that while it was passing through the Courts the rules were unsettled. He also cited "Cesena Sulphur Company v. Nicholson" (L.R., 1 Ex.D., 428); "San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Company v. Carter" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 580); "Denver Hotel Company v. Andrews" (3 Tax Cases, 356; 11 The Times L.R., 238).

Mr. ASQUITH submitted that it was a question of fact whether the inference drawn by the Court in the Bartholomay case, which was identical with the present case, was right or not. He submitted there was nothing in the San Paulo case to throw any doubt on it. The Court of Appeal held that the Denver case fell within the principle of the San Paulo case. The question of fact was this, Where during the year of assessment was the business actually carried on?

The COURT decided in favour of the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the San Paulo case governed the present. The Commissioners had found facts which showed that though the profits were earned in the United States the trade was carried on in England. The persons who earned the profits or made the loss in America were appointed or reappointed or dismissed by the English company. In that state of things the observations in the judgments of the San Paulo case applied. His Lordship then referred at length to the judgments therein. His Lordship thought that delegating to persons in America the exercise of the supreme power was an exercise by the English company of the supreme power. There must be judgment for the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD V. TWIGGE AND BUTTERS.*

Harbours and Docks—Mersey Docks Act, 1858, sec. 234—Construction—Foreign dock rates—Coastwise dues.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This action was brought to recover from the defendants foreign dock rates and town dues at 2d. per cwt., less credit for coastwise town dues, on 150 bags of tapioca, weighing 200 cwt., imported into Liverpool under the circumstances hereinafter stated. The plaintiffs claimed that the tapioca was liable under section 234 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, to foreign dock rates and town dues on an importation into the port of Liverpool from Singapore, a port beyond the seas. The defendants contended that the tapioca was liable under the same Act, and under resolutions of the Board now in force remitting the dock rates on goods imported coastwise, to coastwise town dues only on an importation into the port of Liverpool from London coastwise, which had been paid. The amount in dispute was small, being only £1 5s., but the action being a test case was one of considerable importance. The following facts were admitted. A consignment of tapioca, consisting of 306 bags, was shipped by Stiven and Co., at Singapore, on board the steamship Agamemnon, belonging to a Dutch company registered at Amsterdam, for carriage to Liverpool under the terms of a bill of lading which contained a power to tranship at London. The Dutch company and the Ocean Steamship Company, an English company, worked in conjunction, and the profits of the Dutch company went to the shareholders of the English company. The Agamemnon proceeded to Amsterdam, where she discharged some and loaded other cargo, and then to London, where she discharged all her inward cargo. Entry was made with the Customs in London of all her cargo carried to London, including the tapioca in question. The steamer was cleared inwards by the Customs on July 20, 1897, and a complete "jerk" note issued to her. The tapioca was placed in the dock sheds in London and the usual London dues were paid on it. The ship and cargo were treated by the Customs officers in London as arriving from ports beyond the seas for the purposes of the Customs Acts. The tapioca was laden from the dock sheds in London by the agents of the owners of the Agamemnon on board the English steamship Sarpedon, owned by the Ocean Steamship Company. The Sarpedon started from London on a voyage to Liverpool and thence to China, and carried some cargo, including the tapioca to be delivered at Liverpool. The Liverpool cargo was carried under a "transire" from the Customs, a document which is only issued in respect of cargo carried (so far as Customs are concerned) coastwise. On arrival at Liverpool the tapioca with the other cargo from London was discharged in the Harrington Dock belonging to the plaintiffs. Such cargo was treated by the Liverpool Customs as carried coastwise for Customs purposes, and the Customs made no examination and no entries were passed in respect of it. The voyage of the Sarpedon to Liverpool and the carriage of goods in her to Liverpool was treated by the Customs under the Customs Act and by the Trinity House as regards light dues as a coasting voyage. One hundred and fifty bags of the tapioca were delivered from the plaintiffs' dock to the defendants, who had purchased the parcel from the endorsees of the bill of lading.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. T. G. Horridge appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Boyd, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in delivering judgment, said that section 234 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, provided that all goods imported into the port of Liverpool from ports beyond the seas should be liable to the dock rates mentioned in Schedule C. The section further provided that goods imported coastwise should pay certain other dock rates. When the plain language of section 234 was looked at, nothing would seem to be clearer than that, under the circumstances of this case, the goods were imported into Liverpool from a port beyond the seas. It was said, however, on behalf of the defendants, that the section had a subtle and concealed meaning and that it must be construed by reference to the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, and the regulations made under that statute. It was said that the effect of that statute was to deprive the plaintiffs of the dues payable in respect of goods imported from beyond the seas which they would otherwise have been entitled to under the Act of 1858. That would be a most extraordinary result, because the Customs Act had nothing to do with these dock dues, which were payable for harbour and dock services rendered by the plaintiffs. The defendants' case was put in this way. The Customs Act, it was said, must be taken to contain a provision that goods transhipped at London were to be deemed to be imported into London and then carried coastwise to Liverpool. There was no express provision in the Customs Act to that effect, or in the regulations made under it, but it was said such a provision ought to be implied from the course of business. The evidence showed that the course of business of the Customs authorities was that when a vessel arrived in London it was ascertained what dutiable and what non-dutiable goods were on board, and when that had been done the Customs had no further interest in non-dutiable goods. The tapioca in question, which was non-dutiable after transshipment, was not placed on a coasting vessel, but on the Sarpedon, which, after discharging a part of her cargo at Liverpool, proceeded on a foreign voyage, so that the action of the Customs authorities in sending the tapioca under a "transire," which was only issued in respect of goods carried coastwise, was irregular. When the goods were dutiable they were treated after transshipment in a different manner. They were forwarded under a bond. In other words, the Customs authorities kept their hands on them till they reached their destination, where the Customs were paid and the record made. Therefore in the case of the transshipment of dutiable goods no such implication as was contended for by the defendants could arise. But, if the contention of the defendants prevailed, it would result that there would be one set of dock dues payable to the plaintiffs in respect of dutiable goods and another set of dues in respect of non-dutiable goods. Under these circumstances there did not appear to be any reason for implying any such regulation in construing the Mersey Docks Act of 1858. The extremely slender foundation on which the defendants' argument was based was that in the case of "Henderson v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board" (13 App. Cas., 600) the late Master of the Rolls and the House of Lords had had recourse to the language of the Customs Act in order to ascertain the meaning of the words "trading inwards" in a section of the Mersey Docks Act; but in that case the Customs Act was merely referred to as a dictionary might be referred to for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of an ambiguous word. Because that had been done, it was now argued in this case that whenever a question arose as to the meaning or construction of the Mersey Docks Act that question must be determined by referring to the Customs Act. The argument of the defendants was, in his Lordship's opinion, quite untenable. There would, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, with costs on the High Court scale.

SYDNEY HARBOUR COLLIERIES (LIMITED) V. EARL GREY.*

Decision of Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 564) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal dated August 3, 1897, reversing, or rather varying, a decision of Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Wright given on May 14, 1897. The case is reported in 13 The Times L.R., 564. The short question was whether the liability of signatories to an underwriting agreement in respect of shares so underwritten, which liability was to cease or be diminished according as the whole or part of the shares were taken by the public, was to be held as diminished by the shares taken "firm" by the underwriters themselves. The following was the "Underwriting agreement.—The Sydney Harbour Collieries (Limited).—Issue of 34,000 preference shares of £10 each. It is proposed to underwrite 34,000 shares of £10 each. To Messrs. Robinson, Fleming, and Co., 9, Billiter-square, E.C. Gentlemen,—I undertake when called upon by you to subscribe for— shares of the above issue, on the terms of the annexed prospectus or any modification thereof, and to pay the instalments on such shares in accordance therewith. If the public subscribe bona fide for 34,000 shares, then my responsibility is to cease. If the public do not subscribe such an amount, but shall bona fide subscribe any smaller amount, my undertaking is to stand for the number of shares that will constitute my pro rata contribution with the other underwriters, to make up the difference between the amount subscribed by the public and the total amount underwritten. In the event of my failing to put in an application for such shares when called upon by you, I hereby irrevocably authorize you to make an application, and sign the same on my behalf, and I agree to accept the allotment which may be made to me upon such application subject to the conditions before stated. This undertaking is conditional on an allotment taking place not later than March 31, 1895. In the event of an allotment taking place, you are to pay me, in consideration of this undertaking, the sum of 7 per cent. as a commission upon the total number of shares hereby underwritten, such sum to be paid by you to me in cash within one month of the first allotment of shares by the company." The number of shares underwritten by the respondent was 2,000. Some of the underwriters sent applications in the ordinary way with cheques, for shares to be taken "firm," and the question was whether shares so taken were to be considered as shares taken by the public, within the meaning of the underwriting agreement, so as to diminish the extent of liability under such agreement. The question was referred to the present Mr. Justice Channell, then at the Bar, as arbitrator, and he found that the shares taken "firm" by underwriters were to be taken in diminution of the underwriters' liability. On that finding Lord Grey was held liable for 854 shares. The question was referred to the Court on a special case and the two Judges adopted the other view, the result of which was that the respondent was held liable for 1,470 shares. The Court of Appeal accepted the view of the arbitrator and the company appealed.

Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Bremner were for the appellants; Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., for the respondent.

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said that it was perfectly clear that the underwriting agreement was a perfect contract in itself and had no relation to the note endorsed by certain of the underwriters to the agreement that they would take so many shares "firm." Those underwriters thereby entered into a perfectly independent contract to take such shares. In addition to being underwriters they thereby undertook to become shareholders. It was hopeless to contend that the persons who made these applications in the ordinary form and sent their cheques, and thereby as between themselves and the company were entitled to allotment, were but members of the public within the meaning of the underwriting agreement. The shares were as really taken by the public as if the subscribers were different persons from the underwriters.

LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred, and held that there were really in each of these cases two distinct contracts—one to underwrite and the other to take shares.

LORD MORRIS and LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD also concurred, and the appeal was dismissed with costs.

Privy Council Appeals—New South Wales—Servant of Crown—Wrongful dismissal—Public Service Act, 1895.

Section 58 of Public Service Act, 1895, does not apply to servants of Crown dismissed before passing of that Act.

This was an appeal by the Minister of Public Works of New South Wales (Mr. Young) from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of April 26, 1897, allowing, by a majority of the Judges, the plaintiff's demurrer to a plea filed by the appellant in an action brought by the respondent, Mr. Alexander Adams, to recover damages for wrongful dismissal from the Civil Service of the colony.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins were counsel for the appellant; Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. James Bacon for the respondent.

LORD WATSON, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the respondent entered the service of the Government of New South Wales in 1885 as a road surveyor at a yearly salary. He continued in that capacity until June 30, 1895, when he was summarily dismissed without compensation. During the period between the original engagement of the respondent and his dismissal the rights of Civil servants in the colony of New South Wales were governed by the Colonial Act, 48 Vic., No. 24. In the appeal "Gould v. Stuart" (App. Ca. [1896], p. 577) it was held by the Judicial Committee, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, that the power generally possessed by the Crown to dismiss a Civil officer at pleasure was restricted by the provisions of the Civil Service Act, 1884, and that the Government had no power to dismiss a Civil servant except upon the grounds and after the inquiry which that statute prescribed. Upon July 14, 1896, the present suit was brought by the respondent against the appellant, who had been duly appointed to be used as nominal defendant on behalf of the Government of the colony. The declaration set forth the employment of the re-respondent as a Civil servant and the fact that he was not dismissed in the manner and on the terms prescribed by the Civil Service Act of 1884; and it concluded with a claim for the sum of £6,160 as damages. By his third plea in defence the appellant maintained that the services and employment of the respondent "were the services of a person employed in the public service within the meaning of the Act 59 Victoria, No. 25, section 58, and the alleged grievances were the exercise by the Government of the right and power of the Crown to dispense with the services of any person employed in the public service and not otherwise." The statute upon which the plea was founded, the short title of which is the Public Service Act of 1895, was passed upon December 23, 1895, five months after the summary dismissal of the respondent. The 58th section enacts that "Nothing in this Act, or in the Civil Service Act of 1884, shall be construed or held to abrogate and restrict the right of the Crown as it existed before the passing of the said Civil Service Act to dispense with the services of any person employed in the public service." The respondent demurred to the third plea, and the appellant joined in the demurrer, which was then heard before the Supreme Court of the colony. On April 26, 1897, the majority of the Court, consisting of Chief Justice Darley and Mr. Justice Owen, gave judgment for the respondent. Mr. Justice Stephen dissented. Their Lordships had come to the conclusion that the decision of the majority was right, and they approved of the reasons which were assigned for it in the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Darley. It was argued for the appellant that the provisions of section 58, being declaratory, must of necessity be enforced by the Courts of the colony in every case, whether arising before or after the date of their enactment, and consequently that, the present case having been brought before the Supreme Court after December 23, 1895, when the Public Service Act became law, the summary dismissal of the respondent must be held to have been within the power of the Government, although on June 30, 1895, when it took place, such act of dismissal might have been illegal and might then have given the respondent a good cause of action. It might be true that the enactments were declaratory in form, but it did not necessarily follow that they were therefore retrospective in their operation and were meant to apply to acts which had been completed or to interests which had vested before they became law. Neither the context of the statute nor the terms of the clause itself, appeared to their Lordships to favour that result. Section 58 was the last of a group of ten clauses which were collected under the statutory heading—"Dismissals, removals, &c.," which was part of the statute, and must be taken into account in construing its provisions. Leaving section 58 out of view in the meantime, the other clauses of the group dealt exclusively with the dismissal, removal, or punishment of officers permanently employed in the public service in consequence of misconduct committed after the commencement of the Act of 1895. Section 58 was complementary of those provisions, and restored the power of the Crown, which was taken away by the Act of 1884, to dismiss at pleasure, and without cause assigned. The right or power which it restored was "to dispense with the services of any person employed in the public service." Could these words be reasonably construed so as to include persons who were not employed in the public service, and who, like the respondent, had ceased to be so before its power of summary dismissal was given back to the Crown? In the opinion of their Lordships the words of the clause as they stood did not admit of that construction. Counsel for the appellant were by the exigencies of their case driven to maintain the contrary, and they accordingly argued that the clause ought to be read in the same way as if after "any person employed in the public service" there had been inserted, "or who, before the passing of this Act, had been dismissed from the public service." The words of the clause, according to their ordinary and natural meaning, referred to persons who were employed in the public service; and neither in section 58, nor in the context of the Act, was there to be found any expression which could qualify that meaning, and make them refer to persons who had been, but had ceased to be, employed before the Act came into existence. Their Lordships were unable to discover the least analogy between the enactments which required to be construed in this appeal and those which were under the consideration of the Court in "The King v. Inhabitants of Dursley" (3 B and Ad., 465) and in "Attorney-General v. Theobald" (24 Q.B.D., 557), which were much relied on in appellant's argument. It did not seem to be very probable that the Legislature should intend to extinguish, by means of retrospective enactment, rights and interests which might have already vested in a very limited class of persons consisting, so far as appeared, of one individual—namely, the respondent. In such cases their Lordships were of opinion that the rule laid down by Chief Justice Erle in "Midland Railway Company v. Pye" (10 C.B., N.S., 191) ought to apply. They thought that in a case like the present the learned Chief Justice was right in saying that a retrospective operation ought not to be given to the statute "unless the intentions of the Legislature that it should be so construed is expressed in plain and unambiguous language, because it manifestly shocks one's sense of justice that an act legal at the time of doing it should be made unlawful by some new enactment." The ratio was equally apparent when a new enactment was said to convert an act, wrongfully done at the time, into a legal act and to deprive the person injured of the remedy which the law then gave him. Their Lordships did not suggest that the language of section 58 was in any sense ambiguous. On the contrary, its enactments appeared to them to have plain reference to persons who were actually employed in the public service at and after the date of the Act of 1895, and to those persons only. In their opinion no construction was possible which would extend the enactments to persons who had ceased to be employed in the public service before the date of the Act without reading into the clause words which were not implied and were not to be found there. Their Lordships would therefore humbly advise her Majesty to affirm the judgment appealed from. The appellant must pay to the respondent his costs of this appeal.

Reported by W. J. SOUTHWICK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

YOUNG V. WALLER, AND WALLER V. YOUNG.*

Privy Council Appeals—New South Wales—Servant of Crown—Wrongful dismissal—Civil Service Act, 1884—Superannuation allowance—Abolition of office.

A servant of the Crown dismissed owing to the abolition of his office is not entitled under the Civil Service Act, secs. 10 and 46, to demand either further employment or compensation if he has not become entitled to a superannuation allowance.

These were cross-appeals from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of May 6, 1897, upon two demurrers in an action brought by Mr. Thomas Francis Waller against the Minister of Public Works of New South Wales (Mr. Young), who was appointed nominal defendant on behalf of the Government of the colony, to recover £7,500 damages for wrongful dismissal from the Civil Service.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Corrie Grant were counsel for Mr. Waller; Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins for Mr. Young.

The arguments were heard before the same board as in the case of "Young v. Adams" (ante, p. 373) when judgment was reserved.

LORD WATSON, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the plaintiff in the suit, who was respondent in the leading appeal, obtained employment in the public service of the Government of New South Wales after the passing of the Civil Service Act, 1884. Before the Public Service Act, 1895, was passed the office which he held was abolished by the Government. After the Act of 1895 became law the suit was brought by the plaintiff against the Government claiming £7,500 damages for wrongful dismissal and deprivation of office. By his defence, the defendant by his second plea pleaded "that the services and employment of the plaintiff were the services of a person employed in the public service within the meaning of the Act 59 Vict. No. 25, section 58, and the alleged grievances were the exercise by the Government of the right and power of the Crown in the section mentioned to dispense with the services of any person employed in the public service, and not otherwise." He pleaded in his third plea "that, whilst the plaintiff was in the service and employment the Government abolished the plaintiff's office, and thereupon dispensed with the services of the plaintiff as such officer in consequence of the abolition of his office under and in accordance with the Civil Service Act, and the grievances are the dispensing with the services of the plaintiff in consequence of the abolition of his office and not otherwise." Those two pleas were heard, on demurrer, before Chief Justice Darley with Justices Stephen and Cohen, who, on May 6, 1897, unanimously entered judgment for the plaintiff on his demurrer to the defendant's second plea, and over-ruled his demurrer to the defendant's third plea, with costs. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Chief Justice Darley with the concurrence of the two learned Judges who sat with him. Their judgment upon the demurrer to the second plea was rested, without discussion, upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of "Adams v. Young." In that case, however, the plaintiff's office was not abolished, and the loss of which he complained was solely due to his summary dismissal by the Government. In this case, the plaintiff's loss of his office and its emoluments had not been due to his summary dismissal, but to the abolition by the Government of the office which he held. Now, although it was decided by the Judicial Committee in "Gould v. Stuart" (App. Ca. [1896], p. 575) that the effect of the Civil Service Act, 1884, was to deprive the Crown of its right to dismiss its Civil servants summarily without following the procedure prescribed by the Act, it was certainly not suggested that the provisions of the Act did—either directly or by implication—take away the right of the Crown to abolish a Civil office. In the argument addressed to them for the plaintiff it was not disputed that the Crown's power of abolition was recognized by the Act of 1884, which made special provision, in the event of its exercise, for the compensation to be made to the Civil servant who was thereby deprived of his office and its emoluments. The substance of the defendant's third plea, to which the plaintiff demurred, was that the plaintiff was not entitled to any compensation under the Act of 1884. If that could be shown, it followed that the plaintiff had no title to insist on his claim of damages at common law as for breach of contract. There were only two clauses in the Act of 1884 which bore upon that question. Section 10 provided:—"If the services of any officer be dispensed with in consequence of the abolition of his office or of any departmental change, and not from any fault on his part, such officer may be required, at the rate of salary last received by him, to perform any duty for which he is considered competent in any public department, and should he refuse such change of duty he shall not be entitled to receive any compensation." Section 46 enacted—"When the services of any officer are dispensed with in consequence of the abolition of his office and no office can be offered to him at the same salary as hereinbefore provided or at a salary of not less than five-sixths of the same, he shall be entitled to retire upon the superannuation allowance herein-after provided." It was admitted in the argument for the plaintiff, that at the date when his office was abolished he had not been a Civil servant for such a period of time as would entitle him to a superannuation allowance. He therefore rested his claim for damages or compensation upon the failure of the Government to fulfil their statutory obligation, by offering him employment as a Civil servant in some public department, at the rate of salary received by him before the abolition of his office, or at a salary of not less than five-sixths of the same. The argument of the plaintiff was rested entirely upon the contention that, by sections 10 and 46 of the Civil Service Act, 1884, an imperative duty was imposed upon the Government of the colony, in the event of their abolishing a civil office, to make compensation to the holder of it, by offering him an office in some public department, at the same salary which he had received before the abolition, or at a salary not less than five-sixths of the same. For that contention, in their Lordships' opinion, there was no warrant to be found in the language of the Act, which placed it entirely within the option of the Government to re-engage the Civil servant whose office had been abolished, or not, as they should see fit. Section 10 merely provided that the displaced official might be required to perform any duty for which he was considered competent in any public department, at the rate of salary last received by him; and the penalty of his declining to accept the duty, when required was that he shall not be entitled to any compensation. But it was clear that all questions relating to his competency, and to the propriety of requiring him to accept another situation, were left to the discretion of the Government. In like manner Section 46 enacted that a Civil servant, displaced by the abolition of his office, should be entitled "to retire upon the superannuation allowance hereinafter provided," if no other office could be offered to him at the same salary as hereinbefore provided, or at a salary of not less than five-sixths of the same. Those enactments, in so far as they related to the offer of another office, referred back to the provisions of Section 10, and left the right of judging whether such an offer ought to be made to the Government. Their Lordships would therefore humbly advise her Majesty to dismiss both the original and the cross-appeal. The parties would each bear their own costs.

WELL V. OFFICIAL TRUSTEE OF CHARITY LANDS.*

Charity—Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855—Trustees—Prohibition against charging a charity estate.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Romer. The plaintiffs were churchwardens of the parish of St. Botolph Without, Aldersgate, during the years 1885, 1886, 1887, and 1888, and as such churchwardens under the operation of a trust deed of November 17, 1865, and in accordance with previous trust deeds and immemorial custom of the parish were during their respective terms of office trustees for the administration of the funds derived from the various properties forming the parish estates. By the deed of November 17, 1865, the parish estates were conveyed by the surviving trustee under a former deed of trust to certain persons upon trust to permit and suffer the churchwardens of the said parish for the time being to receive and take the rents, issues, and profits of the same hereditaments and premises as the same should from time to time arise, grow due, and be payable as formerly had been used, and for such charitable uses, intents, and purposes as the same had been usually disposed of and employed by the parishioners of the said parish, whether in or about the repairs of the church, the relief of the poor of the said parish, or any other the public affairs of the same parish, and to and for no other use, trust, or purpose whatsoever. Between the years 1885 and 1888 various sums amounting in the aggregate to £3,000 had been advanced by the London and County Bank to the parish and credited to the churchwardens' account in the books of the bank. These sums were obtained and expended for ordinary parish purposes, the income of the parish having been temporarily diminished by about £500 owing to the falling in of certain leases and the granting of new leases at a peppercorn rent during rebuilding and to other causes. In 1891 by a scheme established under the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, which incorporated the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 to 1867, the parish estates were vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands, and were thenceforward to be administered by the trustees of the London Parochial Charities. The London and County Bank had recently brought actions in the Queen's Bench Division against the present plaintiffs to recover the sums respectively advanced to them for the purposes of the parish, and these actions were still pending. The plaintiffs then commenced these proceedings against the Official Trustee of Charity Lands and the Trustees of the London Parochial Charities to determine the question whether they ought not to be indemnified out of the parish funds in respect of these advances. Mr. Justice Romer held that the plaintiffs failed. Under the terms of the trust deed the churchwardens had not, in his Lordship's opinion, any power to anticipate the income and had no rights against the future income of the parish. The plaintiffs appealed. Upon the appeal the question turned mainly upon the construction to be put upon section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, which provides that "it shall not be lawful for the trustees of any charity to make or grant otherwise than with the express authority of Parliament, under any Act already passed or which may hereafter be passed, or of a Court or Judge of competent jurisdiction, or according to a scheme legally established, or with the approval of the Board," i.e., the Charity Commissioners, "any sale, mortgage, or charge of the charity estate."

Mr. Neville, Q.C., Mr. P. S. Stokes, and Mr. Arthur Powell were for the plaintiffs; the Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins were for the Official Trustee of Charity Lands; Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Reginald Neville were for the Trustees of the London Parochial Charities.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the question was one of some difficulty and of some importance and interest. The deed of 1865 in effect made the churchwardens trustees of the rents and profits of the parish property; but churchwardens were merely annual officers. It was contended that they were a corporation; but churchwardens were not a corporation, except to a limited extent by the custom of London; they could not sue or be sued as a corporate entity. The substance of the case was that these churchwardens were annual officers, and were trustees only of the rents and profits which it was their duty to receive under this trust deed. Still, it did not necessarily follow upon the construction of this deed that it was impossible for the churchwardens as such trustees ever to look beyond the income for the year of their office. If it was customary for the churchwardens in old times to borrow money beyond what they had in hand in any one year and to recoup themselves out of the future income, his Lordship was not prepared to say, apart from recent legislation, that such a course was illegal or improper. But, in his Lordship's opinion, to give effect to the plaintiffs' contention in this case would be to do the very thing which modern Acts of Parliament had endeavoured to prevent. In 1883 the London Parochial Charities Act was passed for the purpose of reorganizing and consolidating the City charities, and special machinery was provided for that purpose. Speaking generally, the objects of the Act were to be effected by means of a scheme, and the charitable funds were to be vested in the official trustee. The scheme affecting this particular charity did not come into operation till 1891. In the meantime—viz., 1885–88—the trustees—i.e., the churchwardens—in order to meet a temporary deficiency in the income of the parish, borrowed money to the extent of £3,000. Knowing perfectly that a scheme was in contemplation, and having spent this money upon the parochial charity, they now asked the Court to indemnify them out of the future income of the charity. Under the Charitable Trust Act, 1855, it was obvious that they could not themselves have created any mortgage or charge on this property without the consent of the Charity Commissioners, and this they must be presumed to have known. Yet, without consulting anybody but the vestry, they obtained these advances, spent the money in a way which they thought beneficial, and they now claimed to be entitled to a charge. If that could be done it would not only be an evasion of the Act of 1855 but it would be depriving the charity of a very great protection against its funds being wasted. No doubt the language of section 29 forbidding trustees "to make or grant a charge" except upon the terms therein mentioned was not particularly apt to cover a transaction of this kind, but it would be an extremely narrow construction of the words to say that this transaction was not hit. The distinction between making a charge and doing that which necessarily involved a charge appeared to his Lordship to be too subtle to be relied upon. It was then suggested that the Court ought now to declare a charge in favour of the trustees under section 29, but, so far as this was a matter of discretion, in his Lordship's opinion the Court ought not to accede to that suggestion. The appeal should be dismissed.

*Reported by H. B. HAMMOND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred. The churchwardens, when they borrowed the money, intended to look to the future income of the charity to recoup themselves. Though there was no writing it was their intention to create a charge, and if they had not thought that what they did had the effect of making a charge they would never have made themselves responsible for the advances. It would be idle to prohibit borrowing if a man was allowed to pay the money out of his own pocket and claim to be recouped. This transaction was within the mischief and within the words of the Act of 1855.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS entirely concurred, and added that, upon the construction of the trust deed, the inclination of his judgment was in favour of the view adopted by Mr. Justice Romer.

IN RE CRONMIRE—EX PARTE TRUSTEE.*

Stock Exchange—Gaming and wagering contract —Deposit of money as cover—Recovery of.
Order of Wright, J. (ante, p. 242), varied.

This was an appeal by the trustee from an order of Mr. Justice Wright admitting the proof of Alfred Edward Waud against the estate of Cronmire. The case is reported ante, p. 242. The facts, so far as material to this report, were as follows:—Cronmire had carried on business as an outside dealer in stocks and shares under the style of Gregory and Co. Cronmire died in April, 1897, and his estate was now being administered in bankruptcy under an administration order. Waud had had various transactions with Cronmire in stocks and shares, and at the beginning of 1897 Cronmire was indebted to Waud in respect of these transactions in the sum of £375. At this time Waud gave Cronmire an order to buy for him for investment £200 Great Eastern Railway Stock, and Cronmire sent to Waud a contract note stating that he had sold to Waud the stock in question, "to be taken up." There was also a subsequent order to purchase a small amount of Dover "A's." The stock had not been delivered at the date of Cronmire's death, and Waud sent in a proof against his estate for £375, being the above-mentioned balance on the purchase and sale of stocks, and it included a sum of £49 3s. 9d. which Waud had deposited with Cronmire as cover. The trustee rejected the proof, on the ground that the transactions were gambling transactions, and upon appeal Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams directed an issue to be tried by a jury as to whether they were gambling transactions. The jury found that the transactions were gambling transactions, but that the purchases of the railway stocks were real transactions. The trustee then applied to Mr. Justice Wright, who had succeeded Lord Justice Vaughan Williams as the Judge taking bankruptcy matters, for judgment upon the verdict of the jury, when the proof was taken as amended by turning it into a proof for damages for non-delivery of the stocks above-mentioned. The trustee contended that the claim in respect of the stocks stood on the same footing as the claim for £375, which sum, being the balance due in respect of gambling transactions, as the jury had found, could not be proved in bankruptcy; that there was a mere substitution of stock for money; and that, therefore, the rejection of the proof was right. Mr.

Justice Wright came to the conclusion that the last two transactions as to the purchase of the stocks, being genuine transactions, were independent of the gambling transactions, and that it was not until afterwards that Waud directed Cronmire to apply the £375 in his hands in payment for the stocks. He accordingly admitted the proof for the full amount, which included the cover. The trustee appealed.

Mr. W. S. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Macaskie appeared for the trustee; Mr. H. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Israel Davis appeared for the respondent Waud.

The COURT varied the order below.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that according to the verdict of the jury the £375 was the result of wagering and gaming transactions. The jury found that the purchases of the Great Eastern and Dover A stocks were real transactions—that is to say, investment transactions. When Waud sent in his proof he made an affidavit which stated very clearly what the transaction was, and which was in exact accordance with what he (the Lord Justice) would have thought to be the true nature of the transaction. Waud stated in the affidavit that instead of receiving the £375 in cash he arranged with Cronmire to purchase from him the above-mentioned stocks to be delivered and to be taken as payment of the amount due to him. It was clear that the stocks were to be purchased with the produce of the gaming and wagering transactions. The trustee contended that Waud could not prove for the £375, and that he could not shape his claim in any way so as to succeed. An ingenious argument as to what must have been the real transaction was addressed to them as well as to Mr. Justice Wright, which induced that learned Judge to decline to act upon Waud's affidavit. It was said that there had been a settlement of account between Cronmire and Waud, and that was evidence of an account stated, and that, therefore, there had been payment for the purchase of the railway stocks. Now, an account stated was only evidence of payment and not conclusive evidence. How could they say that the account stated showed a payment when Waud swore that it was no such thing? It seemed to him, therefore, that Mr. Justice Wright was wrong in holding that Waud could prove against Cronmire's estate for so much of the £375 as represented the produce of the gambling transactions in whatever way the claim was shaped. Waud could not claim it by turning his proof into one for damages for non-delivery of the stocks. Then as regards the £49 3s. 9d. cover. "Cover" was money deposited by a customer with a broker to secure the latter against loss in the event of the stock falling. As Lord Herschell said in "Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan" ([1896] A.C., 166, at p. 173), the security deposited was deposited as security against a debt which might arise from a gambling transaction, and it was not deposited to abide the event of a wager. The gaming and wagering transactions had come to an end, and the result was that Cronmire still had this £49 3s. 9d. in his hands. Why could not Waud claim it back? It had never been used by Cronmire for the gaming transactions, nor had there ever arisen any occasion to use it. There was no defence to such a claim. There was no necessity to go into any question of appropriation, for in this case the event for which the money had been deposited had come to an end, and the money had never been used. Waud therefore could prove for the £49 3s. 9d.

The COURT refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

IN RE THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.*

Revenue—Property of bodies corporate or unincorporate—Exemptions—Institutions for promotion of “education . . . science”—Royal College of Surgeons—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885.

This was a petition by the Royal College of Surgeons praying for the discharge of an assessment made on them under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885. The ground on which the exemption was claimed was that the Royal College of Surgeons was an institution for the promotion of “education, literature, science, or the fine arts.”

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Mr. J. R. Paget appeared for the petitioners; the Attorney-General and Mr. Danckwerts for the Crown.

The petition showed (1) that by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, it was enacted that there should be levied in respect of all real and personal property which shall have belonged to or been vested in any body corporate or unincorporate a duty at the rate of £5 per annum upon the annual value, income, or profits of such property after deducting all necessary outgoings subject to exemption from such duty in favour of property of the description following—that is to say, property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts; (2) that the petitioners were a body politic established by Royal charter in the year 1800; (3) that the objects of the petitioners' incorporation, as specified in the said Royal charter, are the benefit of the common weal of this kingdom by the promotion of the art and science of surgery and the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science of surgery; (4) that further powers and privileges had from time to time been conferred upon the petitioners by subsequent Royal charters with the object more effectually to promote and encourage the study and practice of the said art and science of surgery; (5) that by the charter obligations and duties were imposed upon the corporation for the benefit of the public at large and the promotion and encouragement of the said art and science of surgery; (6) that they were, under terms imposed by Government, the custodians at their own expense of the Hunterian collection, which is national property; (7) that on June 24, 1894, the annual value or income from real property was £7,200, the total value of the personal estate was £187,195 17s. 11d., and the income therefrom for the same yearly period was £5,833 5s. 7d.; (8) that the whole property was legally appropriated and applied for the benefit of the public at large or for the promotion of science, literature, or education; (9) that the petitioners were called upon by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to deliver an account in accordance with section 17 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, that they did deliver such an account claiming exemption; (10) that the petitioners were notwithstanding assessed by the Commissioners at £3,161 and required to pay as duty thereon the sum of £158 1s.; (11) that they had been compelled to pay the same. (12) The said sum of £3,161 included the following:—The sum of £300, the annual value of that part of the library within the premises Nos. 40, 41, 42, Lincoln's-inn-fields; the sum of £250, the annual value of the official residence of the conservator of the museum; £200, the value of 39, Lincoln's-inn, another portion of the library. (13) Apart from the general claim to total exemption the petitioners submitted that, in any event, the above property came within the provision for exemption. The affidavits used stated that the College had fulfilled the duties and obligations imposed by the charters, and had in addition, in conjunction with the Royal College of Physicians, instituted examinations and granted diplomas to successful candidates which entitled them to practise as surgeons. They also issued diplomas to dentists. The museum is very large and represents an annual value of £1,900. The Royal College of Surgeons had expended £90,000 in building it, to which the Government had contributed £42,500. The original nucleus of the collection inside was the Hunterian collection. The library is of the annual value of £500, and contains over 47,000 volumes. Admission is accorded practically to every person having a bona fide object for admission, though the regulations give special advantages to members. Another portion of the property is the house appropriated to the conservator of the museum as his official residence. He is required to reside there. It adjoins the museum. The college has no school course of instruction or training for persons seeking admission to the membership of the college. Professors, however, deliver lectures in the theatre of the college, to which lectures the public are admitted free of charge. The college awards prizes for dissertations on subjects connected with the science of surgery. The Crown had granted exemption in respect of the museum, but contended that neither the library, the examination hall and offices, nor the conservator's house should be exempted, they not being both appropriated and applied, in fact, for the promotion of science. For the college it was contended—first, that they were altogether exempt; and, in the alternative, that the separate buildings were all or some exempt. These cases were cited:—“Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue” (2 Tax Cases, 257); “The Tailors of Glasgow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue” (24 Scott. L.R., 516); “In re Bootham Ward Strays” ([1892] 2 Q.B., 152); “The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Scott” ([1892] 2 Q.B., 161; in Court below, 60 L.J., Q.B., 615); “The Linen and Woollen Drapers Case” (53 L.T., 954); “Forrest v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue” (15 App. Cas., 334).

The COURT found for the Crown, with the exception of the conservator's house, which was declared exempt.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the section provided an exemption for property legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science. There were two classes of property, the first—property of such a character as to be exempt as a whole—being property of which the main or sole object was the promotion of science. In such a case no declaration of trust was necessary. That, however, was not the present case, for on the authorities cited it could not be said that the property of the Royal College of Surgeons was legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science at the time of the assessment. At the time of the original charter science might have been the main object, but the actual object at the present day was to be gathered from the later charters and the by-laws. That object mainly was the granting certificates or diplomas to persons desiring to become surgeons. The balance-sheets showed that the largest source of income and expenditure was the examinations. The evidence brought before the Court failed to show that the promotion of science was now the main object. The case of the Institute of Civil Engineers showed that in such a case the property was not exempt as a whole. The second class of property was that where the promotion of science stopped short of being the main object—when, though there was a promotion of science, the objects were of a mixed character. In such a case, apparently, each part of the property must be considered and each part examined to see if it had been actually—i.e., not by mere conveyance or declaration of trust—appropriated and applied to the purpose for which exemption could be claimed. His Lordship referred to passages in Lord Watson's judgment in the case of the Institute of Civil Engineers—"Forrest v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue" (15 App. Cas., 334). The principles of that case must be applied here. As to the museum, the Crown had conceded in fact, though not in theory, that it was exempt. In the opinion of the learned Judge the Hunterian Museum was within the exemption. Money had been voted by Parliament to build it, and it could not be used for purposes other than a museum without a breach of trust. Then came the offices, value £700. They could not now be said to be appropriated and applied for purposes of science, but for examination purposes. With regard to the examination hall and properties attached to it, it was very clear that the main object was not the promotion of science. Thirdly, there was a library. That seemed a more difficult point, and was very near the line. It had not, however, been shown that the library was applied for purposes of science. The case of the Writers to the Signet was an authority that in such a case a library was not exempt. The house of the conservator of the museum was said on behalf of the Crown not to be exempt because the college might appoint another house for his residence. The museum was appropriated to science, and it was within the purposes of the college to have a conservator's house. It did not require an unchangeable appropriation.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. It must be remembered what the particular Act was out of which this question arose. The cases cited were not all on the same Act. In the Acts relating to income-tax and rating the exemption depended on the character of the society. In the present case it depended on the particular property. Under this statute, speaking generally, corporations were chargeable. The exemption was not given to the corporation, but to the property. It was only necessary to consider the character of the corporation in order to see if any of the property should be exempt. For that purpose it must be seen what the corporation was doing lawfully with the particular property at the time of the assessment. He did not think that the objects—and certainly not the motives—of the Crown in granting the charter would be necessarily conclusive on this question. If the object was to form a body for the promotion of science, but the body so formed acted partly in the promotion of science and partly to give benefits to its members, such a society might come within the preamble to the charter, because it might well promote science all the better if the members had a personal interest in it, but that society would have a double object. It could not be said that it had acted ultra vires in giving benefit to members. The society here had undergone a change of that description. It had a double object, and it could not be said that all the property was devoted to one of them only—namely, the promotion of science. He agreed as to the position of the examinations. They were instituted for the benefit of those examined, and not for the promotion of science. It followed that the examination hall could not be exempt, nor the general offices which were attached to it. There was nothing whatever to show that the society was exempt generally. As to the library, the case of "The Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue" (2 Tax Cases, 257) was enough to show that it was not exempt. Though the public might without much difficulty obtain admission, it was clear that the members had special privileges. It could not be said to be appropriated to the special purposes of science. The conservator's house should be treated as part of the museum. It would be a breach of trust to give up the museum, yet it might be moved. If moved it would still be exempt. That was an argument in favour of exempting the conservator's house, notwithstanding that he might be removed to another residence. The assessment must be reduced by £250 in respect of the house.

PRIOR V. THE SLAITHWAITE SPINNING COMPANY.*

Factory—Young person—Employment during unlawful hours—Factories and Workshops Act, 1878.

This was a case stated by magistrates of the West Riding of Yorkshire upon the dismissal of an information preferred against the respondents for employing a "young person" at their factory during a time specified in a notice affixed in the factory as a time allowed for meals and absence of work contrary to the Factories and Workshops Act, 1878.

The Solicitor-General, Sir Robert Finlay, Q.C., and Mr. Sutton appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Rawlinson, Q.C., and Mr. Harper for the respondents.

The respondents' factory was a textile mill and the business of the boy in question was that of a piecer; it was his duty to tie up ends when they were down. On November 5 last the boy, finding it warmer in the mill than outside, had his dinner in the mill during the interval allotted for that purpose. After he had finished his dinner he set to work to oil the spindles in order to while away the time. It was not the boy's business to oil the spindles. The magistrates dismissed the information on the ground that there was no evidence of employment of the boy by the respondents in contravention of the Factories and Workshops Act, 1878. Section 17 (2) of the Act of 1878 provides that "a child, young person, or woman shall not during any part of the times allowed for meals in the factory or workshop be employed in the factory or the workshop."

Mr. RAWLINSON, Q.C., contended that the mere fact of the boy doing what he did was not necessarily evidence that he was working. What he did might have been a mere piece of mischief, and the magistrate was therefore right in taking the view he did. Counsel further contended that the respondent was entitled to exemption under section 87, which provides that "where the occupier of a factory or workshop is charged with an offence against the Act, he shall be entitled upon information duly laid by him to have any other person whom he charges as the actual offender brought before the Court at the time appointed for hearing the charge, and if, after the commission of the offence has been proved, the occupier of the factory or workshop proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he used due diligence to enforce the execution of the Act, and that the said other person had committed the offence in question without his knowledge, consent, or connivance, the said other person shall be summarily convicted of such offence, and the occupier shall be exempt from any fine."

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The COURT allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the magistrates to convict.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said that the policy of the enactment was to ensure that certain classes of persons employed in factories should have the hours allowed for their meals preserved intact, and though extreme cases might arise they were not likely to be of frequent occurrence, and ought not to prevent the Act being construed rigorously so as to ensure the fulfilment of its object. In this case the boy was oiling spindles within the prohibited hours. Though his object in doing so was to amuse himself, that did not prevent what he did being work. The magistrates did not find that the boy did not work. All they found was that he was not employed by the respondents. The respondents were not entitled to the benefit of the exemption under section 87 because there was no information before the magistrate by which any other person was charged with the offence. Section 87 was intended to meet cases where the occupier was in no way to blame, but the relief afforded by the section was conditional on another person being suspected and brought before the magistrates. Still, even where nobody could be brought to book, the magistrates who administered the Act had a discretion as to the amount of the fine, and could meet a case of hardship by moderating such fine.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered judgment to the same effect.

Chitty, and Collins, L.J.J.)

April 30.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. BEECH AND ANOTHER.*
Revenue—Estate duty—Finance Act, 1894.

Held, that estate duty was not payable on the death of a person, who, having a life estate in certain property, had assigned it during her life to the reversioner.

Decision of Divisional Court ([1897] 2 Q.B., 535, and 13 The Times L.R., 549) reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Baron Pollock and Mr. Justice Ridley) upon an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894 (reported in 13 The Times L.R., 549; [1897] 2 Q.B., 535). The question raised was whether, when a tenant for life surrendered his life estate in certain property to the person entitled in remainder, estate duty became payable upon the death of the tenant for life. By a marriage settlement dated July 13, 1853, the wife's property, present and future, was conveyed to trustees upon trust during the joint lives of the husband and wife to pay the income thereof to the wife for life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and, in case of her surviving her husband (which event happened), to pay the income to her and her assigns during her life, and, after her decease, as to the capital of the trust funds and the income thereof upon trust for the children of the marriage, with a power to the wife to appoint to one or more of them by deed or will after her husband's death. The husband died in 1885. By an indenture dated December 21, 1886, the wife appointed the property to the defendant, her son, subject to her life interest. By an indenture dated December 18, 1894, the wife surrendered to the trustees of the settlement her life interest in the property as specified in the schedule thereto, to the end and intent that such life interest might merge in the interest in remainder to the defendant. The wife died on August 27, 1896. The information claimed that upon the death of the wife estate duty became payable under section 2 subsection 1 (b) of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value of the trust property comprised in the schedule to the indenture of December 18, 1894, as property passing on her death. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the Crown.

MR. COZENS-HARDY, Q.C., and MR. LEVETT, Q.C. (Mr. W. M. Spence and Mr. Austen-Cartmell with them), appeared for the defendants; The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C. (Mr. Vaughan Hawkins with them), appeared for the Crown.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The question in this appeal is whether, when a tenant for life more than twelve months before his death absolutely and bona fide surrenders his life interest to the remainderman, this property is nevertheless, upon the death of the tenant for life, liable to estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894. The facts giving rise to the question are extremely short. By deed bearing date December 21, 1886, Eliza Beech, who had a life interest in certain trust funds, over which she had a power of appointment, appointed the funds, subject to her life interest therein, to her son Howard Beech. In the year 1894 Eliza Beech was desirous of surrendering her life interest in the trust funds for the benefit of her son Howard Beech, and by deed bearing date December 18, 1894, she surrendered her life interest in these funds "to the end and intent that such life interest might merge in the interest in remainder of her son Howard Beech, and that accordingly William Beech and Howard Beech as trustees might thenceforth hold the said trust funds in trust for the said Howard Beech, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns to be disposed of as he or they should direct." Upon the surrender of this life interest to Howard Beech he became absolute owner of these funds. Eliza Beech died upon August 27, 1896. These are the facts. The real point in my judgment for determination is, When did the life interest of Eliza Beech pass? Did it pass to her son, the remainderman, at the date of the surrender—viz., upon December 18, 1894—or did it pass to him at the death of Mrs. Beech upon August 27, 1896—i.e., 20 months after the surrender? Lengthened arguments have been addressed to us by the Attorney-General and Sir Robert Reid as to what was the intention of the Legislature when it passed the Act of 1894; but, as to this, I cannot do better than quote the words of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Halsbury) in the House of Lords when dealing with a similar argument addressed to the House upon a taxing Act in the case of "Tennant v. Smith" ([1892] A.C., at p. 154). The Lord Chancellor said:—"This is an income-tax Act, and what is intended to be taxed is income. And when I say 'what is intended to be taxed,' I mean what is the intention of the Act as expressed in its provisions, because in a taxing Act it is impossible, I believe, to assume any intention, any governing purpose in the Act, to do more than take such tax as the statute imposes. In various cases the principle of construction of a taxing Act has been referred to in various forms, but I believe they may be all reduced to this—that, inasmuch as you have no right to assume that there is any governing object which a taxing Act is intended to attain other than that which it has expressed by making such and such objects the intended subject for taxation, you must see whether a tax is expressly imposed. Cases, therefore, under the taxing Acts always resolve themselves into a question whether or not the words of the Act have reached the alleged subject of taxation. Lord Wensleydale said in In re Micklethwait (11 Exch., 456), "It is a well-established rule that the subject is not to be taxed without clear words for that purpose; and also that every Act of Parliament must be read according to the natural construction of its words." Now, what is it that the Finance Act, by the very words of the Act, levies a duty upon? The governing words of the Act are to be found clearly set out in sections 1 and 2. Section 1 enacts that "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act there shall . . . be levied and paid, upon the principal value . . . of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called estate duty." And section 2, subsection 1, follows up section 1, and enacts that "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following." What this is I will deal with hereafter. This Act, for the first time, imposes a duty upon all real or personal property, settled or not settled, which passes or is deemed to pass upon death. The time at which by the Act the duty is imposed is the moment of death; the property upon which the duty is imposed is the property which passes or is deemed to pass upon death. If no property passes or is deemed to pass upon death, no estate duty is leviable. If it be leviable, then the duty imposed is a duty upon the principal value of the property which passes or is deemed to pass upon death. This is what we decided in Earl Cowley's case ([1898] 1 Q.B., 355), though in that case we held that, as the life estate of the second Earl Cowley had been kept alive until his death, and was then subsisting, it was property which was deemed to pass within section 2, subsection 1 (b), of the Act upon the death of the second earl—a very different case from the present. I now come to section 2, subsection 1. It enacts that "property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include—(a) property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose; (b) property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest. The present case clearly does not fall within section 2, subsection 1 (a), for the owner of the life interest at the time of her death was not competent to dispose of it, for the simple reason that she had absolutely disposed of it more than one year and eight months before her death. Nor does it fall within subsection 1 (b), for the owner of the life interest had already disposed of it one year and eight months before her death, and had no interest ceasing on her death, nor had the remainderman any interest ceasing on her death, for at the date of the death of the owner of the life interest the remainderman had been absolutely entitled to the property for more than 20 months. This life interest had been extinguished and annihilated long before the death of the owner of the life interest, upon which event it is that the estate duty attaches upon the property which then passes. To no extent whatever did a benefit accrue or arise by cesser of the life interest upon the death of the owner of that interest, either to her or to the remainderman, or to any other person. In the face, however, of the clear words of the Act divers arguments were addressed to us by learned counsel for the Crown. It was argued that, as the owner of the life interest had had at one time a life interest in the property, it came within subsection 1 (b), but I would point out that this is not so; for the words are not "had had," as the Crown contended, but, on the contrary, are "had an interest ceasing upon the death of the deceased," and are not "has had an interest which had ceased before death." Take, for instance, the case of a remainderman dying in the lifetime of the surrenderor after an absolute surrender to him of a life interest. What duty would have to be paid upon the property which passed upon his death—that is, upon the death of the surrenderor, the remainderman? It is obvious to me that duty would have to be paid upon the principal value of the property which passed at the death of the remainderman. And yet, if the Crown be right, another duty would become payable upon the subsequent death of the owner of the life interest; for, upon the hypothesis which the Crown contends for, the life interest passes in such circumstances upon the death of the owner of the life interest. This appears to me with submission to be absurd. Another argument put forward by the Crown was that subsection 1 (b) deals with settlements, and so it does, but where in this subsection, or indeed in any other section, are to be found words showing that property which is non-existent passes or is deemed to pass upon death, and is subject to estate duty? Sections 5 and 7 were referred to, but, in my opinion, they show nothing of the kind. Again, the Crown argued that, if its contention were not correct, after the words "property in which the deceased or any other person" in subsection 1 (b) must be added the words "other than the remainderman"; for if they are not inserted the words "other person" embrace the remainderman. Assume they do, but how does this show that the life interest which has become extinct by the surrender is liable to estate duty? My brother Chitty during the argument answered another suggestion made on behalf of the Crown, which was that, if the Crown were not right in its contention, the case of a surrender of a life interest to a remainderman was the only case in which estate duty would not become payable upon the death of the owner of the life interest. My brother pointed out that this was not so, and he put the case of the cesser of a life interest with a gift over in fee upon the happening of an event which had happened, and the owner of the life interest not dying till years afterwards. Would estate duty become payable upon the death of the owner of the defunct life interest? I say not, but upon the death of the owner in fee it would be that the Crown would get the duty. The real truth of this case is that, after the surrender by the owner of the life interest to the remainderman, it having taken place more than 12 months before the death of such owner, her death, so far as estate duty is concerned, is a wholly immaterial matter, for her life estate had then ceased to exist and nothing passed at her death; see Radcliffe v. Bewes ([1892] 1 Ch., 227). The Attorney-General, to use his own expression, stated that, if we decided against him, we should knock the bottom out of the Finance Act, for he argued that our judgment would permit any tenant for life upon his death-bed to surrender his life estate to the remainderman and thus defeat the duty. He argued that section 2, subsection 1 (c), of the Finance Act, which relates to gifts inter vivos less than 12 months before death, and which incorporates and amends section 2 of 44 Vict., c. 12, and section 11 (1) of 52 Vict., c. 7, did not apply to the case. That section 2, subsection 1 (c), is a very remarkable piece of legislation no one can deny, and if what the Attorney-General says is the effect of it the Legislature, by the circuitous route it has adopted, has obviously failed to carry out its object; but, if this be so, all I can say is so much the worse for the Crown. The true construction of this composite section is wholly immaterial to the present case, and I give no opinion as to its true construction, though the argument upon it struck me as remarkable, coming as it did from learned counsel for the Crown. For the reasons above I think the Crown is wrong, and that Eliza Beech's property in the trust funds, which consisted of a life interest therein, and which came to an end 29 months before her death, is not liable to estate duty upon her death as contended for by the Crown, and that this appeal must therefore be allowed with costs.

*Reported by F. G. BUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read the following judgment:—I am of the same opinion. Upon the execution of the deed of December 18, 1894, the appellant, Howard Beech, became absolutely entitled in equity in possession to the trust property, upon the principal value whereof the estate duty is claimed by the information. The effect of the deed was to merge his mother's life interest in the immediate reversion then vested in him. The life interest was finally extinguished and ceased to exist. Thenceforth he was the sole owner of the entire beneficial interest in the property. He had all the rights of a beneficial owner. He could have sold or assigned the property or mortgaged it or otherwise disposed of it as he thought fit. He could have required his co-trustee to make it over to himself or his assigns. The merger of the life interest was as complete as it would have been if the property had been land and the estates legal. All these propositions are incontrovertible. They are the result of the simple application of an ordinary and well-established rule of equity to the facts of the case. The ground being thus cleared, the question, as it appears to me, is narrowed down to this—Has the Finance Act, 1894, Part I. (the only part with which we have to deal), kept alive the life interest of Mrs. Beech for the purposes of the Act, so as to render the property liable to estate duty on her death, notwithstanding the merger? It is unquestionably within the competence of Parliament when imposing a tax to modify or abrogate for the purposes of the Act any rule of law or equity which otherwise would be applicable to the subject matter. Whether it has done so or not must always be a question of the true construction of the particular statute under consideration. The right and, indeed, the only method of interpretation is to ascertain the intention of the Legislature from the language and provisions of the Act itself. In construing a statute regard must be had to the ordinary rules of law applicable to the subject matter, and these rules must prevail except in so far as the statute shows that they are to be disregarded: and the burden of showing that they are to be disregarded rests upon those who seek to maintain that proposition. It is incumbent on the Crown when claiming the tax to make out affirmatively that the case falls within the statute. The principles applicable to the interpretation of a taxing Act are laid down by the Lord Chancellor in the passage already cited. You must see that the tax is expressly imposed; the subject is not to be taxed without clear words, and the Act, like every other Act, must be read according to the natural construction of the words. In construing this particular Act I am unable to derive any assistance from the authorities or the dicta on the Succession Duty Act. The two Acts are framed on entirely different lines. The scheme of the Finance Act, Part I., is to be found in section 1, which is more fully developed and explained in the subsequent sections, the most important of which for the present purposes is section 2. The effect of these two sections is to impose the tax on property which passes or is deemed to pass on death. Stated simply, but with sufficient accuracy for the present purposes, section 1 runs thus:—In the case of every person dying after August 1, 1894, there shall be levied and paid upon the principal value of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty called estate duty at the graduated rates after mentioned. For the duty to attach under this section it is essential that there be a passing of property on the death of the person so dying. In my judgment it is clear that this case does not fall within the section. No property passed on Mrs. Beech's death. Her life interest had passed more than a year before she died. The property remained unaffected by her death. If the appellant, Howard Beech, had died in her lifetime the property would have passed on his death, and the duty would have been leviable. The fact that she was then alive would have been wholly immaterial. Her subsequent death would have been equally immaterial. Yet to be consistent on this section, it must be said for the Crown that a new or further duty would have been payable on her subsequent death. The claim for the duty is rested substantially on section 2. I pass over subsection 1 (a), which has already been sufficiently dealt with by Lord Justice Smith, and go to subsection 1 (b). The effect of it is as follows:—Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest. Mrs. Beech had formerly a life interest in the property, but it had ceased more than a year before her death. The words are "ceasing on the death of the deceased." They import, according to their grammatical and natural meaning, that the interest ceases presently on the death. The argument for the Crown alters the words. It attempts to read the words as if they included the case of having previously had an interest which had ceased before the death. In my opinion the interest which ceases must be an interest which ceases on the death. I agree with what Lord Justice Rigby said in "Cowley's" case, ([1898] 1 Q.B., p. 375). Where the interest is a life interest it need not be a life interest in the deceased; the deceased may have been merely a cestui que vie, the beneficial interest being vested in some other person. The subsection is not confined to life interests, it would embrace any other case of an interest ceasing on the death. But, confining myself for the moment and for the sake of clearness to a life interest, it appears to me that the argument for the Crown requires the insertion of words to the effect that a life interest for the purpose of the subsection shall be deemed to continue down to the death of the deceased notwithstanding it has been previously determined by merger. I cannot find any such words, nor words from which any such implication can be reasonably said to arise. Certainly there are no clear words to that effect. During the argument I put a case to the counsel for the Crown, on which I received no clear or satisfactory answer. Supposing a life interest is limited to a man for his life subject to a condition of cesser if he shall attempt to alienate, and he does attempt to alienate, whereby his life interest ceases on that attempt, or supposing property to be limited to a widow subject to a provision that if she marries again her interest shall cease, and she does marry again, whereby her life interest ceases on her second marriage, do these cases fall within the subsection? In my opinion they clearly would not. Much was said upon opening the door to evasion. Would these be cases of evasion? Certainly not. Indeed, the whole argument on evasion of the Act is fallacious. The case either falls within the Act or it does not. If it does not, there is no such thing as an evasion. If a tax is imposed on using a crest or coat of arms and a man who has previously used them ceases to use them in order to be free from the tax, there is no evasion of the Act in any sense of the term legitimately used. I now ask, What is the difference between the two hypothetical cases

I have put and the case before us? I can see none. In the case before us the general law of merger whereby the life interest ceased was brought into operation by the lawful act of the parties. In the hypothetical cases the life interests cease by the acts of the parties bringing into operation a limitation of cesser to which the law gives effect. Turning back to the subsection, I will deal briefly with the words "or any other person," on which great stress was laid in the argument for the Crown. They carry the case of the deceased being a mere cestui que vie. Restricting myself again to the case of a life interest, but merely for the sake of clearness, they include a life interest originally vested in the deceased, which has been assigned or transferred to some other person and is still subsisting at the death. They would include other like cases, but they do not apply where the interest has ceased before the death. The words remaining to be considered are "to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises on the death of the deceased." They were dealt with by the Court in Cowley's case, and more particularly by Lord Justice Rigby. I agree with what he said in his judgment at pp. 376, 377. He said that the words did not involve any departure from the principle that the Act takes no notice of successions, and that they "only limit the operation of the word 'ceasing' by confining it to cases where something passes and to the extent to which anything does pass." And again, "they are there used . . . as a measure of the extent to which the property in which the interest ceases is to be deemed to pass, and section 7, subsection 7, only shows the way of applying that measure." He afterwards dealt with section 7. I think it unnecessary to add anything on that section. In support of their main contention counsel for the appellants referred to subsection 1 (c), and contended that, if the merger had taken place within a year before Mrs. Beech's death, the gift of her life interest would have brought the case within the Act. In my opinion their main contention did not require this support. For the Crown, however, it was contended that a gift of the life interest would not have fallen within the reach of the statutes mentioned in this complicated section. Legislation by reference to other statutes which are at the same time altered by the enacting statute is a risky method, and sometimes fails in accomplishing the object in view. I will assume that counsel for the Crown are right in their contention, but without expressing any opinion one way or the other on the point. On this assumption the result is simply this. The Legislature contemplated that recourse would be had to methods of attempting to escape from the tax, and closed the door against some of these attempts, but left it open where there was a gift of a life interest in the deceased made more than 12 months before the death. In other words, the Legislature (whether intentionally or not it is beyond our province to inquire) has failed or omitted to hit that particular case. I have dealt only with the main points argued for the Crown. There were some further points raised, but in my opinion they do not affect the real question, and with all due respect to the counsel who raised them I think it unnecessary to notice them in detail. In the judgments delivered in the Divisional Court some observations were made on conveyancers and the rules of conveyancing. I am unable to see the bearing of those observations. Conveyancers did not invent the rules of merger either at law or in equity, nor are they responsible for them. Their function is to understand the doctrine of merger and to apply it practically where it is applicable.

ROPER V. KNOTT.*

Criminal Law—Malicious Injuries to Property
Act, 24 and 25 Vic., c. 97—Wilful or malicious damage.

An act done with the knowledge that damage will result is an act of wilful damage.

"Hall v. Richardson" (6 The Times L.R., 71, and 54 J.P., 345) disapproved.

This was a case stated by a magistrate which had been argued before a Divisional Court consisting of two Judges, and was then reserved for a special Divisional Court. The question raised was whether a man who takes milk round for his master and waters the milk for his own purposes can be convicted of malicious injury to personal property. The magistrate, relying on the case of "Hall v. Richardson" (6 The Times L.R., 71, and 54 J.P., 345), had refused to convict.

Mr. Avery appeared on behalf of the appellant; the defendant was not represented.

The case stated by a metropolitan magistrate gave these facts:—A charge was made against Charles Knott that he did wilfully damage, injure, or spoil four gallons of milk, the property of Robert Roper, contrary to section 52 of the Malicious Injuries to Property Act, 24 and 25 Vic., c. 97. The appellant is a milk salesman carrying on business in Hornsey, and the respondent, who was a milk carrier in his employ, was in the habit of coming to the place of business every morning to fetch milk, which he subsequently sold to the appellant's customers. The respondent was seen to conceal a three-pint can full of water in a garden of a house near the appellant's premises. The respondent was then seen to fetch four gallons of milk in a barrow from the appellant's premises (which in the ordinary course would be sold and delivered by him to the appellant's customers), and bring it opposite to the said garden. He then was seen to pour the three pints of water out of the can into the said milk. The magistrate found that the whole of the said milk, after it had been so watered, was in fact damaged and spoiled, and was thrown away. He also found that the respondent acted in a fraudulent way, and that his object in adding water was to increase the bulk and to put the money into his own pocket by selling and not accounting for the surplus. The question for the Court was whether the respondent could be convicted of the said offence.

Mr. AVORY cited "Hall v. Richardson" (6 The Times L.R., 71, and 54 J.P., 345), "Reg. v. Pemberton" (L.R., 2 C.C.R. 119, 43 L.J., M.C., 91), "Hamilton v. Bow" (1888) 52 J.P., 726. He contended that the respondent ought to be convicted. It was no answer for a person doing an act of which the natural consequence would be to damage property that it was not his intention to injure it.

The COURT thought there should be a conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said the question for the Court was whether the magistrate ought to have convicted. Having regard to the case of "Hall v. Richardson," it was quite natural that the magistrate should have decided not to convict. The charge was founded on section 52 of 24 and 25 Viet., c. 97. The facts were that the complainant was a milk seller and the respondent was a man in his employ who distributed the milk. Suspicions had been aroused against the respondent, and he was detected adding water to milk which it was his duty to deliver to the customers in the condition in which it was when he received it. The result of his action was that the four gallons of milk were spoiled, and the master lost about 10s. The respondent had done this with a fraudulent intention, though he had no personal malice against his master. Under these circumstances could the respondent be convicted of an offence within the section? The statute began with enumerating a series of specific cases of damage to realty and personality. Section 51 dealt with cases of injury, for which no punishment was before provided, to an amount exceeding £5 committed "unlawfully and maliciously." Then came section 52, in which the language was different, for it provided that whosoever should "wilfully or maliciously" commit any damage, injury, or spoil upon any real or personal property for which no punishment was before provided should be liable to imprisonment or fine. It was therefore clear that a distinction was to be drawn between acts wilful and malicious and acts wilful but not malicious. Now, was this a case of injury? The finding of the magistrate was an answer to that question, for he had found that the ten gallons of milk had been, in fact, damaged. Was this injury done wilfully? There was no doubt that it was. The respondent did the thing that caused the injury, intending to do it with the fraudulent motive of getting the price into his own pocket. A man did a thing wilfully if he intentionally did the thing that caused the damage either with the intention of doing the damage or intentionally did it knowing that it would cause the damage. This was a case of wilful damage within the section. Coming to the case of "Hall v. Richardson" (6 The Times L.R., 71, and 54 J.P., 345) in 1890, it was most natural, under the circumstances of that case, that the magistrate and Court should have been slow to convict, for there the man, who had accidentally spilt some milk and filled up his can with water, had no intention to defraud; but this Court could not shrink from the obligation of considering that case and did not approve of it. There was—first, the cardinal error that there was a confusion between damage to the thing and the consequent loss to the owner, but, in his opinion, the offence was committed even if the wilful damage to the thing did not cause loss to the owner. Secondly, in that case Lord Coleridge seemed to have come to the conclusion that there must be an intention to damage somebody. That, however, was not what the statute aimed at, which was damage to property. Thirdly, the power to give compensation provided by the section was apparently considered by the Judges in that case as showing that the section was limited to cases for which compensation might be awarded. The section, however, did not say so. In this case the appeal must be allowed and the case be remitted to the magistrate.

MR. JUSTICE DAY concurred.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS added some observations on the case of "Gardner v. Mansbridge" (19 Q.B.D., 217), which had been cited on the former occasion, and added, as an explanation of the word "wilfully," that if a man did a thing occasioning damage to property, but not knowing that it would do harm, he could not be convicted within the section.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM concurred in the judgment of the Court. By section 52 it was intended to sweep in a great number of small offences. The change of language from "unlawfully and maliciously" to "wilfully or maliciously" indicated that. There were three questions to ask:—(1) Was there property? Milk certainly was property. (2) Was it damaged? The magistrate had found that it was? (3) Was the damage done wilfully? The answer was that it was done intentionally for the benefit of the respondent. It was, therefore, done wilfully. All these questions being answered in the affirmative, the case came within the section. He agreed in the observations of the Lord Chief Justice upon the case of "Hall v. Richardson."

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, and MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred.

Licensing Acts—Confirmation of licence—Licensing Act, 1872, sec. 43—Rules made by Justices—Ultra vires.

This case came on as an argument to make absolute a rule nisi for a mandamus to the licensing justices sitting as confirmation committee of the City of London to hear William Henry Needes in opposition to the application of Vergilio Guidotti for a full licence in respect of the premises known as 11, Bridge-street, Westminster.

Mr. Scrutton appeared for the applicant Guidotti, and Mr. Candy, Q.C. and Mr. Peter Grain for the objector, William Henry Needes.

The application was made by the objector on the ground that Rule 30 of the Standing Orders of Quarter Sessions for the County of London was ultra vires. The rule in question directs that any person who desires to oppose the confirmation of a licence granted by the justices must, within seven days after the grant of such licence, give notice in writing to the applicant and the clerk of the peace of his intention to oppose the confirmation of it. The licence was granted on March 25. The applicant did not take the necessary steps to entitle him to appear before the confirming committee to oppose until April 17, ten days before the day fixed for the sitting of the committee. He then served the proper notice on the applicant and tendered a duplicate copy to the clerk of the peace. The latter declined to receive it on the ground that it was useless unless delivered within the prescribed period of seven days. The applicant had also omitted to enter into his own recognizance and find one surety for £20 to be answerable for the costs of his appearance, which was prescribed by Rule 31 of the standing orders. The confirming committee, in consequence of the failure of the applicant to comply with the rules, declined to hear his opposition.

MR. CANDY, Q.C., argued that the power granted to the justices by section 43 of the Licensing Act, 1872, to make rules did not entitle them to make such a rule as that before the Court. In support of his argument he quoted the following cases:—"Rex v. Norfolk Justices" (5 B. and Ad., 990); "Rex v. Staffordshire Justices" (4 A. and C., 842); "Reg. v. Surrey Justices" (18 L.J., 175); "Reg. v. Pawlett" (L.R., 8 Q.B., 491).

At the conclusion of the arguments, their LORDSHIPS decided that though the objects of the rules might be effected in another way, they were of opinion that the rules as they stood were undoubtedly ultra vires, and the rule for a mandamus was made absolute.

Receiver—Liability—Rent of premises—Receiver held not personally liable.

The plaintiff in this case was the owner of some stables in Bloomsbury. By indenture dated April 12, 1886, he demised them to Charles Shurey for 13 years subject to the usual covenants, and in April, 1892, Shurey assigned the lease to Purkess and Company (Limited). A debenture-holder's action was brought against the company and on March 30, 1894, the defendant was appointed by the Court of Chancery receiver and manager for the debenture-holders. In August, 1894, the plaintiff wrote to the company asking for the half-year's rent due at the previous midsummer, and the defendant replied by a letter written on the company's notepaper and signed "A. A. James, Receiver and Manager," enclosing the rent. In this action the plaintiff sought to make the defendant personally liable for use and occupation of the premises.

Mr. LUSH WILSON, Q.C. (Mr. George Wallace and Mr. Lucy Smith with him), for the plaintiff, argued that the receiver and manager was personally liable and must look to the assets of the company to recoup him. "Burt v. Bull" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 276), and "Owen v. Cronk" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 265). As between a receiver and manager and any customer the effect of signing as receiver and manager was to warrant that he had funds. A receiver and manager was in the position of an executor carrying on a business and such a person would be personally liable if he entered into possession and paid rent. "In re Bowes" (37 Ch.D., 128). Defendant's proper course was to have gone to the Court and produced an account and asked permission to surrender the lease. Form 577 in Palmer's Company Precedents showed that this was the practice.

Mr. BOSANQUET, Q.C. (Mr. R. B. D. Acland with him), for the defendant.—The plaintiff had let the premises for an unexpired period to Shurey, who was still liable. In such a case the owner can only sue two persons—i.e., the original lessee and an assignee who is liable upon the covenants. Two things are necessary for an action for use and occupation—first, that the owner be entitled to immediate possession; and, secondly, that the owner should have allowed the defendant to be in under some sort of contract. Here neither of these conditions was present. "Burt v. Bull" was a case where a receiver and manager had made a contract for goods. Here defendant had made no contract. The defendant was clearly not an assignee under the lease and covenants, and otherwise he could not be sued. 11 Geo. II., c. 19, s. 14, had no effect where there was a deed.

Mr. LUSH WILSON, in reply.—The rule that where a deed exists no action for use and occupation lies only applies to an action against the tenant under the deed, "Williams v. Heales" (L.R., 9 C.P., 177). There may be one tenant by deed and another by estoppel.

Mr. JUSTICE RIDLEY said there would be judgment for the defendant. The case rested on the letters asking for and enclosing rent, and on these defendant was said to be estopped from denying his liability. This case was not governed by "Burt v. Bull." There the receiver and manager had entered into a contract; here he had not; he had only, in reply to a demand, paid rent due from the company. Neither did "Williams v. Heales" apply. The action was wrongly brought for use and occupation, but it was not a case for amendment, as the interests of justice did not require that the defendant should be made personally liable.

Stay of execution was granted pending appeal.

Divorce—Practice—Appeal—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895—Appeal from magistrates—Duty of magistrates' clerk to supply notes of the evidence.

This was an appeal under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, by Mrs. Elizabeth Robinson from a refusal of the Watford justices on March 22 last to grant her a judicial separation, and a maintenance order against her husband Henry Robinson, on the ground of his persistent cruelty, which had caused her to leave and live apart from him.

Mr. G. M. COHEN was for the wife; Mr. Turrell for the husband.

Mr. COHEN, in opening the appeal, said that he was much hampered by the fact that the magistrates' clerk had refused to give his client a copy of the depositions, and by the fact that apparently the magistrates themselves had taken no note.

The PRESIDENT.—Do you really mean to say that a magistrates' clerk has refused to supply this Court with a copy of the depositions? Perhaps you mean that none were taken.

Mr. COHEN.—They were refused, my Lord.

The PRESIDENT.—Refused?

Mr. COHEN.—Yes. I must ask your Lordships to say that this appeal cannot be properly heard without the depositions, and that it must be adjourned for the magistrates' clerk to supply them at his own expense.

The PRESIDENT.—Have we that power?

Mr. COHEN.—I should submit that a refusal to supply this Court with depositions under this Act amounts to contempt of Court.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not like to say anything at this moment until I know what reasons may be given for the refusal to supply them.

Mr. JUSTICE BARNES.—I see we have a newspaper report of the inquiry supplied to us. If that could be verified in any way—

Mr. TURRELL.—I am content that your Lordships should treat that report as the notes of the evidence. There are no depositions strictly, this not being an indictable offence.

The PRESIDENT.—If I had the power I would compel the magistrates' clerk to produce his notes of evidence.

Mr. COHEN.—I submit that Rule 8, order 59, gives your Lordship power.

The PRESIDENT.—In an early case decided under this Act ("Harling v. Harling," 74 L.T., 559, and The Times, March 4, 1896) we expressed our opinion that a full note should be taken of the evidence, and that the magistrates' reasons for deciding the case should also be stated. I may add that in every case up to the time we have been supplied with an excellent note.

Mr. COHEN.—Before the case was heard the chairman said, "Cannot this case be settled out of Court?" and after the summons had been dismissed the chairman "expressed the hope that the husband and wife would settle their dispute and live together peacefully. In a few years' time they would, no doubt, laugh together at having brought their trouble for the Bench to settle." The parties were married in April, 1896, and in September, 1897—the wife being then enroute—the husband smacked her face and pushed her about so as to cause her to scream. In January last she was delivered of a child, who only lived a few minutes.

*Reported by J. H. MURPHY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The husband wished to have it buried in a box as a stillborn child, and he was very angry because funeral expenses were incurred owing to the child having breathed. In February, before the wife had really recovered from the effects of her confinement, he beat her with a toasting-fork and pulled her out of bed on to the floor because she complained of his coming to bed with his boots on. He further said, "I'm an Englishman," and struck her. He had also said that "he would swing for her" and would have nothing more to do with her. Under these circumstances there could be no doubt that the husband's course of conduct was dangerous to the wife's health, that it was persistent, and that there was a danger that it would be repeated.

MR. JUSTICE BARNES.—Her evidence stands uncontradicted.

THE PRESIDENT.—The wife's cross-examination does not raise any denial or suggest any defence.

MR. TURRELL, for the husband, regretted the absence of the notes of evidence, for which his client was in no way responsible, and submitted that it had not been shown that the husband's conduct caused the wife to leave him and live apart.

THE PRESIDENT.—She did leave him, and before the magistrates her solicitor, in answer to the chairman, said that she would never go back to him.

MR. TURRELL.—All the magistrates said was that until a different class of case was established against the husband they did not consider that a case for granting a judicial separation had been made out under the Act. The husband's case was never therefore heard.

THE PRESIDENT.—Can you resist the case going back to the magistrates?

MR. TURRELL.—I should submit that the magistrates were justified in holding that no case of persistent cruelty causing the wife to leave her husband had been made out.

THE PRESIDENT.—This case comes before us in a most unsatisfactory form, owing to the fact that we have not been supplied with the proper materials for enabling us to hear and determine this appeal. When this Act came into force we stated that the Court should in these cases be furnished with proper notes of evidence, and with the justices' reasons for determining the cases. This I may say we have been supplied with in every case, and although this necessarily imposes a little extra trouble upon the justices and their clerks, I must remind them that the Legislature has under this Act given justices a very important jurisdiction in matters of such vital moment that it has also felt it necessary to allow a full appeal to this Court in both questions of law and fact. In this case we are told that the justices' clerk has declined to supply a note of the evidence. I cannot believe, nay, I decline to believe, that any justices' clerk has refused to supply this Court with a note of evidence. I can only regret that the note taken was of such little value that the justices' clerk must have thought it would be of no assistance to this Court. After dealing with the evidence, his Lordship said that a prima facie case had undoubtedly been made out against the husband, yet the justices in their wisdom thought that the summons should be dismissed rather than take the serious step of separating a wife from her husband. After referring to the chairman's remarks at the end of the case his Lordship concluded,—"I need say no more, with all due respect to the justices, than this—they have not decided the matter which they had before them to decide. This case must go back for the justices to decide according to the law of the land."

MR. JUSTICE BARNES.—I entirely agree. I need only say that in my opinion it is essential that the notes of evidence and the justices' reasons for their decision should be taken down at the time, as an appeal lies to this Court on both questions of fact and law.

The case was accordingly sent back to the justices for hearing. An order for the wife's costs was made.

CROCKER, AND OTHERS.*

Insurance—Marine—Loss by stranding—Negligence of assured—Liability of underwriters.

When the proximate cause of a loss is a peril of the sea, the fact that it was brought about by the negligent navigation of the assured affords no defence to the underwriters.

Decision of Kennedy, J. (13 The Times L.R., 502), affirmed.

These were appeals from judgments of Mr. Justice Kennedy, before whom the actions were tried without a jury. The actions were brought in the interest of the owners of the sailing ship Gainsborough on policies of marine insurance effected with the defendants respectively. The action against the Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company was on a policy on freight. The action against the North Queensland Insurance Company was on the hull of the Gainsborough, and is reported in 13 The Times L.R., at p. 502. The action against Weston, Crocker, and others was on a policy of disbursements. The Gainsborough, while on a voyage covered by the policies, stranded on the island of Oahu, near Honolulu, on August 29, 1896. The master was the owner of forty-two sixty-fourths of the ship, and was one of the plaintiffs in the actions. In another action, "The Westport Coal Company (Limited) v. McPhail and Others," brought by the cargo-owners against the ship-owners, which was tried before Mr. Justice Kennedy with a special jury a few days before these actions were tried, the jury arrived at certain findings, which it was agreed should be taken to be findings in these cases. One of such findings was that the stranding was due to the negligence, but not the wilful negligence, of the master in the navigation of the ship. The learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs in each of the actions. The defendants appealed on two grounds—(1) That no notice of abandonment had been given; (2) that the loss had been caused by the personal negligence of the assured.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the defendants in each action; Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Joseph Hurst for the plaintiffs.

THE COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day, dismissing the appeals.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment in the first case:—This is an action by a ship-owner for a total loss of freight upon a policy of marine insurance covering freight, and the first point taken by the defendants, who are an underwriting company, is that as neither the ship carrying the goods for the carriage of which the freight was to be earned nor the goods themselves were actual total losses, notice of abandonment must have been given by the plaintiff to the underwriters upon freight to entitle him to recover for total loss of freight. The second point is that, as the stranding of the vessel which brought about the loss of freight sued for was caused by the negligent navigation, though not the wilful act, of the plaintiff the assured (he being part owner and captain of the ship), he cannot recover upon the policy. The facts are as follows:—On May 27, 1896, the plaintiff caused a policy of marine insurance to be effected with the defendants on his and his co-owners' behalf against perils of the sea upon "freight chartered or as if chartered" in the ship Gainsborough from Sydney to Newcastle, New South Wales, while there and thence to any port or ports in New Zealand, while there and thence to San Francisco. When the ship was proceeding on her voyage from New Zealand to San Francisco with a cargo of coals, the plaintiff found himself short of water and thereupon justifiably, as it has been held, put into Honolulu for water. Upon nearing Honolulu on Saturday, August 29, 1896, owing, as it has been found, to his negligent navigation, the ship was run upon and became firmly stranded upon a reef and commenced at once to make water. Endeavours were made to get her off by means of towing but without avail, seas were washing over her decks, she was bumping heavily upon the reef and kept going further on, her cargo became wetted by the sea water, and the ship and cargo were in a very critical and perilous position. In these circumstances the plaintiff took the opinion of Lloyd's agent at Honolulu, together with that of the harbour-master there and of a Captain Campbell, and they agreed in advising him that, considering the condition and position of the ship and cargo, they should be at once sold; and upon Monday, August 31, they were accordingly sold, situated as they were, and realized the sum of £374, the purchaser Allen having also to pay some charges to the amount of £43. It has been found that this sale was not justified at the time it took place, but my brother Kennedy, who tried the case, has found that the sale, although premature, must have taken place within a few days of the time at which it did. The ship and cargo remained upon the reef until September 26, when Allen commenced operations in order to get the ship and cargo off, a steam pump having by that time been obtained. Some 200 tons of coals were then jettisoned, and upon October 4 the ship, with the remainder of her cargo in her, was got off. This coal when got out of the ship was sold at Honolulu by Allen for £1,000. Without dealing with the evidence in detail, in my judgment it shows that the sea damage which the ship had sustained—situated, as she was, 2,000 miles from San Francisco, which was the nearest port at which the ship could be repaired to make her a cargo-carrying ship, and then only at a cost which would have exceeded the value of the ship when repaired—was such as would have justified an abandonment of the ship and a claim against the underwriters upon the ship for a total loss. The learned Judge has found that "it was not a practicable thing to carry on the cargo either in the stranded ship or in any other ship, for none could be obtained, and that it could not have been carried on, and no abandonment would have enabled the assurers to do so; that the cargo, although it did not actually perish, was in a condition in which it was not doubtful whether notice of abandonment could give the assurers any advantage, for it was quite clear it would not; that the cargo would have had to be sold at Honolulu, and that the freight by reason of the stranding was an actual total loss, and that there was a destruction of the voyage." These being the findings of the learned Judge, as there was clearly evidence to support them, I see no ground for differing from him. There was no telegraphic communication between Honolulu and San Francisco or anywhere else. Honolulu was, as before stated, 2,000 miles from San Francisco, and this was the nearest place to Honolulu wherefrom to communicate with England. Had notice of abandonment of freight been given by the plaintiff from Honolulu, as the underwriters upon freight now contend it should have been, it would have taken from five to six weeks before the underwriters could have communicated with Honolulu. The evidence shows that the coal in its wet state could not have been carried on board any ship from Honolulu to San Francisco by reason of its inflammable condition and liability to spontaneous combustion. It could have been dried at Honolulu, but it was proved that the process of unshipping, drying, reshipping, and afterwards conveying coal on to its destination is such that, besides the heavy cost of drying, the coal itself becomes greatly deteriorated and damaged, and, as before stated, the learned Judge has found that the sale of the coal at Honolulu must have taken place within a few days of the time at which it was actually sold. It was argued for the underwriters that as there was no actual total loss of the ship, for she remained a ship after the stranding and is so still, and as there was no actual total loss of the cargo, for it remained coal after the stranding as before though wetted and greatly deteriorated and depreciated in value, the assured could not recover for a total loss of freight unless notice of abandonment of freight had been given to the underwriters upon freight. Now the question of giving notice of abandonment upon a policy covering freight is distinct from the question of giving notice of abandonment upon a policy on a ship, and they must be kept apart. At one time there was a conflict of opinion upon this question of giving notice of abandonment, Lord Abinger in "Roux v. Salvador" (3 Bing., N.C., 236) holding that there were cases in which, although the subject matter insured against remained in specie, notice of abandonment need not be given; Lord Campbell on the contrary ("Knight v. Faith," 15 Q.B., 649) holding that notice of abandonment must be given in all cases except in cases of actual total loss. This controversy was finally, as regards a policy on freight, determined in the case of "Potter v. Rankin" (L.R., 6 E. and I., 83), in the House of Lords, in which case the Judges were called in to advise the House as to the necessity of an assured upon freight in all cases giving notice of abandonment in the case of a constructive total loss of ship before he could recover for a total loss of freight. Lord Abinger's view was supported. In "Potter v. Rankin" the appellants, the underwriters upon freight, contended that, by the insurance law of England, where the thing insured against existed in kind, however deteriorated or damaged, there could be no total loss without notice of abandonment, and one of the questions asked by the House of the Judges was this:—Was notice of abandonment, either of ship or freight, or of both, necessary to enable the plaintiff to recover for a total loss on a policy on freight? In this case the subject matter of insurance was chartered freight. His Lordship read passages from the opinions of Mr. Justice Brett and Mr. Justice Blackburn and from the judgment of the Lord Chancellor and continued:—It seems to me that in the present case, applying the principles laid down in "Potter v. Rankin," the circumstances were such as (a) to authorize an abandonment of the ship on a policy on ship; (b) that there was no chance of an opportunity of the cargo being forwarded in a substituted ship, for no other could be obtained; (c) that this was not a matter of doubt; (d) that the ship herself could earn no freight on the voyage insured; (e) that there was nothing which the underwriters upon freight could have done had notice of abandonment been given to them, and it would have only been an idle ceremony to have done so. His Lordship then referred to the case of

"Kaltenbach v. Mackenzie" (3 C.P.D., 467), and continued:—I am of opinion, therefore, that this first point as to the necessity of there being a notice of abandonment given in this case fails the defendants. The second point taken is that inasmuch as the ship was run upon the reef by the negligent navigation, though not wilful act, of the captain, as he was one of the assured he cannot recover upon the policy. It cannot be doubted that a policy upon ship covering perils of the sea covers a loss brought about by the negligent navigation of the captain and crew, if such loss is immediately caused by a peril of the sea. It was held over 50 years ago in "Dixon v. Sadler" (5 M. and W., 414) that an assured of ship makes no warranty to the underwriters that the master and crew will do their duty during the voyage, and consequently their negligence is no defence to an action on a policy when the loss is brought about by their negligent navigation, if the loss is immediately occasioned by the perils of the sea. Mr. Baron Parke, when delivering the judgment of the Court, cited five cases in support of this proposition commencing as far back as the year 1818 with the case of "Busk v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company" (2 B. and Ald., 73). That the negligent navigation of a ship by a person other than the assured affords no defence to an action upon a policy of marine insurance against perils of the sea, when the loss is immediately occasioned by a peril of the sea, is clear, the reason in my opinion being that what is insured against is a peril of the sea, which is none the less a peril of the sea though brought about by negligent navigation. Is there then any warranty by a part-owner, if he be one of the assured, that he will not personally be guilty of negligent navigation during the voyage covered by the policy? We are not dealing with a loss brought about by the wilful act of an assured. Negligent navigation has never been held to be equivalent to "dolus," or the "misconduct" which is spoken of by Lord Campbell in "Thompson v. Hopper" (6 E. and B., 937), nor is it the negligence referred to by Lord Ellenborough in "Bell v. Carstairs" (14 East., 374). It cannot be doubted that the legal maxim, In jure non remota causa sed proxima spectatur, applies when considering what are the particular perils for which an insurer undertakes to be liable on a policy of marine insurance, if such maxim contravenes no principle of insurance law, and is not hostile to the manifest intention of the parties (see per Lord Campbell in "Thompson v. Hopper"). It is not disputed at the bar that negligence of an assured upon a fire policy, whereby the fire was occasioned which caused the loss, affords no defence to the insurer. Why so? Because loss by fire is what is insured against. And so in a marine policy sea perils are what is insured against. The risk undertaken by an underwriter upon a policy covering perils of the sea is that if the subject matter insured is lost or damaged immediately by a peril of the sea, he will be responsible; and in my judgment it matters not if the loss or damage is remotely caused by the negligent navigation of the captain or crew or of the assured himself, always assuming that the loss is not occasioned by the wilful act of the assured. In the last case the maxim above referred to does not apply for the reasons pointed out by Lord Campbell in "Thompson v. Hopper," for then not only does the maxim contravene the principles of insurance law and the manifest intention of the parties, but it is qualified by another legal maxim, Dolus circūitus non purgatur. I believe that there cannot be found in the insurance law of England a single case to support the proposition now contended for by the underwriters, which is that, assuming the loss has not been occasioned by the wilful act or default of the assured, but is immediately caused by a peril of the sea, the remote and not the proximate cause is to be looked to. His Lordship referred again to "Thompson v. Hopper," and also to "Dudgeon v. Penbroke" (2 App. Ca., 284), as authorities supporting that which he held to be the law. In conclusion he said that he agreed with the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read a judgment to the same effect.

The LORD CHANCELLOR concurred.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the two other appeals depended upon the case which they had just decided, and that they also would be dismissed.

THE WESTPORT COAL COMPANY (LIMITED) v. MCPHAIL AND OTHERS.*

Ship—Bill of lading—Exception of negligence of master—Master a co-owner.

An exception in the bill of lading exempting the owners from liability for the negligence of the master will protect the master himself where he is one of the co-owners.

Decision of Kennedy, J. (13 The Times L.R., p. 497), reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy in an action arising out of the same facts as the above cases. This action was brought by the owners of a cargo of coal shipped on board the Gainsborough against McPhail, the master and part owner, and his co-owners of the ship for breach of the contract contained in a bill of lading to deliver the said cargo. The case is reported in 13 The Times L.R., at p. 497. The action was tried before Mr. Justice Kennedy with a special jury. The jury found that the cargo had been lost on the voyage owing to the negligence, but not the wilful negligence, of the master; and that the sale of the cargo by the master after the stranding of the Gainsborough was unnecessary. The bill of lading contained the following exception among others:—"The neglect and default of pilot, master, or crew in the navigation of the ship, collisions, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever are excepted." The learned Judge on these findings gave judgment for the plaintiffs against the defendant McPhail, on the ground that the exception was not meant to except persons for their own neglect; and he gave judgment for the other defendants on the ground that they were entitled to the protection of the exception. The defendant McPhail appealed.

Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Joseph Hurst appeared for the defendant; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton for the plaintiffs.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read the judgment of the Court as follows:—This is an action by owners and shippers of coal upon a bill of lading signed by the defendant McPhail, who, as master, on behalf of himself and his co-owners of the ship Gainsborough, signed the bill of lading for the coal shipped thereon; and the facts stated in the judgment in the case of "Trinder, Anderson, and Co. v. the Thames and Mersey Insurance Company," as far as material, apply to this case. The following are the material parts of the bill of lading upon the construction of which this case depends:—"Shipped in good order and condition by the Westport Coal Company on board the good ship Gainsborough, whereof is master for the present voyage A. McPhail, lying in the port of Westport and bound for San Francisco, 1,315 tons of coal to be delivered (subject to the exceptions hereinafter mentioned) in like good order and condition at the aforesaid port. The following are the exceptions, the act of God, . . . barratry, the neglect and default of pilot, master, or crew in navigation of the ship." It was signed "A. McPhail, master." The question is whether these exceptions are such as to cover the negligent navigation of the defendant McPhail, who was master of the Gainsborough and was also interested in the ship as part owner. On the first point made by the plaintiff, we are of opinion that the argument that having regard to the words immediately preceding and following it the word "master" in the exception must be read as not embracing a part owner who acts as master cannot prevail. If the exception is inapplicable to such a person, the other co-owners are not protected; the person who caused the mischief does not come within the description of master against whose negligence they provided, and they have in fact made no contract relieving them from liability for his acts. Mr. Justice Kennedy has held that they are protected, and there is no appeal against his decision. The case of "Jones v. Nicholson" (10 Exch., 28) decides that the relation of owners and captain may exist between part owners and one of their number so as to entitle them to claim against underwriters in respect of his acts on a policy against barratry of master or crew, and certainly it would be a strange result if the exception of master's negligence were wholly nugatory wherever he had an interest as part owner. It is also clear law that a party is not debarred from contracting against liability for his own negligence, and therefore there would be no personal incapacity in a part owner debarring him from setting up the exception of master's negligence even though he were himself the master; and in another case the present defendant has been held entitled to recover against underwriters for a loss brought about by the same negligence that we are now discussing. But though the defendant is, we think, to be treated as the captain within the exception, and though he is not debarred from relying upon it whether he be sued as captain or as owner, it does not follow that it suffices to relieve him from liability in this case. But it is very desirable to see what the precise ground is on which his non-immunity from liability must be placed. It is a well-established rule that exceptions must be strictly construed against the person for whose benefit they are inserted, and this rule has been frequently applied so as not to interpret them in bills of lading as relieving the owner from his obligation to take due care. This rule would debar us from reading into the exception any such words after "master" as would cover part owner's as distinguished from master's negligence. The exception, therefore, must be treated as not excusing a breach of the owner's duty as such. But it is at this point that the real difficulty arises. The captain is excused, the owner is not. But the holder of the bill of lading has given up the right to complain of loss traceable to the master's negligence, and it was the negligence of the master in the sphere of his duty as master which caused the loss, a loss, moreover, against responsibility for which he is certainly protected in his capacity as master by the bill of lading itself, which is signed by him, and in which he is expressly named. The plaintiffs seek to make him liable by viewing him in two different capacities, that is to say, they distinguish his capacities for the purpose of limiting the exception, but they mix them up again for the purpose of fixing him with liability as owner. But does it follow that because one and the same person is captain and part owner negligence in either capacity is to be deemed negligence in both? Or does not this question involve an examination of what his duty is in each capacity, so as to see whether there was in fact negligence in both? So far as the navigation of the ship is concerned, the duty of the owner as distinguished from the master would be to take due care to appoint a competent person, and therefore the defendant's co-owners in this case, having discharged that duty and being protected against the master's negligence, are not now charged with negligence as owners. Does it make any difference that the master cannot divest himself of his personality as part owner when he is engaged in duties which have been properly delegated to him as master? Tried by the converse case, if the owners had appointed a notoriously incompetent master, whose incapacity had caused disaster, the exception of master's negligence would certainly not have protected them, and it would certainly have been no better protection to that one of their number who had been appointed captain, in respect of that part of his negligence, which would clearly be negligence as owner and not as captain. Moreover, if the negligence of the captain in the proper sphere of his duty is to be deemed a breach of the owners' duty because the captain is also part owner and cannot divest himself of his personality as such, it would follow that the other co-owners are liable. They are not protected against negligence of owners. The same person who, as captain, in their agent is also part owner, and on the hypothesis, was negligent. If, therefore, they have been rightly held excused, it can only be because his negligence as captain is treated as the only negligence which in fact caused the damage. The case has been argued before us on the basis that they are excused as the learned Judge held, and, if it is to be dealt with on that basis, it follows that the only ground on which the present defendant can be held liable while his co-owners are excused is that he is under a personal disability by reason of his negligence, and this ground, where there has been no wilful default, cannot be maintained. Are we then to give effect to the highly artificial reasoning by which it is suggested that the same acts of the same man are within or without the exception according as he is regarded as owner or master, and this though the acts were unquestionably done in the discharge of his functions as master only? It seems to us that it could be simpler and more in accordance with commonsense to hold that the negligence which caused the damage was exclusively master's as distinguished from part owner's negligence within the meaning of the exception. The case of "Jones v. Nicholson" above cited favours this view. There was there no contract by the underwriters to be responsible for a part owner's barratry. Their only contract was against that of captain or mariners, and the argument was that the captain being an owner could not commit barratry. The Court obviously regarded the act done by a captain who was also part owner as an act done by him as captain only and not as part owner, and therefore as coming within the policy. Again in "Earle v. Rowcroft" (8 East, 128), it was contended that a captain who was also supercargo and as such represented the owner must be taken to have assented as supercargo to his acts as captain, and therefore debarred the owner from claiming in respect of them as barratrous. Lord Ellenborough deals with this argument by saying that it only required to be stated to be rejected. The plain commonsense of the matter seems to be that the owners, including the defendant, bargained to be excused from the consequence of the negligence within the sphere of his duty of the person, whoever he might be, who should be properly charged with the command of the ship. That person was the defendant, and the loss has arisen by reason of the very negligence which they provided against—viz., negligence in the navigation of the ship. This construction involves no addition of words to those in the bill of lading, which as they stand are sufficient and unambiguous. We have pointed out that the logical result of the plaintiffs' contention, involving as it does the proposition that the acts of the defendant being those of one man are inseparable and must be deemed to have been done in both capacities, must be that the co-owners are unprotected and the exception nugatory. There is certainly no reason in commonsense for adopting this artificial contention unless we are forced to do so, for had the same master done the same acts, being one of seven persons formed into a limited company and holding the largest interest in it, he would be protected, while, on the proposed construction, if he were a part owner holding only one share, he would be liable to the full extent of the damage. The appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.

IN RE AURIFEROUS PROPERTIES (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Set off—Calls in arrear. Two companies, A and B, were in liquidation. Before the liquidation of either, B owed A for calls made and in arrears, while A owed B for money lent.

Held, that there was no set off, but that the liquidator of each company must prove in the winding up of the other for the amount due.

The African Gold Properties (Limited) went into voluntary liquidation in January, 1898, and a supervision order was shortly afterwards made by the Court. In December, 1896, a compulsory winding-up order was made against the Auriferous Properties (Limited). In January, 1896, the Auriferous Company became indebted to the Gold Company in a sum of over £2,000. In January and June, 1896, before the winding up of either company, two calls amounting to nearly £1,500 were made by the Auriferous Company against the Gold Company in respect of shares held by the latter in the former. The liquidator of the Gold Company took out a summons in the winding up of the Auriferous Company, raising the question whether he was entitled to set off the debt due to his company against the calls owing by it to the Auriferous Company.

Mr. George R. Northcote was for the liquidator of the Gold Company and Mr. Howard Wright for the liquidator of the Auriferous Company.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered judgment as follows:—Both the Auriferous Company and the Gold Company are now in liquidation. Before the liquidation of either of them the latter company owed the former for calls made and in arrear, and the former owed the latter for money lent. The question is whether against the claim for the amount of the calls the claim for the money lent can be set off. If the Gold Company had not been in liquidation it could not have set off its claim for money lent against its liability for the amount of the call. That was decided before the Judicature Acts in Grissell's case ([1866] L.R., 1 Ch., 528) and in Black and Co.'s case ([1872] L.R., 8 Ch., 254, 261), with reference to calls made by a liquidator in a winding up under an order of the Court, or (per Lord Selborne) in a voluntary winding up. And since the Judicature Act, 1875, it has been held in the case of "In re Whitehouse and Co." ([1878] 9 Ch. D., 595) that the same rule holds good whether the call is made before or in the liquidation, and whether the liquidation is compulsory or voluntary. The ground of the rule is that all contributions from shareholders enforceable in the liquidation are by the Companies Acts made applicable for the payment of the company's creditors pari passu (sections 38, 101, 133 of the Companies Act, 1862), and a person who is a creditor and also a contributory cannot be allowed to do what might amount to paying his own claim in full out of a fund which ought to be distributed rateably (see Black and Co.'s case and "In re Pyle Works" [1890], 44 Ch. D., 534, 537, 535, where the decision in "In re Whitehouse and Co." is approved, though some of the reasons given by Sir George Jessel are questioned). Whether the same rule would apply if the liquidator sought to enforce the call by action seems not to have been the subject of express decision; but the call, though made and payable before the liquidation, and therefore at one time a debt to the company, is also enforceable by the liquidator by balance order as a contribution to be made in the winding up for pari passu distribution, and in this aspect is not a subject of set off in the case of a limited company. But in the present case it happens that the Gold Company is also in liquidation and the question is what is the effect of this. If the Gold Company had been a bankrupt individual instead of being a company in liquidation the liquidator of the Auriferous Company must have enforced his claim in the bankruptcy, and according to bankruptcy law, which even before and apart from the Judicature Act would have allowed the set-off ([1807] "In re Duckworth," 2 Ch., 578, where the question arose in the bankruptcy of the creditor-contributory; "Ex parte Strong" [1870], 5 Ch., 493, where it arose in the liquidation of the company). Here the creditor-contributory is not a bankrupt individual, but is a company in liquidation, and therefore the particular ground on which "In re Duckworth" was decided is not applicable. The liquidator of the Auriferous Company is not driven to proceed in the bankruptcy or to submit to the rules of the Bankruptcy Court, but proceeds in the Chancery Division and is entitled to the benefit of the Companies Acts as there administered. And the simple question is whether section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, has introduced into the law of the winding up of companies the bankruptcy rules as to set off, so as to allow a set-off against liability for the amount of unpaid calls in the case of a company constituted with limited liability. It seems to me that this question is decided in effect in the negative by Gill's case ([1879], 12 Ch.D., 755), which was cited with approval in the Court of Appeal in "In re Washington Diamond Co." ([1893], 3 Ch., 95); and that the liquidator of the Auriferous Company is entitled to prove in the winding up of the Gold Company for the whole amount still due upon the shares, leaving the liquidator of the Gold Company to his right of proof in the winding-up of the Auriferous Company for the money lent. It is true that in Gill's case the creditor-contributory was not a company in liquidation, but that circumstance does not prevent it from being in point as a decision that the bankruptcy law of set-off is not imported by the Judicature Act into the law of companies so as to allow a set-off against calls; though for other purposes there may be the same right as in bankruptcy (see in "Ex parte Theys" [1884], 23 Ch.D., *Reported by R. EWANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

587) to a set-off of cross-claims as existing at the time of the bankruptcy. "In re Duckworth" has, therefore, no application. The view which I have taken seems to be consistent with all the decisions on section 101 of the Act of 1862 since the Judicature Act (see e.g., "Ex parte Felly," [1882], 21 Ch.D., 492, 500, and "In re Pyle Works," 44 Ch.D., at p. 585, per Lord Justice Lindley). I therefore hold that the applicant is not entitled to the set-off which he claims, but has only a right to prove. I think there is some difficulty in reconciling "In re Duckworth" with what Lord Selborne said in Black and Co.'s case (at p. 262) with reference to a "statutory trustee," but I do not think the House of Lords would now overrule what was said in Black and Co.'s case.

HORTON V. WALSHALL UNION.*

Rating—Rateable value—Gross value—Deductions.

When once a rate has been allowed the figures of the gross value cannot be increased.

This was a special case stated by the quarter sessions of Stafford raising a rating question.

Mr. Alfred Young and Mr. G. C. Lewis appeared for the rating authority, who were appealing against the decision of quarter sessions; Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Disturnal for the appellants at quarter sessions.

The appellants below were rated for the Alma Works in the parish of Darlaston. The original gross estimated rental of the premises was £750 and the rateable value £606. Objection, however, had been taken to this before the assessment committee, and the gross estimated rental was reduced by them to £725 and the rateable to £544. This did not satisfy the appellants, who appealed to quarter sessions. At the appeal the appellants accepted the gross estimated rental of £725 as correct, and claimed, in order to arrive at the correct net annual value, to deduct from the £725 the sum of £310, which the appellants alleged represented the average annual expenditure upon repairs, insurance, and other expenses necessary to maintain the premises in a state to command the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year. The respondents, the assessment committee, having made a re-survey of the premises admitted that £310 was required for insurance, repairs, &c., but they stated that the rent mentioned in the statute was in fact more than that shown in the rate-book as the gross annual value. The rating authority, for the purpose of satisfying the Court that the true net annual or rateable value under 6 and 7 Will IV., c. 96, section 1, was not less than £544, proposed to prove that the gross estimated rental and rateable value were in fact understated in the ratebook and valuation list, and for that purpose proposed to give evidence of the total present structural value of the buildings and such of the plant and machinery as was properly to be taken into account as enhancing the annual value, and to take a percentage upon such structural value, which would give the true rateable value, and to such true rateable value the respondents agreed that £310 should be added to arrive at the gross estimated rental. The respondents did not claim that either the "gross estimated rental" of £725 or the "rateable value" of £544 should be increased, but that the real point at issue was the net annual or rateable value of the premises, and they claimed the right to call the evidence before mentioned to show that the rate of £54 8s. was not made upon a higher sum than the true net annual value of the hereditament. The quarter sessions rejected the evidence as inadmissible and ordered the rateable value to be reduced and allowed the appeal. The appellants contended that the respondents were precluded from contesting the amount appearing in the valuation list as "gross estimated rental," and that as that amount was admitted by the appellants the only question which the Court had power to decide was what were the proper deductions to be made from the gross value in order to arrive at the rateable value.

Mr. YOUNG contended that the rateable value was the material point in the appeal. The assessment committee might give evidence as to that value without reference to the gross value. He cited "Reg. v. Wells" (L.R., 2 Q.B., 542), "Reg. v. London School Board" (65 L.J., M.C., 33), "Reg. v. Inhabitants of Fordham" (11 A. and E., 73). He also referred to "Reg. v. Denaby and Cadeby Colliery Company" (reported ante, p. 347).

Mr. LEWIS followed on the same side.

Mr. LAWRENCE and Mr. DISTURNAL both argued for the ratepayer, contending that the gross value could not be increased, and that the rateable value must be fixed by deductions from the gross value.

The COURT upheld the decision of quarter sessions.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the case raised a question of importance on rating law. It was one as to which he had felt some difficulty, but at the last he had come to the conclusion that the quarter sessions were right. It was quite true that the real question was as to what sum the rateable value ought to stand at, but what pressed him was this—the whole of the apparatus for rating was statutory. There were elaborate provisions made to enable rating authorities to get their figures right; there were also provisions made by 41 Geo. III., c. 23, for the alterations to be made in the rate-book on appeals; but there was no machinery provided by which the figures of the gross value could be increased after the rate was once allowed. Unless an appellant, who objected to an inequitable assessment, applied to have his premises rated higher the rating authority could not get the figures amended by way of increase under 41 Geo. III., c. 23, s. 1. Here there was no power to alter the figure. It therefore stood. If the Court were to say that the justices were to inquire into a second figure for the rateable value the result would be that the proper relations between the gross value and the rateable value would be disregarded. It could not be that they could order a rate which they knew to be wrong. They must see that the proper deductions were made. This view was consonant with that taken in "The Denaby and Cadeby Colliery Company" (reported ante, p. 347), and though that case might be said not to be binding because it was a case in which the consultative jurisdiction of the Court was invoked, yet the expression of opinion in that case was right and not wrong. He would add as a makeweight that there was a great convenience in insisting on the finality of the figures of the assessment committee. A case had been put in which there might be a real wrong if a decision the other way were given. For an appellant to quarter sessions, satisfied with the gross value but dissatisfied with the deductions made from it, might be met with the unexpected point that the gross value was not high enough. This would probably involve an adjournment and an inquiry of an expensive description, into which it was very likely the appellant would never have thought of entering had he known that any question about the gross value was to be raised. This view was also more consonant with the language of section 1 of 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 96, which was the initial statute in these matters, for it clearly started with the gross value as the value from which deductions should be made in order to arrive at the rateable value. It must not be pressed too far, however, for on mentally calculating what the value of premises was to be it often happened that the rateable value was reached first owing to the information in the hands of the person calculating. In the statute, however, the gross value was given as the starting point.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred on the same grounds.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS added that the Master had shown the Court an authority in which it had been decided that only one counsel should be heard on a case stated by quarter sessions. The fact that both counsel had addressed the Court in this case must not therefore be taken as a precedent, but he was very glad they had had the assistance of the learned junior counsel in the present case.

PASSINGHAM V. KING.*

Principal and Agent—Commission—Sale of public-house—Finding a purchaser—Agreement—Construction.

Decision of Kennedy, J. (ante, p. 39), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy at the trial of the action without a jury, reported ante, p. 39. The action was brought by the plaintiff, who was a publichouse broker, to recover £100 commission upon the sale of a publichouse. The defendant, who was the owner of a publichouse called the Albert Edward, instructed the plaintiff on December 23, 1896, to find a purchaser for the house, and on December 30, 1896, the plaintiff introduced a Mr. Vine, a licensed victualler, who went down to Brighton to see the defendant, and agreed with him to buy the house for £19,750, and gave him a cheque for £250. This cheque was dishonoured, but the £250 was subsequently paid. Upon January 1, 1897, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant as follows:—"We beg to inform you that our regular commission to a vendor for licensed property is 1 per cent. upon the purchase money, but as we hope to do further business with you over some of your other houses we are willing to reduce our commission re the Albert Edward to £100. . . . You will remember that the appointment for signing contract stands for Monday next at 2 o'clock at our office." This was accepted by the defendant. The contract was signed on January 4 by the defendant and Vine, and the purchase was to be completed on February 11. Subsequently the defendant by arrangement with Vine extended the time for completion to May 5, and in consideration thereof Vine paid a further deposit of £250. On February 12 the defendant instructed the plaintiff to prepare the inventory at the Albert Edward. The contract provided that the deposit should be forfeited if the purchase was not completed. The purchase went off, and Vine stated in evidence that he contracted to buy the house as a speculation, and that he did not complete because he could not resell at a profit. The plaintiff having brought an action to recover the £100 commission, the defendant contended that the agreement was to pay commission only upon completion of the sale, the words "purchase money" in the letter of January 1, 1897, meaning the purchase money actually paid. Mr. Justice Kennedy gave judgment for the plaintiff for £100.

MR. JELF, Q.C., and Mr. F. LOW, for the defendant, referred to "Hayes v. Tyndall" (1 B. and S., 296).

MR. C. A. RUSSELL, Q.C., and Mr. CARRINGTON, for the plaintiff, referred to "Grogan v. Smith" (7 The Times L.R., 132).

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the circumstances were these. The defendant had what he (the Lord Justice) would call a £20,000 publichouse which he wished to sell. He got into communication with the plaintiff, Vine, a licensed victualler, was looking out for a house as a speculation, and he went down to Brighton to see the defendant, and negotiations took place there between the defendant and Vine to which the plaintiff was no party. The result was that Vine contracted to buy the publichouse. Before the contract was signed the letter of January 1, 1897, was written. The first question was, what was the meaning of the words "1 per cent. upon the purchase money"? Did they mean 1 per cent. upon the money contracted to be paid or upon the money actually paid? In his opinion they meant 1 per cent. upon the money contracted to be paid. His reading of the contract was that if the plaintiff found a purchaser whom the defendant was willing to accept, and who would accept the defendant's terms, then the defendant would pay the plaintiff 1 per cent. upon the purchase money. That was his view of the contract. But there was another ground upon which the case could be decided. The defendant knew quite as much about Vine as the plaintiff did. The cheque for the first deposit of £250 was dishonoured, though the money was subsequently paid. In the face of that the defendant entered into further negotiations with Vine and signed the contract to sell him the publichouse. Later on the defendant agreed with Vine to extend the time for completion and took a further sum of £250 from Vine for doing so. In these circumstances, he was of opinion that the defendant had taken up the negotiations himself and taken them out of the hands of the plaintiff and had accepted Vine as the purchaser, and that, therefore, commission was payable.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY delivered judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred in the result. He agreed with the second ground stated by Lord Justice A. L. Smith. He did not think that the plaintiff had done everything to entitle him to commission; but he thought that the defendant by his subsequent conduct had waived the right which he otherwise would have had to call upon the plaintiff to do certain things as a condition precedent to commission becoming payable. As regards the construction of the contract, in his opinion the words "purchase money" in the letter did not mean the price fixed by the contract. They meant the purchase money which became payable upon completion, and if through default of the purchaser the purchase was not completed no commission would be earned. However, it being the duty of the plaintiff to introduce a person willing and able to complete the purchase, in this case the defendant lost his right to insist upon the plaintiff doing that by taking the matter out of the plaintiff's hands and carrying it on himself.

MARKS V. FROGLEY AND OTHERS.*

Army—Volunteer—"Subject to military law"
—False imprisonment—Liability—Army Act,
1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 58), secs. 41, 45, 158, 176.
Decision of Kennedy, J. (ante, p. 181, and [1898] 1 Q.B. 396), reversed.

This was an application by the defendants, other than Frogley, for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Kennedy and a special jury, reported ante, p. 181. The action was brought by a member of the Bedfordshire Volunteer Corps to recover damages for assault and false imprisonment. The jury found a verdict for £300 damages against three defendants—Arthur Cooper, a lance-corporal, and Thomas Lovelock and George Albert Short, privates in the same corps as the plaintiff. The defendant Frogley was a superintendent of the Herts County Police, and upon the findings of the jury judgment was given in his favour, and no question now arose as to him. Mr. Justice Kennedy gave judgment for the plaintiff against the three abovenamed defendants for £300. The facts are fully stated in the judgment of Lord Justice A. L. Smith. The arguments upon this appeal were reported in The Times of March 28 and 31.

Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. R. D. Muir, and Mr. George Humphreys appeared for the defendants; Mr. A. J. Tassell appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the application and entering judgment for the defendants.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—This is an action for false imprisonment brought by the plaintiff, who was a private in the Bedfordshire Regiment of Volunteers, against three of his comrades in the same regiment (a lance-corporal and two privates), and also against a police superintendent of the Herts County Constabulary. The superintendent has succeeded in the action, for he showed to the satisfaction of the jury that he had reasonable cause for suspecting that a felony had been committed by the plaintiff, but as the other three defendants were unable to show that a felony had in fact been committed, for the plaintiff had been acquitted at quarter sessions, it was held by the learned Judge who tried this case that, as the three defendants were mere civilians when they did what is complained of, they were consequently undefended, and they have had damages assessed against them by the jury to the amount of £300. The three defendants, with the aid of the War Office, appeal, and the questions are whether they have a good defence to this action upon the ground that they were not civilians but were soldiers under military law when they did the act which is charged against them, and, if not, whether the damages are so excessive that a new trial should be ordered as regards them. The material facts are these. Upon Saturday, August 8, 1896, the plaintiff and the three defendants were quartered with their regiment, the 2nd Bedfordshire Volunteers, in camp at Shorncliffe, training and exercising there with a portion of her Majesty's regular forces. The Volunteer regiment had gone into camp on the previous Saturday under an order of the War Office dated April 22, 1896, "for the formation of the Home Counties Volunteer Brigade at Shorncliffe, August 1 to August 8, 1896." It will be noticed that by the order this camp, as it has been called, began on Saturday, the 1st, and ended on Saturday, August 8, 1896. Upon the morning of Saturday, August 8, 1896, whilst the regiment was still in camp, the plaintiff was accused by some of his comrades of having stolen certain articles belonging to them. Captain Foote, of the Royal Inniskillings, who was adjutant of the regiment and in charge of the Volunteer battalion, was called up to the tent where the felony was supposed to have been committed, and, having investigated the matter, ordered the plaintiff under arrest and into the custody of one of the Volunteers present, to be taken to the Shorncliffe Railway Station with the baggage guard of the regiment; and he ordered that the plaintiff should be taken under escort and arrest in the special military train which on that day was about to take the regiment to Boxmoor Station; and he also ordered that upon arrival there the plaintiff should be taken under arrest and handed over to the police authority at Hemel Hempstead, which is about two miles from the Boxmoor Station and is the plaintiff's home. Under the order of Captain Foote the plaintiff was placed under arrest and into the custody of one of the Volunteers of the regiment, and was so taken to the Shorncliffe Station with the baggage guard of the regiment, the plaintiff as well as the Volunteer who had him under arrest being in uniform and under arms. Shortly after the plaintiff reached the Shorncliffe Station the regiment under arms and under command arrived there with the three defendants in the ranks. They were then told off and ordered by their superior officer, pursuant to the order of Captain Foote, to escort the plaintiff under arrest in the special military train about to start for Boxmoor, and upon arrival there to take him under arrest to Hemel Hempstead and hand him over to the police authorities there. This order the three defendants obeyed, both they and the plaintiff being all the time in uniform and under arms. The regiment, which had formed up in marching order in camp at Shorncliffe, was not dismissed until after its arrival at the Boxmoor Station, and the three defendants were not dismissed until the orders of Captain Foote had been carried out and the plaintiff handed over to the police authority at Hemel Hempstead, to which place they had marched the plaintiff from Boxmoor Station in uniform and under arms by a side road from the station. The learned Judge, against whose judgment, as also against the verdict of the jury as to damages, the three defendants appeal, has entered judgment for the plaintiff for £300, having first amended the statement of claim, which claimed £200, by altering the claim into one for £300, the result being that these three defendants, who are working men and of the same rank of life as the plaintiff (he being a working tailor and the others journeymen painters and a carpenter), have been mulcted in the sum of £300 for simply obeying the orders of their superior officer. If they had disobeyed those orders they would, I apprehend, have found themselves in a perilous position by reason of section 21 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, and of section 20 of the Army Act, 1881. I now proceed to inquire whether the law is such as to sanction a judgment for false imprisonment at all, no matter for what damages, against the three defendants in the above circumstances. There can be no possible doubt that upon the morning of August 8, 1896, Captain Foote, in the camp at Shorncliffe, gave a lawful order concerning "a soldier" engaged in military service for a military offence. The offence for which the plaintiff was placed under arrest was cognisable by either military or civil authority. That the plaintiff, when the order was given, was a soldier subject to military law is beyond dispute. Section 176 of the Army Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 58), and Article 374 of the Regulations for the Volunteer Forces are conclusive as to this. But it is argued for the plaintiff that, although this might be so, the order to the three defendants given at the Shorncliffe Station by their superior officer pursuant to the order of Captain Foote to escort the plaintiff under arrest with his regiment from Shorncliffe Station to Hemel Hempstead was illegal, because the plaintiff and the three defendants had then ceased to be subject to military law and had become civilians, which, it is said, they became immediately they left the camp, and that, therefore, the three defendants could only justify imprisoning—that is, escorting the plaintiff under arrest pursuant to orders from Shorncliffe Station to Hemel Hempstead—by proving that a felony had, in fact, been committed, and that they had reasonable cause for suspecting that the plaintiff had been guilty of it, and this fact the three defendants had failed to establish. Now, first of all, did these four men—that is, the plaintiff and the three defendants—become civilians either when they left the camp in the circumstances in which they left it or when they left the Shorncliffe Station with the regiment, all being in uniform under arms, and under command in the military train? It has been held by the learned Judge that upon the true construction of the statutes they became civilians when they left the Shorncliffe Camp, and it is argued that, as Captain Foote had only a jurisdiction limited to such time as military law existed, the three defendants cannot justify under an order which, though good so far as the primary arrest was concerned, was bad so far as it ordered the keeping of the plaintiff under arrest, for, as to this, it was in excess of jurisdiction. In my opinion the War Office order of April 22, 1896, above referred to, covered and included the whole of Saturday, August 8, 1896. It was argued that it did not. Inasmuch as it must be conceded that the order covered some part of the day, what part of it did it cover if it did not cover the whole day? No answer was given to this. In my opinion the order covered and included the whole of Saturday, August 8, in the same way as it covered the whole of Saturday, August 1, 1896. So soon as the Bedfordshire Volunteers fell in under arms and under command on that day as a regiment to proceed to the camp at Shorncliffe to take part in military training there with Regulars, in my opinion from that time they became subject to military law, and remained so subject until they were dismissed upon Saturday, August 8, 1896. I can find in the War Office order no fraction or part of a day as distinct from the whole day as being only covered by the order, but, on the contrary, I find that, by section 573 of the Regulations for the Volunteer Forces, an additional allowance of 4s. per day is granted to a Volunteer private to cover time occupied in joining and quitting camp, which points to the day being entire. If the Bedfordshire regiment of Volunteers had remained in camp at Shorncliffe the whole of the 8th, during the whole of that day it would have formed part of the Home Counties Volunteer Brigade at training and exercise with Regulars, even though during that day the Regular forces might have been leaving the camp, and the camp itself was being dismantled. If all the Regulars had left the camp on the morning of the 8th, leaving the Bedfordshire Regiment still in camp, can it be said that the regiment did not continue under military law whilst it remained in camp? I heard no suggestion in argument that the regiment became a regiment of civilians whilst in camp; then what becomes of the argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiff that the regiment became a regiment of civilians, though under arms and under command, the moment it became a unit by itself. If the regiment had been dismissed in camp and each Volunteer had had to find his own way to his home as best as he could, this would have been another matter, but is not the present case. By section 176 of the Army Act, 1881, it is enacted that "persons subject to military law as soldiers are non-commissioned officers and men belonging to the Volunteer forces of the United Kingdom when they are being trained or exercised with any portion of the Regular forces," and by Article 374 of the Regulations for the Volunteer Forces it is provided that "Volunteers become subject to military law when they join a camp with Regular forces or are assembled for training or exercise with any portion of the Regular forces." The question arises, When did this Volunteer regiment begin to and cease to be trained or exercised with a portion of the Regular forces? In my judgment each member of this regiment became subject to military law when he fell in and formed up at Boxmoor with his comrades as a regiment under arms and under command upon Saturday, August 1, 1896, in order to train and exercise with Regular forces at Shorncliffe, and that the subjection did not cease so long as it continued to be a regiment under arms and under command—that is, until it and its component parts were dismissed from being any longer under arms upon August 8. In my judgment the training or exercise of a regiment under arms and command to carry out efficiently what is called "entraining" and "detraining" is a military exercise, and constitutes part and parcel of the forming as well as the unforming of a camp, and is as much a military training or exercise as the formation of a regiment into square or of a company in fours, or the bringing about of any other military manoeuvre. I cannot agree with the learned Judge that the plaintiff and the three defendants became mere civilians upon leaving Shorncliffe Station as a regiment under arms in the special military train, but I should add that it does not appear that the War Office order of April 22, 1896, was called to his attention as it has been to our's in this Court. But there is another section of the Army Act, 1881, which, in my judgment, is fatal to the plaintiff's case. It is section 158. By it it is enacted that "where an offence under this Act has been committed by any person while subject to military law such person may be taken into and kept in military custody and tried and punished for such offence, although he or the corps or battalion to which he belongs has ceased to be subject to military law, in like manner as he might have been taken into and kept in military custody, tried, or punished if he or such corps or battalion had continued so subject." This section, to my mind, obviously means where an offence is alleged to have been committed, and indeed the learned counsel for the plaintiff had to admit that it would be absurd to construe the section in any other way, for otherwise the jurisdiction under it to try could only arise if, after trial, the prisoner be convicted, which, with all respect to the draftsman of the section, is ridiculous. It is clear that the plaintiff whilst subject to military law was taken into and placed in custody for an offence under the Act. But it is said that this only applies to and justifies the keeping in military custody, and not the keeping in civilian custody, which the defendants are charged with having done in the present case after leaving Shorncliffe Station. I have already said what I have to say about the continuance of military law in this case. But it is argued that military custody means the custody of a Regular soldier only, which custody is defined by section 45 of the Army Act, 1881, thus:—"Military custody means according to the usages of the service, the putting the offender under arrest or putting him in confinement"; and by Article 29 of the Queen's Regulations, "military custody in the case of a private soldier means confinement under charge of a guard, picket, patrol, or sentry, or of a provost marshal"; and it is said that military custody therefore means the custody by a Regular soldier. In considering what is military custody when dealing with a volunteer section 21 of the Volunteer Act must be looked to as well as the Army Act, 1881. This section, in addition to empowering the commanding officer of a volunteer corps to discharge from the corps any volunteer . . . for disobedience of orders while doing any military duty with his corps enacts that "if any volunteer while under arms or on march or duty with the corps . . . or while wearing the clothing or accoutrements of such corps or going to or returning from any place of exercise or assembly of such corps disobeys any lawful order of any officer . . . or is guilty of misconduct, the officer in command . . . may order the offender . . . if an officer into arrest, and if not an officer, into custody of any volunteer belonging to the corps, but so that the offender be not kept in such arrest or custody longer than the time prescribed by this section." Now is this civil or military custody? There can be but one answer. It is not civil; it is therefore military. I can see no sense or reason for holding that the custody in which the plaintiff was from Shorncliffe Camp to Hemel Hempstead police-station was not military custody, which in my judgment it was, and consequently section 158 of the Army Act, 1881, also avails the three defendants. There is also another ground upon which it appears to me, if it were necessary to resort to it, that this case ought to be decided adversely to the plaintiff, and it is this. By section 43 of the Army Act, 1881, it is enacted under the heading of "Redress of Wrongs" as follows:—"If any soldier thinks himself wronged in any matter . . . by any soldier he may complain thereof to his captain, and if he thinks himself wronged by his captain in respect of his complaint not being redressed, or in respect of any other matter, he may complain thereof to his commanding officer; and if he thinks himself wronged by his commanding officer, either in respect of his complaint not being redressed or in respect of any other matter, he may complain thereof to the General or other officer commanding the district or station where the soldier is serving; and every officer to whom complaint is made in pursuance of this section shall cause such complaint to be inquired into, and shall, if on inquiry he is satisfied of the justice of the complaint so made, take such steps as may be necessary for giving full redress to the complainant in respect of the matter complained of." For the reasons above given in my opinion the plaintiff and the three defendants were soldiers under military law between Shorncliffe Camp and Hemel Hempstead, and this section therefore applies to the plaintiff. I find in the judgment of Mr. Justice Lush in "Dawkins v. Lord Paulet" (L.R., 5 Q.B., at p. 121), some remarks in connexion with the Articles of War, of which this section is the equivalent, which appear to me to be such sound sense and good law that I will repeat them. He says:—"Can it be reasonably inferred that any other mode of redress or measure of redress was intended by the Act than that which is specified in the article? It is no argument to say that the remedy is imperfect because no pecuniary compensation is given to the injured party. That defect, if it be one, is a defect in the code itself which we cannot remedy. The plaintiff has no reason to complain for he has all which the law military, to which he engaged to submit when he entered the service, entitles him to have. The same code creates both the right and the remedy, and this Court cannot add to the one or the other." This statement of Mr. Justice Lush applies to the present plaintiff, and if there were no other ground adverse to him I think it suffices to put an end to this unseemly action against the three defendants, and I entirely agree with what that learned Judge said. I need not refer to passages which may also be found in the judgment of Mr. Justice Willes in the case of "Keighly v. Bell" (4 F. and F., 763) and in "Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby" (4 F. and F., 886), showing that the civil Courts cannot be invoked to redress grievances arising between persons both subject to military law. For the reasons I have given I think that the plaintiff's action fails. In regard to the damages being excessive, I need say nothing except that in my judgment as against these three defendants they were so excessive that I think a new trial should have been ordered upon this ground, if it were necessary to have done so. I do not doubt that the jury have heaped upon the shoulders of the three defendants damages which Frogley, the police superintendent, might possibly have had to bear and for which the three defendants were not liable, had he not succeeded, as he did, under his plea of justification. But what I might have to say as to this, in the view I take of this case, is now immaterial. For the reasons above in my opinion the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the three defendants with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read a judgment to the same effect.
LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed.

Upon the plaintiff's undertaking not to appeal from the judgment, the defendants did not press for the costs of the appeal.

Q.B. Div. (Lord Russell of Kil- } 1898.
lowen, C.J., Hawkins, Day, } May 7.
Wills, and Wright, JJ.)

KIRSHENBOIM V. SALMON AND ANOTHER.*

Merchandise Marks Act, 1887—False Trade Description—"Hand-made" cigarettes—Materiality of false description.

The fact that the purchaser got something as good and valuable as the thing purported to be sold affords no ground for finding that a trade description is not false in a material particular.

This was a special case stated by Mr. Franklin Lushington, stipendiary magistrate at Bow-street, which was argued before Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Darling on March 17 and was then reserved for the consideration of a special Court.

Mr. Corrie Grant appeared for the appellant; Mr. Avory for the respondents.

The question raised was whether selling cigarettes with a label describing them as "guaranteed hand made," when they had in fact been made by machinery, but were in every way as good, was an offence under section 2 (2) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 28). The magistrate had dismissed the information. The purchaser applied to him to state a case, and on his refusal had obtained an order from the Court for a special case to be stated. The material facts appear in the judgment.

Mr. CORRIE GRANT, after reading the case, was stopped by the Court.

Mr. AVORY said the magistrate had to find as a fact whether the false trade description was false in a material particular. Here he had found it was not.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said the magistrate had explained his finding. If that was accepted as sufficient, would it not follow that a person could sell American hams for York hams and defend himself on the plea that they were just as good? If the magistrate had merely found as a fact that the false description was not material, the Court might not have been able to go behind it.

Mr. AVORY said that that was what the magistrate had first found, and it was only when the Court had ordered him to state a special case that he inserted the explanation. A magistrate must decide whether the false trade description was material. Further the respondent had established his defence under the statute, for he had "acted innocently" within the meaning of section 2 (2), for it was found that he acted without an intent to defraud. He cited "Stairey v. Chilworth Gunpowder Company" (24 Q.B.D., at p. 96).

MR. JUSTICE WILLS pointed out that the magistrate had not found that it made no difference in the market value whether the cigarettes were hand made or machine made.

Mr. AVORY cited "Gridley v. Swinburn" (5 The Times L.R., 71, 1888).

In the result, the COURT remitted the case to the magistrate to convict.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said the charge was preferred under section 2 (2) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c., 28). That statute provided that it should be an offence if a person sells any goods to which a false trade description is applied. The case found these facts. The respondent sold to the appellant for 2½d. ten cigarettes in a packet to which a printed label was affixed bearing these words, "Ten cigarettes guaranteed hand made by experienced workmen." The ordinary price for ten cigarettes made by hand of the same quality of tobacco would have been 2½d. In other words, one halfpenny more for each packet of ten. The appellant, who was a member of the Amalgamated Cigarette and Tobacco Cutters' Union, bought the cigarettes for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were hand made or not, with a view to eventual legal proceedings. The respondent admitted that they were not hand made. The magistrate found that the description was a trade description and that it was false, and that it was applied by the respondents. The case then explained that the cigarettes were made for the respondents by a newly-invented and improved machine called Barron's machine, that the same quality of tobacco, paper, and starch were used in their making as would have been used if they had been made by hand, and that they were at least as good as those made by hand. It also found that there was no intention to defraud buyers, but that in using these labels the respondents were actuated merely by a spirit of petty economy that prompted them to utilize the remaining stock of labels which they had already paid for. The magistrate held that a false trade description had been applied, but he found that under the circumstances set out it was not "false in a material respect" under section 3 (1). If he had contented himself with finding as a fact that this description, though false, was not false in a material respect, the Court could not have questioned it. But what he had done, and quite rightly, was to give his grounds and reasons for arriving at that conclusion. He had applied to the case what might be called the doctrine of equivalents, in that though the buyer did not get what he asked for or what the thing purchased purported to be yet he got something which was just as good. Could that doctrine be applied? The general scheme of section 2 was this—it enumerated various things which should be offences against the Act. It then provided how the person charged could defend himself. If the charge was under 2 (1) he could meet it by proving that "he acted without intent to defraud." When the charge was under 2 (2) there were two ways. If the charge was made in respect of goods obtained from some one else with the label on them he might show that he had taken all precautions and had no reason to suspect the truth of the description: and, secondly, wherever the goods came from, if "otherwise he had acted innocently." The onus was on the respondent to prove his defence when once facts had been established against him which prima facie brought him within the Act. It was to be observed that the Act was intended to protect buyers, not merely as to the number, weight, and quantity of the goods sold, but also as to their mode of manufacture. That brought one to the question of the materiality of the description. If the doctrine of equivalents was applicable to such a case, hams, butter, cheese, cigars, and almost anything else might be sold under a wrong description, and the defence would be at once raised that the article sold was as good as that asked for. The Legislature could never have contemplated such a thing as that. Moreover, there were some people who, rightly or wrongly, preferred hand-made to machine-made cigarettes. All this showed that it was impossible to say that the magistrate was right in holding that because the thing sold was just as good as that asked for the respondent should not be convicted. That could not be supported. A man was entitled to know what he was buying, and entitled to have supplied to him the article for which he had asked and paid. The second point to be considered was whether the respondent had acted innocently. That, however, the learned Judge could not accept. The respondent had done the thing deliberately with the object of saving the expense of printing new labels. The matter must go back to the magistrate who would, of course, exercise his own discretion as to what the punishment should be.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS concurred, and would only add that the materiality of the trade description could not be made dependent on the evidence as to the quality of the goods supplied.

MR. JUSTICE DAY concurred.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS was of the same opinion. The magistrate had found that there was a difference of 20 per cent. in the price of machine-made and hand-made cigarettes. How was it possible to say that was immaterial? It showed that some portion of the public did not think that the machine-made cigarettes were as good as the others.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT also concurred.

THE BIRMINGHAM BREWERIES (LIMITED) v. JAMESON.*
Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenant by lessee to buy beer of landlord—Assignment of lease and reversion—Construction of agreement.
Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 223), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne, dated February 11 last, and reported in The Times of the following day; ante, p. 223. By a lease dated November 5, 1889, and made between Alfred Hood, therein described as of "The Brewery, Nechells, Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, brewer (hereinafter called 'the lessor')," of the one part, and John S. Nock, therein described as of "100, Nechells-park-road, Nechells, Aston-juxta-Birmingham, beer retailer (hereinafter called 'the lessee')," of the other part, the lessor demised unto the lessee a beerhouse at 87, Guildford-street, Lozells, for 14 years from June 21, 1889. The lease contained the following covenant:—

*Reported by E. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"And the lessee hereby covenants with the lessor . . . that he, the lessee, his executors, administrators, lessees, tenants, and assigns, and all other persons for the time being carrying on the business of a beer retailer or publican upon the said premises will and shall during the said term of years hereby granted deal exclusively with the lessor or his firm of Messrs. Hood and Sons or his or their successors in business for all beers, ales, porter, stout (except bottled stout), and other like articles which shall be sold or consumed upon the said hereby demised premises or shall be brought thereon to be so sold or consumed; and will not nor shall during the said term on any pretence whatsoever purchase, take in, or receive, or have in his or their possession, or directly or indirectly sell or dispose of, or permit the sale, disposal, or consumption, in or upon the said premises of any such articles other than such as shall have been purchased or taken of the lessor or his firm or his or their successors in business, provided that he or they shall be willing to supply the same at the price and terms usually charged by the lessor or his firm to his or their tenants." The lease also contained a declaration that "where the context allows, the expressions 'the lessor' and 'the lessee' used in these premises include, besides the said Alfred Hood, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and besides the said John Sidney Nock, his executors, administrators, and assigns." The lease was afterwards assigned to the defendant, John Jameson, who carried on the premises the business of a beer retailer and publican. A. Hood, in 1894, assigned the reversion expectant on the lease to a company, which, in 1896, assigned such reversion to the plaintiff company. Messrs. Hood and Sons were still carrying on their business at the brewery at Nechells. The defendant had refused to deal exclusively with the plaintiff company for his beers, whereupon that company brought the present action for an injunction to restrain him from buying his beers elsewhere. He was willing to buy his beers from Messrs. Hood and Sons. The question in dispute was whether the covenant compelled him to deal only with the plaintiff company. Mr. Justice Byrne was of opinion that on the true construction of the covenant the plaintiff company had the right to compel the defendant to buy from them exclusively. His Lordship accordingly granted the injunction asked for. From that decision the defendant now appealed.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Thomas Douglas were for the appellant; Mr. Dunham was for the respondents.

Their LORDSHIPS reversed the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne and allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that it was not possible to say that this case was a very clear one, and he was not surprised that the learned Judge in the Court below had felt some doubt when deciding it. In some respects it was very like the case of "Clegg v. Hands" (44 Ch. Div., 503), and in some very like the other case which had been cited of "Doe v. Reid" (10 B. and C., 849). The Court, however, had not to find out which of those cases the present one was most like, but what was the construction to be placed upon the lease now before it. As to that his Lordship found that the construction was different from that put upon the lease by Mr. Justice Byrne. His Lordship then dealt with the facts of the case and read the material provisions of the lease, and continued. The Court was asked by the respondents' counsel to insert after the word lessor in the covenant the words "his executors, administrators, and assigns," having regard to the interpretation clause in the lease. His Lordship confessed that he did not see any reason for doing that. The context did not require it. If he did insert it, he would be converting a clause which was reasonably plain into one which would be extremely difficult to understand. It would produce a great deal of mischief if the Court adopted the construction argued for on behalf of the respondents. It was plain what the meaning of the covenant was—namely, that the lessee was to buy exclusively the beer of the Nechells Brewery; that was to say, from the lessor or his successors in business. It was to protect his business. Taking that view there was no difficulty about it. Otherwise you got yourself into inextricable difficulty, rendering the covenant extremely embarrassing in its effect. The context did not allow of the insertion of the words "executors, administrators, and assigns," if sense was to be made of the covenant. His Lordship would not say anything about "Clegg v. Hands," or "Doe v. Reid," except to the extent that the problem which the Court had now to deal with was not that which was discussed in "Clegg v. Hands." There the lessor had not severed his business from the reversion. Again, "Clegg v. Hands" did not overrule "Doe v. Reid"; and if the present case were compared with those authorities it would be found rather nearer "Doe v. Reid" than "Clegg v. Hands." But it was not necessary to discuss that matter. The appeal must accordingly be allowed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY delivered judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

PAYNTER V. WATSON.*

Metropolis—Building—Rebuilding premises—Jurisdiction of County Council—London
Building Act, 1894, secs. 41 and 43.

This was a special case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate raising a new question under the London Building Act, 1894, section 43, as to the right of an owner of premises to rebuild them in a different manner to the old buildings without first obtaining the leave of the London County Council.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Poyser appeared for the appellant; Mr. Avory and Mr. Daldy for the respondent.

The appellant was Major George Paynter; the respondent was the district surveyor of the district of St. George's, Hanover-square north. The case was stated on an appeal to the magistrate from a notice of objection served by the district surveyor under section 150 of the Act. The appellant had served a building notice under section 145 on the district surveyor, and had annexed thereto the plans and sections of the new buildings which he proposed to erect on the site of Nos. 12 and 13, Grafton-street. These plans showed that the new buildings would not cover any ground that was uncovered before, but the arrangement of the upper floors was such that a certain amount of the old existing air space would be occupied by the new buildings, which were to be higher and to contain more cubic feet than the old. The magistrate found that the plans of the proposed new buildings did deviate in certain respects, and particularly in regard to the height, from the plans of the old buildings, and he held that the word "deviate" in section 43 (2) applied not only to the ground covered by the old buildings, but also to that of the buildings in respect to height and width and depth on the several floors, and he therefore affirmed the surveyor's objection. The London Building Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., cap. cxxiii.), section 43 is as follows:—

"When any person intends to erect a domestic building . . . abutting upon a street on the site of domestic buildings existing at the commencement of this Act,

"(1) It shall be lawful for such person, before commencing to erect the intended domestic building, to cause to be prepared plans showing the extent of the previously existing domestic building in its several parts . . . and to cause such plans to be submitted to the district surveyor, who shall (if reasonably satisfied with the evidence of their accuracy) certify the same under his name, and such certificate shall be taken to be conclusive evidence of the correctness of the plans. Such person may then erect the intended domestic building, but so that no more land shall be occupied by the newly-erected building than was occupied by the previously existing domestic building as so certified. If such person fail to submit such plans, . . . and the district surveyor, or the tribunal of appeal, refuse to certify the accuracy of the same, such person shall on rebuilding be bound by the preceding provisions of this part of this Act.

"(2) If a person erecting the intended domestic building shall desire to deviate in any respect from the plan or plans certified by the district surveyor, it shall be lawful for him to apply to the Council, who shall sanction such deviation on such conditions as they may think fit."

Mr. MACMORRAN said that the magistrate was wrong and contended that the owner was within his rights so long as he covered no more or different ground with the new buildings than the old buildings covered. He did not argue that section 43 gave an unqualified right to rebuild. It was only intended to give the rebuilder dispensation for the requirements of section 41 (2) as to amount of air space to be left for the benefit of the neighbouring houses. The "plan" referred to in the section meant only a ground plan. He referred to section 47 and said that that would apply. The gist of the difficulty was this—that the appellant said that he could build on the old area to any height subject to section 47. The County Council, on the other hand, said that not only the ground area must be the same but the cubic content.

Mr. AVORY, on behalf of the district surveyor, pointed out that Part V. of the Act, in which part this group of sections was to be found, was headed "Open spaces about buildings and height of buildings." By section 41 all new buildings were to leave air space from the ground upwards. Under the law before this it was enough to leave air space from the ceiling of the ground floor. As, under the old law, the ground floor did not necessarily have air space, it followed that if a person re-erecting old premises chose to build up straight above the ground floor no air space would be left at all.

The COURT supported the decision of the magistrate.

Mr. JUSTICE WILLS said he had in this case no doubt and had not had any during the argument. All depended on what was meant by "the plans showing the extent of the previous existing domestic building in its several parts" in section 41 (1). It would be the most extraordinary synonym for ground plans possible. It was clear that a complete set of plans was intended. If a person chose to rebuild an old house exactly as it was he might get the protection of this section. The cardinal condition of the section was that no ground previously uncovered should be covered.

But if a person desired to deviate in any respect, and not in one respect only, then he was subject to the jurisdiction of the County Council. The general purview of the Act was the limitation of private rights over property for the general good. It could not be doubted that the magistrate had put the right construction on the section. If the building owner desired to alter his old buildings he must submit to the discretionary sanction of the County Council.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred.

SIR HENRY HAWKINS AND OTHERS V. BLACK.*

Practice—Writ of summons—Indorsement of residence—O. 4, r. 1.

Mr. CAVANAGH appeared in support of an application by the defendant in this action to have the writ of summons set aside on the ground of irregularity. He said that the action was brought to recover possession of a set of chambers in the Temple, which, as stated in the indorsement on the writ, were let by the plaintiffs to the defendant under an indenture dated February 1, 1896. The plaintiffs were five gentlemen who were thus described on the writ:—"The Honourable Sir Henry Hawkins, the Honourable Sir Alfred Wills, Edmund Macrory, Sir Charles Hall, and the Honourable Sir Walter George Frank Phillimore"; but nothing appeared on the writ showing who they were, or what they were. The short point was whether the plaintiffs' residence was properly described in the writ as required by Order 4, rule 1. The indorsement of address on the writ stated that the writ was issued by a firm of solicitors, whose address for service was given, and who were described as "solicitors for the said plaintiffs, who reside at the Treasury, Middle Temple-lane, in the City of London." The affidavit made by the defendant in support of the application, after stating that he was called to the Bar in 1884 by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple and that he obtained possession of the chambers in question in 1885, and that the writ in this action was served upon him on April 29, 1898, proceeded as follows:—"Since service of the said writ I have called at the address given therein as the address of the plaintiffs—to wit, the Treasury, Middle Temple-lane, in the City of London—and from inquiries there made, as well as from personal inspection, not one of the plaintiffs, as far as I could discover, sleeps, or lives, or in any sense resides, or ever did sleep, or live, or reside there. The said Treasury consists of an office and a few rooms where business of one kind or another, chiefly of a counting-house character, is carried on by clerks and agents of the said society; but there is no vestige of sleeping accommodation nor of any of the necessities requisite for living or residence in the place. On the afternoon of Monday, May 2, 1898, between the hours of 1.30 and 3.30 p.m., I called at the said Treasury, but did not find any of the plaintiffs there, and, so far as I can ascertain, they only go there occasionally, and have no private property of their own there upon which an execution could be levied." Order 4, rule 1, required that "the address of the plaintiff" should appear on the writ; and in the case of "Stoy v. Rees" (24 Q.B.D., 748) the Court of Appeal held that these words were not satisfied by merely stating the place where the plaintiff carried on business, but that it was necessary to state where he resided. No doubt there were authorities which allowed a special construction to be put on this rule in cases where an action was brought by a firm or a corporation. The present plaintiffs, however, were not a firm nor a corporation, but a voluntary society or fellowship. An analogous case to this would be where the plaintiffs were the trustees of a charity or a school, and no one would suggest that in such a case it would be sufficient to give as the plaintiffs' address the place where they held their meetings or where their clerk transacted their business.

Mr. J. E. BANKES, for the plaintiffs, contended that there was no irregularity in the writ. The rule said that the address of the plaintiff must be given. The form in the schedule to the rules spoke of the residence of the plaintiff. But it was clear that there were cases to which the form could not apply—e.g., the case of a corporation, which could not reside anywhere. The plaintiffs were in fact the trustees of the Middle Temple, and they were suing in that capacity. The defendant had failed to produce any authority which showed that the form must be followed in cases where plaintiffs sued in a representative capacity. He submitted that the rule itself had been sufficiently complied with.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE said he thought there was no irregularity in the writ at all. So far as appeared from the writ itself the plaintiffs were a body of persons carrying on business in a particular place, and part of their business was to let out chambers in the Temple. It was not necessary to consider whether they were trustees or whether they were a corporation. The only question was whether, in such circumstances, it was requisite to give the private address of each of the plaintiffs. He thought that a distinction was rightly drawn between the case of private persons and that of persons in such a position as the present plaintiffs. It seemed to him that there was no necessity to give their private addresses. The application therefore failed.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY delivered judgment to the same effect.

RAYNES V. BALLANTYNE AND ANOTHER.*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—Exemptions from liability—Negligence of master.

Decision of Court of Appeal (ante, p. 2) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, dated October 26, 1897, reversing that of Mr. Justice Kennedy, dated May 15, 1897. The case is reported ante, p. 2. The action was brought by the appellant for damages to his pier at Llysfaen owing to the defendants' alleged negligence in the management of the steamship Bessie Barr at such pier on December 7, 1896. The appellant stated that the Bessie Barr was loaded, or ordered to be loaded, with too great a weight of limestone in the after-hold of such vessel before there was any weight in the forward part, whereby such forward part broke away from the pier and caused the after part to beat and work against the pier. The appellant also alleged that such matters were done by the master of the Bessie Barr after warning. The respondents denied the warning and negligence, and alleged that if there was any negligence it was excepted by the terms of their contract of charterparty with the appellant, which was dated February 19, 1895, originally for three calendar months, but subsequently extended by agreement between the parties, and it was the charterparty under which the Bessie Barr was hired on December 7, 1896. By the said charterparty the respondents agreed to place the Bessie Barr at the disposal of the appellant at Raynes Stage, Llandulas (being the stage the damage to which was complained of in the action), or at such safe wharf or place where she might always safely lie as the appellant might direct. The charterparty embodied the following negligence clause:—"It is agreed that the following additional exceptions and conditions shall apply to this contract. The act of God, perils of the sea, fire on board in hulk, or craft, or on shore. Barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, and thieves, arrest and restraint of Princes, rulers, and people, collisions, strandings, and other accidents of navigation excepted. The owner is not to be responsible for loss or damages of any kind arising from the neglect, default, or error in judgment of the pilots, master mariners, engineers, stevedores, workmen, or other persons employed in, on, or about the ship. Not answerable for any loss or damage arising from explosion, bursting of boilers, breaking of shafts, or any latent defect in the machinery or hull not resulting from want of due diligence by the owners of the ship or any of them or by the ship's husband or manager." While the Bessie Barr was at the said stage damage was occasioned to the same by the after part of the said vessel beating and working against it, and an action was brought by the appellant against the respondents to recover the amount of the said damage. At the trial at Liverpool, before Mr. Justice Kennedy and a special jury, the following answers were given by the jury to the following questions left to them by the Judge:—1. Was the damage to the pier caused by the neglect of the defendants' servants?—Yes. 2. If so, what are the damages?—£450. On May 15, the Judge, after hearing arguments on the question raised by the defendants under the charterparty, gave judgment for the plaintiff for £450 and costs. Upon appeal the Court of Appeal (Lords Justices A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins) gave judgment reversing the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy, holding that the respondents were exempted by the terms of the charterparty from liability for the negligence found by the jury. The question was whether the neglect of the master found by the jury ought or ought not to have been regarded as a tort independent of the charterparty.

Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. Gardner Horridge appeared for the appellant; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Carver, Q.C., for the respondents, were not heard.

LORD HERSCHELL, in moving the dismissal of the appeal, said the whole question turned upon the construction of the charterparty. By that contract it was agreed that the respondents should let and the appellant hire a certain steamship for the term of three months, and the ship was to be placed at the disposal of the charterers. The captain was appointed by the owners, but was to be under the directions of the charterers. The effect of that contract was to place the vessel at the complete disposal of the charterers within the limits specified in the charter, and subject to the same limits the master was bound to obey the orders of the charterer, although no doubt he was still the servant of the shipowner. Consequently, apart from the clause, the owner would be responsible for any negligence of the master, although the owner had no voice to control the master, who was carrying out the charterer's instructions. The purpose of the clause was clearly to relieve the owner from responsibility if any damage should arise from the master's negligence whilst the charterparty was in force. There was nothing to take the case out of the wide and general words used, and the case came within the reasons which might fairly be attributed as actuating the parties in entering into this contract.

LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD MORRIS concurred.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE V. TOD.*

Revenue — Stamps — Conveyance on sale — Ad valorem duty — Decree under Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1894—Stamp Act, 1891, secs. 54, 57, and 62.

Decision of Court of Session (34 Scottish Law Reporter, 704) reversed.

This was an appeal from a judgment, dated June 16, 1897, of the First Division of the Court of Session as the Court of Exchequer in Scotland upon a case stated under the Stamp Act, 1891, by the appellants, at the request of the respondent, Mr. David Tod, of Eastwood Park, Renfrewshire. The case is reported 24 Court of Session Cases (4th series), 934; 34 Scottish Law Reporter, 704. The question was whether the instrument submitted by the respondent for the opinion of the appellants was chargeable as a conveyance on sale with the ad valorem stamp duty specified in the first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891. The Commissioners were of opinion that the instrument amounted to a conveyance or transfer on sale, as these words are used in the Act, and accordingly assessed and charged the duty graduated ad valorem. This view was reversed by the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, and their Lordships held that the instrument should be assessed with the fixed stamp duty of 10s., chargeable on a conveyance or transfer other than a conveyance or transfer on sale. The instrument was the extract of a decree, pronounced pursuant to the provisions of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1894. The respondent, as a creditor under a bond and disposition in security, in the exercise of his power of sale, exposed the subjects—certain real estate, or “heritable subjects,” in Glasgow—by public roup, and, failing to find a purchaser, applied to the sheriff for decree in the form of Schedule D annexed to the Act. After certain procedure, the sheriff gave decree as asked, finding that the debtors in the bond had forfeited their right of redemption; that their right was extinguished; and that the respondent had right to, and was vested in, the subjects as absolute proprietor. The main purpose of the Heritable Securities Act was to confer on heritable creditors in Scotland a right of foreclosure, and enable them to become proprietors of the subjects over which their security extended. At common law a creditor selling the subjects could not become a purchaser. Hence it was provided that, on such a decree as was here obtained being pronounced and an extract thereof being recorded in the Sasine register, the creditor should have right to “the lands disposed in security in the same manner and to the same effect as if the disposition in security had been an irredeemable disposition as from the date of such decree,” and the lands should be disencumbered of all posterior securities and diligencies. The instrument as to which the present question arose stated as follows:—“At Glasgow, the 26th day of January, 1897, in an action in the Sheriff Court of the county of Lanark, at Glasgow, at the instance of David Tod, pursuer, against David Lamont Rodger, residing at 11, Rylett-eressent, Shepherd’s-bush, London, heir-at-law of David Rodger, writer in Glasgow, and as such heir of provision in trust for the firm of Murdoch and Rodger, writers in Glasgow, and Ebenezer Erskine Scott, chartered accountant, Edinburgh, as trustee for the creditors of the said Murdoch and Rodger and of James Murdoch, writer, Glasgow, and the said David Rodger, defenders; the sheriff in absence found and declared that the defenders had forfeited the right of redemption reserved to the granters in a bond and disposition in security for the sum of £22,000 sterling, dated the 10th, and recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of the Barony and Regality of Glasgow the 11th, both days of September, 1873, granted quoad the personal obligation by the said Murdoch and Rodger and James Murdoch and David Rodger, the individual partners of the said company or firm of Murdoch and Rodger, and quoad the disposition in security by the said James Murdoch and David Rodger, the only partners of the said firm of Murdoch and Rodger and trustees for said company or firm and partners thereof, in favour of the pursuer, and that the said right was extinguished as from and after the said date hereof, and that the pursuer had right to and was vested in,” [certain heritable subjects in Glasgow, particularly described in the said bond and disposition in security] “as absolute proprietor thereof, but subject,” as therein mentioned, “at the price of £27,000 (the sums due under the said bond and disposition in security at the term of Whitsunday, 1896, being £28,483 2s. 2d., and decreed; and granted warrant to record this extract decree in the Register of Sasines.” Section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, enacts:—“For the purposes of this Act the expression ‘conveyance on sale’ includes every instrument, and every decree or order of any Court or of any Commissioners, whereby any property, or any estate or interest in any property, upon the sale thereof is transferred to or vested in a purchaser, or any other person on his behalf, or by his direction.” Section 57:—“Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or encumbrance upon the property or not, the debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty.” The appellants contended that by the instrument in question the absolute property of the security subjects was transferred to the respondent for a price, and on a sound construction of the Stamp Act, 1891, and particularly of sections 54 and 57, the instrument was a transfer on sale within the meaning of the Act.

There appeared for the appellants the Attorney-General, the Lord Advocate, the Solicitor-General for Scotland, and Mr. A. J. Young, of the Scottish Bar; for the respondent, Mr. H. Aitken, of the Scottish Bar, and Mr. E. F. Spence, of the English Bar.

LORD HERSCHELL moved that the judgment appealed from be reversed and the appeal allowed. After stating the facts his Lordship said there was no doubt that by the decree of the sheriff property, or an interest in property, was transferred to the respondent or vested in him. The question was whether it was so transferred or vested “upon the sale thereof” within the meaning of the 54th section of the Stamp Act, 1891. Before the Act of 1894, although the creditor might be willing to purchase—that is, to acquire the entire title to the property, he could not do so; he was not under the power of sale empowered to become the purchaser. But under that Act he might become the proprietor after exposing the lands held in security to sale. It was to be observed that the effect of the bond and disposition was only to create a real burden upon the land—the title in the land subject to that real burden remaining in the original proprietor. But after the decree the title was completely vested in the creditor, who thus became the proprietor. Now when, after such exposure for sale and sale, the creditor applied to the sheriff for his decree, the sheriff might consider that the property had not been exposed under the best possible conditions, and might order another sale and himself fix the upset price. If he did not order another exposure it must be on the ground that he regarded the price paid by the creditor as the highest obtainable. Having come to that conclusion the sheriff declared that the debtor had forfeited his right of redemption, and that “the petitioner has right to and is vested in the lands described in the said bond, and disposition in security . . . as absolute proprietor” at the price paid, which is stated in the decree. Did not that in substance and effect amount to a declaration that the creditor should be treated as the purchaser of the lands which were to be adjudged to him as purchaser? The effect was the same whether the decree was made after the first exposure for sale or the sheriff directed that the property should be re-exposed. It was impossible to say in either case that the property was not vested “upon the sale thereof” according to either of the modes prescribed, and that being so the ad valorem duty attached. The Crown did not ask for costs, as the Inland Revenue Commissioners did not at first take the view of the Act which had for the first time been presented in this case. But the respondent must repay to the Crown the costs awarded to him in the Courts below. As the Commissioners had for some time acted on a view which was contrary to that which had been successfully argued before their Lordships, it might be desirable for the Legislature to intervene to give validity to transactions carried through on the former construction and to enforce the ad valorem duty only in cases subsequent to this decision. His noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, who had been obliged to leave, desired to express his entire concurrence with the motion.

LORD MACNAGHTEN also thought that the transaction under consideration was in reality a sale, and that the sheriff's decree was, in the words of the Stamp Act, a decree by which the property was vested in the creditor “upon the sale thereof.” An analogy had been suggested between the English rule by which the Crown did not claim ad valorem duty on foreclosure decrees of legal mortgages and the Scotch law on the subject. On that he could express no opinion, but would reserve consideration of the question when a case under the English practice came to their Lordships' House.

LORD MORRIS concurred, and said that this was clearly a vesting of property on sale whichever of the alternative courses prescribed in section 8 of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1894, was followed. The appeal was allowed without costs.

WHITE V. TURNBULL, MARTIN, AND CO.*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—Broker's commission—“Commission payable on all hire earned”—Rescission of charterparty.

Decision of Bigham, J. (ante, p. 45), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham in favour of the defendants at the trial of the action without a jury, reported ante, p. 45; 3 Com. Cas., 13. The action was brought to recover commission in respect of a time charterparty entered into through the agency of the plaintiff between the defendants, who were the owners of the steamship Elderslie, and the Jamaica Fruit Importing Company as charterers. The Elderslie was fitted with refrigerating machinery. The charter was for a period of 12 months, the hire being at the rate of £1,050 per month, payable monthly in advance, and the charter provided that a commission of 5 per cent. should be paid to the plaintiff “on all hire earned,” and that payment of the hire was to be suspended or reduced in certain cases, as, for instance, in the event of loss of time from breakdown of machinery. The first two months' hire was duly earned and commission was paid to the plaintiff. The third month's hire was duly paid in advance, but during the currency of that month the charterers rescinded the charter, alleging that certain warranties as to the condition of the ship contained in the charter had been broken by the defendants. In an action between the defendants and the charterers, which was tried before Mr. Justice Mathew in July, 1897, judgment was entered by consent after a trial occupying several days, by which the cancellation of the charter was confirmed, and £700 of the £1,050 hire paid in advance was ordered to be returned to the charterers. The plaintiff in the present action claimed commission on the £1,050 paid in advance and on a like sum for each of the remaining nine months of the charter. The defendants paid into Court £17 10s., being commission on the £350 not returned without a denial of liability, and a further sum of £35, being commission on the £700 returned with a denial of liability. Mr. Justice Bigham held that it had not been shown that the charter had come to an end through any default of the defendants, and gave judgment for them. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. E. Bankes appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. Leek for the defendants.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the defendants, dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to commission under this charterparty. It appeared that the charterparty, when it was first presented to the defendants, the shipowners, was a printed document in the ordinary form which was generally used by the plaintiff. It consisted of many clauses, and at the end came the terms as to the commission to which the plaintiff was entitled. These terms, as printed, provided for the plaintiff receiving commission on the estimated amount of freight. The words providing for this, however, were struck out, and instead thereof were inserted words providing for commission on all hire earned. It was clear that this alteration was intended to introduce a limitation on the obligation to be put on the shipowners. The plaintiff admitted that he could not recover the commission which he claimed in the action as commission on freight which had been actually earned, because the freight had not been earned. But he contended that there was an implied term in the charterparty that the defendants would do nothing to prevent the plaintiff from earning his commission, or, in other words, that they would keep the charterparty running for 12 months and would perform all their obligations under it. In his opinion it was impossible to import any such implied term into the charterparty. He entirely agreed with the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, and he thought that the appeal must be dismissed.

OXLEY V. WILKS.*

Defamation—Libel—Newspaper—Payment into Court under Lord Campbell's Act—6 and 7 Vict., c. 96, sec. 2—Judgment, how entered.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Darling at the trial of the action with a jury. The action was brought for a libel published in a newspaper. The defendants put in a plea under section 2 of Lord Campbell's Act, 6 and 7 Vict., c. 96, and at the same time paid the sum of £5 into Court. At the trial Mr. Justice Darling at first left the case generally to the jury, and they returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £5. The learned Judge then left specific questions to the jury, in answer to which they found that there was no malice on the part of the defendants, that there was negligence on their part, that they had made a sufficient apology, and that the damages were £5. The learned Judge held that the defendants had failed to establish the whole of their plea, inasmuch as the jury had found that there was negligence, and he accordingly directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

Mr. F. S. COOPER (Mr. Rawlinson, Q.C., with him) appeared in support of the appeal, and contended that the defendants were entitled to judgment. Payment into Court was now governed entirely by the Rule of the Supreme Court—viz., by Order 22. That part of section 2 of Lord Campbell's Act which related to payment of money into Court was repealed by the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879. The jury having by their verdict found that the sum paid into Court by the defendants was sufficient, the defendants were, under the present rules, entitled to judgment. If it were not so the defendants were in a worse position than they would have been in if they had simply paid the same sum into Court admitting liability, under Rule 1 of Order 22, and had not relied on Lord Campbell's Act at all; which would seem to be an absurd result, considering that Lord Campbell's Act was undoubtedly passed in the interest of newspaper proprietors.

Mr. Candy, Q.C., and Mr. Arthur May appeared for the plaintiff.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said this was an action of libel against a newspaper. The defendants pleaded a plea under Lord Campbell's Act, and they set out the four ingredients necessary to raise that plea—viz., that there had been no malice on their part, and no negligence, that they had made a full apology, and that they brought a sum of money into Court by way of amends. Those four matters were all necessary to make the plea a good plea. At the trial the case was fought on that plea, and the jury found that the defendants had proved three of the necessary ingredients, but that they had failed to prove one—viz., that they had acted without negligence. The defendants therefore failed to establish the plea which they set up. They now sought to turn round and treat the payment of £5 into Court as a payment into Court under the Judicature Rules, and argued that under those rules they were entitled to judgment. In his opinion it was not open to them to do that. He thought that the judgment of Mr. Justice Darling was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

KERRY V. MAORI DREAM GOLD MINES (LIMITED).*

Company—Directors—Inequitable transaction—Unfairness to one set of shareholders—Injunction granted.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice North (reported in The Times of April 7) refusing a motion by the plaintiffs, who were holders of vendors' shares, suing on behalf of themselves and all other fully paid up shareholders, to restrain the defendants, the Maori Dream Gold Mines (Limited) and its directors, Lord Kilmorey and others, till the trial of the action, from carrying into execution a purchase of shares in another company authorized by one of certain resolutions passed by the company on February 28. The ground of the motion was that the terms were unfair to one set of shareholders, and that the majority were induced to vote for the resolutions by a transaction in the nature of a bribe. The resolutions in question authorized the directors (1) to abandon their own mine; (2) to purchase 10,000 fully-paid shares of £1 each in the Waihi Gladstone Gold Mining Company (Limited) for £8,000; and (3) to invest the remaining funds of the company as they might think expedient. The notice convening the meeting was dated February 18. It was accompanied by a circular stating that the directors had obtained an independent report to the effect that it was advisable to abandon their mine, and that two of the directors of the Maori Dream Company, Messrs. R. D. Wilkinson and H. C. Parkes, were on the board of the Waihi Gladstone Company, and it was proposed to nominate another director to represent the interests of the shareholders of the Maori Dream Company. On the same February 18 Mr. Parkes, who was a promoter of the Maori Dream Company, and the vendor to the Waihi Gladstone Company, sent a circular to all the shareholders of the Maori Dream Company (other than holders of vendors' shares) referring to the proposed meeting, saying, "In order to give each shareholder in the Maori Dream Gold Mines (Limited) who has subscribed for his shares in cash an opportunity of getting value for not only the money already paid upon such shares, but also for that which remains to be paid, I have agreed with the directors of that company to give to each of such shareholders, so soon as his shares in that company have been paid in full, one fully-paid share in the Waihi Gladstone Gold Mining Company (Limited) in exchange for each fully-paid share held by such shareholder in the Maori Dream Gold Mines (Limited). In order to give effect to this arrangement I have agreed with the directors to transfer a sufficient number of fully-paid shares in the Waihi Gladstone Gold Mining Company (Limited) to trustees, who will be empowered to make the exchange above-mentioned." The circular pointed out that it was intended to benefit cash subscribers of shares in the Maori Dream Company and not holders of vendors' shares, and that in the event of the Maori Company being wound up the cash shareholders would have to pay up in full and any overplus would be participated in by the holders of vendors' shares which were fully paid up. At the meeting the resolutions were passed by a majority of eight to five of those present; no poll was demanded; it was, however, in evidence that the directors had the command of votes of those present and proxies to the number of over 48,000, while the holders of vendors' shares who opposed the resolution had somewhat over 25,000 votes available. Mr. Justice North, being of opinion that there was no sufficient reason why these resolutions should not be carried out, refused the motion. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. George Henderson were for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Gore Browne for the defendants.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that it was impossible to regard the circular issued by Mr. Parkes as something independent of the resolution to buy the 16,000 shares. It was obvious that that circular was part of the transaction, that transaction being that the company was to buy the shares for £8,000, and that Mr. Parkes, as part of the transaction, should, by agreement with the directors of the Maori Company, give certain advantages to the holders of cash shares in that company. Plainly that transaction could not stand, because the company had no right to stipulate for an advantage to one set of shareholders against another. The arrangement taken as a whole was one which it was not competent for the shareholders to carry out. There would, therefore, be an injunction to restrain the defendants till the trial from carrying out the resolution to buy the shares, and the appeal would be allowed with costs, to be paid to the plaintiffs in any event.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and COLLINS concurred.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC V. LA COMPAGNIE FRANCO-BELGE DU CHEMIN DE FER DU NORD.*

Practice—Discovery—Documents.

Application for discovery of documents refused on the ground that they were not relevant to the action.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice North refusing an application by the defendant company for the common order against the plaintiffs for discovery of the documents relating to the matters at issue in the action. The defendant company was constituted in Belgium in 1892 for the purpose of acquiring and working a concession to make a railway in the Transvaal. In June, 1894, the company applied to the Government of the Republic for its assent to the issue of debentures for £1,000,000, and proposed that the proceeds of the issue should be deposited in the joint names of Mr. Van Blokland, the Commissioner in Europe of the Republic, and a trustee named by the company, so that all moneys required for the construction, &c., could only be drawn on the joint signatures of the two trustees. This was acted upon and large sums arising from the debentures were placed in two London banks in the joint names of Van Blokland and Baron Oppenheim, the company's trustee. Van Blokland having died in 1896, Baron Oppenheim, as the surviving trustee, claimed the right, on behalf of his company, to draw out the moneys standing in the joint names. Thereupon the South African Republic commenced the present action for a declaration that the funds ought to be held by two trustees and that the plaintiffs were entitled from time to time to nominate a trustee on their behalf; payment of the funds to the trustees when constituted; and an injunction to restrain the defendant company from dealing with the funds in the meantime. The defendants, by their defence, complained that the plaintiffs had, through their trustee, persistently declined to allow the funds in question to be applied to the purposes for which they were deposited, and submitted that it would be inequitable that the funds should be again placed under the control of the plaintiffs except upon the terms of the plaintiffs agreeing to observe the arrangement whereby the same were placed in joint names and to carry out the terms of the concession. The object of the defendants in applying for discovery was to enable them to make good these allegations. Mr. Justice North pointed out that the scope of the action was confined to the appointment of a new trustee and the protection of the funds in the meantime. There being no claim to administer the funds he did not see how the documents of which the defendants required production were relevant to the action. He therefore dismissed the application. The defendants appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney were for the defendants; Mr. Waggett was for the plaintiffs.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS did not think that the Court ought to accede to this application. This was another instance of the difficulty which people got into by entering into contracts with foreign Governments. The plaintiffs were applying for the appointment of a trustee of a fund in this country. There was really no defence to the action, limited as it was in that way, and no necessity for any discovery. But the suggestion was that the plaintiffs had departed from the arrangements under which the fund was paid in and that as they were a foreign Government and incapable of being sued in this country the Court as a condition of appointing a new trustee ought to put them upon terms to observe that arrangement. But, in his Lordship's opinion, the Court ought not to accede to an application for an order on the plaintiffs to make an affidavit of documents which would not be of the slightest use to any one for the purposes of the trial of this action.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed. It was said that the Transvaal Republic in the time of the last trustee had so acted that they could not be trusted to appoint a new trustee or to have the trust carried out out of Court. But in an action of this kind there was no ground for inquiring into the past administration of the trust, and an ordinary plaintiff would not be subjected to terms such as were now proposed. This Court was asked to assume against a foreign State a jurisdiction which it would not assume against a person who was entirely amenable to its jurisdiction. This application was made because the plaintiffs were a foreign State and could not be sued here. That seemed to his Lordship to be the very reason for not exercising this jurisdiction against them.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

LUMSDEN V. BURNETT.*

Distress—Income-tax—Sum unpaid not exceeding £20—Charges of collector—Man in constructive possession—7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 17.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. G. BUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence), reversing a judgment of the Judge of the Lambeth County Court. The action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, who was a collector of Queen's taxes, to recover damages for an alleged illegal distress for income-tax, and also to recover the sum of 15s. paid by the plaintiff under protest in respect of the expenses of a man alleged to have been in possession of the plaintiff's goods for six days. In January, 1897, a notice was left at the plaintiff's house in the usual form on yellow paper, stating that the sum of 13s. 4d. was due from him for income-tax. Without any further demand for payment being made on the plaintiff, a levy was executed on April 29, when the defendant, accompanied by another man, went to the plaintiff's house with a notice of distress. The only person in the house was the plaintiff's daughter, a girl about 14 years of age. The defendant produced a printed document called a power to re-enter, to which he obtained the girl's signature. This document was in form a request to the defendant to withdraw from the house, and an authority to him to re-enter at any time for the purpose of holding possession of the goods therein, and an undertaking not to remove any of the goods. The defendant left the notice of distress with the girl, and went away with the other man, whom he had intended to leave in possession if it had been necessary. On the same day the plaintiff, having heard what had happened, went to the defendant's office and tendered the sum of 13s. 4d. The defendant refused to accept this sum, and demanded in addition 3s. for the levy fee. Two days later, on May 1, the plaintiff tendered 16s. 4d., when the defendant demanded three days' possession money at half-a-crown a day, under the provisions of 57 Geo. III., c. 93, and 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 18. The plaintiff refused to pay possession money on the ground that no man had been in possession. The period of five days mentioned in section 86 (4) of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, having expired, the defendant, on May 4, commenced to remove some of the goods, and thereupon the plaintiff, under protest, paid the sum of £1 11s. 4d., being the amount of the tax, the levy fee, and 15s., the costs of a man in possession for six days. The plaintiff then brought this action, and at the hearing the County Court Judge gave judgment in his favour for £3 15s.—being £3 for damages for illegal distress, and 15s. in respect of possession money illegally charged. The Divisional Court, on appeal, reversed the judgment of the County Court Judge. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., and Mr. Addington Willis appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Lincoln Reed for the defendant.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The amount in dispute in this appeal is insignificant, but the point raised is of some practical importance, and the case has acquired the name of "The Walking Possession Case." It raises the question whether a collector of income-tax, when he distrains upon the goods of a taxpayer for unpaid income-tax which does not exceed £20 (in this case amounting to the sum of 13s. 4d.), is entitled to levy upon the taxpayer, in addition to the tax due, 2s. 6d. a day for a man in possession, amounting in this case to 15s.—i.e., six days at 2s. 6d. per day, when in truth and in fact the man has not been really in possession, but at the most has been in constructive possession of the goods distrained. The facts are these. In the early part of January, 1897, the tax-collector, who is the defendant, left with the taxpayer, who is the plaintiff, a printed document which the plaintiff himself designated as being the "customary demand note."

It is a document headed in large type, "Income-Tax, House Duty, and Land Tax payable on or before the 1st January, 1897." The document states the amount of duties payable for the year 1896-97 by the taxpayer, which in the present case was duty under Schedule D at 8d. in the pound, amounting in all to 13s. 4d. At the foot of this demand note, in large type, are the words, "This notice must be produced at the time of payment or sent with the remittance." Although the plaintiff was served with this demand for payment of income-tax, he wholly disregarded it, and did not pay the 13s. 4d. due and demanded. Time went on without the tax being paid, and on April 29, 1897, the tax-collector, accompanied by a man, went to the plaintiff's premises armed with two printed documents, the one being a document headed "Queen's Taxes, Arrears Warrant," which, when filled up as it subsequently was, gave the taxpayer notice that the collector had upon that day seized and distrained upon the taxpayer's goods and chattels for income-tax, Schedule D, 13s. 4d., due upon January 1, 1897, and also that, unless that amount, together with the charges attending the distress, was paid within five days from April 29, 1897, the goods and chattels seized would be sold according to law. The charges mentioned in this document, in addition to the tax of 13s. 4d., were "levy, 3s.," "man, 2s. 6d. per day." The "inventory of goods seized" was thus filled in—"Shop, eight pair trousers." The other printed document which the collector then took with him to the plaintiff's house was the following:—"To Mr. H. E. Burnett, 24, Queen's-road, S.E."—this is the name of the defendant, the collector—"or whom it may concern,—I hereby authorize you to re-enter at any time upon the premises. . . . by force or as you may think fit, and to break open doors or windows for the purpose of taking possession under your warrant of distress; and I also undertake not to move away or allow to be moved away from the said premises any of the goods and chattels which are now therein until the amount levied for, together with all costs and charges of maintaining the levy, are duly paid and settled. And in the event of the man now in possession quitting the said premises temporarily or from any cause whatever previous to the removal by you of the said goods from the above-mentioned premises or the distraint being otherwise satisfied, it shall not be considered in any way an abandonment of the levy. I also undertake not to replevy the said goods and chattels, and not to bring any action or actions at law against you or either of you, or prefer any indictment, for any of your proceedings in this matter. Dated this 29th day of April, 1897." The only person the tax-collector and his man found upon the plaintiff's premises upon April 29, 1897, was the taxpayer's daughter, a child about 13½ years of age, whose signature the tax-collector then obtained to the printed document above-mentioned, having first demanded the tax of 13s. 4d. from her. This child had no authority whatever from her father, the plaintiff, to sign this document, then for the first time produced by the tax-collector, and, indeed, the father never knew of this document, nor that his child had signed it, till long afterwards, when the tax-collector was insisting that the taxpayer should pay him 2s. 6d. per day for the man having been, as he alleged, in possession for six days, amounting to the 15s. then claimed by him. Upon this April 29, 1897, the collector, accompanied by the man as before stated, distrained upon the eight pair of trousers in the shop, and left the document headed "Queen's Taxes, Arrears Warrant" filled up as before mentioned upon the plaintiff's premises. The collector and his man then left the plaintiff's premises, taking with him the document signed by the plaintiff's child, neither the collector nor the man remaining in possession of the goods distrained, though it appears that during the six days the man daily returned to the neighbourhood to keep, as he said, watch on the premises, and to see that nothing was removed; and this man also stated that sometimes he was in possession of two houses in one day. It seems to me, for reasons hereafter, that the findings of fact of the learned County Court Judge, if they be findings of fact, are wholly immaterial to the decision of this case. If material, I could not agree with some of them, for in my opinion they are not only founded upon no evidence at all, but are directly contrary to the undisputed evidence in the case. For instance, the County Court Judge in his judgment states that no demand for the tax due was made upon the taxpayer other than the demand upon the child upon April 29, 1897, ignoring altogether the service of the demand note on or about January 1, 1897, and the continued and deliberate non-payment by the plaintiff of the tax due till the distress was made upon April 29, 1897. Again, this continued non-payment the County Court Judge holds to be no evidence of a refusal to pay, for he holds that there was "no refusal to pay the tax in the sense intended by the Act of Parliament," whatever that may mean. The County Court Judge also states that the defendant levied a distress which was in the first instance improper; and that he afterwards abandoned it by not having a man in possession in such a way as to make it continuous possession. We held in this Court not long since in the case of "Bagshawes (Limited) v. Deacon" (not reported), after full argument and discussing amongst other authorities "Ackland v. Paynter" (8 Price, 95), "Swann v. Earl of Falmouth" (8 B. and C., 456), and "Eldridge v. Stacey" (15, C.B., N.S., 458), that, where a sheriff goes out of possession, and the point arises as to whether he has abandoned possession or not, the question always is one of fact, and is whether the sheriff by going out of possession as he did has abandoned the possession. A sheriff in some circumstances may go out of possession and again re-enter without having abandoned possession, and the question always is whether what he has done amounts to an abandonment of possession. Although the document signed by the child in this case clearly does not bind the plaintiff and is no evidence against him, yet it is strong evidence to show that the collector did not abandon possession, and his employing and paying a man to go and see that the goods distrained were not removed affords corroborating evidence, if it were needed, that he went out with the intention of returning and not of abandoning possession. But these findings of the County Court Judge are immaterial to the real question he had to try, which is the right of the collector, apart from agreement, to levy upon the plaintiff for the 15s. for the man said to have been in possession when the distress was for an amount not exceeding £20. This question has to be decided upon the statute regulating distresses for income-tax not exceeding £20, which appears to have been altogether overlooked by the County Court Judge, and is not alluded to by the Divisional Court, who decided the case upon the question whether there had been an agreement by the taxpayer to pay the 2s. 6d. per day, whether the man was in real possession or not, of which, in my opinion, with submission to the Divisional Court, there was not a tittle of evidence. I am not aware of any Act of Parliament regulating the charges to be made when the sum distrained for exceeds the sum of £20, but from text books of repute I find that for such expenses the general practice appears to be to charge 1s. in the pound for the levy and 3s. 6d. per day for the man in possession. But there is an Act of Parliament which regulates what is to be charged by a collector for distress for income-tax when such unpaid tax does not exceed £20, and this is the Act of 1827 (7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 17). The matter stands thus:—By the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict., c. 19), section 86, subsection 1, it is enacted that "If a person refuses to pay the sum charged upon him by virtue of the Tax Acts or this Act on demand made by the collector . . . such collector may and he is thereunto authorized and required for non-payment thereof to distrain . . . the person so charged by his goods and chattels . . . without any further authority from the Commissioners for that purpose than the warrant to such collector delivered on his appointment." By subsection 4 it is enacted that every distress levied by a collector shall be kept for the space of five days at the costs and charges of the person so refusing to pay; and, by subsection 5, if such person does not pay the respective sums of money so due within the five days, the distress after appraisal may be sold by the collector for payment of the said money, and the overplus coming by the said distress (if any there be) after deducting the said money and also the costs and charges of taking, keeping, and selling the said distress, shall be restored to the owner. The question arises, What are these costs and charges? This brings me to the Acts of 1817 and 1827. By the Act of 1817 (57 Geo. III., c. 93), after reciting that "divers persons acting as brokers and distraining on the goods and chattels of others . . . have of late made excessive charges to the great oppression of poor tenants and others," it is enacted that "from and after the passing of this Act no person whatsoever making any distress for rent where the sum demanded and due shall not exceed the sum of £20 for and in respect of such rent . . . shall have, take, or receive out of the produce of the goods or chattels distrained upon and sold or from the tenant distrained upon . . . any other or more costs and charges for and in respect of such distress or any matter or thing done therein than such as are fixed and set forth in the schedule thereunto annexed and appropriated to each act which shall have been done in the course of such distress; and no person or persons whatsoever shall make any charge whatever for any act, matter, or thing mentioned in the said schedule unless such act shall have been really done." In this schedule, which is headed, "Schedule of the limitation of costs and charges on distress for small rents," is set forth as follows:—"Levying distress, 3s.; man in possession per day, 2s. 6d." Ten years afterwards, in the year 1827, by the Act of 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 17, all the provisions of the Act of 57 Geo. III., c. 93, which related to distraining for rent not exceeding £20 were extended to any distress or levy made for . . . assessed taxes, or other rates and taxes . . . whatever . . . where the sum demanded and due for such taxes should not exceed the sum of £20. What, then, are the charges which can be made for a distress for income-tax, when an amount not exceeding £20 is due? It is clear that in such a case by the statute the charge for a man in possession may be made of 2s. 6d. per diem, but only if the act for which the charge is made has been really done—i.e., if the man charged for has really been in possession. In the present case at the most the man charged for at 2s. 6d. per day has but been in constructive possession, and it is impossible to hold that constructive possession is the same thing as real possession, for the one is a reality and the other is not. For instance, how can there be real possession by one man of two, six, eight, or ten houses upon the same day? The thing is impossible. As, however, the statute 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 17, is a statute in favour of a taxpayer owing incometax not exceeding £20, I do not see why such a taxpayer may not agree with a collector, if the former desires neither to pay the tax due nor to suffer the inconvenience of having a man in real possession, to pay the 2s. 6d. per diem to the collector, even though the man does not remain in real possession, but unless such an agreement is made I am clear that the collector cannot claim the 2s. 6d. per day if the man does not remain in real possession. It is for these reasons I think, there being no agreement to the contrary, that the tax-collector cannot charge 2s. 6d. per day for the man who has not been really in possession of the goods distrained, when the income-tax due amounts, as in this case, to less than £20. I think, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed with costs to the appellant here and below.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read a judgment in which he expressed the same opinion.

IN RE THE RUSSELL INSTITUTION—FIGGINS V. BAGHINO.*
Literary Institution—Dissolution—Surplus funds —Distribution amongst shareholders—Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, sec. 30.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees of the Russell Literary and Scientific Institution, one proprietor being made defendant for the purpose of representing the others. The institution has been carried on from the year 1808, when it was founded, at a building in Great Coram-street, Russell-square, till last year, when, shortly before the time it would have expired, the lease was surrendered, resolutions were passed for dissolving the society, and the library and other assets were disposed of, with the result that there was in the hands of the trustees a sum of about £1,600, and the question for the decision of the Court was whether this sum was divisible among the proprietors of the institution or whether it came within the operation of the 30th section of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, which provides:—
“If upon the dissolution of any institution there shall remain, after the satisfaction of all its debts and liabilities, any property whatsoever, the same shall not be paid to or distributed among the members of the said institution or any of them, but shall be given to some other institution, to be determined by the members at the time of the dissolution, or in default thereof by the Judge of the County Court aforesaid, provided, however, that this clause shall not apply to any institution which shall have been founded or established by the contributions of shareholders in the nature of a joint stock company.” The Russell Institution was founded in the year 1808. A lease of the premises in Great Coram-street for 98 years from the Duke of Bedford was assigned in consideration of 200 shares in the institution and a money payment to trustees to be used and disposed of in such manner as by the rules and regulations of the institution for the time being in force should be ordered and appointed. The rules of the institution as originally framed provided for a capital divided into 700 £25 shares. A portion of the capital was appropriated to preliminary expenses, fitting up the rooms, and the purchase of a library. A portion of the income of invested funds was to be accumulated. When the interest of the whole capital should be sufficient to defray current expenses independently of current subscriptions, a portion of the revenue was to be appropriated to dividend amongst the proprietors. The rules provided for the transfer of shares by a proprietor and the transmission of shares on the death of a proprietor. The rules provided for a library and lecture-hall and a news-room. Annual and life subscribers were admitted to the benefits of the institution. In the year 1843 an Act was passed, 6 and 7 Vict., c. 36, exempting from the payment of public rates societies established exclusively for the purpose of science, literature, or the fine arts, provided that such societies were supported wholly or partly by annual contributions and no dividend or bonus were payable among members and the society were certified in manner provided. In the year 1847 new rules of the Russell Institution were made with a view to bringing the institution within the exemption from rating. No dividends had ever been paid to proprietors, and it was provided that no dividend, gift, division in bonus, in money or otherwise, should be made unto or between any of the members, and the institution was certified. Proceedings were brought in the Court of Queen's Bench to try whether the institution was exempted from payment of rates under the Act of 1843, and the judgment of the Court was given by Lord Campbell in January, 1854, against the institution, the Court holding that its objects were not confined to science, literature, and the fine arts exclusively. In the year 1857 the new rules of the society were made, which provided that the society should consist of proprietors and life and annual subscribers. One rule provided that proprietors should be interested in the property of the institution in proportion to the number of shares they held.

Mr. SWINFEN EADY, Q.C., and Mr. ELGOOD, for the trustees, submitted to the Court that the money in hand was not divisible among the proprietors, but was devoted by section 30 of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act to some kindred institution to be determined in manner provided by the Act. They relied on the authority of a decision of the late Lord Justice Kay when a Judge of first instance upon a petition to wind up a similar institution (“In re the Bristol Athenæum,” 43 Ch.D., 236; 6 The Times L.R., 88). His Lordship dismissed the petition, holding not only that the society in question was not only not subject to the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Acts as to winding up, but also giving his opinion that it was not in the nature of a joint stock company.

Mr. H. T. TERRELL, Q.C., and Mr. DOUGLAS, for the defendant, argued that the society was not within the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act at all, and that, if it were, it was exempted from the operation of section 30, because it was in the nature of a joint stock company.

The arguments were completed on the 25th ult. His Lordship said that he would have given judgment at once, but he was told that there was a somewhat similar case in which Mr. Justice Stirling had reserved judgment, and he would take an opportunity to discuss the matter with Mr. Justice Stirling.

His LORDSHIP gave judgment. He intimated that Mr. Justice Stirling was of the same opinion as he was as to the construction of the 30th section of the Act. In the first place, he held that the institution was a literary and scientific institution within the provisions of the Act of 1854 and capable of being dissolved under that Act, and he pointed out that the members of the institution had themselves taken this view. There remained the question whether the institution was within the exemption contained at the end of section 30 as being in the nature of a joint stock company. On this part of the case, though he agreed with Lord Justice Kay that the petition in the case "In re the Bristol Athenæum" was properly dismissed—the only point necessary for decision in that case—with great deference he differed from the opinion the learned Judge had gone on to express that the institution in question was not in the nature of a joint stock company, for the reason there was no provision for payment of dividend or bonus to members. His Lordship referred to provisions of the earliest Joint Stock Company Act, of the existing Act of 1862, and the Amendment Act of 1867, which, in his opinion, applied to such an association as the present, and finally held that the proprietors are entitled to the surplus assets in proportion to the number of shares held by them respectively.

THE HORSEY ESTATE (LIMITED) V. STEIGER AND PETRI-FITE (LIMITED).*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Proviso for re-entry—Construction—Liquidation of company.

This was an action to recover possession of premises known as 31, Orchard-place, Blackwall, by way of forfeiture under the terms of a lease.

Mr. Christopher James and Mr. B. A. Cohen appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Boome and Mr. Timins for the defendant Steiger; and Mr. Clarke Williams for the defendants Petrifite (Limited).

On November 4, 1889, the trustees of the will of Thomas Horsey, deceased, demised to John Donnelly and a registered company the piece of land in question for a term of 21 years. The lease contained covenants by the lessees for rent and repairs, and a covenant not to assign or underlet without the consent of the lessors. There was also a proviso for re-entry on failure to pay rent or to observe the other covenants of the lease, "Or if the lessees shall become bankrupt or enter into liquidation for the benefit of, or compound with, his creditors, or, being a company, shall enter into liquidation whether compulsory or voluntary." On August 1, 1894, the lessors assigned to the plaintiffs. On December 13, 1895, the lessees assigned (with the assent of the lessors) to the defendants. The assent of the lessors was expressly limited to this assignment. On January 26, 1897, Petrifite (Limited) went into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of reconstituting the company and increasing its capital, and a new company was formed and registered on September 27, 1897, under the same name, to carry out the objects of the old company. By an agreement dated December 2, 1897, the original Petrifite (Limited) assigned to the new company their rights and property, including their right and interest in the leasehold premises 31, Orchard-place, for the residue of the term, subject to the covenants of the lease. No actual assignment of the lease was ever made. Notice was thereupon served upon the original lessees and the present lessees under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, preparatory to taking proceedings to enforce the right of re-entry. One of the questions was whether the liquidation of the original Petrifite (Limited) was a ground of re-entry.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS, in the course of a considered judgment, after reciting the facts, said that he agreed in the contention made by the learned counsel for the defendants that provisos for re-entry ought to be construed strictly, which after all, according to his Lordship's idea, meant but little more than this—that the right of re-entry must be determined by the intention of the parties so far as they were expressed in the lease. It certainly did not mean that those whose duty it was to construe it should endeavour to adopt any possible interpretation, however forced and unreasonable, with the mere object to defeat the forfeiture. In "The Corporation of Bristol v. Westcott" (12 Ch.D., 466), Sir George Jessel, M.R., pointed out various considerations which must be applied for the purpose of construing a clause in a lease which it is impossible to deal with literally, but where, nevertheless, the intention of the parties can be collected from the language of the covenants. In the same case Lord Justice Cotton said:—"Although it is a question of forfeiture we must construe the covenant fairly, ascertain its meaning without regard to forfeiture, and then see whether upon that ascertained meaning a forfeiture has been incurred." These words exactly expressed his Lordship's view. The same view was expressed in "Varley v. Coppard" (L.R., 7 C.P., 505). Construing this proviso fairly, it was not necessary that each of the lessees should be bankrupt or in liquidation before the right of re-entry could arise. The words of the proviso were—"If the lessees shall become bankrupt," but it was clear that the word "lessees" in the plural could not be literally so construed. Such a construction would render the forfeiture impossible, for a registered company could not become bankrupt, nor could the words "or enter into liquidation, &c., for the benefit of his creditors" apply or be intended to apply to the registered company, or to any but the individual lessee. This part of the proviso fairly construed could only mean "if the individual lessee shall become bankrupt or compound with his creditors," and could have no relation whatever to the company. The proviso then continued, "or being a company shall enter into liquidation" the lessors might re-enter. This clearly could not refer to the individual lessee. The reasonable meaning to be attached to this proviso was, reading it sensibly:—"If the individual lessee becomes bankrupt or the company enters into liquidation the right of re-entry shall accrue." If that was the meaning of the parties there was no reason why the proviso should not be enforced. The reason and probability for such a construction was that when the lease was granted the lessors had the responsibility of the two lessees named in the lease or others who, by the assent of the lessors, might succeed them as lessees, and it could not be doubted that both parties contemplated the continuance of this state of things during the continuance of the term. The provisions of the lease were framed with this object, but such intentions would be defeated if the company ceased to exist by reason of its liquidation, whether for one reason or another, as it practically would do at the commencement of the winding up (see section 181 of the Companies Act, 1862, and per Jessel, M.R., in "General Share and Trust Company v. Wetley Company," 20 Ch.D., 267), or if by bankruptcy the responsibility and ability of the individual lessee to discharge the obligations of his lease were destroyed. There was no ground for limiting the term "liquidation" to a liquidation in the nature of bankruptcy or for the benefit of creditors. The liquidation of a company, whether for one purpose or another, must result in the extinguishment of the company. As applied to the individual lessee the meaning of the term liquidation is limited to a liquidation by reason of pecuniary embarrassment. The right of the plaintiffs to re-enter followed upon the entering into liquidation of the original Petrifite (Limited); and upon that ground the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. His Lordship also held that, in the circumstances of the case, there had been no breach of the covenant not to assign or underlet without the assent of the lessors.

COUNTY COUNCIL OF CUMBERLAND V. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamps—Agreement as to payment to local authority in respect of roads—Stamp Act, 1891, sched. I.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to the 13th section of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vic., c. 39), raising a question as to what stamp ought to be put on a document which was an agreement between a county council and an urban authority as to the amount to be paid by the county council to the authority, which had claimed to retain the main roads in their district.

Mr. William Russell appeared for the county council; the Solicitor-General and Mr. Danckwerts for the Crown.

On December 2, 1897, an instrument was presented on behalf of the county council of Cumberland (hereinafter called the appellants) by their solicitors to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the provisions of the 12th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The instrument was an agreement made on November 26, 1897, between the county council of Cumberland and the urban district council of Frizington, whereby the annual payment to be made by the county council to the urban council in respect of the year ending March 31, 1898, in pursuance of section 11 (2) and (3) of the Local Government Act, 1888, towards the cost of maintenance and repair and reasonable improvement connected with the maintenance and repair of all main roads within the urban district, was to be the sum of £314. The urban council had under the power conferred by section 11 (2) claimed to retain the powers and duties of maintaining and repairing the main roads in the said agreement mentioned. The appellants claimed that the instrument came within the following heading in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891—viz., "Agreement or contract made or entered into pursuant to the Highway Acts for or relating to the making, maintaining, or repairing of highways, 6d.," inasmuch as by section 3 of the Local Government Act, 1888, there was transferred to the county council "all business done by the quarter sessions, or any committee appointed by the quarter sessions, in respect of the following matters (subsection 8) :—Bridges and roads repairable with bridges, and any powers vested by the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, in the county authority; and the appellants contended that the agreement was made pursuant to the powers vested in them by a Highway Act—namely, the Act of 1878, and was therefore chargeable with a duty of 6d. only. The Commissioners, however, were of opinion that the agreement came under the heading "Deed of any kind whatsoever not described in the schedule," and assessed the duty at 10s.

MR. RUSSELL said that this was a test case. He commented on the different Highway Acts, and urged that this agreement could properly be described as coming within them.

The COURT, however, upheld the decision of the Commissioners.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in giving judgment, said the agreement did not come within the terms of the schedule to the Act of 1891. It was made pursuant to the Local Government Act, 1888, and not pursuant to the Highway Acts. It was not an agreement "relating to the making, maintaining, or repairing of highways," for the agreement contained provisions for improving the main roads, and it had been decided that improving roads was different from maintaining or repairing them. (See "Leek v. Staffordshire," 20 Q.B.D., 794.)

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE concurred. He did not think that this was an agreement "relating to the making, maintaining, or repairing of highways." It was an agreement as to the amount of payment to be made to the urban authority. The duty must therefore be assessed at 10s. and not at the smaller sum.

FARMER AND CO. V. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamps—Agreement for sale of lands in New South Wales—Mortgage—Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 59 (1)—"Equitable estate or interest."

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to the 13th section of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vic., c. 39), raising the question whether an English agreement for the sale of lands in New South Wales, the lands being subject to a mortgage, required an ad valorem stamp. On February 12, 1897, an instrument was presented on behalf of Farmer and Company by their solicitors to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the provisions of the 12th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The appellants, being dissatisfied with the assessment of the duty, applied to the Commissioners to state a case.

Mr. Scrutton appeared for the appellants; the Solicitor-General (Sir R. Finlay, Q.C.) and Mr. Danckwerts appeared for the Crown.

The instrument is an agreement under the hands of Sir William Farmer and John Pope of the first part, and under the seal of the appellants of the second part. It is dated February 8, 1897, and is an agreement by which the parties of the one part agree to sell to the appellants the respective properties referred to in the schedule. It was made and executed in England and was admitted by the appellants to be liable to duty according to the assessment of the Commissioners, if the Court is of opinion (1) that the property was an equitable estate or interest in property within the meaning of section 59 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891, and (2) that the exception in favour of estates or interests in lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages locally situate out of the United Kingdom does not apply to equitable interests in such property. The said premises consisted of certain freehold properties in Sydney, New South Wales. The price which the appellants apportioned to the said premises was the sum of £98,000. The said premises first described in the schedule were at the date of the agreement subject to a mortgage to secure the sum of £40,000 (with interest at 5 per cent.), and the premises secondly described in the schedule were subject to a mortgage to secure a sum of £18,000, and the premises were sold subject to these mortgages. The said indentures of mortgage respectively were executed in Sydney, New South Wales. The law in force in New South Wales other than the statutory law is the law of England. The appellants contended that by virtue of a provision contained in section 25 of the colonial statute, 26 Victoria, No. 12, the mortgagor of the said property, notwithstanding the said mortgage, had a legal and not an equitable interest in the said property, and consequently that the agreement for sale was the sale of a legal interest in land, and not a sale of an equitable estate or interest in any property within the meaning of the 59th section of the Stamp Act, 1891. The provision in question is in the following terms:—"All mortgages of real or personal estate shall hereafter be deemed at law as now in equity pledges only of the property thereby mortgaged and nothing in any such mortgage shall prevent the title of any mortgagor or person claiming and being in possession from being deemed a good title at law, subject to such pledge as against all persons other than the mortgagee and those claiming under him, provided that nothing in this enactment contained shall interfere with or prejudice the legal rights and remedies of mortgagees and those claiming under them for the preservation and enforcement of their securities." They further contended that an equitable interest in land situate abroad was not an equitable interest in any property whatsoever within the meaning of section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891. The Commissioners were of opinion that, notwithstanding the said statutory provision, the interests agreed to be sold were equitable estates or interests in the said property and were within the words of section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891. They accordingly held that the agreement was liable to ad valorem conveyance duty in respect of the said properties, and accordingly assessed such duty at the sum of £490, being 10s. per cent. on the sum of £98,000, the apportioned amount of the total consideration applicable thereto. The instrument has been stamped in conformity with the assessment.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. SCRUTTON contended that the Commissioners were wrong. If they were right it followed that though an agreement for a sale of lands situate in New South Wales was free from an ad valorem duty, yet if there was a mortgage on them the duty applied. An equity of redemption was an interest on land. The land in question being situate in the colony, and the mortgagor under the New South Wales statute being deemed to have a good title at law to accept against the mortgagee, this amounted to a mere sale of lands situate out of Great Britain. That being so, this transaction was within the exemption as a sale of an estate or interest in lands or property locally situate out of the United Kingdom. Further, it was not an equitable interest that was being sold, for the lex loci must be considered, and under the New South Wales statute it was not an equitable interest, but a legal interest over them. The New South Wales statute was a bar to any one but the mortgagee or those claiming under him being able to say that the mortgagor had not the legal estate. The Commissioners, therefore, could not deny the legal estate of the appellants. He cited "Norman v. Peck" (4 N.S.W., L.R., 42) and "Re Ferguson" (3 N.S.W., L.R., 43).

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that this was a contract for the sale of an equitable interest. The business was done in England, and would be enforced in the Courts here. The section of the New South Wales statute only dispensed with the necessity of joining the mortgagee in legal proceedings. It was only a rule of convenience, like section 25 (5) of the Judicature Act, 1873.

The COURT upheld the decision of the Commissioners.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the question turned on the construction to be put upon section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55-Vict., c. 39), which was as follows:—"Any contract or agreement made in England or Ireland . . . for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever or for the sale of any estate or interest in any property except lands, tenements, hereditaments or heritages or property locally situate out of the United Kingdom, or goods, wares, or merchandise, or marketable securities or any ship, vessel . . . shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty to be paid by the purchaser as if it were an actual conveyance or sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold." The first branch of the section made agreements for sale of equitable interests liable to ad valorem duty. The second branch of the section did not put down the first branch. Was this a sale of an "equitable interest"? In English law it would be without doubt. It had been said that the New South Wales statute altered the position. The decisions that had been cited, however, did not support that view. In the case of R. Ferguson it was decided by the Court in New South Wales that as regarded title evolution the statute made no difference. That section was of a kindred character to section 25 (57 of the Judicature Act, 1873) (36 and 37 Vict., c. 66), which entitled a mortgagor in possession to sue for rent or damages for trespass, &c.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE was of the same opinion. He thought that the first paragraph of section 59 of the Stamp Acts of 1891 affixed a duty on the sale of equitable interests. The second passage in the section did not detract from that provision. As to the effect of the New South Wales statute, he was not sure that he would have taken the same view of it if it had been untouched by authority, but he could not say that he disagreed of the decision in "Ex parte Ferguson," and that case was adverse to the appellant's contention. The New South Wales statutory provision was very nearly to the same effect as that in the Judicature Act, 1873, section 25 (5). It was not quite the same, however, for probably the sale of the equitable interest of the property in Sydney carried some legal rights with it. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

IN RE COLCHESTER GRAMMAR SCHOOL.*

Endowed Schools Acts—Scheme of Charity Commissioners—Persons "directly affected"—Right to petition—Endowed Schools Act, 1869, secs. 19 and 39.

This was a petition of appeal to her Majesty in Council, presented under the 89th section of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, against a scheme for the administration of the Colchester Grammar School.

Mr. Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and Mr. J. Scott Fox were counsel for the petitioners; Mr. Yelverton for other parties interested; and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins for the Charity Commissioners.

LORD HOBHOUSE, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the two petitioners described themselves as inhabitants and ratepayers of Colchester and as parents of sons attending the school. They alleged that they were directly affected by the scheme and felt aggrieved by it and by the provisions for the school contained therein, and by the decision of the Charity Commissioners on which the scheme was founded, given on or about March 31, 1894, that the endowment in question did fall within the provisions of section 19 of the Endowed Schools Act. They prayed that the scheme might be remitted to the Commissioners with such declaration as the nature of the case might require. For the purpose of deciding the appeal it was not necessary to state in detail the origin or history of the endowment. It was effected by Royal charters, one of King Henry VIII. and one of Queen Elizabeth, conveying lands to the Corporation of Colchester for the maintenance of a free grammar school and for general town purposes. Power to make statutes was vested in the Bishop of London and the Dean of St. Paul's, who had done so at intervals. The statutes now in operation were made by those dignitaries in the year 1844. There was also a body of trustees for the property of the school established by the Court of Chancery in 1698, and filled by appointments from time to time. Both before and after the passing of the first Endowed Schools Act there had been discussion with the view of framing a new scheme for the school. Some years ago the Charity Commissioners prepared a draft scheme, which was opposed on the ground that it contained provisions which, if the endowment fell within section 19 of the Act of 1869, it ought not to contain except with the consent of the governing body. That raised the question whether the endowment did or did not so fall, and the Commissioners thought it necessary to decide that question. On March 31, 1894, the secretary of the Commissioners addressed a letter to the town clerk of Colchester, which, so far as it related to and raised the present question, was as follows:—"I am directed by the Charity Commissioners to state for the information of the town council that, owing to their failure to obtain the consent of the several governing bodies of the above-named endowment to the terms of the compromise proposed in the published draft scheme, the Commissioners have been constrained to determine the question whether the endowment does or does not fall within the provisions of section 19 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, and they are of opinion that the endowment does so fall. The consequence of this decision is that, apart from consent, the Commissioners are precluded by statute from introducing into the scheme any provision respecting the religious instruction or attendance at religious worship of the scholars (other than a provision giving exemption to day scholars on whose behalf it is claimed from attending prayer or religious worship or lessons on a religious subject) or respecting the religious opinions of the governing body or masters. The following clauses of the scheme will therefore be struck out—viz., clauses 2, 31, 52, 53 (except so much as secures the exemption above referred to), and words will be inserted disclaiming (subject as above mentioned) all interference with subsisting legal requirements respecting the religious instruction or attendance at religious worship of the scholars or the religious opinions of the governing body or masters. . . . With these amendments the Commissioners propose to submit the scheme in due course to the Education Department. I am, however, to point out that clauses 2, 31, and 53 (in its entirety), as to which there appears to be no controversy, can be retained if the several governing bodies assent to the scheme with such retention. In order to afford opportunity for the expression of such assent, the Commissioners will wait for a period of four weeks before submitting the scheme to the Education Department." After some further negotiations, provisions either identical with or to the same substantial effect as the opposed clauses were agreed to. The Charity Commissioners then issued a new draft to which the several governing bodies signified their consent in a formal way. That draft was the scheme now under appeal. The petitioners contended that, as the decision of the Commissioners announced in their letter of March, 1894, with reference to section 19 was expressly made subject to appeal by that section, they had a right to challenge it, and, if it was found to be erroneous, to require the scheme to be remitted to the Commissioners for revision. The Commissioners objected that it was improper to enter on the question whether the endowment fell under section 19, first, because the petitioners were not persons directly affected within the meaning of section 39, and, secondly, because, assuming that the judgment of the Commissioners was wrong, the scheme was still within their jurisdiction as to all its provisions, and therefore the petitioners could not be aggrieved by the decision. Their Lordships thought that the petitioners failed to meet those preliminary objections. To a certain extent the two objections were mixed up together, because it could not be determined who was directly affected without examining the scheme to see what interests it affected. Their Lordships would first deal with the second of the objections. Though section 19 was very familiar to all engaged in those discussions, it would be convenient to extract the expressions relevant to the present contention, which, so far as their Lordships knew, was quite a new one. "If . . . any person . . . directly affected by such scheme feels aggrieved by the scheme on the ground (1) of any decision of the Commissioners in a matter in which an appeal to her Majesty in Council is given by this Act, or . . . (3) of the scheme being one which is not within the scope of or in conformity with this Act, such . . . person . . . may . . . petition her Majesty in Council . . . praying her Majesty to withhold her approval from the whole or any part of the scheme." The petitioners did not any longer contend that they could bring their case within head (3) of the grounds of appeal, because, as before stated, on either view of the applicability of section 19, the scheme, having received the consents required by that section, was in conformity with the Act. They were therefore driven to contend that they had a right to appeal from the declared opinion of the Commissioners that section 19 was applicable, and, if they succeeded, to have the scheme remitted on the speculation that the Commissioners might alter their minds on points which in either view of section 19 were within their competence. It would be very unfortunate if the Act had given an appeal on an abstract matter of that kind, not involving any illegality or irregularity. Certainly their Lordships could not find any warrant for it in the words of the Act. The persons entitled to appeal must be aggrieved, not by the abstract decision, but by the scheme on the ground of the decision—that was, by some practical result of the decision taking effect in the scheme. It was true that section 19 said that the opinion of the Commissioners was subject to appeal, and so it was, but only "as mentioned in this Act"—that was, as mentioned in section 39, and the right of appeal there given was an appeal against the scheme, and did not arise till the scheme had been approved by the Education Department. Moreover, if the opinion of the Commissioners was overruled, the remedy was to make a declaration to that effect and to remit the scheme in order that it might be brought into conformity with the declaration (section 43). But this scheme contained nothing which was not in conformity with the declaration prayed for by the petitioners. The Commissioners and the Education Department might consistently with such a declaration approve of the very scheme now under appeal. Her Majesty in Council could not properly be asked to pronounce a decision quite barren of legal result. In point of fact, so far as the scheme deviated from the strict lines to which the Commissioners were confined by section 19, it was in favour of the views of the petitioners. The only clause which they pointed to as embodying a grievance, to them was clause 33, which required the master, who by the existing statutes of 1844 must be in holy orders, should henceforward be a member of the Church of England. But it was within the discretion of the Commissioners to make that less stringent provision with the consent of the governing bodies, which, as before mentioned, had been given. The result was that, in the judgment of their Lordships, the petitioners were not aggrieved by any part of the scheme which rested on the disputed decision of the Commissioners, and that they could not, even if they had a locus standi for any appeal, ask for a review of that decision. Whether or no they had such a locus standi was the subject of the first preliminary objection, and was a question of considerable importance in the working of those Acts. The right of appeal on legal grounds was carefully limited by section 39 as regarded both the subjects of appeal and the persons who were entitled to appeal. The petitioners had no right unless they were directly affected by the scheme. They did not show how they were directly affected except by describing themselves in the terms above stated. That description was not supported by evidence, but it might be taken for the purpose of the argument as being accurate. The school was for those who belonged to Colechester, and in a sense all who belonged to the place had an interest in and were affected by a scheme for such an important institution as its school. It was manifest that such an interest as that was not within the meaning of the term "directly affected." That term pointed rather to a personal and individual interest as distinct from the general interest which appertained to the whole community among which the endowment worked. But it was said that they had boys who were at the school and that they were directly affected through those boys. Assuming that what affected the boy affected the parent, did those boys fall within the class of persons mentioned in section 39 as directly affected by the scheme? The scheme did not turn any boy out of the school nor remove the school away from him, nor in any way deprive him of the benefits of the education he was receiving. It was not alleged that the boys were on the foundation of the school. They appeared to be ordinary pupils attending it. But, even if they were on the foundation and if they were interfered with, what right of appeal would they have? Section 13 of the Act, which dealt with vested interests, provided only for the vested interests of boys who were on the foundation when the Act passed—i.e., on August 2, 1869. Section 39 gave a right of appeal to persons whose vested interest was not treated as required by the Act. It was clear that even boys on the foundation, if they had come upon it later than 1869, had no right of appeal given to them on the ground that their own interests were affected. It would be extravagant to hold that it was intended to give them a right of appeal against the scheme on other grounds, because they were persons directly affected, when they could appeal in their own personal interest. Yet their Lordships were asked to affirm a more extravagant proposition—viz., that the parent of every boy who happened to be at school when the scheme was approved had a right of appeal against any appealable matter which was not in conformity with his views. In the Hemsworth School case (12 App. Ca., p. 444) the scheme complained of removed the site of the school from Hemsworth to Barnsley. A petition of appeal was presented by inhabitants of Hemsworth whose children were at the school. It was held that inhabitants as such had no locus standi for appealing; they could only appeal in respect of some vested interests of their boys, and the vested interests saved by the Act had been spent many years before. That decision accorded in principle with the previous decisions in the cases of In re Shaftoe's Charity (3 App. Ca., p. 872) and Sutton Coldfield School (7 App. Ca., p. 91), and it was even more closely applicable to the present case. Indeed, so far as the facts of the present case constituted any distinction, they were less favourable to the right of appeal than those of the Hemsworth case, for the removal of the school did affect the interests of the Hemsworth boys in a material sense, only it was not the sense contemplated by the Act in sections 13 and 39. The argument, perhaps, was not presented as it had now been presented for the petitioners, but the decision clearly governed the present case. The petitioners had no such right as they claimed. They might at due times make representations to the Education Department or to the Houses of Parliament, but they could not appeal to the Queen in Council. The Commissioners asked for costs, but costs had never been given to them in such cases, and their Lordships did not see any reason to depart from the usual course. They would humbly advise her Majesty to dismiss the petition.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR NEW SOUTH WALES v. LOVE.*

Privy Council Appeals—New South Wales—
Statutes of Limitation—Nullum tempus occurrit regi—9 Geo. III., c. 16.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of February 18, 1896.

Mr. Arthur Cohen, Q.C., Mr. Vaughan Hawkins, and Mr. A. R. Butterworth were counsel for the appellant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in delivering a considered judgment, said,—This is an appeal by the Attorney-General for New South Wales against the judgment of the Supreme Court of the colony pronounced on February 18, 1896, overruling a demurrer to the defendant's plea to an information of intrusion to recover certain lands in the parish of Concord and county of Cumberland in the said colony. The question involved is whether the English Nullum Tempus Act, 9 Geo. III., c. 16, is in force in the colony and applies to land which has never been granted out or dealt with by the Crown. It does not appear to be denied that the lands in question (described by their abutments and containing 13½ acres) were, and had ever since the original settlement of the territory of New South Wales been, waste lands belonging to and vested in the Crown. The defendant by his plea dated April 10, 1895, averred that one Edward J. Keith more than 60 years before the filing of the information entered on and thenceforward held possession of the lands as his own property; that he conveyed his interest therein to William Love, who settled the same in trust for himself and his wife, Susannah Love, and the survivor of them for life, and after the decease of the survivor on the defendant, Emily Susannah Love, absolutely; that the foregoing persons had, from the entry of Edward J. Keith to the present time, held continuous possession of the lands adversely to her Majesty and without payment of rent to her, and had themselves since the said entry taken and enjoyed the rents, revenues, issues, and profits of the land; and that her Majesty's title to the land did not first accrue within 60 years next before the filing of the information. The plea did not aver that the lands had not been in charge of the Crown within the said 60 years. On May 20, 1895, the applicant replied traversing the allegations of the plea, and also demurred thereto on the grounds (1) that the Act 9 Geo. III., c. 16, is not in force in New South Wales; (2) that, assuming it to be in force, it does not apply to lands which have never been dealt with by the Crown; (3) that the period of 60 years was not alleged to have run out before the date of the Constitution Act, 1855; (4) that the plea showed no title in the defendant. Joinder in demurrer having been delivered, the demurrer came on for hearing before the full Court (consisting of Chief Justice Darley and Justices Windeyer and Simpson), by whom judgment was pronounced on February 18, 1896, in favour of the defendant, overruling the demurrer, Mr. Justice Simpson stating that he felt very considerable doubt about the matter. Their Lordships have no doubt that the judgment accurately describes the importance of the question here raised to the colony. The learned Judges say:—"The earlier grants issued by the Crown were vague in the extreme, and that it would be in the present day impossible to ascertain from the description in the grants to what lands they applied." And it is clear that the inferences which the learned Judges draw from that state of facts is accurate, "that the holders would not be able to show upon the face of the instrument a title, and have to rely upon possession." Their Lordships do not think that the learned Judges at all exaggerate the mischief and confusion which would arise in the transfer of property if the holders could not depend upon the operation of the statute in question. Two arguments appear to have been suggested against the application of the Act to the particular colony under 9 Geo. IV., c. 83, which prima facie applied the Nullum Tempus Act to the colony in question as much as if it had in terms re-enacted it for that colony. Section 24 of that Act provides:—"That all laws and statutes in force within the realm of England at the passing of this Act (that is to say, in 1828) shall be applied in the administration of justice in the Courts of New South Wales"; and it is sought by construction to limit the words "all laws and statutes" by introducing into the section the words "having relation to procedure," or some equivalent expression. At least, that is the only intelligible mode in which the argument can be supported, because the words which do occur in the section—"in the administration of justice"—would certainly include a limitation of the time within which actions can be brought, and their Lordships are of opinion that the language of the section cannot be limited so as to exclude the statute, which for the reasons pointed out by the learned Judges were and are so important in the administration of justice in the colony. The second argument is not very intelligible, since the words upon which reliance is placed are words which in the statute thus applied (9 Geo. III., c. 16) except from the operation of the statute lands in respect of which the Crown has been answered by rents, revenues, issues, or profits thereof within the space of 60 years next before the issuing or commencing of such action, information, &c., as shall at any times have been duly in charge or stood in super of record within the space of 60 years. The provision is intelligible enough, and what, in substance, it means is that if the Crown is not actually in possession, but if in the Crown's accounts some person is charged with the rent which he had not paid and still stands as a Crown debtor in the Crown books, and that condition of things has existed within the 60 years, the title by that condition of things, although the possession may have been for 60 years, was not adverse, because during that period something was payable to the Crown which had not been paid. It is not suggested here that the person in possession filled that character; but the argument appears to be that because there is no such administration in the colony as involves the peculiar form of Crown accounting thus described, the remedial operation of the statute cannot apply. Their Lordships are unable to accept any such suggestion. There is no allegation here of any equivalent record against the person who held possession for 60 years, and if no modification or limitation such as Section 24 of the Act authorizes has been made so as to apply such a mode of accounting to the Crown as might have an equivalent effect, the only result would be that there is nothing upon which the exception preserving the Crown's right could operate, but certainly would not cut down the enacting part of the statute or establish that it was inconsistent with the laws of England. For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the Supreme Court was right, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed accordingly.

IN RE JONES—CLEGG V. ELLISON.*

Literary Institution—Dissolution—Surplus funds—Distribution amongst members—Institution in the nature of a joint-stock company—Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, sec. 30—Construction.

This was an application by way of summons by Mr. Edwin Clegg on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders of the Sheffield Botanical and Horticultural Society, asking that the defendants, the trustees and committee of management of the society, might be ordered to sell the property of the society pursuant to resolutions passed and confirmed at meetings of members of the society held on April 28 and May 10, 1897, and to distribute the proceeds of sale in accordance with those resolutions. The application was opposed by the Attorney-General, who insisted that the property of the society, after satisfaction of its debts and liabilities, ought not to be distributed among the members of the society, but ought, under the provisions of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, to be given to some other institution of a like character. The society was established under a deed dated October 15, 1844, the general effect of which was that the real estate of the society was vested in trustees, and the personal estate in the committee of management; that every person who paid to the funds of the society £5 and executed the deed became a member and entitled to one share in the society, which share was transferable by him or his legal personal representatives; that each member was liable to pay an annual subscription of 15s., and was entitled to admission for himself and his family to the gardens of the society, but was not entitled to any dividend or bonus, but was, upon a dissolution, entitled to a share of the profits of the society after the payment of debts and liabilities. The gardens which formed the property of the society were conveyed to trustees for the society by a deed dated June 20, 1845. The property at the time of the conveyance was subject to a mortgage for £3,000, which had since been paid off. The purchase money and the mortgage debt were paid and discharged out of the funds of the society contributed by the members. Recently the gardens had not been carried on with financial success, and resolutions had been passed that the society should be dissolved, and that its property should be sold to a public body, known as the town trustees of Sheffield, at a price sufficient, after payment of debts and liabilities and costs, to pay to each member the sum of £5 for every share held by him. It was, however, admitted that the value of the property probably exceeded such an amount. The Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, was passed on August 11, 1854. Section 30 provided that "If upon the dissolution of any institution there shall remain, after the satisfaction of all its debts and liabilities, any property whatsoever, the same shall not be paid to or distributed among the members of the said institution or any of them, but shall be given to some other institution, to be determined by the members at the time of the dissolution, or, in default thereof, by the Judge of the County Court aforesaid; provided, however, that this clause shall not apply to any institution which shall have been founded or established by the contributions of shareholders in the nature of a joint stock company." The plaintiffs and the defendants, the trustees and managers, contended that the society fell within the exception to section 30, or, in other words, was an institution which had been founded and established by the subscriptions of shareholders in the nature of a joint stock company. The contention on behalf of the Attorney-General was, first, that the members were not shareholders in the proper sense of the term; and, secondly, that the society was wanting in one of the necessary elements of a joint-stock company—namely, that it should be carried on for the purposes of gain.

The case was argued last sittings, when Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Ingle Joyce appeared in support of the application; Mr. John Dixon for the defendants, the trustees and managers; and the Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. R. J. Parker for the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that, as regarded the first point contended for by the Attorney-General, it appeared to him that it was not well-founded. The suggestion was that the payment of £5 mentioned in the deed of constitution was merely in the nature of an entrance fee; but that was to attribute too little force to the language of the deed. The contributor of £5 was to be considered as having a share in the society, which was transferable, and entitled the holder to certain benefits in the way of enjoyment during the continuance of the society, and to participate in the distribution of the property upon dissolution. Although, if the argument of the Attorney-General was well founded, any such participation was forbidden by the statute of 1854, still it was to be borne in mind that that prohibition was not in force at the date of the deed, and the provisions of clause 2 might be taken into consideration in ascertaining whether or not the members were shareholders. In his Lordship's opinion they were. The other contention was much more serious. In the first place, the society was not founded for purposes of profit. Clause 2 distinctly prohibited any dividend, division, or bonus. The language followed that of section 1 of the Act, 6 and 7 Vict., c. 36, under which societies established for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts were exempted from rates on certain terms, of which two were that the society should be supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions, and should not, and by its laws might not, make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members. That afforded a reason for the prohibition of dividends found in the deed of constitution. Still the prohibition constituted a prominent feature in the deed, and the other clauses relied upon appeared to be provisions as to management and not to affect the result. The question then arose whether the absence of any purpose of profit precluded the application of the proviso at the close of section 30. That proviso was not that the clause "shall not apply to any institution which shall be a joint stock company," but "shall not apply to any institution which shall have been founded or established by the contributions of shareholders in the nature of a joint stock company." That appeared to mean that such an institution was not to be actually in all respects a joint stock company, but to be such as, without being a joint stock company, should in some respects partake of the nature of such a company. If it were asked what elements of a joint stock were more particularly contemplated by the Legislature, his Lordship would say these—first, the existence of a joint stock or common property; secondly, the contributions of members as the source of such property; and, thirdly, the holding of that property by numerous persons in transferable shares. All these ingredients existed in the constitution of the society. No doubt joint stock companies were ordinarily formed for the purpose of profit, but many associations existed which were not formed for that purpose, to which it would be hard to deny the nature of joint stock companies. Under the Companies Act of 1862 it appeared to be clear that a joint stock company might be formed for other purposes than those of profit. His Lordship referred to sections 6 and 21 of the Act of 1862 and section 23 of the Act of 1867, and, continuing, said that section 4 of the Act of 1862 prohibited the formation of any company consisting of more than 20 persons for the purpose of carrying on any business that had for its object the acquisition of gain by the company or by the individual members thereof unless registered as a company under the Act. Upon that section it had been repeatedly held that associations of more than 20 persons might exist which did not require to be registered, and were not made illegal by the Act of 1862; see, for example, "Smith v. Anderson" (L.R., 15 Ch.D., 247), "Crowther v. Shorley" (32 W.R., 330), and "Re Siddall" (L.R., 29 Ch.D., 1); yet it would be difficult to deny to those associations the nature of joint stock companies. The Joint Stock Companies Registration Act of 1844 (7 and 8 Vict., c. 110) applied only to joint stock companies established for the purpose of profit, and it had been repeatedly held—see "Reg. v. Whitmarsh" (15 Q.B., 600), "Bear v. Bromley" (18 Q.B., 271), and "Moore v. Rawlins" (6 C.B., N.S., 289)—that associations which very closely resembled joint stock companies did not require registration under that Act. On behalf of the Attorney-General some observations of Lord Justice Kay in "In re Bristol Athenæum" (L.R., 43 Ch.D., 236) were properly relied on. The actual decision in that case was that the Bristol Athenæum, an association possessing a constitution somewhat similar to that of the Sheffield society, could not be wound up as an unregistered company under section 199 of the Companies Act, 1862, and with it his Lordship did not differ. Incidentally, however, Lord Justice Kay did express the opinion that the Bristol Athenæum was not a joint stock company, and therefore not within the proviso of section 30 of the Act of 1854. No one could be more sensible than his Lordship of the weight due to anything which fell from the learned Lord Justice, but he had, while preparing his judgment, been informed by Mr. Justice North that he had recently in a case (reported ante, p. 406) before him independently arrived at a similar conclusion with regard to the construction of section 30 to that which his Lordship had endeavoured to express. On the main question, therefore, he thought that the applicant was entitled to the order which he asked for.

NORTH METROPOLITAN TRAMWAYS CO. V. THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Practice—Costs—Solicitor and client costs—
Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

This case raised the question whether, when judgment has been obtained by a public authority in an action brought against it and costs have been given in its favour, such judgment carries costs as between solicitor and clients as of course under section 1 of the Public Authorities' Protection Act, 1893. It appears that the action was brought against the defendants for an injunction to restrain an alleged trespass on the plaintiffs' tramways. The defendants contended that they were entitled to acquire and purchase the tramways under the provisions of section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870. At the hearing Mr. Justice Romer dismissed the plaintiffs' action with costs. The defendants brought in a bill for taxation as between solicitor and client, and the Taxing Master so taxed it, acting in pursuance of the Public Authorities' Protection Act. The plaintiffs objected to such taxation on the ground that an order for taxation of costs as between solicitor and client ought to have been asked for at the hearing.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER, who had reserved judgment, said that the Taxing Master was right. Judgment was in substance obtained by the defendants with costs. The question was one of substance and not of form. Although nothing was said in the judgment how the costs were to be taxed, and it would have been better to have said so, yet the omission did not deprive the defendants of the benefit of the Act. In cases in the Queen's Bench like the present he had found that the costs were taxed as between solicitor and client although nothing was said in the order.

Mr. J. Tanner appeared for the defendants; and Mr. F. Richardson and Mr. A. H. Carrington for the plaintiffs.

COPPEN V. MOORE.†

Merchandise Marks Act, 1887—False trade description—"Scotch" hams—Liability of employer for offence committed by servant.

This was a special case stated by the Justices of the borough of Richmond, Surrey. The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. The question raised was an important one under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887—namely, whether the appellant was liable to be convicted under the Act for the act of his servant done in the course of his employment. The Justices held that the appellant had not taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act, and convicted him. The case came originally before a Divisional Court composed of Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Darling, when the question was considered of such importance that it was reserved for a specially constituted Court. The case was, therefore, heard before the present Court, and the arguments, which were heard some weeks ago, were reported in The Times of April 5.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. H. D. Bonsey appeared for the appellant; Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. David appeared for the respondent.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day affirming the conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE read the judgment of the Court:—This is a case stated by Justices who summarily convicted the appellant of an offence against the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 28). The appellant was charged under section 1, subsection (2), with having sold goods to which a false trade description was applied. The facts were as follows:—On September 4, 1897, the respondent, at the London Supply Stores, 42, George-street, Richmond (one of several places of business of the appellant), asked the salesman at the door of the shop for a small English ham. The salesman pointed to a number of hams on a shelf, and said they were Scotch hams. In fact they were long-cut American hams. The salesman stated the price, 8½d. per lb., and the respondent said he would take one, which was then produced. The salesman then passed the ham selected through the open window to a shop assistant inside, saying, "Weigh up, Scotch ham, 8½d." The respondent, before paying, asked the assistant to make him out an account, and put on it "Scotch ham," "as he had bought it as such." The assistant at first handed the respondent an invoice without the word "Scotch" on it. The respondent did not accept it so written, but told the assistant to put in the word "Scotch," "as he had bought it as such." The assistant then did so, and handed the invoice to the respondent, who then paid the price, 8s. 5½d. Upon this being done, the respondent asked the assistant whether he still said it was a Scotch ham, when the assistant admitted it was not, but was an American ham. The salesman, in like manner, was asked, and he at once admitted it was an American ham. On the part of the appellant, evidence was given that he had sent a notice to all his branch places of business, including that in question, in the following terms:—

"Marshall-street, Feb. 25th, 1897.

"Most important.

"Please instruct your assistants most explicitly that the hams described in the list must not be sold under any specific name of place or origin, that is to say, they must not be described as 'Bristol,' 'Bath,' 'Wiltshire,' or any such title, but simply as breakfast hams.

"To Mr. Bedford, Richmond.

"Please sign and return.

"H. W. COPPEN."

The ham in question would come within the category of breakfast hams. Evidence was given that the terms of this notice were communicated to the manager and assistants, and the appellant stated that he had no reason to believe that his instructions were not being carried out. It is now necessary to consider the statute in question and its application to the facts proved. Section 2 is the important section. Subsection (1) deals with the forging of any trade mark and with the false application to goods of any such mark or of any false trade description, and enacts that, subject to the provisions of the Act, an offence shall have been committed by such forging or application unless the party charged proves that he acted without intent to defraud. Subsection (2) enacts (omitting words immaterial in this case) that every person who sells any goods to which any false trade description is applied shall be guilty of an offence against the Act unless he proves—(a) that having taken all reasonable precautions he had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade description; and (b) that on demand duly made he gave all information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods; or (c) that otherwise he acted innocently. By section 3 it is enacted that "trade description" shall mean any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect, as to (among other things) the place or country in which any goods were made or produced. Later in such section it is enacted that the expression "false trade description" shall mean a trade description false in any material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied. By section 5 subsection (1) it is enacted that a person shall be deemed to have applied a trade description to goods who applies it to the goods themselves or uses a trade description in any manner calculated to lead to the belief that the goods in connexion with which it is used are designated or described by that trade description. In "Budd v. Lucas" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 408) it was decided that where certain casks of beer were delivered accompanied by an invoice in which the casks were falsely described as "barrels" (which word had acquired the character of a trade description) it was held that an offence under section 2 subsection (1) of the Act in question had been committed, although the invoice containing the false trade description was not physically attached to the casks. I think this case was well decided; in other words, I think that it is not necessary to constitute the offence that there shall be any physical connexion between the false trade description and the goods to which it is applied. It was admitted that the description "Scotch ham" was a trade description and it was found that it was applied to the ham sold by the appellant's employés, and it was admittedly false. It was not contended that it was not material. In these circumstances it is clear that an offence against the Act was committed by the salesman and by the assistant of the appellant. But the question which the Court is now called upon to decide is whether the appellant also is not personally liable to be convicted. This was the question argued before us. The appellant's contention was that the charge here preferred was a criminal charge and that the general principle of law applied—nemo reus est nisi mens sit rea. There is no doubt that this is the general rule, but it is subject to exceptions, and the question here is whether the present case falls within the rule or within the exception. Apart from statute exceptions have been engrafted upon the rule; for example, in the case of "Reg. v. Stephens" (L.R., 1 Q.B., 702) the defendant was held liable on indictment for obstructing navigation by throwing rubbish into a river from a quarry owned by the defendant but managed by his son, although it was proved that the men employed at the quarry had been by order prohibited from doing the acts complained of. No doubt in that case the fact that the proceedings were only in form criminal was adverted to by the Judges who decided it, but the fact remains that the defendant was criminally indicted. But by far the greater number of exceptions engrafted upon the general rule are cases in which it has been decided that by various statutes criminal responsibility has been put upon masters for the acts of their servants. Amongst such cases are "Mullins v. Collins" (L.R., 9 Q.B., 292) where a licensed victualler was convicted of an offence under the 16th section of the Licensing Act of 1872 for supplying liquor to a constable on duty, although this was done by his servant without the knowledge of his master. Again in "Bond v. Evans" (21 Q.B. D., 249), where a licensed victualler was convicted of an offence against the 17th section of the same Act where gaming had been allowed in the licensed premises by the servant in charge of the premises, although without the knowledge of his master. The decisions in these and in other like cases were based upon the construction of the statutes in question. The Court, in fact, came to the conclusion that, having regard to the language, scope, and object of those Acts, the Legislature intended to fix criminal responsibility upon the master for acts done by his servant in the course of his employment, although such acts were not authorized by the master and may even have been expressly prohibited by him. The question then in this case comes to be narrowed to the simple point, whether upon the true construction of the statute here in question the master was intended to be made criminally responsible for acts done by his servant in contravention of the Act, where such acts were done, as in this case, within the scope or in the course of their employment. In my judgment it was clearly the intention of the Legislature to make the master criminally liable for such acts, unless he was able to rebut the prima facie presumption of guilt by one or other of the methods pointed out in the Act. Take the facts here and apply the Act to them. To begin with, it cannot be doubted that the appellant sold the ham in question although the transaction was carried out by his servants. In other words, he was the seller although not the actual salesman. It is clear also, as already stated, that the ham was sold with a "false trade description" which was material. If so, there is evidence establishing a prima facie case of an offence against the Act having been committed by the appellant. But it is only a prima facie case. The burden of proof is shifted upon the appellant, and he might meet successfully that prima facie case if he is able, where the charge is under the first subsection of section 1, to prove that he acted without intent to defraud; or, where the charge is under subsection 2 of section 1, if he is able to prove (a) that he had taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act and had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade description in question, and (b) that on demand he had given full information, or (c) if he is able to prove that otherwise he acted innocently. It seems clear that clauses (a) and (b) of subsection 2 apply to cases where goods in question are in the possession of the accused for sale or are sold with the forged trade mark or false trade description already stamped upon them or otherwise applied to them, and not to a case like the present, where the false trade description is applied upon the occasion and as part of the terms of sale; and in the latter case the accused must rely for his exculpation upon clause (c)—namely, by showing that he had acted innocently. In the present case there was ample evidence to justify the conclusion of the magistrates that the appellant was prima facie guilty of the offence charged, and that prima facie case has not been met in the manner required by the Act. The magistrates, indeed, have affirmatively found—in the terms of clause (a)—that the appellant had not, in fact, taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act, but I have already pointed out that that clause does not directly apply to the facts of this case. This finding is, therefore, not strictly relevant, although it suggests an important element in determining whether the accused is innocent; but what is material to note is that the magistrates do not appear to have been asked to find, and certainly they do not in fact find, that the appellant acted innocently within the meaning of clause (c). There was evidence before them that the American hams in question were dressed so as to deceive the public; and this probably explains the reason of the affirmative finding to which I have adverted and the absence of the finding that the appellant had acted innocently within the meaning of clause (c). In answer, then, to the question which alone is put to us—namely, whether, upon the facts stated, the decision of the magistrates convicting the appellant was in point of law correct—my answer is that, in my judgment, it was. When the scope and object of the Act are borne in mind, any other conclusion would, to a large extent, render the Act ineffective for its avowed purposes. The circumstances of the present case afford a convenient illustration of this. The appellant, under the style of the "London Supply Stores," carries on an extensive business as grocer and provision dealer, having, it appears, six shops or branch establishments, and having also a wholesale warehouse. It is obvious that, if sales with false trade descriptions could be carried out in those establishments with impunity so far as the principal is concerned, the Act would, to a large extent, be nugatory. I conceive the effect of the Act to be to make the master or principal liable criminally (as he is already by law civilly) for the acts of his agents and servants in all cases within the sections with which we are dealing, where the conduct constituting the offence was pursued by such servants and agents within the scope or in the course of their employment, subject to this—that the master or principal may be relieved from criminal responsibility where he can prove that he had acted in good faith and had done all that it was reasonably possible to do to prevent the commission by his agents and servants of offences against the Act. The result, therefore, is that the conviction will be affirmed, and with costs. I wish to add that the form in which this case is stated is not satisfactory. It does not throughout clearly distinguish between what was merely evidence and what was proved to the satisfaction of the magistrates. It is important that it should be borne in mind that when a case is submitted to the Court it ought to state clearly what the facts proved were, and not merely what the evidence was.

*Reported by R. B. SCHOMBERG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

†Reported by A. F. JENKIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Local Government—By-law—Validity.

Following by-law held valid:—"No person shall sound . . . any musical instrument . . . within 50 yards of any dwelling-house after being required by any constable or by an inmate of such house, or by his or her servant, to desist."

Mathew, J., dissented.

Judgment was given in this case affirming the conviction, Mr. Justice Mathew dissenting. It was a special case stated by the Justices of the Bearsted Division of the county of Kent raising the question whether a by-law made by the County Council of Kent was valid. The case was argued some weeks ago, and a report appeared in The Times of April 5.

Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Hohler were counsel for the appellant; and Mr. Dikeus, Q.C., and Mr. A. Gill were for the respondent.

The case was considered to be of such great importance that it was heard by a specially constituted Court. The facts are sufficiently stated in the Lord Chief Justice's judgment. It is only necessary to add that the appellant was on the occasion in question conducting an open-air religious service in the parish of Leeds in Kent.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the following judgment:—"The County Council of Kent, claiming to act under their statutory powers, made the following by-law:—"4. Playing musical instruments, &c.—No person shall sound or play upon any musical or noisy instrument or sing in any public place or highway within 50 yards of any dwelling-house after being required by any constable, or by an inmate of such house personally, or by his or her servant, to desist." The appellant was summoned before the magistrates for offending against this by-law, when it was proved that on October 17, 1897, he persisted in singing in a public highway within 50 yards of a dwelling-house, after having been required by a police-constable to desist. It was further proved by the occupier of the dwelling-house that the singing of the appellant and those with him was an annoyance to such occupier. The occupier had not, on the day in question, set the constable in motion, but he had on previous occasions complained to the police of the appellant's singing. The magistrates convicted the appellant, and against that conviction the present appeal is brought. The question reserved for this Court is whether the by-law is valid. If valid the conviction is to stand. It is objected that the by-law is ultra vires on the ground that it is unreasonable and therefore bad. It is necessary, therefore, to see what is the authority under which the by-law in question has been made, and what are the relations between its framers and those affected by it. But first it seems necessary to consider what is a by-law. A by-law of the class we are here considering I take to be an ordinance affecting the public or some portion of the public, imposed by some authority clothed with statutory powers ordering something to be done or not to be done and accompanied by some sanction or penalty for its non-observance. It necessarily involves restriction of liberty of action by persons who come under its operation as to acts which, but for the by-law, they would be free to do or not to do, as they pleased. Further, it involves this consequence—that, if validly made, it has the force of law within the sphere of its legitimate operation (see "Edmonds v. the Watermen's Company," 24 L.J., M.C., 124, 1855). In the present case we are dealing with a by-law made by a local representative body—namely, the County Council of Kent, which is created under the Local Government Act, 1888 (cap. 41), and which is endowed with the powers of making by-laws given to municipal corporate bodies under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (cap. 50). Section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, provides that a county council shall have the same power of making by-laws in relation to their county as the council of a borough have in relation to their borough; and it further provides that section 187 of the Public Health Act of 1875 shall apply to such by-laws. I will take these statutes in the order of time. Section 182 of the Act of 1875 (cap. 55) provides that all by-laws made by a local authority under that Act shall be under their common seal and may be altered or repealed by a subsequent by-law, but no by-law shall be repugnant to the laws of England or to the provisions of the Act. Section 183 gives power to impose penalties. Section 184 provides that by-laws shall not take effect until confirmed by the Local Government Board, which may allow or disallow them, and, before their confirmation, notice of intention to apply for confirmation must be advertised, and for a month at least before such application a copy of the proposed by-laws must have been kept at the office of the local authority for the inspection of ratepayers, and the clerk of the local authority is bound to furnish on application a copy of the proposed by-laws, or a part of them, to any ratepayer on certain payment being made. Section 23 of the Act of 1882 provides that the council of a borough may from time to time make such by-laws as to them seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner, and they may by such by-laws appoint such fines, not exceeding £5, as they deem necessary for the prevention of offences against the by-laws. It is under this authority that the by-law in question was framed. What are the checks or safeguards under which this very wide authority of making by-laws is exercisable? The same section 23 further provides that no by-law can be made unless two-thirds of the whole number of the council are present, and, when so made, it shall not come into force until the expiration of 40 days after a copy thereof has been fixed on the town-hall and it shall not come into force until the expiration of 40 days after a copy sealed with the corporate seal has been sent to the Secretary of State; and if within those 40 days the Queen, with the advice of her Privy Council, disallows a proposed by-law or part thereof, such by-law or such part shall not come into force, and the Queen may within the 40 days enlarge the time within which the by-law shall not come into force. We thus find that Parliament has thought fit to delegate to representative public bodies in towns and cities, and also in counties, the power of exercising their own judgment as to what are the by-laws which to them seem proper to be made for good rule and government in their own localities. But that power is accompanied by certain safeguards; there must be antecedent publication of the by-law, with a view, I presume, of eliciting the public opinion of the locality upon it, and such by-laws shall have no force until after they have been forwarded to the Secretary of State. Further, the Queen, with the advice of her Privy Council, may disallow the by-law wholly or in part, and may enlarge the suspensory period before it comes into operation. I agree that the presence of these safeguards in no way relieves the Court of the responsibility of inquiring into the validity of by-laws where they are brought in question, or in any way affects the authority of the Court in the determination of their validity or invalidity. It is to be observed, moreover, that the by-laws having come into force they are not like the laws, or what were said to be the laws, of the Medes and Persians—they are not unchangeable. The power is to make by-laws from time to time as to the authority shall seem meet, and if experience shows that in any respect existing by-laws work hardly or inconveniently the local authority, acted upon by public opinion, as it must necessarily be, of those concerned, has full power to repeal or alter them. It need hardly be added that should experience warrant that course the Legislature, which has given, may modify or take away the powers they have delegated. I have thought it well to deal with these points in some detail, and for this reason—that the great majority of the cases in which the question of by-laws has been discussed are not cases of by-laws of bodies of a public representative character entrusted by Parliament with delegated authority, but are for the most part cases of railway companies, dock companies, or other like companies which carry on their business for their own profit, although incidentally for the advantage of the public. In this class of case it is right that the Courts should jealously watch the exercise of these powers and guard against their unnecessary or unreasonable exercise to the public disadvantage. But when the Court is called upon to consider the by-laws of public representative bodies clothed with the ample authority which I have described, and exercising that authority accompanied by the checks and safeguards which have been mentioned, I think the consideration of such by-laws ought to be approached from a different standpoint. They ought to be supported if possible. They ought to be, as has been said, “benevolently” interpreted, and credit ought to be given to those who have to administer them that they will be reasonably administered. This involves the introduction of no new canon of construction. But, further, looking to the character of the body legislating under the delegated authority of Parliament, to the subject matter of such legislation, and to the nature and extent of the authority given to deal with matters which concern them and in the manner which to them shall seem meet, I think Courts of justice ought to be slow to condemn as invalid any by-laws so made under such conditions on the ground of supposed unreasonableness. Notwithstanding what Chief Justice Cockburn said in “Bailey v. Williamson” (3 L.R., Q.B., 124, 1873)—an analogous case—I do not mean to say that there may not be cases in which it would be the duty of the Court to condemn by-laws made under such authority as these were made as invalid because unreasonable. But unreasonable in what sense? If, for instance, they were found to be partial and unequal in their operation as between different classes, if they were manifestly unjust, if they disclosed bad faith, if they involved such oppressive or gratuitous interference with the rights of those subject to them as could find no justification in the minds of reasonable men, the Court might well say Parliament never intended to give authority to make such rules; they are unreasonable and ultra vires. But it is in this sense, and in this sense only, as I conceive, that the question of unreasonableness can properly be regarded. A by-law is not unreasonable merely because particular Judges may think that it goes further than is prudent or necessary or convenient, or because it is not accompanied by a qualification or an exception which some Judges may think ought to be there. Surely, it is not too much to say that, in matters which directly and mainly concern the people of the country who have the right to choose those whom they think best fitted to represent them in their local government bodies, such representatives may be trusted to understand their own requirements better than Judges. Indeed, if the question of the validity of by-laws were to be determined by the opinion of Judges as to what was reasonable—in the narrow sense of that word—the cases in the books on this subject are no guide, for they reveal, as, indeed, one would expect, wide diversity of judicial opinion, and they lay down no principle or definite standard by which reasonableness or unreasonableness may be tested. So much for the general considerations which it seems to me ought to be borne in mind in considering by-laws of this class. I now come to the by-law in question. It is admitted that the county council of Kent were within their authority in making a by-law in relation to the subject-matter which is dealt with by the impeached by-law. In other words, it is conceded—and properly so—that the local authority might make a by-law imposing conditions under which musical instruments and singing might be permitted or prevented in public places. But it is objected that they have no authority to make a by-law on that subject in the terms of this by-law. Further, it is not contended that the by-law should, in order to be valid, be confined to cases where the playing or singing amounted to a nuisance, but the objections are, as I understand them, that the by-law is bad—first, because it is not confined to cases where the playing or singing is, in fact causing annoyance, and next because it enables a police-constable to bring it into operation by a request on his part to the player or singer to desist. As to the first of these objections, if the general principles upon which these by-laws ought to be dealt with are those which I have already stated, it is clear that the absence of this qualification cannot make the by-law invalid. But, further, such a qualification, in my judgment, would render the by-law ineffective. What is to be the standard of annoyance? What may be a cause of annoyance to one person may be no annoyance, and may even be pleasurable, to another person. Again, who is to be the judge in such a case of whether there is or is not an annoyance? Is it to be the resident of the house within 50 yards of the playing or singing, or is it to be the magistrate who hears the charge? It is enough to say that in my judgment the absence of the suggested qualification cannot make the by-law invalid, even if it be admitted that its presence would be an improvement. As to the second objection—namely, that the policeman has the power of putting the by-law in operation by requiring the player or singer to desist, I again say that, even if the absence of this power would be an improvement and would make the by-law in the apprehension of some more reasonable, it is not on the principles I have already stated any ground for declaring the by-law to be invalid. In support of this objection pictures have in argument been drawn (more or less highly coloured) of policemen who, without rhyme or reason, would or might gratuitously interfere with what might be a source of enjoyment to many. In answer, I say a policeman is not an irresponsible person without check or control; if he acts capriciously or vexatiously he can be checked by his immediate superiors, or he can be taught a lesson by the magistrates should he prefer vexatious charges. If the policeman persisted in saying that the musician should desist when the people in the neighbourhood desire his music, his gratuitous interference would promptly come to an end. Nor is it correct to say (as has been erroneously stated in some of the cases cited) that the magistrate would be bound in every case to convict where the musician did not desist when called upon. It is clear that, under section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the magistrate, if he thinks the case of so trifling a nature that it is inexpedient to inflict any punishment, may without proceeding to conviction dismiss the information. The facts of this case are certainly no illustration of the by-law having been gratuitously or vexatiously put in force. The case states (paragraph 5) that although it was not proved that the occupier of the house within 50 yards had on the day in question requested the constable to require the appellant to desist, yet it was proved that the singing was an annoyance to the occupier and that he had on previous occasions complained to the police of such singing. Indeed, it was stated during the argument that the conviction here appealed from was the second conviction of the appellant for an offence against this by-law. I have carefully read the cases cited in argument, but I do not propose to consider them in detail. Many of them relate to by-laws made under different statutes; others it is difficult to reconcile; few deal with the principles upon which by-laws like those in question are to be dealt with by the Courts; and some of them—as, for instance, “Munro v. Watson” (51 J.P., 660, 1887) and perhaps “Johnson v. Mayor of Croydon” (16 Q.B.D., p. 708, 1886)—may be distinguished from the present case. In weighing previous authorities it is further to be recollected that the cases have come before Divisional Courts, usually consisting of two members, and that those cases, being in their nature criminal, there has been no judgment of a Court of Appeal upon them. It is for this reason that the present special Court has been constituted. I cannot doubt that this Court has authority to review, and if it thinks fit to differ from, any prior decision of a Divisional Court on this subject (see “Fortescue v. the Vestry of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green” [1891], 2 Q.B., p. 170). I have said that there are few of the prior cases dealing with this matter which lay down the principles upon which the by-laws made by representative public bodies are to be considered. There is one notable exception; I refer to the case of “Slatery v. Naylor” (13 App. Cases, p. 446, 1888). That was a case in the Privy Council, in which the members of that Court had to consider the validity of a by-law passed by the municipal council of the borough of Petersham, in New South Wales, under the provisions of the Municipalities Act, 1867. The Court consisted of Lords Hobhouse, Herschell, and Macnaghten and Sir Barnes Peacock and Sir Richard Couch. That case has been so fully discussed during the course of the argument that I do not think it necessary here to refer to it in detail. It is enough to say that, beyond doubt, the reasoning and principles on which it proceeds fully justify the views which I have expressed in this judgment. Nor are the weight and value of the reasoning in that case, as an authority in the present case, in any way lessened by the fact that the by-law there was made under the authority of a different statute. The cases are strictly analogous, and it was necessary for the judgment of the Privy Council that that tribunal should consider the principles upon which by-laws of representative governing bodies made under statutory authority should be considered. That it has done thoroughly and clearly. In my opinion, judged by the test of reasonableness, even in its narrower sense, this a reasonable by-law; but, whether I am right or wrong in this view, I am clearly of opinion that no Court of law can properly say that it is invalid. In the result the conviction appealed from must, in my opinion, be affirmed; but, as the question is one of wide importance, and as to which there has been a contrariety of judicial opinion, it will be affirmed without costs.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE read a judgment concurring with that of the Lord Chief Justice.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW read a judgment in which he expressed his dissent from the conclusion arrived at by the other members of the Court. His Lordship, in the course of his judgment, said that the by-law in question was made under the Local Government Act, 1888, with which were incorporated certain provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. By section 23 of the Act of 1882 the county council were enabled to make such by-laws as to them seemed meet for the good rule and government of their district and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner; and certain formalities were directed to be observed before the local enactments came into operation. These formalities had been complied with, and the first question was whether the by-law in question had been thereby legalized. It had been decided in very early times, with reference to the by-law mentioned in the statute 19 Henry VII., c. 7, that the requisite approval did not give it validity if not otherwise legal (see Ipswich Tailors' case, 11 Co., 54). The validity of the by-laws must be determined by the Judges when they were brought before them. This duty had been cast on the superior Courts when any restriction was sought to be imposed on personal liberty, and was traceable to the clause in the Great Charter, “Nullus liber homo,” &c. That rule had been followed and acted upon down to the present time. From the many decisions upon the subject it would seem clear that a by-law to be valid must, among other conditions, have two properties; it must be certain—that is, it must contain adequate information as to the duties of those who were to obey—and it must be reasonable. (See “City of London” case, Co. Rep., 251; Com. Dig., By-Law, B. 1: “Eagleton v. East India Company,” 3 B. and P., 55.) It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the by-law in the present case was not reasonable and was not certain. It forbade without qualification of any kind conduct which might be perfectly innocent and unobjectionable. It did not provide, as had been done in similar enactments, that the act prohibited should be an annoyance to any one. It contained no exception, and would, according to its terms, condemn all music and singing within 50 yards of a dwelling-house as in the nature of a nuisance. The right to prohibit was conferred on any policeman. A policeman had no such authority in the metropolis. Why should a policeman in the country be entrusted with powers so easily abused? For the respondent it was argued that the by-law had been framed by a representative body created under recent legislation, whose regulations should be indulgently treated, and that Parliament intended that local authorities should be upheld, and to this end that new canons of construction should be adopted by the Courts to preserve their by-laws from being declared invalid. The argument was that it was no longer enough to point out that a by-law according to its terms was unreasonable; it should be upheld if it might be reasonably enforced, and it was no longer an objection that it might be unreasonably enforced. It was urged that there were adequate safeguards for the public which, though not expressed, ought to be implied. It was said that confidence might be reposed in the discretion of the policeman. That seemed to his Lordship too generous a view of the qualifications of the ordinary constable. There was said to be a further safeguard—viz., that the county council would not sanction interference by the police unless there was some good cause. But a by-law once made could not and ought not to be controlled in its operation by the members of the council. Further, it was argued that the policeman who interfered without good cause would be reprimanded by his superiors, or a magistrate would probably refuse to issue a summons. These suggestions implied that there would be cases in which a constable ought not to have the power to prohibit or to summon. It seemed to him that the public ought to be informed in clear language what these cases were. It would not be satisfactory to a person who was innocent of any real offence and who was summoned as a criminal to have an apology offered to him on the ground that the policeman had been wanting in discretion. Again, it was said that the magistrate could refuse to convict in a trifling case under section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879; but, in his opinion, the by-law afforded no security that this power would be exercised. This by-law was made for securing the good rule and government of the district, but, in his opinion, it would appear not to be well calculated to secure any such result. He did not propose to refer at length to the cases cited in the argument, where by-laws made under local authority had been condemned as unreasonable, but in none of those cases was there any indication of the principle which he understood to be now contended for—viz., that such by-laws should receive a special kind of interpretation. From the earliest times when charters were granted to towns municipal affairs had been managed by elected representatives of the inhabitants, and the by-laws made by such bodies had been frequently declared to be invalid. No case had been cited in which there was any trace of the principle now contended for that such by-laws were to be interpreted with any particular indulgence because of their popular origin. He concurred in the view that deference should be shown by the Courts to the by-laws of a local authority which might appear to interfere unduly with personal liberty, where there was reason to suppose that the regulations were called for by the requirements of the particular place. But this by-law was not confined to a particular locality. It applied to the whole of rural Kent. It seemed to him that it was practically proposed in this case that they should add a proviso to the by-law to the effect that it ought not to be unnecessarily or unreasonably enforced. This, he considered, they had no power to do. His Lordship, having referred to "Slattery v. Naylor" (13 App. Cas., 446), said that he regretted being unable to concur with the view of the majority of the Court. Their judgment appeared to him to conflict with the recent decisions referred to, and with the views expressed by Mr. Justice Hawkins, the late Mr. Justice Cave, the present Master of the Rolls, and the late Lord Justice Kay. The principle of "Alty v. Farrell" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 636), a case which had the high authority of the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Wright, seemed to him to be applicable to the present case. The judgment of the majority of the Judges by whom the present case was decided would, no doubt, be entitled to great respect from those who might have to decide similar cases, though not binding on them. In the present state of the law, there seemed to be no mode of finally settling differences of judicial opinion that might arise in cases like the present. A change of procedure would seem to be necessary which would permit an appeal in the ordinary way. In his opinion, the conviction should be quashed.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, MR. JUSTICE DARLING, and MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL agreed with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. STRANGE.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Marriage settlement—Life estate—Income.

On the death of a husband, estate duty is payable in respect of property the income of which was settled on him for life by the wife, and which becomes hers again unencumbered at his death.

Decision of Divisional Court (13 The Times L.R., 538) reversed.

This was an appeal by the Attorney-General, as informant, from a decision of Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams and Mr. Justice Kennedy, sitting as a Divisional Court, dated August 12 last, and reported in The Times of the following day, also in The Times L.R., Vol. 13, p. 588. The question raised was whether, on the death of a husband, estate duty was payable in respect of property the income of which was settled by the wife on the husband for life, and which, therefore, became hers again unencumbered after his death. The information set out the following facts:—By an indenture, dated January 14, 1846, and made between James Newburgh Strange, of the first part, the defendant, Charlotte Maria Strange, then Charlotte Maria Eyre, of the second part, Dame Louisa Strange, widow, of the third part, and certain trustees, of the fourth part, being a settlement made on the marriage of the said James N. Strange and Charlotte M. Eyre, certain sums of Consols and personal property, partly reversionary and partly in possession, were settled upon trust to pay the income thereof to the said James N. Strange for life, and after his decease to the said Charlotte M. Strange for life, with remainder as to the capital of the trust funds for the children or child of the said marriage as therein mentioned; and in the said indenture was contained a covenant by the said James N. Strange and the defendant Charlotte M. Strange to vest any personal property which the said Charlotte M. Strange was then or should during the intended coverture or the said James N. Strange in her right should at any one time by gift, bequest, or otherwise become entitled of the value of £200 or upwards other than a life interest only and other than specific chattels not producing income, and besides the trust premises thereinbefore settled, in the trustee or trustees for the time being of the now stating indenture upon trust, and to the intent that the same might be laid out by such trustees upon some of the stocks, funds, &c., prescribed by the said indenture, and that the stocks, &c., upon which the same might be so laid out, and the dividends, interest, and annual produce thereof might be held by such trustees upon trust to pay the income thereof unto the said James N. Strange or his assigns during his life and after his decease to the said Charlotte M. Strange or her assigns during her life, and from the decease of the survivor of them, upon trust, if the defendant Charlotte M. Strange should survive the said James N. Strange, then after his decease in trust for the defendant Charlotte M. Strange, her executors, &c., but if she should die in his lifetime, then after his decease upon such trusts and purposes as the said Charlotte M. Strange should by will appoint, and in default of appointment upon trust for her statutory next-of-kin. The marriage between the said James N. Strange and the defendant Charlotte M. Strange was solemnized shortly after the date of the settlement. The defendant Charlotte M. Strange became entitled at different dates during the said coverture to personal property falling within the covenant hereinbefore stated. The said after-acquired property of the defendant Charlotte M. Strange was got in by the trustees of the said settlement and invested and the same was represented at the death of the said James N. Strange by a sum of £17,097 8s. 7d. £3 10s. per cent. stock of the Metropolitan Board of Works then and now standing in the names of the trustees of the said settlement. The said James N. Strange died on November 1, 1894. On the death of the said James N. Strange the defendant Charlotte M. Strange became absolutely entitled to the said after-acquired property, and she applied to the trustees of the said settlement and requested them to transfer the capital thereof to her, which they were and are prepared to do. The information stated that estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, became payable in respect of the said after-acquired property as property passing on the death of the said James N. Strange, but she and her trustees refused to pay, contending that no estate duty had become payable in respect of the property bound by the said covenant to settle other or after-acquired property by reason of the provisions of section 21 (5) of the said Act, but the informant charged that the last-mentioned section did not apply, the defendant having become entitled, not to the income only, but to the capital of the property in question. The information prayed that it might be declared that upon the death of James N. Strange estate duty became payable upon the principal value of all property coming within the terms of and bound by the covenant to settle after-acquired property of the defendant Charlotte M. Strange as property passing on the death of the said James N. Strange. The Finance Act, 1894, section 21 (5), provides:—"Where a husband or wife is entitled, either solely or jointly with the other, to the income of any property settled by the other under a disposition which has taken effect before the commencement of this part of this Act, and on his or her death the survivor becomes entitled to the income of the property settled by such survivor, estate duty shall not be payable in respect of that property until the death of the survivor." It was decided by the Divisional Court that the case fell within the exception of that section, and that therefore estate duty was not payable until the death of the survivor.

From that decision the Attorney-General now appealed.

Sir Richard Webster (Attorney-General), Sir Robert Finlay (Solicitor-General), with them Mr. Vaughan Hawkins, were for the appellant; Mr. Dicey, Q.C., and Mr. Butcher, Q.C., were for the respondents.

Their LORDSHIPS reversed the decision of the Divisional Court and allowed the appeal, with costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that he thought that the interpretation of section 21 (5) was plain; he saw no doubt about it. The marriage settlement was also plain enough. [His Lordship read and commented on the marriage settlement, and became absolutely entitled to the trust property. The trustees had no choice in the matter. They were bound to hand it over to her. Then, turning to the Finance Act, 1894, it appeared that sections 1 and 2 would cover the case unless there was any exemption. His Lordship would turn to section 21 (5) and apply that to the events which had happened. The wife had not become entitled merely to the income but to the whole property. It was said that if she became entitled to the capital she became entitled to the income. But the same meaning was not intended by the expression. The word "income" was used, and you could not construe it as including anything else. Throughout the Act "income" was always used in contradistinction to "capital." It appeared to his Lordship that it was a mere play upon the words to argue that income included capital. He thought, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed in the usual way.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY, in delivering judgment to the same effect, said that it appeared to him that what was contemplated by the section was successive titles to the income of property as distinguished from titles to the property itself; and that, therefore, the case aimed at by the section had not arisen here.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

HALLETT V. HALLETT.*

Will—Bequest—Construction.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, sitting as an Additional Judge of the Chancery Division, on February 9, in an action brought to recover possession of certain portions of Hampden-house, which is situated at 142, Marine-parade, Brighton, and which adjoins the Bristol Hotel in that town. The case involved the construction of the will of William Hallett, who in 1842 was the owner in fee of the Bristol Hotel, and the lessee, with an option to purchase the freehold, of Hampden-house. From 1842 to 1852 Hallett occupied both houses together, but in 1852 he let the greater part of the Bristol Hotel to one Samuel Bacon for 21 years, while he himself resided in Hampden-house. Such parts of the Bristol Hotel premises as were not let to Bacon he incorporated and occupied with Hampden-house till his death in 1862. In 1861 he exercised his option of purchasing the freehold of Hampden-house, and by his will, made in 1862, he devised the two properties in the following terms—to his wife absolutely "all that his leasehold messuages and premises known as 142, Marine-parade, Brighton, with the appurtenances, together with the furniture, fixtures, &c." To his wife for life with remainder to his children "all that his freehold estate known as the Bristol Hotel as now on lease to Samuel Bacon, with the appurtenances." He devised the residue of his real estate in the same way as he had devised the Bristol Hotel. After the testator's death in 1862, the widow continued to reside in Hampden-house, as it had been enlarged and occupied by her husband, until her death in 1891, and from 1891 to 1896 it was taken possession of under her will by the defendant, Mr. George Hallett, as her heir, the hotel in its reduced form being occupied by various tenants who succeeded Samuel Bacon. In 1896 the devisees in trust of the Bristol Hotel under William Hallett's will, the plaintiffs in this action, asserted a claim to all such parts of the Bristol Hotel as had been originally incorporated by Hallett with Hampden-house. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes held that they were right, being of opinion that the testator could not have intended the additions made by him to Hampden-house to be permanent. From that decision the defendant now appealed.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Mackarness were for the appellant; Mr. Vernon K. Smith, Q.C., and Mr. R. F. Norton were for the respondents.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after stating the facts and reading the material passages of the testator's will, said that if the construction put upon the will by Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes was right the premises in dispute would pass neither under the devise of the leasehold premises nor under the devise of the Bristol Hotel, but would be swept up by the residuary devise. This would be such a startling result that it was impossible to suppose that the testator could have intended it. The descriptive words used by the testator of Hampden-house, though containing the word "leasehold," were clearly applicable to the premises in their enlarged condition and passed to his widow the additions which were freehold. He thought that in the case of "Hall v. Fisher" (1 Coll., 47), which was cited on behalf of the respondents, Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, although right in principle, had gone a little far. The appeal must be allowed, and the action dismissed, with costs.

STROUD V. LAWSON AND OTHERS.*

Practice—Pleading—Statement of claim—Distinct causes of action—Plaintiff put to election—O. 16, r. 1.

This was an appeal by the defendants from an order of Mr. Justice Darling at Chambers. The plaintiff sued—first, in his own behalf; and, secondly, in his own behalf and also on behalf of all the other shareholders in the Beeston Pneumatic Tyre Company (Limited). The defendants were three directors of the company. The plaintiff, in his statement of claim, first, alleged that the defendants fraudulently conspired together to induce the public to buy the shares of the company in the market at prices greatly above their actual value, and that the plaintiff was thereby induced to buy and did buy certain shares of the company, and in consequence thereof incurred loss, and he claimed £550 damages. The plaintiff, secondly, alleged that the directors of the company in June, 1896, wrongfully paid an interim dividend of 100 per cent., which was not paid out of the profits of the company, such dividend amounting in all to £30,000, and he claimed that the payment of this dividend was ultra vires and illegal, and that the defendants should account for the £30,000 to the company. One of the particulars of the alleged fraud under the first head of the claim was the declaration of the dividend of 100 per cent. The defendants applied that the statement of claim should be struck out as embarrassing unless the plaintiff elected on which of the two claims he would proceed, upon the ground that there were two separate causes of action and two separate sets of plaintiffs, and that the defences would be different. Mr. Justice Darling refused the application.

Mr. J. Brooke Little appeared for the defendants; Mr. Mattinson, Q.C., and Mr. G. F. Hart for the plaintiff.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the question was whether the plaintiff should be put to his election with regard to two absolutely distinct causes of action. He was of opinion that the plaintiff ought to be put to his election. The action was brought by Mr. Stroud, in the first place, on his own account solely, to recover damages from the defendants for having cheated him into becoming a shareholder in the company of which they were directors by false and fraudulent misrepresentations. That was a common law right of action. He then sued in a different capacity—not in his own personal capacity, but on behalf of himself and all the other shareholders—he sued the same defendants with having—to put it shortly—paid a dividend out of capital, and he claimed that they should put back the money which they had so paid ultra vires, not into his pocket, but into the coffers of the company. For this purpose it was necessary that he should make the company a defendant on the record. He thus joined together in one action a well-known common law action and an action which in the old days would have been brought in the Court of Chancery. In the first action he sued on his own behalf, and he had to prove fraud; in the other action he sued, not on his own behalf, but on behalf of all the shareholders, and he had not to prove fraud. There were clearly two causes of action, and in his opinion there were different plaintiffs and different defendants also. He thought that the case did not come within Order 16, rule 1, which regulated the joinder of plaintiffs. That rule was altered in consequence of the decision of the House of Lords in "Smurthwaite v. Hannay" ([1894] A.C., 494). The new rule was as follows:—"All persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or, in the alternative, where if such persons brought separate actions any common question of law or fact would arise." The plaintiff could not bring the case within that rule unless he showed that the relief claimed under the two causes of action arose out of the same transaction. In his opinion the plaintiff had not shown that, and the proper order to be made in this case was either to strike out one or other of the two claims or to put the plaintiff to his election as to which of the claims he would proceed upon. The appeal would therefore be allowed.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgments to the same effect.

NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY V. DALTON OVERSEERS.*

Highway—Exemption from highway rate—
Liability to repair ratione tenuræ—Estoppel—Res judicata—Highway Act, 1835.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by A. F. JENKIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a case stated by the quarter sessions of the North Riding of Yorkshire, on the hearing of an appeal by the North-Eastern Railway Company, against a poor-rate made for the township of Dalton. The facts were as follows:—Prior to the making of an order by the quarter sessions for the North Riding of Yorkshire in 1880, constituting the hamlet of Islebeck a separate highway parish, and annexing it to the Birdforth Highway District, the hamlet formed part of the township of Bagby in that district, and was a place in which all the highways were repairable by the occupiers of lands ratione tenuræ, and in which no highway rates were leviable by reason of the exemption contained in section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835. The hamlet continued to form part of the township of Bagby until June 1, 1886, when it became part of the township of Dalton, as is mentioned below. The North-Eastern Railway Company was at all material times, and still is, in occupation of lands in the hamlet, and was, prior to the making of the order of 1881, referred to below, liable ratione tenuræ to repair a portion of a certain highway in the hamlet. Upon April 11, 1881, an order was made at petty sessions, notwithstanding the opposition of the railway company, under section 35 of the Highway Act, 1862, whereby it was ordered that all the highways within the hamlet of Islebeck should become and be parish highways and be repaired and maintained by the Birdforth Highway Board, and whereby the sums to be paid by the respective occupiers of lands within the hamlet previously liable to the repair of the highways in full discharge of all claims thereafter in respect of the repair and maintenance of the said highways were fixed. Such sums, which were merely nominal, were duly paid. On August 22, 1881, the railway company was rated in respect of its said lands to a rate for the expenses incurred by the Birdforth Highway Board in repairing and maintaining the highways within its district, including those within the hamlet of Islebeck, and for other expenses of the board. The company appealed against that rate to quarter sessions upon the ground that the company was exempt from liability to contribute towards the repair and maintenance of the said highways, and the appeal was allowed. By an order of the Local Government Board, dated June 1, 1886, and confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (Poor Law) Act, 1887, the hamlet of Islebeck was detached from the township of Bagby and was amalgamated with the township of Dalton in the Birdforth Highway District. On June 7, 1897, the poor-rate, with respect to which the present appeal was brought, was made for the township of Dalton, and the railway company was rated to that rate in respect of its occupation of the said lands in the hamlet of Islebeck. The rate was levied, inter alia, in respect of expenses incurred, or to be incurred, by the rural district council of Thirsk, which council is the successor of the Birdforth Highway Board, in respect of the repair and maintenance of the highways within the rural district of Thirsk, including the portion of the township of Dalton which was or is comprised in the hamlet of Islebeck. The company appealed against the rate, and on their behalf it was contended—(a) That it having been decided in the appeal against the rate of 1881 that the company was not liable to contribute towards the repair and maintenance of the highways in the portion of the township of Dalton formerly within the hamlet of Islebeck the question was res judicata, and that the quarter sessions were precluded from deciding otherwise in the present appeal; (b) that the company, having been liable to maintain highways in the hamlet of Islebeck ratione tenuræ, was exempted by section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835, from liability to rates levied in respect of the repair and maintenance of such highways, and had continued to be exempt ever since; and (c) that the company, having complied with the requirements of the order of petty sessions above-mentioned, was, by virtue of section 35 of the Highway Act, 1862, discharged of all claims thereafter in respect of the repair and maintenance of the highways in the hamlet of Islebeck, and was, therefore, not liable to pay the said rate. On behalf of the respondents it was contended—(a) That the decision of the quarter sessions in the appeal of 1881 was final only for its proper purpose and object, which was that the railway company was not liable to pay the particular rate, and was not conclusive on the points arising in the present appeal; (b) that the exemption from the payment of highway rates conferred by section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835, continued only so long as the liability of the company to repair ratione tenuræ lasted, and that the exemption was, therefore, determined by the order of petty sessions; and (c) that that order only operated to discharge the company from all claims by the Birdforth Highway Board or its successors in respect of the portion of highway formerly repairable ratione tenuræ by the company and thereby made repairable by the parish, and in no way affected the liability of the company in respect of its occupation of property within the rural district of Thirsk to pay rates for expenses incurred by the council of that district in respect of the repair and maintenance of the highways within that district. The quarter sessions dismissed the appeal, stating the present case for the opinion of the High Court.

Section 35 of the Highway Act, 1862, provides that, "where any person or corporation is liable by reason of tenure of lands or otherwise to repair any highway situate in a highway district, the person or corporation so liable may apply to any justice of the peace for the purpose of making such highway a highway to be repaired and maintained by the parish in which the same is situate; and such justice shall thereupon issue summonses requiring the waywarden of such parish, the district surveyor, and the party so liable to repair such highway as aforesaid to appear before two or more justices in petty sessions assembled, and the justices at such petty sessions shall proceed to examine and determine the matter and shall, if they think fit, make an order under their hands that such highway shall thereafter be a highway to be thereafter repaired and maintained by the parish, and shall in such order fix a certain sum to be paid by such person or corporation to the highway board of the district, in full discharge of all claims thereafter in respect of the repair and maintenance of such highway." And the section goes on, inter alia, to provide for the application of the sum so paid.

Mr. A. A. Bethune (with whom was Mr. R. Cunningham Glen) appeared for the appellant company; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Gowan Taylor appeared for the respondents.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the case raised two questions—the first as to the construction of section 35 of the Highway Act, 1862; the second the question of estoppel. His Lordship read the section, the material provisions of which are above set out, and said the question was whether an order under the section operates to discharge the person liable from liability in respect of highway expenses altogether, or whether its operation is confined to the extra cost which would fall upon him as compared with other ratepayers by reason of the ratione tenuræ liability. The language of the section was far from plain. But, upon the whole, it appeared to him that the governing words were "the highway shall thereafter be . . . repaired and maintained by the parish." It would have been very easy to add that the land in respect of which the liability existed should continue to enjoy the exemption. But that was not expressly said; and some of the consequences that would follow from such a construction of the section were so startling that, in his opinion, the respondents' construction ought to be accepted. In this particular place—to take it as an example—there were formerly no highways which were not repairable ratione tenuræ. If the appellants' view were applied in such a case, the result might be that a sum fixed once for all with reference to the then probable cost of repair would be absolutely fixed for all time; and if the expenses increased there would be no means of providing funds to meet them. Also, on the same view, the contribution of an individual towards highway expenses might be fixed at a sum which might in course of time become utterly inadequate to represent the burden of the liability to repair the particular highway from the burden of repairing which he was discharged, or utterly inadequate to represent a fair proportionate share of the general highway expenses. A man might be liable to repair a country lane, commute that liability, and then turn his property into a building estate. If he had continued subject to the ratione tenuræ liability he would have had to bear the increased expenditure. But if he had commuted his whole liability for a sum fixed once for all, the whole of the increased expenditure would have to be borne by the rest of the community. It was said on the other side that the opposite construction might operate harshly in certain cases; but such cases must be rare, and legislation of the kind would hardly be expected to work with perfect fairness in all cases. The more reasonable construction was that where the Legislature said the highway should "thereafter be a highway to be thereafter repaired and maintained by the parish" it meant what it said—namely, that the highway should become repairable by everybody in the parish, including the person formerly liable ratione tenuræ. If, as in the present case, the burden in the shape of highway rates cast on the lands by reason of the extinction of the ratione tenuræ liability was an equivalent for that liability, then the sum to be paid as commutation would be properly fixed at a merely nominal amount. The second question was whether the judgment of the quarter sessions on the appeal of 1881 was an estoppel. Questions of estoppel were often difficult, not from any difficulty in the principle, but from the difficulty in applying the principle. But it appeared from "Reg. v. Hutchings" (6 Q.B.D., 300), which was founded upon the "Duchess of Kingston's Case," that, though a judgment of a Court of concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction directly upon the point is conclusive upon the same matter between the same parties coming incidentally in question in another Court for a different purpose, it is not conclusive of any matter which came collaterally in question, nor of any matter incidentally cognisable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment. The judgment of the quarter sessions in 1881 was that the then rate was to be quashed. It necessarily followed that that rate was bad, and as between the same parties that question could not have been raised again. But the construction of section 35 of the Highway Act, 1862, was only incidentally cognisable on a matter to be inferred by argument, and was not one of the things necessarily involved in the judgment of the Court of quarter sessions. The decision in "Reg. v. Hutchings" was very near this case. Mr. Bethune had argued that there was a distinction between the judgment of a Court of quarter sessions, which was a Court of record, and a decision of magistrates. That might be so for some purposes. But the decision in "Reg. v. Hutchings" went on no such ground as that. Indeed, the Court expressed the opinion that a decision of a Court of summary jurisdiction would have been an estoppel on a matter directly in issue.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred.

CHINA TRADERS' INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED) v.
ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION.*

Practice—Discovery—Documents—Action on policy of reinsurance—Order for ships' papers.

This was an appeal from the refusal by Mr. Justice Mathew, sitting in Chambers as the Judge taking commercial causes, to make an order on the plaintiffs for the production of ships' papers. The question raised was whether an order for production of ships' papers should be made in a case of reinsurance. The action was brought to recover for losses under two policies of reinsurance on goods per ship Conqueror. The plaintiffs were the insurers by original policies of certain goods on the Conqueror from Singapore to Boston, and they had effected reinsurances with the defendants in respect of these goods. The claim alleged that the Conqueror, with her cargo, became a total loss on the voyage by perils insured against, and that the plaintiffs had paid under the original policies for a total loss. Upon the hearing of a summons for directions, the defendants applied for an order that the plaintiffs and all persons interested in these proceedings and in the insurance the subject of this action should produce and show to the defendants, their solicitors or agents, upon oath all ships' papers (in the terms of Form 19 in Appendix K to the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, with the additions thereto mentioned in the case of "China Steamship Company v. Commercial Union Assurance Company," 8 Q.B.D., 142). Mr. Justice Mathew refused the application, but ordered lists of documents to be exchanged between the parties and inspection given. The defendants appealed by leave.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. F. W. Hollams appeared for the defendants; Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs.

The Court allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether, upon a reinsurance by an underwriter, who made a claim against the reinsurer, the underwriter was liable to have an order for production of ships' papers made against him. He desired to say that, in his opinion, the order of Mr. Justice Mathew in the present case, that each party should exchange documents, was sufficient, but that was not the point which the parties as well as Mr. Justice Mathew wished to have decided. The rule as to ships' papers was a very old rule, the case of "Goldschmidt v. Marryat" (1 Camp., 559) upon the subject in the time of Sir James Mansfield being decided in 1809. As between the assured and the underwriter it was common practice to order the assured to produce ships' papers. An order for production of ships' papers was a matter peculiar to insurance. In 1890, in the case of "Nord Deutsche Versicherungs Gesellschaft v.

Merchants' Marine Insurance Company" (not reported), a Divisional Court consisting of Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Cave held that an order for production of ships' papers could not be made in a case of reinsurance. Later on, in "Willis and Co. v. Baddeley" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 324) in this Court Lord Justice Bowen and himself said that the point raised in the above unreported case must be left open; and in 1897 it was said that Lord Justice Collins at Chambers, in the case of "Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation v. Faber," made an order for production of ships' papers in a case of reinsurance. Mr. Justice Mathew had come to the conclusion that in such a case he would not order production of ships' papers, and that an order for the exchange of documents was sufficient. In his opinion that was not a correct view. The reinsurer had open to him all the defences which were open to the original underwriter as against the assured, and it was right that he should see all the documents which the original underwriter might have seen. It was said that the underwriter would probably have no documents, whereas the shipowner would have them. But the rule as to production of ships' papers applied to an insurance on goods as well as on ship, though there was not much probability that the cargo-owner would have the ships' papers. But he might have access to them. In his opinion a reinsurer could have an order made against the original underwriter for production of ships' papers.

THE QUEEN V. WARDLE AND OTHERS, JUSTICES, AND THE HARTON COAL COMPANY—EX PARTE BURROWS*.

Justices—Jurisdiction—Test case—Justices equally divided—Res judicata.

This was a rule nisi directed to justices of South Shields ordering them to show cause why they should not state a case. Two hundred and thirty summonses were issued by the Harton Coal Company against their workmen under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, claiming damages on the ground that they wrongfully left their employment. The Act (sections 3 and 4) gives jurisdiction to justices to settle disputes of a certain character between employers and their workmen, and section 9 provides that such jurisdiction shall be exercised as if made upon complaint. A test case (Clarke's case) was heard before the justices, which, it was agreed, should decide the others. The justices were four in number and were equally divided, and the chairman announced that the bench being equally divided the summons was dismissed. A case was asked for by the Harton Coal Company, but was refused. Another of the summonses, Burrows's case, was subsequently heard before seven justices, and Burrows, by a majority, was fined 10s. Burrows asked for a case, contending that the matter was res judicata. The case was refused, whereupon Burrows obtained this rule nisi.

Mr. ASQUITH, Q.C., and Mr. DANCKWERTS (Mr. Mundahl with them), showing cause, contended that the justices in Clarke's case had no power to dismiss the summons. The justices being equally divided there was no decision. They referred to "Reg. v. Belcomb" (11 Q.B., 388).

Mr. ROBSON, Q.C. (Mr. J. H. W. Pilcher with him), in support of the rule, contended that the justices in Clarke's case having said that the summons was dismissed it must be taken that they came to a decision and adjudicated on the summons. Such decision would, under the arrangement between the parties, decide Burrows's case. He cited "Reg. v. Brackenridge" (48 J.P., 293); "Rox. v. Justices of Leicestershire" (1 M. and S., 442); "Reg. v. Justices of Monmouthshire" (4 B. and C., 844); "Reg. v. Justices of Monmouthshire" (8 B. and C., 137); "Reg. v. Ashplant" (52 J.P., 475); and "Kinnis v. Graves," decided before Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Kennedy on May 12, 1898.

Mr. JUSTICE HAWKINS, in discharging the rule nisi, said that what the justices did in Clarke's case was an adjudication as against Clarke, but it was not a decision upon the questions which were in the contemplation of the employers and the workmen, and which each desired to have settled by the judgment of the bench. At the hearing of Burrows's case the counsel for the complainants submitted that the decision in Clarke's case was not such a decision as was contemplated by the arrangement, and the justices adopted that view and heard the case. As between the complainants and Clarke, without discussing the various cases cited, it must be assumed on the authority of "Ex parte Evans" ([1894] A.C. 16) that the adjudication in Clarke's case was binding on both parties, though the course adopted by the justices was a very doubtful one, notwithstanding the case of "Reg. v. Ashplant" (52 J.P., 475), which, it must be remembered, was a criminal case and not a civil one like the present. Possibly their decision might have been reversed had they granted a case as they were asked to do, but no steps were ever taken to set it aside, and the decision stood as between the complainants and Clarke. As between the complainants and the other workmen, his Lordship was by no means satisfied that the arrangement contended for, even if assented to by all, could under any circumstances be set up as a legal answer to the complaint, though in honour the complainants might feel bound by it. On the affidavits it was nowhere stated that Burrows was a party to the arrangement which was come to in Clarke's case. But, assuming his concurrence in an arrangement that Clarke's case was to be treated as a test case, it could not be doubted that the decision referred to in the arrangement meant a decision on the merits. Nobody would say that a decision given in favour of one party because the justices were equally divided was a decision on the merits, or could be treated as a test case. He thought the justices sitting in Burrows's case were right in refusing to grant a case.

Mr. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE gave judgment to the same effect.

ferred by the appellant, Frederick Benford, an inspector of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, against the respondent, a veterinary surgeon practising at Cardiff, for unlawfully cruelly ill-treating a horse by causing it to be worked in an unfit state. Early in 1897 Alfred Hunt, a coal merchant, the owner of the animal, consulted the respondent with reference to the lameness of the animal, a bay mare. The respondent advised that she should be turned out to grass. That was done until November, 1897. On November 18, 1897, the respondent gave a certificate that he found the mare "to be renewing her hoof on the near fore foot; nevertheless the mare is free from pain and quite fit for work." On December 13 last the mare, while working, was stopped by the appellant. She was then very lame, and even light work caused her pain. The magistrate found that the respondent knowingly counselled the owner to cause the act of cruelty to be perpetrated. Further, that although the advice of the respondent in some degree influenced the owner to cause the animal to be worked, such advice was the remote cause of the cruelty in some degree, and not the proximate cause of the cruelty in any degree, and, therefore, not the cause of the cruelty within the meaning of the statute, and that the respondent was charged with the offence committed by the owner, and was not charged with the offence disclosed by the facts—viz., knowingly counselling an act of cruelty to be caused. The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the magistrate was right in acquitting the respondent.

Mr. Colam appeared for the appellant. The respondent did not appear.

The COURT held that the respondent ought to have been convicted and that the case must be remitted to the magistrate with an intimation to that effect. Although the words of section 2 of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849 (12 and 13 Vict., cap. 92), were "shall cruelly . . . cause . . . to be cruelly . . . ill-treated," section 5 of Jervis's Act (11 and 12 Vict., cap. 43) enacted that a "person who shall . . . counsel . . . the commission of any offence . . . shall be liable to be proceeded against and convicted . . . either together with the principal offender or before or after his conviction." The magistrate ought to have convicted the respondent under that section.

Case remitted.

JENKINS v. COOMBER.*

Bill of Exchange—Endorsement—Incomplete bill
—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, secs. 55 and 56
—"Steele v. M'Kinlay" (5 App. Cas., 754).

This was an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Lumley Smith, Q.C., in an action on a bill of exchange. It appeared that one Arthur Coomber, the defendant's son, was indebted to the plaintiffs, a firm of builders, and that, being pressed for payment, he arranged that the plaintiffs should draw a bill at three months on him, which he would get his father, the defendant, to back. In pursuance of this arrangement the plaintiffs drew the bill in question on Arthur Coomber. The bill was made payable to the plaintiffs' order. Arthur Coomber accepted it, got the defendant, his father, to sign his name on the back, and handed the bill back to the plaintiffs. The bill was not paid at maturity, and the plaintiffs brought the present action. The learned County Court Judge gave judgment for the defendant, holding that the case was governed by "Steele v. M'Kinlay" (L.R., 5 App. Cas., 754), the authority of that case not being, in his opinion, affected by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. ATTENBOROUGH appeared for the appellants, the plaintiffs below, and contended that the defendant was liable either under section 55 or section 56 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Mr. Abraham appeared for the respondent.

The cases of "Steele v. M'Kinlay" (5 App. Cas., 754), "Wilkinson v. Unwin" (7 Q.B.D., 636), "Holmes v. Durkee" (1 Cab. and El., 23), and "Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers" ([1891] A.C., 107) were cited in the course of the argument. The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said that, in his opinion, the learned County Court Judge was right. He did not think the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, was meant to introduce in this respect the important alteration in the law that it had been contended it did. He thought there was no intention of inferentially repealing the decision of the House of Lords in "Steele v. M'Kinlay." In the present case, at the time when the defendant wrote his name across the bill it was not a perfect instrument, though it might have been made so by the plaintiffs' endorsement; nor had it ever become a perfect instrument. It was plain, therefore, that section 56 of the Act, which would have given the plaintiffs a right of action against the defendant if they had been holders in due course, was not satisfied, because "holder in due course" was defined by section 29 as a holder who has taken a bill "complete and regular on the face of it" under certain conditions; and here the bill was not complete and regular on the face of it. It was sought to make the defendant liable as an endorser under section 55. The Act afforded little help as to the meaning of "endorsement," because by section 2 it defined "endorsement" as meaning "endorsement," completed, it was true, by delivery. It was, however, plain that the writing of a signature across a bill was not necessarily an endorsement, as was pointed out by Lord Watson in "Steele v. M'Kinlay." It appeared to him that in this case the law merchant, unless it had been altered in a very material respect—and in his opinion it had not—had no application. The cases in which an endorser had been held liable to a drawer, to whose hands a bill had returned, were all cases in which the instrument was perfect in itself, and were not in point. In the present case the facts were exactly like those in "Steele v. M'Kinlay." Therefore the contract of indemnity on which the plaintiffs relied was not one depending on the law merchant, but upon an agreement between the parties, and was not relied on as getting over a defence that might otherwise have prevailed, viz., the defence of circuity of action, but was relied on as creating the primary liability. For these reasons the appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered judgment to the same effect.

ORCHARD v. BUSH.*

Innkeeper—Liability—Property of guest—Loss of.

This was an appeal by the defendant against a decision of the learned County Court Judge of Liverpool in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the value of a coat which was lost by the plaintiff in the dining-room of an hotel kept by the defendant in Liverpool. Persons in very considerable numbers were in the habit of using the dining-room of the defendant's hotel as a restaurant, 80 or 90 persons other than persons staying at the hotel dining there every evening. On the occasion in question the plaintiff, who was going home from his place of business, went on his way to the railway station, to the defendant's establishment to dine about 9 o'clock. He hung his coat up on a peg in the dining-room, and on his leaving at about 10 o'clock he found that the coat had disappeared. He therefore brought the present action to recover the value of the coat. The learned County Court Judge held that the relationship of landlord and guest existed between the defendant and the plaintiff, though the plaintiff only went to the defendant's establishment to dine, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

Mr. LUSH appeared for the defendant in support of the appeal. He contended that under the circumstances there was no evidence on which the learned County Court Judge could come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was a guest at the defendant's hotel so as to give rise to the liability on the defendant's part that attaches to an innkeeper as regards the safe custody of the goods of his guests, and he cited "Strauss v. County Hotel Company" (12 Q.B.D., 27), "Reg. v. Rymer" (2 Q.B.D., 136), "Medawar v. Grand Hotel Company" ([1891] 2 Q.B., 11), "Ultzen v. Nichols" ([1894], 1 Q.B., 92), "Lamond v. Richard" ([1897], 1 Q.B., 541), "Burgess v. Clements" (4 M. and S., 306), "Thompson v. Lacy" (3 B. and Ald., 283), and "Dawson v. Chamney" (5 Q.B., 164) on this point. He further contended that even if the relationship of innkeeper and guest existed between the parties, still the defendant was not liable in the absence of negligence, because the coat had not been committed to his custody. In support of this contention he cited "Great Western Railway v. Bunch" (13, App. Cas., 31) and "Ultzen v. Nichols" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 92).

Mr. HORRIDGE appeared for the respondent, the plaintiff below. He cited "Bennett v. Mellor" (5 T.R., 273) and "Yorke v. Grenaugh" (2 Ld. Raym., 866). The notes to Calve's case in 1 Smith's Leading Cases were also referred to in the course of the argument.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the only question was whether there was evidence that the plaintiff when he lost his coat was a guest at an inn. The place to which the plaintiff went was the dining-room of an hotel, and in what sense he was not a guest his Lordship failed to understand. Taking the narrow view contended for by Mr. Lush—namely, that to be a guest at an inn a person must be a traveller or wayfarer—the plaintiff was a guest. He was on his way from his place of business to the railway station, whence he intended to proceed further by train. If he had been going along a country lane on horseback, and had stopped at the hotel for the purpose of necessary refreshment, why would he not have been a wayfarer and a guest? In his Lordship's opinion he clearly would. What difference did it make that, instead of going on horseback, he walked to the station with a view to taking the train, and accepted refreshment? He could not see why the plaintiff was not a wayfarer and a guest. Further, he was not disposed to take that narrow view of the meaning of "guest." He thought that a person who uses an inn is a guest if he is received into the four walls of the inn and there receives such accommodation as the innkeeper offers to persons who use the inn. That the person does not stop the night would make no difference. And on authority there was not much to be said for the contention that in this connexion the expression guest is confined to wayfarers. True that in old times a guest was more often a wayfarer than not. But the liability was said to arise when the innkeeper receives a person causa hospitandi. Why did an innkeeper who gave a person refreshment, receiving him for the same purposes and in the same way as he received other persons at the inn, not receive that person causa hospitandi? The present case was much less strong than "Bennett v. Mellor" (5 T.R., 273). There a man who went to an inn for a purpose wholly unconnected with the use of the inn as such, and who, while waiting for an answer with reference to the business on which he went to the inn, sat down in the public room and took some refreshment, was held to be a guest and to be entitled to the privileges of a guest. That was a much stronger case than this, for the use made of the place by the plaintiff in the present case was much more like the natural use of an inn. The case would have been quite different if the place where the plaintiff dined had been a restaurant detached from the hotel or not substantially forming part of it. If it had been a restaurant merely, then his Lordship would have thought that no liability would have arisen. But the room in question was part of the inn and used as part of the inn, and the defendant supplied the plaintiff with the refreshment as an innkeeper.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered judgment to the like effect.

CAHN AND MAYER V. POCKETT'S BRISTOL CHANNEL STEAM PACKET COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Sale of Goods—Property in goods, when it passes —Bill of lading, with draft for acceptance attached—Fraudulent endorsement of bill of lading—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 19, subs. 3, and sec. 25, subs. 2.

This was an action nominally for damages for the non-delivery of certain copper. The real question in dispute was whether the property in the copper, which had been sold by Steinmann and Co. to one Pintscher, had passed to the plaintiffs by the endorsement to them of the bill of lading by Pintscher. The facts are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. Parker Lowe for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW said that the action was brought by the endorsees of a bill of lading against shipowners for non-delivery of the goods. The facts were contained in a lengthy correspondence, but they might be very briefly stated. A firm at Liverpool, Steinmann and Co., sold to one Pintscher, a merchant, the goods in question, which were to be shipped at Swansea and delivered at Rotterdam. Under the bill of lading the goods were shipped at Swansea on the defendants' vessel, and were to be transhipped at Bristol and forwarded to Rotterdam, at 15s. a ton, through freight. Steinmann and Co. forwarded the bill of lading, endorsed in blank, to Pintscher, together with a draft for acceptance. The amount of the bill of exchange was incorrectly stated, but nothing turned on that, because no effort had been made by Pintscher to set the mistake right. When the documents arrived Pintscher was on the verge of bankruptcy, and it was clear that he ought to have sent back the bill of lading and the bill of exchange, which he did not intend to accept, but he did not do so. He did what was wrong, and committed a fraud upon Steinmann and Co. He declined to accept the draft, but sold the goods, and endorsed the bill of lading, to the plaintiffs. Then his financial difficulties became known to Steinmann and Co., and they took steps to obtain possession of the goods. They succeeded in doing so, on giving an indemnity to the defendants, and the question now arose whether the plaintiffs, as endorsees of the bill of lading, or Steinmann and Co., the sellers, are entitled to the goods. The first point taken for the defence was that the action ought to have been brought against the steamship company into whose ship the goods were transhipped, but his Lordship was clearly of opinion that there was only one contract of carriage, at a through rate of freight, and on that contract the defendants, if any one, were liable. The next point was taken under section 19, subsection 3, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which provided that "where the seller of goods draws on the buyer for the price, and transmits the bill of exchange and bill of lading to the buyer together to secure acceptance or payment of the bill of exchange, the buyer is bound to return the bill of lading if he does not honour the bill of exchange, and if he wrongfully retains the bill of lading the property in the goods does not pass to him." It was said that under that section Pintscher ought to have returned the bill of lading to Steinmann and Co.; that he acquired no property in the goods; and that, therefore, the plaintiffs acquired none, and were not entitled as against Steinmann and Co. to retain the possession of the goods. The plaintiffs sought to meet that point by relying on section 25, subsection 2, of the same Act, which provided that, "where a person having bought or agreed to buy goods obtains, with the consent of the seller, possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale . . . to any person receiving the same in good faith . . . shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner." The effect of that somewhat extraordinary section was that the buyer became a mercantile agent for himself. It was said in this case that Pintscher, the buyer, had obtained possession of the bill of lading and thereby was enabled to represent himself as the owner of the goods, and that under the provisions of section 25, subsection 2, he could create a title in the plaintiffs. The bill of lading did not of itself create title, because it was not a negotiable instrument, but it was argued that, when it was in the possession of a person who appeared to be the owner, it might be endorsed so as to give the endorsee a title to the goods. The defendants said that the significant words in section 25, subsection 2, were "with the consent of the seller," and that this bill of lading was not in Pintscher's possession with the consent of Steinmann and Co., the sellers. In his Lordship's opinion Pintscher held the bill of lading, as agent of the sellers, for safe custody, until he should have accepted the draft. He determined not to accept the draft, and therefore he continued to have the custody only of the bill of lading, not possession of it, with the consent of the seller. He had, therefore, no right to deal with the bill of lading by endorsing it to the plaintiffs, and he could not, by so dealing with it, create a title to the goods. On these grounds judgment must be for the defendants.

COLE AND ANOTHER V. LANGFORD.*

Judgment—Fraud—Judgment obtained by fraud —Action to set aside judgment.

This was a motion, under Order 27, rule 11, of the Supreme Court Rules, for judgment in default of delivery of a defence. By the terms of the rule referred to "such judgment shall be given as upon the statement of claim the Court or a Judge shall consider the plaintiff to be entitled to."

Mr. GREGSON ELLIS, who appeared for the plaintiffs, said that this case raised the important question whether a judgment that had been obtained by fraud could be set aside. In 1896 the present defendant had obtained judgment in the High Court of Justice against the present plaintiffs for £53 and costs. That judgment had been obtained by a fraud for which the present defendant was now in prison. The statement of claim set out the particulars of the fraud and claimed that the judgment obtained thereby should be set aside. In making the application Mr. Gregson Ellis said that he felt it his duty to refer to authorities, some of which might be thought to show that a judgment cannot be set aside on this ground. The decision of the Court of Appeal in "Flower v. Lloyd" (6 C.D., 297) was in his favour, but the subsequent opinion of the majority of the Court of Appeal in "Flower v. Lloyd" (10 C.D., 327) was against his contention.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE referred to "Priestman v. Thomas" (9 P.D., 70, 210).

Mr. GREGSON ELLIS also mentioned the case of "Baker v. Wadsworth" (67 L.J., 301), in which the Divisional Court held that a judgment obtained in an action will not be set aside in a subsequent action brought for that purpose upon mere proof that the judgment was obtained by perjury.

The COURT granted the application on the ground that though perjury was not a sufficient cause for setting aside a judgment obtained by it, nevertheless that this could be properly done where the judgment had been obtained by a fraud on the Court.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT, 1894—PETITION FROM THE RURAL DISTRICT OF CRICKHOWELL—COX AND OTHERS
V. DAVIES.†

Election Law—District council—Nomination paper—Validity—Returning officer's jurisdiction as to validity—Rural District Councillors Election Order, 1893, rule 7 (2).

This was a motion to strike off the file an election petition filed by Messrs. William Cox, William Williams, William Edwards, and Alfred William Lewis, the petitioners, praying that the election of Mr. John *Reported by T. E. HAYDON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

†Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ward Davies on the Rural District Council of Crickhowell should be declared void.

Mr. Corrie Grant appeared for Mr. Davies, in support of the motion; and Mr. Roskill appeared for the petitioners.

The petition stated that the election was held on April 2, 1898, and that Mr. Davies was a candidate. The nomination paper used by him was signed by the proposer and seconder with the name, place of abode, description, and qualification of the candidate in blank. Mr. Davies afterwards filled in his name, &c., and delivered the paper to the returning officer. The returning officer published a statement in the prescribed form, in which he gave notice of his decision that Mr. Davies's nomination was valid. It was submitted by the petitioners that the nomination paper was bad on the ground that the signatures of the proposer and seconder were put to it before the name of the candidate had been inserted.

Mr. CORRIE GRANT contended that the ground for avoiding the election put forward in the petition was not a proper ground on which to proceed by election petition, and that the decision of the returning officer was final, having regard to rule 7 (2) of the Rural District Councillors Election Order, 1898. That rule provided as followed:—"The returning officer shall, as soon as practicable after the receipt of any nomination paper, examine and decide whether it has or has not been properly filled up and signed by two parochial electors of the parish or other area, and whether it is or is not invalid under rule 4 (5) or rule 6. His decision that a nomination paper has been so filled up and signed, and is not invalid as aforesaid, shall be final, and shall not be questioned in any proceeding whatever."

Mr. ROSKILL contended that the ground of invalidity put forward by the petitioners was not one into which the returning officer had authority to inquire. His duty was confined to seeing that the nomination paper was correct on the face of it. Rule 14 of the rules as to nominations in elections of councillors, schedule 3, part II., of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, provided as followed:—"The decision of the mayor shall be given in writing, and shall, if disallowing an objection, be final, but, if allowing an objection, shall be subject to reversal on petition questioning the election or return." That rule was taken direct from the Municipal Elections Act, 1875, section 3. It was in effect the same as the rule relied on by the other side. The added words "and shall not be questioned in any proceeding whatever" gave no greater force to the rule. In the interpretation of the new rule, therefore, the Court ought to be guided by the decisions on the old rule. Counsel cited "Howes v. Turner" (1 C.P.D., 670) and "Harmon v. Park" (7 Q.B.D., 369) in support of his contention that the objection to the nomination paper was not such an objection as under the old rule could have been dealt with by the returning officer. The proper way of raising such an objection was on petition.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM made the order prayed for. He said that counsel had endeavoured to minimize the effect of the rules of 1898 by referring to a decision in which Lord Esher said, with regard to a certain decision by a mayor, that the decision was not one of those which were not to be questioned by virtue of the rule then prevailing. The present rule was not then in existence. The question in that case was whether the nomination was made in time. It had nothing whatever to do with the nomination paper. His Lordship found a difficulty in saying that a candidate should not be allowed to get the names of his supporters filled in on the paper before he filled in his own. He himself had had practical experience of elections and knew that it was constantly done. Was there anything so wrong in the practice as that the candidate should be exposed to the expense of an election petition. If there were forgery or a mistake that would be a different matter, but that had not been shown. In "Harmon v. Park" eight burgesses signed a nomination paper on the assumption that two other burgesses, whom they knew, respectively proposed and seconded the candidate. The name of the proposer was afterwards struck out, and the name of another gentleman was substituted as proposer. The nomination was held to be invalid, whether that decision could have been given under the new rules was not for their Lordships to say. They were bound by the new rules. The nomination paper was good on the face of it, and there was nothing to show that anything wrong had been done in getting it filled up.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

Leave to appeal was refused.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1898.
Rigby and Collins, L.J.J. } May 19.
IN RE DE NICOLS—DE NICOLS V. CURLIER.*

International Law—Husband and wife—Change of domicile—French law as to community of goods—Matrimonial domicile—Will.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 206, and [1898] 1 Ch., 403), reversed.

"Lashley v. Hog" (4 Pat., 581) discussed.

This was an appeal by the defendant, the testator's daughter, from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich dated February 3 last and reported in The Times of the following day; also ante, p. 206. The question was whether, where a Frenchman and a Frenchwoman, having married in France without entering into any marriage contract altering the French law as to the "community of goods" as between husband and wife, subsequently come over to this country and acquire a domicile here, "movable goods," such as money and securities, acquired by the husband during his domicile here can be affected by his will made here according to the English law, so as to deprive his widow of the rights originally vested in her by the French law at the date of her marriage. The question arose in consequence of the death of the testator, Mr. Daniel Nicolas de Nicols, the late proprietor of the Café Royal, Regent-street. In the year 1854 Mr. de Nicols was a man of no means, earning his living as a coachmaker in Paris, at wages. On May 30 in that year he married his first cousin (both being of age), the ceremony being performed at the mayor's office of the Third District of Paris, and the marriage was duly registered at the Prefecture of the Department of the Seine. It appeared, however, that the register was destroyed by fire by the Commune at the close of the Franco-German war. No contract of marriage was executed on the marriage, but, in accordance with French law and custom, the municipal officer who performed the ceremony formally called upon the parties to declare whether they had executed any contract of marriage, to which they both replied in the negative, when their answers were duly recorded on the usual "minute." The husband had at the time of the marriage no property whatever of his own, but the wife was possessed of a small piece of land at Vachy, in France, which was the birthplace of both of them, a sum of

*Reported by E. A. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1,000*l.*, or about £40, in cash given to her as a dôt by her parents, and a sum of between 1,500*l.* and 1,600*l.*, or between £60 and £64, representing savings by her as an assistant in a linen business. Soon after the marriage the husband and wife sold the piece of land for 500*l.*, or about £20, and became managers of a wine and spirit business in Paris, which in a year's time they purchased from the proprietor for 6,000*l.*, made up of the proceeds of the wife's piece of land, her dôt and savings, and the joint earnings realized by her husband and herself in carrying on the business. In December, 1862, they sold that business for 14,500*l.*, or about £580. In October, 1863, Mr. and Mrs. de Nicols came over to England, and with a sum of about £400, which represented their sole property, set up a small café, called the Café Royal, in Glasshouse-street, Regent-street, and under their skillful management this café expanded into the large and well-known café of that name in Regent-street. In 1865 he took out letters of naturalization as a British subject, and he and his wife remained in this country until his death, she actively assisting him in the management of the café. Out of that business and from an interest in the property upon which the Empire Theatre now stands Mr. de Nicols amassed a fortune of about £600,000. On February 28, 1897, he died, having made a will dated March 22, 1895, in the English form, in which he described himself as "of the Café Royal, No. 68, Regent-street, in the county of Middlesex, and Regent-house, Surbiton, in the county of Surrey, restaurant proprietor," and proceeded, "I hereby declare that I am a domiciled Englishman naturalized in England in the year 1865." Then, after appointing three persons his executors and trustees and bequeathing various legacies, he gave his residuary real and personal estate to them in trust for sale and to hold the proceeds on trust for his wife for life, and after her death upon trusts for his daughter, her husband and children. He died possessed of considerable freehold and leasehold property, besides investments in numerous stocks and shares. It was said that he had also £100,000 worth of wine in France. The only issue of the marriage was one child, a daughter, who was married to a French marquis. This was an originating summons taken out by Mme. de Nicols, the widow, against the executors and trustees of the will and the daughter, to ascertain (amongst other things) what were the rights and interests of the plaintiff in the real and personal estate of the testator by reason of her marriage with him without any marriage settlement or contract, the parties being then domiciled in France. Subsequently the question for decision was formulated in Chambers as follows:—
 "Did the change of domicile alter the legal position of the parties to the marriage in reference to property?" and the summons was adjourned into Court for argument on this question. Upon the summons being opened it was arranged that the argument should be confined to the effect of the change of domicile on the testator's "movable goods" only. The contention on the part of the plaintiff was that the "communauté légale de biens" was never dissolved during the joint lives of herself and her husband, and that such "communauté" regulated the property and interests of herself and her husband as from the date of the marriage up to the determination of the "communauté" by his death, and that she was entitled under it to one moiety of all property in the possession of her husband or of him and herself jointly at the time of his death, notwithstanding his will. On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the defendant, the child of the marriage, that the rights of the parties were governed by the law of their change of domicile. Mr. Justice Kekewich was of opinion that there was no principle requiring him to say that by a change of domicile at any time subsequently there was any surrender by the wife of that to which she was entitled under the matrimonial contract, and therefore held that the husband by his will disposed only of such property as was properly his, and that it did not include what was the wife's property under the matrimonial contract—that is, her right under the law of community of goods. Accordingly his Lordship made a declaration that the plaintiff's right under that law to movable property acquired during the coverture by husband and wife, or either of them, was not affected by the will. But this decision was without prejudice to any question as to the rest of the property of the testator. The testator's daughter appealed.

Mr. Dicey, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney were for the appellant; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Ingle Joyce were for the respondent, the plaintiff; Mr. E. J. Elgood (with him Mr. Maugham) was for the respondents, the executors and trustees.

At the conclusion of the arguments on the 6th inst., their Lordships reserved judgment.

The MASTER of the ROLLS read the judgment of the Court as follows:—This is an appeal from the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, reported ([1898] 1 Ch., 403). The question raised by this appeal turns upon whether the decision of the House of Lords in the case of "Lashley v. Hog" (4 Pat., 581) applies to it or not. Mr. Justice Kekewich has treated that decision as not applicable to the present case, and he has decided that a change of domicile has not affected the rights acquired by two French people in each other's unsettled movable property by their marriage in France. In order to appreciate "Lashley v. Hog" and its true bearing on the case before us it is necessary to understand how at the date of that decision the law of Scotland stood as regards the effect of marriage on the movable property of the wife. By the Scotch law, on the marriage of two persons domiciled in Scotland the existing and after-acquired movable property of both husband and wife was regarded as a common fund (communio bonorum) divisible in certain shares on the death of either of them. But the whole of this so-called common fund was at the disposal of the husband during the marriage and was liable to the payment of his debts. During the marriage neither his wife nor his children had any right to any part of it. But the law applicable to this so-called communio bonorum did not depend in any way on whether any of the movable property which constituted it came from the wife or not. The proportion, if any, to which she contributed to it was of no importance. The whole was the husband's property, and his inability to dispose of the whole of it by will and the rights to it which arose on the death of himself or his wife in no way depended on the amount of her contribution, if any, to the common stock. Assuming a communio bonorum to exist, the right of the wife and children to it on his death, or in other words, the distribution of the communio bonorum on the death of the husband would on general principles of law be determined by the Scotch Law of Succession to the movable property of married men or widowers. So the persons to take the wife's share, if any, of the communio on her death would be decided by the Law of Succession as applied to her share. But when the question is, as it was in "Lashley v. Hog," whether on the wife's death in her husband's lifetime any part of his property became hers or became payable to persons claiming through her as if it were her property, it is very difficult to understand upon what principle recourse is had to the Law of Succession. Apart from authority we should have thought that the matrimonial law of the place where the parties were domiciled when they married and not the law of the domicile of the husband on the wife's death would have been the law to apply to such a question as that. We pass now to "Lashley v. Hog," which is reported also in the appendix to Robertson's Law of Succession, No. 3, p. 414. Many questions were raised and decided on that appeal, but the only one which concerns us on the present occasion is the effect of the change of domicile on the rights of married persons to their respective unsettled movable properties. Mr. and Mrs. Hog, both of whom were English, married in England. Her unsettled movable property, existing and after acquired, became his, and she had no right to his movable property except what she might acquire under the Statute of Distributions if he died intestate. Mr. and Mrs. Hog had several children and went to Scotland and became domiciled there and they both died there. His wife predeceased him. One of their daughters married a Mr. Lashley. Mr. Hog had amassed a large fortune and he left a will making provisions for his children. Mrs. Lashley, however, refused to take anything under her father's will and insisted on her right under the Scotch law. These rights were as she insisted:—(1) A share of what her mother became entitled to in the communio bonorum when she died. (2) A share of her father's property at the time of his death. She succeeded in establishing her right to a share of her father's estate in a previous litigation (4 Pat., 583). Owing to circumstances not mentioned here, she got the whole legitimum (see p. 609). Her claim to her share of what her mother became entitled to when she died remained to be decided, and that was one of the questions before the House of Lords in "Lashley v. Hog." The House of Lords decided in her favour, reversing the decision of the Scotch Court on this point. The judgment of Lord Eldon is extremely long, dealing with various matters which do not bear on the question we have to consider. We have all studied that judgment with great care in order to ascertain the real grounds on which his decision on this point was based. The case was argued for the appellant, Mrs. Lashley, on the ground that her father being a domiciled Scotchman when his wife died, the distribution of property on the dissolution of the marriage must be regulated by the law of the place of the domicile of the married pair at that time. The previous decision in favour of Mrs. Lashley's claim to legitimum—i.e., her share of her father's estate on his death, was relied upon and it was urged that no distinction could be made between a wife's share and a child's share. The argument for the respondent was to the effect that the destination of the movable property of married persons on the dissolution of the marriage depended on the law of the place where they were domiciled when they married; and that the death of the wife in the lifetime of her husband did not deprive him of what became his on his marriage. These were shortly the two views presented to the House of Lords for decision. The House adopted the view presented by the appellant, and held that on the dissolution of the marriage by the death of the wife a portion of the husband's property became divisible amongst those persons who would have become entitled to it by the law of Scotland if the husband and wife had been domiciled in Scotland when they married. The claim of the daughter to her share of her father's movable property on his death is intelligible enough. It is a mere illustration of the well-settled rule that the law of a person's domicile regulates the succession to his movable property. But the claim of the daughter to what became divisible on her mother's death cannot be explained on any such principle; for although when that share became divisible the mother was dead yet the father was not; and it was a part of his property which the daughter claimed and was held entitled to.

The decision in her favour necessarily involves the view that the change of domicile affected the matrimonial rights of the husband and wife, and this was plainly what both Lord Eldon and Lord Rosslyn meant to decide and what the House of Lords did decide. (See 4 Paton, 611-619.) Lord Eldon said distinctly (p. 617) that it was best to hold that the wife's rights shifted with the domicile of her husband, and that was the basis of the judgment. It is plain that he was much influenced by the difficulty of making any distinction between the rights of a wife who survived her husband and the rights of those who claimed her share if she died in his lifetime (p. 615). Lord Rosslyn concurred in Lord Eldon's judgment and repudiated the idea that marriage imported any implied contract which a subsequent change of domicile could not affect. It is impossible to escape from the conclusion that the change of domicile was held to have altered the respective rights of both husband and wife with respect to their unsettled movable properties. She acquired and he lost rights by the change even during his life. This decision is binding on us. It is true that there are several material differences between the Scotch and French matrimonial laws of property, the wife having more extensive rights under the law of France than she has under the law of Scotland. But these differences do not warrant us in holding that the law of the matrimonial domicile can prevail after such domicile has been changed. It is not altogether satisfactory to hold that a change of domicile cannot affect an express contract embodying the law of the matrimonial domicile; but that a change of domicile does affect the application of that law if not embodied in an express contract. But after all there is some practical convenience in holding that a change of domicile changes the rights of husband and wife as regards their respective unsettled movable properties, just as it changes their rights to obtain judicial decrees for separation and divorce and their testamentary powers. In America and in Scotland this view has prevailed; although on the continent it has been repudiated as opposed to sound legal principle. After "Lashley v. Hog" we do not consider the question open to judicial review in this country. We cannot regard the decision as based only on the law of Scotland. It decided a most important principle of private international law. The appeal therefore must be allowed and the declaration made by Mr. Justice Kekewich must be altered accordingly. The costs of the appeal will be costs in the summons.

GOMERSALL V. DAVIES.*

Defamation—Libel—Publication, what amounts to—Letter opened by clerk of addressee in ordinary course of business.

This was an application by the defendant for a new trial of an action of libel, or for judgment. The plaintiff was a game and poultry salesman residing and carrying on business at Leeds, and the defendant was an auctioneer carrying on business at Preston. The alleged libel was contained in a letter written by the defendant to the plaintiff and addressed to him at his residence and place of business. The letter was opened and read by a person in the employment of the plaintiff as clerk. The question was whether there had been a publication of the libel. The trial of the action took place at Leeds, before Mr. Justice Wright and a jury, and, in answer to questions put by the learned Judge, the jury found that the letter was opened by a person other than the plaintiff in the ordinary course of business; that the writer did not expect any one to open the letter but the plaintiff; but that the probability was that some person in the employment of the receiver might see the letter. Damages were assessed at £20, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff for that amount.

Mr. SCOTT FOX appeared for the defendant, and argued that there had been no publication of this libel. In order to maintain an action for libel it was necessary to show an intention to defame on the part of the defendant, an intention to publish defamatory matter. There was no evidence on which the jury could properly find that the defendant intended this letter to come to the notice of any person other than the plaintiff, as was held by Lord Ellenborough to be necessary in the case of "De la Croix v. Thevenot" (2 Stark, 63). Mr. Justice Wright thought this case was governed by "Rex v. Burdett" (4 B. and Ald., 95), but he submitted that that case was not really applicable to the facts of this case. "Emmens v. Pottle" (16 Q.B.D., 354) and "Reg. v. Munslow" [(1895] 1 Q.B., 765) showed that an accidental publication was no publication at all.

Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Compston, for the plaintiff, were not called upon to argue.

The COURT dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the plaintiff was a game and poultry salesman who carried on business, or at any rate had an office, at his own house. He complained of a letter which had been written to him by the defendant and addressed to him at his house, and which had been opened and read by some one in his employment, as being a libel. The plaintiff stated in his evidence that he carried on the greater part of his business in the market, and that his foreman was in the habit of opening his letters and reading them and bringing them to him in the market. The jury, in answer to questions put to them, found that the plaintiff's business was such that to the defendant's knowledge letters addressed to the plaintiff and received in the ordinary course of business would be likely to be opened by persons in the plaintiff's employment. In the face of that finding how could it be said that this was an accidental publication? He did not trench on the cases in which it had been held that an accidental publication was not a publication at all. On the finding of the jury he was clearly of opinion that there had been a publication of this libel. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

MANSFIELD CORPORATION v. BUTTERWORTH.*

Local Government—Streets—"Proposed works" —Insufficiency or unreasonableness—Private Streets Works Act, 1892, sec. 7—Construction —Jurisdiction of justices.

This was a special case stated by the justices of the Mansfield Division of Nottingham, before whom certain objections made under section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, by the respondent to certain proposals of the appellants with reference to a street called Quarry-lane were heard. The appellants, in whose borough that Act is in force, resolved, in pursuance of the Act, to execute certain works of paving, &c., in part of Quarry-lane, a street in their borough, and specifications of the proposed works, with plans and sections, an estimate of the expenses, and a provisional apportionment, were duly prepared and approved by the appellants. The provisional apportionment included a piece of land belonging to the trustees of a charity called "Bellamy's Charity," having a frontage of about 200 yards on Quarry-lane, and hereafter referred to as the respondent's land. The respondent duly objected to the proposals of the appellants on the grounds specified in section 7 (d) of the Act—namely, "that the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable, or that the estimated expenses are excessive." The proposed works were intended to be done over a part of Quarry-lane, about 677 yards in length. For several years past there has been a considerable traffic, both vehicular and foot traffic, over and along such part of the street, and such traffic has increased during the past 12 months, and is increasing, in consequence of the erection (which is still in progress) of a street of houses on land abutting on and adjoining Quarry-lane, but at a further distance from Mansfield than the respondent's land. Vehicular traffic between the new street of houses and Mansfield passes through Quarry-lane and over the portion thereof on which it was proposed to execute the works above referred to. There is no made roadway or footpath, and no foundation to the road, which is uneven, with very deep ruts, but there is a footpath irregularly demarcated with rough stones. There are no sewers to carry off the sewage of the houses erected and in course of erection in the said new street, or of the houses adjoining Quarry-lane, and there is no provision for lighting it. In wet weather Quarry-lane is almost impassable, and it is frequently in a foundering condition and dangerous to persons using it, either by night or by day, with horses and carts, or on foot. The average width of Quarry-lane throughout the 677 yards is about 16ft., and for several yards opposite the respondent's land the width is about 12ft. (inclusive of the rough footway referred to, which is 3ft. in width). At other points in the street where the respondent's land does not adjoin Quarry-lane its width is from 14ft. 6in. to 16ft. It was admitted that the estimated expenses stated in the provisional apportionment were not excessive. In support of the respondent's objection it was contended that, inasmuch as it was not part of the plan of the appellants' proposed works that Quarry-lane should be widened opposite any part of the respondent's land, but that the works should be executed whilst retaining Quarry-lane at its present width, the proposed works would be insufficient and unreasonable, having regard to the requirements of vehicular traffic as existing at the present time as well as the probable requirements of such traffic in future, and that the insufficiency and unreasonableness meant by the statute had reference to the probable requirements of future vehicular traffic as well as, in addition to, the requirements of present vehicular traffic. For the appellants it was contended that the justices could not find that the proposed works were insufficient and unreasonable within the meaning of section 7 of the Act on the ground only that they considered that the street ought to be widened before any works were done, and that the insufficiency and unreasonableness meant by the statute must be in respect of the nature and character of the proposed works, having regard to the present condition of the street and the traffic over it. The

*Reported by A. F. JENKIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Justices were of opinion that the proposed works were insufficient and unreasonable on the ground that the existing width of the highway (that is to say, 9ft. roadway and 3ft. footway) at the point before mentioned was insufficient for a highway, and that such works or any part thereof ought not to be done unless and until the street was made wider, and they therefore, having visited and viewed Quarry-lane at such point, ordered and adjudged that the works were insufficient and unreasonable on the ground that such proposed works involved the retention of the present width of the street without enlargement. The question for the Court was whether the justices could find on the grounds above stated that the proposed works were insufficient and unreasonable within the meaning of section 7 (d) of the Act.

Mr. Appleton appeared for the appellants; and Mr. John Chester for the respondent.

The Court allowed the appeal.

Mr. Justice WILLS said the question arising was one of some difficulty; but he had come to a tolerably clear conclusion, notwithstanding the apparent difficulty of the language of the Act. The Act provided that where a street was not in a state satisfactory to the local authority, they might resolve that certain works should be done, comprehending such works as had been ordered in the present case. After that the surveyor was to prepare plans and specifications, &c., and then the local authority were to pass a resolution approving the plans, &c., prepared by the surveyor with or without modification. Then, after that, opportunity was to be given to the persons affected by the proposals to object, and the objections were to be heard before a Court of summary jurisdiction. The objections that could be made were specified in section 7. Certain of the objections—two of them beyond all doubt—went to the root of the whole scheme, because, if they were valid in fact, they went to establish a state of things in which the local authority had no jurisdiction to pass the resolutions. That was much as it was under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875. Under that section the local authority might pass resolutions, execute works, and apportion expenses. But if it turned out that the alleged street was not a street, the whole foundation of the proceedings failed, and the person proceeded against escaped. The Act of 1892 preserved objections of this class, and provided for objections of other kinds. Then the Act gave the justices power, where an objection succeeded, to quash "the resolution." Looking at the whole scheme of the legislation, and more particularly at the fact that under section 7 there was a large class of objections relating to the plans and matters of that kind, he thought it impossible to doubt that the jurisdiction of the magistrates was to quash the resolution approving the plans. That was just as effectual in the case of a place which was not a street as if the original resolution were quashed. In the present case the Court was specially concerned with the objection, under clause (d) of the section, "that the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable." At first sight that objection to proposed works might appear to be an objection of the same class as the objection that the place was not a street, going to the root of the whole scheme. But the language of the clause was capable of another construction—namely, as referring to the works as specified in the plans and sections. He thought this was the true construction of the clause; and that the Act was not intended to interfere with the jurisdiction of the local authority to adopt the scheme as a whole, in the sense of determining when the work was to be done, but merely to give the justices power to consider the sufficiency and reasonableness of the way in which the work was proposed to be done. The first ground of the objection was the insufficiency of the works. In his opinion the expression "insufficient" in the clause pointed exclusively to a comparison between the thing ordered to be done and the means of effecting it. It did not mean insufficient having regard to some matter which might make a better scheme for the neighbourhood in general. The other ground of the objection was the unreasonableness of the works. "Unreasonable" was a much wider word. It did give power to the justices to consider whether or not the thing proposed to be done was as a whole a reasonable thing to be done. That followed from "Sheffield Corporation v. Anderson" (64 L.J., M.C., 44), where it was held under a local Act similar to the Act of 1892 that the justices had power to say that under the circumstances a sewer was not required for a street. He thought there was no reason to quarrel with that construction of the Act. And if the magistrates had found in this case that the works ought not to be done at all, that is to say that the works were not required, and had held that the scheme was unreasonable on that ground they would have had jurisdiction to disapprove of it and quash the resolution approving the plans. But, upon a careful consideration of what was said in the special case, it was plain to his Lordship's mind that the magistrates had not decided anything of that kind. He thought the magistrates had thought it would be a very good thing to have the street made wider, and that they would put the screw on the corporation and get the street widened by withholding their approval of the scheme. It was clear from their deciding that the work was insufficient that they were thinking of the insufficiency of the general scheme for the good of the public; a matter they had no power to consider. And it appeared that they found that the work was unreasonable because they thought that the corporation ought to add to their scheme a widening of the street. He thought the magistrates had applied the wrong principle in dealing with the case, and that there was no ground to suppose that, if they had applied the right principle, they would not have dismissed the objection. The magistrates' order must therefore be quashed and the appeal allowed.

Mr. Justice KENNEDY delivered judgment to the like effect.

RE AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE LLANWONNO SCHOOL BOARD AND THE YSTRADYFODWG SCHOOL BOARD.*

Local Government—Transfer from one parish to another—Adjustment of property and liabilities—Transfer of schools—Cost of building—Arbitration—Local Government Act, 1894, sec. 68.

This was a special case stated by an arbitrator pursuant to section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, in an arbitration between these School Boards under section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, with regard to the adjustment of the expenses of building such schools, and with regard to the compensation, if any, to be paid by the Ystradyfodwg School Board to the Llanwonno School Board in respect of the transfer of certain property—viz., the school and premises formerly belonging to the Llanwonno Board from the Llanwonno Board to the said Ystradyfodwg School Board.

Mr. B. Francis-Williams, Q.C., and Mr. S. T. Evans, M.P., appeared for the Llanwonno School Board; Hon. A. Lyttelton (Mr. Cripps, Q.C., with him) for the Ystradyfodwg School Board.

By an order of the county council of Glamorgan made on June 14, 1894, confirmed, with certain modifications, by a confirming order of the Local Government Board made on November 21, 1894, a part of the parish of Llanwonno was transferred to the parish of Ystradyfodwg. In that part there were certain schools called Porth Schools, which up to that time had been vested in the Llanwonno School Board, and by virtue of that order became vested in the other School Board. In 1888 and the subsequent years the school had been increased. The costs of this work had been paid out of revenue, with the aid of an increased rate on the whole parish of Llanwonno, before the date of the order of transference. The claim by the Llanwonno School Board was for a proportionate part of the cost of the said additions and alterations. The question for the Court was whether there was anything for the arbitrator to consider. The Local Government Board order contained the following provisions:—

“II. From and after the day when any part of any existing parish ceases, in pursuance of the order, to be within the district of the School Board of such existing parish, the powers, duties, and liabilities of such School Board in respect of such part of the existing parish shall cease and determine, and all buildings, with their fittings, being the property of such School Board and situate within such part of the parish, shall be transferred to and shall vest in the School Board of the parish in which such part is included by the order, and all contracts, liabilities, and engagements attaching to or incurred by the School Board of the existing parish in respect of such buildings, or exclusively in respect of the said part of the existing parish, shall vest in and attach to and be enjoyed and discharged by the School Board of the parish to which the said part of the existing parish is transferred.”

By paragraph 13 of the order it was provided that any question “with regard to the interests” of the School Boards in the schools should be dealt with in an adjustment under section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894.

Mr. FRANCIS WILLIAMS contended that the arbitrators ought to allow the Llanwonno School Board something for their outlay on the school. If the money had been raised by a loan charged on the school it was admitted that payment must be made for it. The question was whether Clause 11 of the order gave the other School Board the buildings without paying for them. The contention for the other side was apparently this—there was no liability, therefore nothing to arbitrate on.

Mr. LYTTELTON said this was an administrative arrangement. If the money was to be paid, to whom could it be paid? The constituent bodies who had contributed towards the school were altered. It was not alleged that Llanwonno had incurred any expense by reason of the transfer. The fact that ten years ago the School Board had spent money on enlarging the school out of the income did not now give them a claim. There was nothing on which to arbitrate.

Mr. JUSTICE RIDLEY said the scheme was contained in paragraphs 11 and 13 of the order. But the order must not be read apart from the Act. If the words were read in the sense argued for on behalf of the authority of the district to which the school was now added that authority would get the school without making any payment for the increased size. The Local Government Board had power to make an order to that effect, if they chose, under section 59 (4) of the Local Government Act, 1888. But in this case he did not think they had done so, for in paragraph 13 it was contemplated that there was something to be adjusted—namely, the “interests” of the School Boards. It was enough to say in this case that there was something for the arbitrator to adjust. The learned Judge referred to the 68th section of the Local Government Act of 1894, and said that this matter came within the words of that section. He would not lay down any principle for the arbitrator, but it sufficed to say that there was something for him to adjust.

Mr. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. The ratepayers of the whole parish were joint owners of the school originally and joint debtors in respect of liabilities. When the boundaries were altered something had to be arranged as to who should take the buildings. The Act of Parliament provided in such a case for an adjustment. It might be made in the order or by agreement between the boards, or, thirdly, if it had not been done otherwise, by arbitration. The question here was, Had such adjustment been made in the order? If it had, nothing remained for the arbitrators to decide. If not, then there was a question for the arbitrators. Did the scheme here mean simply that the liabilities of having to keep up the school cast upon the School Board of Ystradyfodwg were to be set off against the possession of the building, or did it merely settle that of the two parties that parish was to have possession? It was not likely that the liabilities should balance equally with the benefits of possession. He did not think that the order was meant to adjust the interests. How could any question about the interests of the School Boards arise under section 13 if they had been already adjusted by section 11 of the order? There was therefore something for the arbitrator to deal with and the matter must go to him.

DAVIS V. WITNEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Purchase of lands—Notice by local authority to landowner under sec. 16 of Public Health Act, 1875—Appointment of arbitrators—Notice of abandonment of scheme by local authority—Public Health Act, 1875, sec. 308—Compensation.

This was an action on an award, certain questions of the defence and reply in which had been set down for argument, by an order made by a Master in Chambers under Order XXV., r. 2.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. (Mr. A. J. David with him), appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. F. Low appeared for the defendants.

The claim was for £269 11s. 10d., of which the particulars were as follows:—Damages for compensation under award, £10; arbitrators' fees, £38 11s.; plaintiff's solicitors' costs under clause 3 of award, £81 15s. 10d.; plaintiff's costs of witnesses and other disbursements under clause 3 of award, £139 5s.—total, £269 11s. 10d. It appeared that the Witney District Council on April 22, 1897, had given the plaintiff notice under section 16 of the Public Health Act that they proposed to make a sewer through certain lands of hers. They had, however, not carried out the proposal. On

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

September 30, 1897, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendants that she claimed £300 for compensation for injury and damage to be sustained by her by reason of the said intended construction and extension of a sewer through the said lands and that she required an arbitration; she also gave notice that she had appointed her arbitrator. On October 13, 1897, the defendants appointed their arbitrator. One meeting was held and then on November 27 the defendants rescinded all resolutions whereby the carrying of a sewer through the said lands of the plaintiff was, or purported to be, authorized. The defendants forthwith gave notice to the plaintiff of such rescission. The arbitrators made their award on December 8, 1897, directing the council to pay the plaintiff £10 in discharge of all her claims for damages or compensation and £39 11s. for the arbitrators' costs, and also to pay the costs of the plaintiff as between solicitor and client. The defendants alleged in their defence that the award was bad, for that, while purporting to be an award under the provision of the Public Health Act, 1875, as to arbitration, it purports to award to the plaintiff compensation in respect of matters which are not subjects of compensation under the said Act—viz., in respect of acts, matters, and things intended to be done but not in fact done by the defendants. The submission to arbitration left to the arbitrators the question of "the amount of the compensation due for the damage or injury the said E. Davis would sustain by the execution of certain works by the Urban District Council of Witney."

Mr. LAWRENCE said there were no authorities on the exact point raised. A notice to treat for land was equivalent to an agreement to purchase an easement. The Crown could give a notice to take lands and might withdraw it, but the Crown alone could do so. See "Steele v. Mayor of Liverpool" (14 W.R., 311). Notice under section 16 and section 32 was not quite the same as a notice to treat, but if to give the notice was an essential exercise of the power, the power was exercised. The authority would have no power to give the notice unless they were clothed with it by the Act. The land was bound by the notice and the plaintiff could do nothing with the land so long as the notice remained. "Ex parte Edwards" (L.R., 12 Eq., 389). It would be bad policy to allow people after receiving such notice to alter the position of the land.

Mr. Low said the point was whether section 308 of the Public Health Act referred to the exercise of the power in the construction of the sewer. The question referred to the arbitrators was what damages would be effected by the construction of the sewer. The authority had offered to pay the plaintiff's costs when they rescinded their resolution. This sort of notice was not a notice to treat. If it had been intended to make it so it would have been quite easy to say so. In section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, certain provisions of the Land Clause Act were incorporated but not those as to notice to treat. The action could not be supported. The submission referred the question of damages caused by the execution of the works, nothing else.

In the result,

The COURT disagreed.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY thought that the submission did not contain anything more than a reference of the damage or injury which would be caused by the execution of the works. That did not include damage caused by land being tied up by a notice. The assessment of damage could be made before the injury was incurred, though the person could not recover the amount assessed till the injury had been sustained. Here no damage had been incurred by execution of works. After the first meeting of the arbitrators notice was given that the works would not be executed. The arbitrators were wrong in awarding the £10 for a matter which was not referred to them. As to the competence of the arbitrators to deal with the costs, it seemed to him that they had in law no such power, and therefore, in his view, there must be judgment for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL differed upon the question whether the arbitrators had power to deal with the costs. He thought they had. They were properly appointed and the arbitration properly begun. He did not think that under the circumstances he would have given costs as between solicitor and client, but as they had, in his view, jurisdiction, the Court could not interfere. However, as he was the junior Judge his judgment would be withdrawn.

WRIGHT V. LONG.*

Undue Influence—Confidential adviser—Sale to —Fiduciary relation—Assignment set aside.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, reported in The Times of February 5. The real object of the action was to set aside an indenture dated February 27, 1896, purporting to be an assignment by the plaintiff to the defendant of certain leasehold premises in Wardour-street. The plaintiff was a dealer in antique furniture carrying on business at 142 and 144, Wardour-street. In 1895, being in financial difficulties, he applied to the defendant, who was a friend of his, for assistance, and in June, 1895, the defendant advanced him two sums of £120 upon the security of two bills of exchange and of a deposit of the lease of the plaintiff's business premises. On January 4, 1896, after the defendant had commenced an action to enforce one of the bills, the plaintiff signed the following document, which was addressed to the defendant:—

" 'Long v. Wright.'"

"Dear Sir,—Without prejudice to your rights and in consideration of your staying proceedings in this action, I hereby sell and deliver possession to you of all my goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects now in or upon the shop and upstairs and warehouses and premises at 142 and 144, Wardour-street, W., and also all those that I have an interest in at the same premises jointly with Mr. Evelyn Wright, at the price of one hundred and twenty-four pounds fifteen shillings and sixpence, the amount of debt and costs in that action. If the goods be not delivered over to you, you are to be at liberty to at once proceed with the action."

"Yours truly,

"FREDERICK WRIGHT."

The value of the goods was stated to be over £3,000. The plaintiff, who was a man of intemperate habits, alleged that he was completely intoxicated at the time when he signed this document, and that on subsequently inquiring what it meant the defendant informed him that the signing of the document was merely a matter of form and that he, the defendant, was acting as a friend to the plaintiff and required the document to protect the plaintiff from a creditor of his (the plaintiff's) named Harris, a bill discounter. The defendant also, according to the plaintiff's account, advised him to stay away for a time from his business, which was being carried on at a loss, and offered to manage it for him in the meantime and to preserve the property from Harris. On his return to the business, in March, 1896, the plaintiff discovered that the defendant had removed a great part of the furniture to the sale-rooms of Messrs. Foster and Co., Pall-mall, where it had been sold for £433 4s. 7d., which was paid to the defendant. The defendant's account of the document of January 4 was that the plaintiff thoroughly understood that it was drawn up in his (the plaintiff's) interest and that the goods therein mentioned were to be sent to Messrs. Foster's sale-room to be sold by auction to meet his most pressing creditors, but that this arrangement fell through because the plaintiff had selected goods of insufficient value; and the defendant further alleged that he had never made any claim to the goods under this document. On February 18, 1896, the plaintiff signed a document under which the defendant had an option to purchase the lease of the Wardour-street premises for £700, and on February 27 the plaintiff signed a further document purporting to be an absolute assignment of the premises for that sum. The value of the lease was stated to be about £2,000. The plaintiff alleged that he was again intoxicated when he signed these documents, and that he executed the assignment on the faith of the representation by the defendant that the price of £700 was fixed for the purpose of being shown to Harris, and that on March 28, when the accounts between the plaintiff and defendant were to be finally settled, the defendant would pay him £1,800 for the lease. However, when the settling day came, the defendant refused to make any further payment. Thereupon the plaintiff commenced these proceedings to set aside the transaction. In his statement of claim the plaintiff rested his case mainly on the ground that on each occasion the defendant had plied him with liquor until he became so intoxicated that he was unfit to transact business; but he further alleged that he had acted throughout in reliance entirely on the advice of the defendant and without any independent advice and was completely under the influence and control of the defendant, who took an unfair advantage of his position. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes held that the plaintiff had failed to make out his case and dismissed the action with costs. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Candy, Q.C., and Mr. Christopher James were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Ashton Cross for the defendant.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS thought that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on his alternative case—viz., that the defendant occupied such a position towards the plaintiff that he ought not to take any unfair advantage of him. It was not a case in which the maxim caveat emptor applied, but it was a dealing by one person with another who was more or less in his power. The plaintiff had grossly exaggerated his case, and his Lordship did not propose to differ from the view taken by the learned Judge of the credibility of the witnesses. But, looking at all the facts, and especially at the correspondence, it appeared that the plaintiff was a person who was as often drunk as sober, a person who was muddled with drink and who required protection, and that the parties were not dealing with each other as business men, but that the defendant had been acting towards the plaintiff as a friend and had been helping him out of his difficulties. It was obvious that the plaintiff was in want of money, and he signed documents which purported to give the defendant absolute control over his goods by making it appear that they had been sold to him. Those documents were not intended to be operative according to their tenor and were only important as showing the extent to which the plaintiff trusted the defendant. They were documents which a man would be a fool to sign unless he trusted completely to his friend's honour. The plaintiff's case was that the assignment of the lease was also a paper transaction as between him and the defendant. Having regard to the relations existing between the parties, and to the fact that this assignment was at a very large undervalue, his Lordship thought that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed, although he succeeded less by the strength of his own case than by the weakness of the defendant's. The appeal would therefore be allowed and the assignment set aside.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred. In his opinion it was sufficient to determine this case in the plaintiff's favour that the defendant had taken upon himself the office of adviser and manager of the plaintiff's affairs and had entered into this bargain without the plaintiff having any independent advice. The defendant stood in such a position towards the plaintiff that the onus of upholding the transaction was upon him.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS also concurred. He thought that the learned Judge had gone wrong from treating this case from the common law point of view without reference to the fiduciary relation existing between the parties, and had decided it on the question whether the drunkenness of the plaintiff was such as to incapacitate him from understanding the nature of the transaction. But in the opinion of the Lord Justice the drunkenness was important to the issue only as emphasizing and confirming the view that the defendant had taken upon himself the relation of friend and adviser to the plaintiff.

GEORGE V. GOLDSMITHS', &C., INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.*
Insurance—Policy against burglary and house-breaking—Loss, whether within policy—Construction.

This case arose out of a dispute as to whether the Goldsmiths' and General Burglary Association were liable to Mr. George, under a policy of insurance against burglary and house-breaking, in respect of a loss sustained by him in the circumstances stated below. The dispute was referred to the arbitration of Mr. Justice Channell while he was at the Bar, and now came before the Court on his award, which was stated in the form of a special case. The facts were shortly as follows:—At all material times Mr. George carried on business as a jeweller in London at a shop at the corner of the Strand and Salisbury-street. In 1891 he insured the goods at his shop with the Goldsmiths' Association against burglary and house-breaking. The policy recited that Mr. George desired to effect an insurance against loss by burglary or house-breaking as thereafter defined, and, in its operative part, insured him against loss "by theft following upon actual forcible and violent entry upon the premises." The loss in respect of which the proceedings arose occurred at about half-past 8 of the morning of March 12, 1897. On that morning Mr. George's porter left the door of the shop unlocked, though closed, while he took down the shop shutters, and while he removed the shutters to the place where they were kept. While he was momentarily absent putting away the shutters some person or persons entered the shop by opening the door, wrenched a padlock off an inner door of the shop front, and stole jewelry from the shop front to the value of upwards of £800. The present proceedings were taken to recover from the Goldsmiths' Association the value of the jewelry so stolen.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. A. T. LAWRENCE, Q.C., appeared for Mr. George, who was in the position of plaintiff. They argued that the policy was essentially a policy of insurance against burglary and house-breaking, and that the words in the policy referring to a forcible and violent entry must be understood as referring to an entry involving a forcible breaking into the premises in the technical sense in which a breaking has to be forcible in order to constitute house-breaking or burglary, and not to an entry violent in the popular sense; and they referred to Hale's "Pleas of the Crown," p. 551; "Foster's Crown Cases," p. 108; "Russell on Crimes" (sixth edition), vol. 2, pp. 6, 7.

Mr. BUCKNILL, Q.C., and Mr. ATTENBOROUGH appeared for the Goldsmiths' Association, and argued that, though the persons who stole the goods might have been guilty of house-breaking in the technical sense, that did not bring the loss within the policy, since there had been no violence in the ordinary sense used in entering the premises. They referred to "Stanley v. Western Insurance Company" (L.R., 3 Ex., 71), "Rex v. Paine" (7 C. and P., 13).

The COURT gave judgment in favour of Mr. George.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the case was by no means an easy case. He had, however, come to the conclusion that the association were liable on the policy. The policy was, broadly speaking, a policy against burglary and house-breaking. It contained a recital that the assured was desirous of being insured "against loss by burglary or house-breaking as hereinafter defined." It would be convenient to start a consideration of the meaning of the definition in the policy by stating what would have been an appropriate definition of burglary or house-breaking if those expressions had been left to their natural meaning. The proper description of burglary or house-breaking—disregarding the distinction between them, which merely depended on the hour at which the offence was committed—was feloniously breaking and entering a building or house, or whatever it might be, for the purpose of committing a felony. The policy dropped all allusion to breaking as a term by itself, though breaking was an absolutely essential part of the offence; and substituted for breaking and entering, "actual forcible and violent entry," and it also substituted a reference to theft following upon such an entry for a reference to entry for the purpose of committing a felony. Some qualifications of the ordinary definition were, no doubt, meant by the use of these substituted expressions. The first alteration was the substitution for breaking and entering, which might be constructive, of "actual" forcible and violent entry. That got rid of constructive breaking. But did it mean anything different from actual breaking and entering? The word "forcible" added nothing; for the conception of a forcible entry must enter into any definition of burglary or house-breaking. In old indictments the entry was always stated to have been made with force and arms. Therefore, if the definition in the policy had been forcible entry followed by theft, it would have been very much like the ordinary definition of burglary or house-breaking except that "followed by theft" would be substituted for "with intent to commit a felony." Did the use of the word "violent" make any difference? His Lordship did not think it did. Etymologically the word meant vi, by force; and in dictionaries the first synonym to be found for violent was by force or forcible. There were, moreover, cases which the policy must obviously have been intended to cover, in which, nevertheless, the force used would be so trivial that they would be excluded from the policy, if the word violent were read in its popular sense. Take the case of a dwelling-house entered by pushing aside a catch and lifting a window, which might be effected without anything approaching the popular conception of violence. Could it be supposed that the policy would not apply to such a case as that? Another instance would be the opening of premises by means of a skeleton key which would take no more force than opening a door in the ordinary way. Such illustrations were valuable as showing that violent could not be read in its popular sense. He thought the policy contained a somewhat inartificial description of burglary or house-breaking with some qualifications; and that the qualifications he had pointed out were sufficient to explain why the parties to the policy had inserted this definition instead of leaving the words burglary and house-breaking to take care of themselves. He desired to add that he must not be taken as having implied that an ordinary case of shoplifting would come within the policy, even if the thief himself opened the door. That would have to be considered when the case arose. There was clearly a substantial distinction, though it was difficult to express it in words, between a case of shoplifting and what took place in this case.

THE MAYOR OF BURY ST. EDMUNDS V. WEST SUFFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Local Government — Bridges — Expenses of — Quarter-sessions borough — Liability — Local Government Act, 1888, sec. 35.

This was a special case raising a question as to the liability of a quarter-sessions borough with a population of over 10,000 to contribute towards the costs of county bridges which had become county bridges since the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888.

Mr. William Graham appeared for the Borough of Bury St. Edmunds; Mr. Wills for the West Suffolk County Council.

The matter came before the Court on an order that a special case in the terms of the endorsement on the writ of summons in the action brought by the Corporation of Bury St. Edmunds should be stated for the decision of the Court. The writ, so far as is material, was endorsed thus:—"The plaintiff's claim is for a declaration that the plaintiffs are not liable to contribute rateably to the cost of erecting, maintaining, or repairing new county bridges." From the case it appeared that Bury St. Edmunds is a quarter-sessions borough with a separate commission of the peace and a population, according to the census of 1881, of 10,000 and upwards. There are bridges in the borough which it is bound to maintain. At the date of the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, there were certain bridges in the county of West Suffolk which the defendants, the West Suffolk County Council, were legally bound to repair—namely, certain county bridges towards the repairs of which the plaintiffs have not been called on to contribute. Since the passing of the Act of 1888 certain other bridges in West Suffolk have become county bridges. Of these Glemsford Fernhill bridge was erected by that parish, and was taken over as a county bridge by the defendants under section 22 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878. All the other new bridges except one were purchased, taken over, or erected by the defendants under the powers conferred upon them by section 6 of the Local Government Act, 1888. There are practically no main roads in the county of West Suffolk, and what few there are do not cross any of the bridges above referred to. The sums paid by the defendants in respect of these bridges have been charged by the defendants in their county accounts as general expenses; and the plaintiffs have been assessed, according to their county rate basis, and have thereby contributed £137 13s. as their rateable proportion of the £1,570 4s. 4d. expended. The plaintiffs contend that the payments should have been charged to special and not to general expenses, so that they might be exempted from contributing. The following sections of (51 and 52 Vic., c. 41) the Local Government Act, 1888, are material:—Section 6.—“The county council shall have power to purchase or take over on terms to be agreed on existing bridges not being at present county bridges, and to erect new bridges and to maintain, repair, and improve any bridges so purchased, taken over, or erected.” Section 35.—“In the case of a quarter-sessions borough . . . containing . . . a population of 10,000 or upwards the following provisions shall . . . apply. (2) Where such borough is at the passing of this Act exempt in whole or in part from contributing towards costs incurred for any purpose for which the quarter sessions of the county in which the borough is situate are authorized to incur costs the parishes in the borough shall not, save as in this Act expressly mentioned, be assessed by the county council to county contributions in respect of costs incurred for any such purpose.”

Mr. GRAHAM said the question was as to the liability to contribute by a quarter-sessions borough with a population of over 10,000 persons to bridges made county bridges recently. This was a claim mainly for a declaration that they were not liable, but also to recover from the county council the money paid in respect of these bridges. But he had to admit, on the authority of the case “Thetford v. Norfolk County Council” ([1898] 1 Q. B., 141), that he could not claim in respect of any payment made over six months ago. As to special and general expenses, section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1888, defined them; any expense not levied over all the county was a special expense. Under section 6 of the Local Government Act, 1888, the county council might take over bridges. He admitted that, in respect of any county bridge existing as a county bridge when the Act came into force, the borough had not been charged. The principle that the county repaired county bridges and boroughs repaired borough bridges was the old law. It was preserved by section 35 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1888, and it applied as well to bridges made county bridges since the Act as to old county bridges.

Mr. WILLS contended that the contributions had been rightly enforced. There were three classes of boroughs—(1) a county borough, which had to repair all bridges within the ambit of the borough; (2) the smaller quarter-sessions boroughs, in which all the bridges were county bridges; (3) the intermediate quarter-sessions boroughs with a population of over 10,000. For any bridge that became a county bridge after the Act of 1888 the boroughs of the third class ought to contribute. Such boroughs were liable to be rated for this purpose as part of the county unless they brought themselves within the exemption of section 35 (2). Erecting or taking over these new county bridges was not a purpose for which the quarter-sessions could have incurred costs. The power was entirely new. This borough was well represented on the county council, therefore no injustice would be inflicted.

Mr. GRAHAM referred to section 35 (6) as showing that if his contention was right the borough members could not vote on the question of county bridges.

Mr. WILLS said that this was a circular argument, and did not carry the matter further.

The COURT decided in favour of the borough.

Mr. JUSTICE RIDLEY said the matter was clear. The question arose on the construction of section 35 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vic., c. 41). The policy of the Act was that a borough of this description should keep up its own bridges at its own expense, and where it was not liable before should continue not to be liable to be rated for the county bridges. Now, the maintaining and repairing of county bridges had always been a purpose for which the county quarter sessions could incur expense. Boroughs of this sort were therefore prima facie exempt. As a consideration for allowing them to continue exempt it was provided that they were to maintain their own bridges. The learned Judge referred to section 119 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. The object of the legislation in section 35 of the Local Government Act was to divide the liabilities according to the purpose for which the expense was incurred. The purpose here was one for which the quarter sessions might have incurred costs. Under section 22 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act the county authority was authorized to contribute half the cost of erecting a new bridge. That was only half. It was true that section 6 of the Local Government Act of 1888 allowed the county council to erect bridges wholly at their own expense. That, however, did not prevent one from saying that this was a purpose for which the quarter sessions were authorized to incur costs, and therefore that these boroughs were exempt from contributing to such purpose.

Mr. JUSTICE CHANNELL delivered a judgment to the like effect. The whole matter turned on the word “purpose” in section 35 (2) of the Act of 1888. It was a very general word and must be so interpreted. His Lordship then read the section. The policy of the Act was to leave the boroughs exempt when they were exempt before. Speaking generally, when the boroughs had to pay for their own bridges they did not pay for the county bridges. The provisions of section 6 of the Act of 1888 merely gave an enlarged power to the county council of incurring costs in respect of a purpose for which the quarter sessions had power to incur costs. The plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration sought. As to the claim for the return of the money, it did not appear that any of the payments had been made within six months. They could not, therefore, be recovered.

RE AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE GUARDIANS OF THE ROCHDALE UNION AND THE GUARDIANS OF THE HASLINGDEN UNION.*

Local Government—Transfer of an area to different union—Adjustment of property and liabilities—Local Government Act, 1894, sec. 68.

This was a special case stated in pursuance of section 7 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the question at issue was as to whether any adjustment was rendered necessary by reason of the transfer of an area in one union to another union.

Mr. D. Brynmor Jones, Q.C., and Mr. A. Glen appeared for the Rochdale Union, which desired that there should be an arbitration and an adjustment in respect of the financial relations between the unions altered by the transfer of a valuable area; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., appeared for the Haslingden Union.

The facts were as follows. The township of Spotland was one of the townships comprised in the Rochdale Union on the formation of that union on January 21, 1837, and the township of Newchurch was one of the townships comprised in the Haslingden Union on the formation of that union on December 20, 1836. By an order of the county council of the county of Lancaster dated June 28, 1894, a certain portion of the said township of Spotland, being the portion included in the borough of Bacup, was, in pursuance of the Local Government Act, 1888, and the Local Government Act, 1894, as from December 28, 1894, amalgamated with a certain portion of the said township of Newchurch, which formed the remainder of the said borough of Bacup, so as to form one township or parish for Poor Law purposes coincident in area with such borough by the name of the township of Bacup. By an order of the joint committee duly appointed by the said county council and the councils of the county boroughs of Bury, Manchester, Oldham, and Rochdale, dated June 28, 1894, the portion of the new township of Bacup, which formerly formed part of the township of Spotland, was, in pursuance of the said Acts as from December 28, 1894, detached from the Rochdale Union, and the whole of the township of Bacup was included in and became part of Haslingden Union, and it was provided that section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, should apply for the purposes of any adjustment which might be required in consequence of the provisions of such order, subject to the proviso that the arbitrator in any adjustment between the Haslingden and Rochdale Unions should have regard to the large amount of workhouse accommodation then provided by the Rochdale Union and to all other special circumstances of such last-mentioned union. The said two several orders "A" and "B" were duly confirmed by the Local Government Board by two confirming orders, each dated November 21, 1894, which came into operation on December 28, 1894. The guardians of the Rochdale Union gave notice that by reason of the detachment of the part of the township of Bacup from their union a serious loss had been occasioned to them, and they demanded an adjustment by arbitration. At the arbitration the Rochdale guardians contended that the following matters ought to be taken into consideration in making the adjustment—namely, (a) The amount of the outstanding loans charged upon the common fund of the Rochdale Union; (b) the exceptional number of paupers requiring relief in the Rochdale Union by reason of (1) the density of population, (2) the situation of the town of Rochdale; (c) the comparative absence of pauperism from the said transferred portion of the township of Spotland; (d) the large amount of workhouse accommodation provided by the Rochdale Union; (e) the unsuitability and unfitness of a great part of the Rochdale Workhouse for the purposes for which it was provided; (f) the loss of all contribution from the said transferred portion of the township of Spotland towards the expenses of the guardians of the Rochdale Union; (g) the increase in the rates leviable in the remainder of the Rochdale Union by reason of such transfer. On behalf of the guardians of the Haslingden Union it was contended that none of the said matters were matters in respect of which the arbitrator had power to award an adjustment as between the guardians of the Haslingden Union and the guardians of the Rochdale Union. The arbitrator was of an opinion that none of the said matters relied upon on behalf of the Rochdale guardians were matters for adjustment between the said parties under the said Acts, and he accordingly declined to receive any evidence on the part of the Rochdale guardians in relation thereto, and awarded and determined that no adjustment was required for the purposes of the above-mentioned acts and orders between the said parties, and that each party should pay their own costs of this arbitration.

Mr. BRYNMOR JONES said this was a question between two adjacent unions. The matter in dispute was whether there could be any claim in consequence of part of the area of Rochdale Union being transferred. Bacup had extended into two unions. The county council had taken away a bit from one of them so as to round off the boundary. The workhouse remains in Rochdale. The orders doing this were made under the Local Government Acts, 1888 and 1894. He contended that there should be an adjustment. There was a loan charged on the common fund. Since the transfer the precept for raising money to pay it was only directed to the overseer of that part of Spotland which was in the union. On the other side it was said it could not be imposed on the Haslingden Union; also that it was not a matter for adjustment between the parties before the Court. He contended also that rates were "income." A considerable part of the paying area had been transferred.

Mr. RUSSELL, for the Haslingden Union, said the cardinal question to consider was whether the right parties were before the arbitrator. The Rochdale Union said there was a matter requiring adjustment, but it had never been held that loss of rates was such a matter, and the subject-matters mentioned in the section 64 of the Act of 1894 were exhaustive. The case depended on the following provisions:—Section 68 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 73)—"When any adjustment is required for the purpose of this Act, or of any order . . . under this Act, then if the adjustment is not otherwise made the authorities interested may make agreements for the purpose, and may thereby adjust any property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses so far as affected by this Act, or such scheme, order, or thing of the parties to the agreement." (2) "The agreement may provide for the transfer or retention of any property, debts, or liabilities with or without any conditions for the joint use of any property and for payment by either party to the agreement in respect of property, debts, and liabilities so transferred or retained, or of such joint use." (3) "In default of an agreement, and as far as any such agreement does not extend, such adjustment shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the Arbitration Act, 1889, . . . and his (the arbitrator's) award may provide for any matter for which an agreement might have provided." (4) "Any sum required to be paid by any authority for the purpose of adjustment may be paid as part of the general expenses of exercising their duties under the Act, . . . and if it is a capital sum the payment thereof shall be a purpose for which the authority may borrow under the Acts relating to such authority."

Mr. MACMORRAN, on the same side, dealing with the question whether the transfer of rateable value was a case of adjustment, contended that adjustment did not mean compensation. The income dealt with in the sections could not include the rates. It meant income derived from property. If adjustment meant compensation it might be unjust in a very few years.

The Court held that an adjustment was necessary. It was not necessary to go into details to assist the arbitrator as to methods of adjustment; but it might be laid down that clearly the loan required adjustment, also the workhouse, which was property. Equally would it require adjustment if it was nothing but a burden. As to the headings b, c, f, and g in the Rochdale claim, they, if they stood alone, would probably not require adjustment. But they might be taken into consideration when adjusting the other matters.

BROGGI V. ROBINS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Weekly tenancy—Defective condition of premises—Neglect to repair—Personal injuries—Liability of landlord.

This was an action for personal injuries due, as alleged, to the defendants' negligence. The defence denied liability.

Mr. ABINGER, in opening the case, said that the plaintiff, Dina Broggi, was the infant child of Davide Broggi. In 1895 Davide Broggi took two rooms at 33, Dean-street, Soho, from the defendants, Messrs. Robins, Snell, and Gore, on a weekly tenancy at 8s. 6d. per week. The defendants agreed to do all necessary repairs. In September, 1896, a part of the fireplace fell on one of Broggi's children and injured his leg. After that Broggi called the attention of defendants' collector to the condition of the floor and asked to have it repaired. It was not repaired, and on February 13, 1897, the plaintiff, a child of five years old, was sitting in a chair in front of the fire when a plank of the floor gave way and she was thrown into the fire. The child upset in her fall a saucepan of boiling soup, by which she was scalded and disfigured for life.

There was a conflict of evidence as to the agreement to repair and also as to the alleged request to repair the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL HALL, for the defence, contended that there was no contract to repair, and also that defendants had no notice that the floor was in need of repair. Further, there was no contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, and no duty on the part of the defendants to the plaintiff. ("Lane v. Cox" [1897], 1 Q.B., 415.)

Mr. ABINGER, in reply.—The cause of action arises ex delicto, not ex contractu. Where a person is under an obligation which he fails to fulfil, any one injured by that failure can sue. ("Heaven v. Pender," 11 Q.B.D., 503.) The landlords must have contemplated that the room would be used by the tenant's children, and that brings the case within "Miller v. Hancock" ([1893] 2 Q.B., 177). In "Lane v. Cox" there were no covenants, either express or implied, to repair.

Mr. JUSTICE DAY said that, in his opinion, the action was maintainable. Even if there was no express agreement to repair, the tenants, having regard to the usual practice in houses of that class, had a right to expect reasonable repairs to be done. The previous accident showed that the place was in a miserable condition. Credible evidence was given that the collector's attention had been called to the fact that the floor needed repair. Upon the grounds that there was a usage to do necessary repairs and that those repairs had been neglected after due notice the defendants must be held liable.

Judgment for the plaintiff for £100. Stay pending appeal. Costs to abide the event of the appeal.

ATTENBOROUGH V. JAY.*

Trade Name—Similarity of name of trader—Injunction refused.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 365), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Mr. Justice North, reported ante, p. 365. The plaintiffs were six persons named Attenborough, who were all stated to have some relationship with one Robert Attenborough, who came to London about a century ago and established a pawnbroking business. The plaintiffs have among them nine establishments in London, where they severally carry on the businesses of silversmiths, jewellers, and pawnbrokers. They are not connected in business, except that they severally trade under names the principal feature of which is Attenborough. It was stated that except the establishments of the defendants, and one business carried on under a style containing the phrase "late Attenborough" and another carried on under a style containing the phrase "successor to Attenborough," there is no similar business carried on in London under a style of which the name "Attenborough" is part. The defendants have two shops, Nos. 142 and 144, Oxford-street, communicating with one another. No. 144 is apparently a silversmith's shop, with the word "Jay's" on the fascia. No. 142 has, and for many years has had, the name "Attenborough" on the fascia. Adam and Eve-court is by the side of the premises, and up the court are two entrances to the premises, one admitting to an ordinary pawnshop, where pledges for sums not exceeding £10, and therefore within the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, are taken; the other entrance admits to an office, where pledges of larger amount, outside the Act, are taken. This latter business is known as contract business in the trade. The door of the contract office has for years borne the name Attenborough, but over the pawnbroking door, in accordance with statute, the name of the actual licensee, till recently "James Jay," has been placed. Some 40 years ago one Richard Attenborough established a business of silversmith, jeweller, and pawnbroker at what is now 142, Oxford-street. He died in the latter part of 1886. In April, 1887, the late James Jay bought at auction the remainder of the lease of the premises, which had been put up for sale by the executors of Richard Attenborough, and, under options given to the purchaser of the lease as a condition of the sale, James Jay also bought the pledge contracts of the testator and the stock-in-trade on the premises. He carried on a business similar to the business of Richard Attenborough down to his own death in 1896, with the addition that he took the adjoining shop, No. 144, in 1891. He bequeathed the benefit of his shops and business to five persons. These persons associated with themselves two other persons, intended to act as managers, and took steps to form themselves into a limited company under the name, as finally determined, of "Jay, Richard Attenborough, and Co. (Limited)." The plaintiffs brought this action against the seven signatories to the memorandum of association. They claimed, inter alia, an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding with registration of a company under the name "Jay, Richard Attenborough, and Co. (Limited)," or any other name of which "Attenborough" formed part. Mr. Justice North came to the conclusion that there was no ground for interfering by injunction.

Mr. HENRY TERRELL, Q.C., and Mr. W. M. CANN argued in support of the appeal.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Thomas Douglas appeared for the respondents.

Their LORDSHIPS, without calling upon the respondents' counsel to argue, affirmed the decision of Mr. Justice North and dismissed the appeal, with costs.

The MASTER of the RULES, in giving judgment, said that he was not surprised at the plaintiffs being annoyed at what was being done by the defendants. "Attenborough" was no doubt an extremely valuable name in connexion with the business of pawnbroking. His Lordship then reviewed the facts at great length and continued:—It is said that the goodwill of the business did not pass when James Jay bought from the executors of Richard Attenborough; but so far as the vendors were concerned he got what they had to dispose of. The defendants—namely, the persons who took under the will of Richard Attenborough and others—were carrying on the business that the testator had acquired by purchase. It was said that the defendants had no right to carry on the trade of pawnbroking under the name of Attenborough, and that if they did their business would be mistaken for that of the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs asked the Court to restrain by injunction. To establish their case the plaintiffs must prove that any business carried on under the style of Richard Attenborough would be mistaken for theirs. The plaintiffs, however, had failed entirely in proving that which was essential to success. The decision of Mr. Justice North was right, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY delivered judgment to the like effect.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

WHEELER V. FRADD.*

Practice — Costs — Taxation — Two counsel on appeal—Discretion of Taxing Master.

The Court refused to overrule the exercise of discretion by the Taxing Master (affirmed by the Judge at Chambers), who refused to allow the costs of two counsel on an appeal.

This was an appeal by the defendant from an order of Mr. Justice Darling at Chambers refusing to review the taxation of costs. The Taxing Master refused to allow the costs of more than one counsel upon an appeal. The action was brought to recover £1,000 paid to the defendant upon the terms of a letter in connexion with the promotion of a company. At the trial judgment was given for the defendant, and this judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (reported ante, p. 302). At the trial the plaintiff was represented by Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. J. Corner; and the defendant by Mr. Boxall. Upon the appeal Mr. Dickens, Q.C., appeared with Mr. Boxall for the defendant. Upon the taxation of costs the Master refused to allow the costs of Mr. Dickens, Q.C., giving as his reason for doing so that the case turned simply upon the construction of a letter, and that it was unnecessary to employ two counsel. The Judge refused to interfere with the Master's decision.

Mr. BOXALL, for the defendant, contended that two counsel ought to have been allowed. The question as to the number of counsel to be allowed on taxation was one with which the Court would always deal. The case was a very important one for the defendant, and he was entitled to have two counsel on the appeal, the plaintiff being represented by two counsel.

Mr. J. CORNER, for the plaintiff, said that at the trial the defendant was represented by only one counsel, and why should he have more than one counsel on the appeal? The Master and the Judge had exercised their discretion in the case, and this Court would not interfere.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that this was an attempt to appeal against two exercises of discretion—one by the Master and the other by the Judge at Chambers. The question was whether two counsel should be allowed on the appeal. He did not put his decision upon the ground upon which the Master put his decision—namely, that the case turned simply on the construction of a letter. He put his decision upon the ground that the Master and the Judge had both exercised their discretion in this case, and he could not say that they had exercised it wrongly, and therefore this Court could not interfere.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. If the Taxing Master and the Judge had acted upon some supposed rule, and were wrong in doing so, he would interfere. But this was a matter of mere discretion in the circumstances of this case.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed.

RUNDLE V. HEARLE.*

Highway—Repair—Liability ratione tenuræ— Footpath across field—Dedication.

There may, in law, be a dedication to the public of a footpath across a field without placing upon any one the obligation to repair it.

The occupier of the field occasionally doing repairs to the footpath for his own benefit does not necessarily show a liability to repair ratione tenuræ.

A footpath crossed a field in the occupation of the defendant, at one point in which there was a stone stile with stone steps. The plaintiff, in crossing the stile, fell and injured himself, owing to the stile having got out of repair. There was evidence that some of the defendant's predecessors had done small repairs to the path and stile.

Held, that this was not sufficient evidence of liability to repair ratione tenuræ, and that the defendant was not liable.

Quære, whether an action in respect of an injury caused by non-repair will lie against a person liable ratione tenuræ to repair.

The Lord Chief Justice delivered the judgment of the Court in this case this morning, allowing the appeal. The facts appear sufficiently in the judgment.

Mr. D. M. Kerly (Mr. Duke with him) was counsel for the appellant; and Mr. MacLeod was for the respondent.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE read the following judgment:—This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of his Honour Judge Granger. The plaintiff sued the defendant under these circumstances. The defendant is the yearly tenant of a farm through which is a public pathway. At one point in its course is a stone stile with stone steps, some of which have been worn away by time and user. In crossing it the plaintiff slipped from one of these steps, fell, and broke his leg. He thereupon sued the defendant for damages, alleging that he was liable ratione tenuræ to repair the stile and that he had suffered by its want of repair. The learned County Court Judge took this view and awarded him damages. It appears that the plaintiff was aged 67 years and that as far back as 1891 he had had a "seizure." He was described by his medical attendant, who was called by him, as being, when the accident happened, in a decrepit state, and as never having had the complete use of his legs since the "seizure." He added he did not think it was safe for him to cross the stile in question and that it was a difficult stile. The learned County Court Judge, however, who heard the witnesses, has not thought it proper to find contributory negligence, and we do not dwell further on this point, and we proceed to consider the ground on which he did act. If it were necessary to consider and determine the point whether an action will lie at the instance of a private person against one liable ratione tenuræ to repair we should desire to hear further argument upon it. There is, so far as we are aware, no record of any such case in the books, although the circumstances giving rise to such an action must have been of frequent occurrence. Baron Martin expressed considerable doubt upon the point in the case of "Young v. Davis" (7 H. and N. 760, at p. 773 [1862]). (His Lordship quoted the passage from the learned Baron's judgment.) We do not, however, decide this case on the view taken by this learned Judge, for we are of opinion that there was in this case no sufficient evidence to warrant the learned County Court Judge in coming to the conclusion that the defendant was under the obligation to repair ratione tenuræ. There was the usual conflict as to the past and existing state of the stile and what had been done to it in the way of repairs. One of the plaintiff's witnesses stated that the stile was at the time of the accident in the same state it was in 40 years ago, and the defendant and his witnesses denied that the defendant had in fact repaired the stile. We must, however, assume that the learned County Court Judge gave effect to the other evidence on the part of the plaintiff and proceed to examine it. There was no evidence that the parish had ever repaired or had ever required the defendant or any prior occupier to repair, but there was evidence that the defendant's predecessor in possession, who was, however, proved also to be the owner, had done repairs to the path and stile. Another witness stated that previous occupiers had repaired, and finally a man formerly in the defendant's employment stated that he had done some repairs. In no case do the repairs seem to have been considerable. The fact that a person has done repairs to a way may certainly be some evidence of such liability. For instance, in "Reg. v. Blake-more" (2 Denison's Cr. C., 410), where the defendant was so held liable, the evidence was that his predecessor had been convicted of not repairing the high road in question in the year 1801, and had subsequently done repairs to it; and in "Reg. v. Barker" (25 Q.B.D., 213) the defendant and his predecessors had repaired the high road, for the non-repair of which he was indicted, from time immemorial, and on that evidence was found liable. But in each of those cases the road was a road for carriages and horses, which is a widely different thing from a foot-path through fields and over stiles. The one requires repairs on a system, and at certain intervals, from the nature of the user, while the other does not; and on the contrary may never, except on isolated occasions, receive any repairs at all. Such a path may be dedicated subject to the right of ploughing ("Mercer v. Woodgate," L.R., 5 Q.B., 26), although the plough would for the time destroy all traces of the path, and after the plough has passed, the path is in common experience trodden out afresh by passers by, not made by repair or of hard material, for that would be inconsistent with the passage of the plough at the next season. So it may be that in dedicating to the public such a pathway through his fields the farmer may do so without any obligation to repair resting on himself or on anybody. It is a path on which people may pass if they choose to do so, but they must pass along it as they find it, and must take it (to use the words of Cockburn, C.J., in the case just quoted) subject to any condition which the owner imposes. Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the same case, said, "If this right is inconsistent with a grant of a right of way to the public, then there was no dedication at all, and the present owner has a right to step up the pathway altogether and so prevent the parish from repairing the path in such a way as to interfere with his ploughing." As the user for which the path is dedicated does not necessitate repairs, we see no objection in law to a dedication of the path without placing on any one the obligation to do them. In the present instance the evidence on which the learned County Court Judge has acted is very slight, considering that the path is an immemorial one, and is quite consistent with such small repairs as were done, that they were done by the occupier for his own benefit. They were done on his own land. It is not as if they had been done outside his own land, or as if he had done the repairs under threat of legal proceedings or had admitted that in doing them he was discharging a legal obligation. We think that the case is like "Hudson v. Tabor" (1 Q.B.D., 225; 2 Q.B.D., 290; 45 L.J., Q.B., 190; and 46 L.J., Q.B., 463). There an action was brought for not maintaining a seawall on the defendant's land, where it adjoined that of the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff's land became flooded. And it was shown, in order to prove the liability of the defendant, that he and his predecessors had from time immemorial repaired the wall where his land fronted the sea. The jury found for the plaintiff, but the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal held that there was no evidence of liability, and Lord Coleridge, C.J., in giving judgment, said, "The mere repair of a man's own fence for his own benefit, however often done, and during however long a period of time, will not, per se, although a man's neighbour may in fact benefit by such repair, impose on a man the duty of continuing such repair for his neighbour's benefit, when he ceases to care to do it for his own." So here the acts relied on were at the least ambiguous, and we think constitute no sufficient evidence of liability—see also per Baron Hullock, in "Rex v. Allanson" (Lewin's Crown Cases, 158 [1828]). In the words of the learned Baron, "An adjoining occupier occasionally doing repairs for his own convenience to go and come is no more like that sort of repair which makes a man liable ratione tenuræ than the repair by an individual of a road close to his door is to the repair of the road outside his gate." We, therefore, think the defendant entitled to judgment. The appeal must be allowed.

BARNES AND ANOTHER V. GLENTON, LEWIS, AND SAUNDERS.*

Limitations, Statute of—Mortgagor and Mortgagee—Mortgage by trustees—Retirement of one trustee—Payment of interest by co-trustees—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict., c. 97), s. 14—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict., c. 57), s. 8.

The defendants, who were entitled as trustees of a testator to certain mortgage securities, executed an assignment of those securities to the plaintiffs to secure an advance. Shortly afterwards, but more than 12 years before the present action was brought, one of the defendants retired from the trust. The remaining trustees continued to pay interest on the mortgage debt. In an action against the defendants, including the trustee who had retired from the trust, to recover the mortgage debt,

Held, that, though there was no express covenant by the defendants to repay the principal money, upon the facts of the case the transaction was one of loan from the plaintiffs to the defendants, accompanied by the security of the transferred mortgages, and that therefore the defendants undertook a personal liability.

Held further, that the money advanced by the plaintiffs was charged upon and payable out of land within the meaning of s. 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that therefore the payment of interest by the co-trustees prevented the Statute of Limitations from running as regards the trustee who had retired; and that in such a case s. 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, did not apply.

The learned Judge gave judgment in this case this morning. It was an action brought to recover money lent and interest thereon due under a deed of September 9, 1882, and made between a Mrs. Barber and the parties to this action. All the material facts appear in his Lordship's judgment. The case was tried before the Lord Chief Justice without a jury, and was argued on February 16 and on April 23, when judgment was reserved.

Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. H. F. Manisty were for the plaintiffs; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs for the defendant Angelo John Lewis; Mr. Johnstone Edwards and Mr. Alfred Roscoe for Mrs. Glenton.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE read the following judgment:—The claim of the plaintiffs as endorsed on the writ is "for money lent due under a deed dated September 9, 1882." The defendants were the trustees of the will of Lewis Glenton, who died in 1873, the defendant Maria Glenton, widow of the testator, being a beneficiary under that will. The material facts are these:—One Fairless Barber had acted as solicitor for the testator and for the defendants as trustees, and certain mortgages for sums amounting to £3,095 15s. 5d. had been transferred to Barber as trustee for Lewis Glenton. Fairless Barber died in 1881, and such mortgages thereupon became vested in Maria Louisa Barber, his widow, who was devisee under and executrix of his will. At the time of Barber's decease the estate of Lewis Glenton was indebted to him in a considerable sum for services rendered by him as solicitor to Lewis Glenton and to the trustees and also for money advanced. The defendants as trustees of Lewis Glenton's estate, with the object of paying off the moneys so due to Fairless Barber's estate and for other purposes in connexion with their trust, entered into negotiations with the plaintiffs for the advance of a sum of £1,650 upon the security of the mortgages before mentioned. The negotiations resulted in the plaintiffs agreeing to make the advance. The transaction was carried out thus:—By four deeds executed on September 9, 1882, Maria Barber assigned the mortgages in question to the plaintiffs. The only parties to these deeds were Maria Barber and the defendants. They contain no covenant for repayment by Maria Barber of the moneys advanced. Indeed, it was expressly agreed that she should come under no personal liability. On the same September 9, 1882, a deed or declaration of trust was afterwards executed to which Maria Barber, the defendants (not described as trustees), and the plaintiffs were parties. It recited the four transfers already referred to; that as to the principal moneys they belonged in equity as to part to Maria Barber and as to the balance to the defendants; that the plaintiffs had, at the request of the defendants, advanced to them £1,650, part of which had been applied in payment of a portion of the moneys secured by the transferred mortgages, which belonged to Maria Barber, and the balance paid to the defendants, and that it had been agreed that the repayments of such moneys and interest should be secured in the manner thereafter mentioned. The deed then provided (1) that the moneys advanced by the plaintiffs should be a first charge upon the transferred mortgage securities; (2) that the plaintiffs might either allow the moneys secured by the several mortgages to remain as invested or might call in and realize them, and as to any money received for interest should, after retaining interest on their advance, pay any balance to the defendants or the survivors or survivor or other the trustees for the time being of Lewis Glenton's will, but no step was to be taken against the mortgaged properties or the persons entitled to redeem without the consent in writing of the defendants or other the trustees of Lewis Glenton, but such consent was only to be refused in case the trustees within three months after application made to them paid off the claim of the plaintiffs. It is only necessary further to say that, subject to the claim of the plaintiffs, the mortgage securities were dealt with as the property of the defendants or other the trustees of Lewis Glenton. The deed contained no express covenant by the defendants to repay the plaintiffs their advance. Immediately after the execution of this deed the defendant Lewis retired from the position of trustee. Interest was paid from time to time up to March, 1896. After crediting the sum of £352 0s. 9d. received on account of principal, the sum of £1,363 15s. 7d. for principal and interest remained unpaid at the date of the writ—namely, April 12, 1897. In this state of facts two points were raised by the defendants. The first was that the plaintiffs had advanced the moneys solely on the security of the mortgages, and that there was no personal liability on any of the defendants to repay. The other point applied to the case of the defendant Lewis only. It was contended for him that the six years' limitation applied and was a defence; that the liability here, if any, was for a simple contract debt within the meaning of the statute of 21 James I., cap. 16, section 3, and as Lewis had had nothing to do with the trust since 1882 he was within the protection of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 and 20 Vic., c. 97, section 14), and that therefore the payments made by his co-contractors or co-debtors, the other defendants, did not keep the debt alive as against him. I have now to determine these questions. As to the first, I have arrived at the conclusion, after a careful consideration of the correspondence and deeds, that it was intended the defendants should undertake, and that the defendants did undertake, a personal liability. The correspondence before the advance was made was conducted by the firm of Barber and Oliver, solicitors, on the part of the plaintiffs. That correspondence beginning in May of 1882 treats the money as a loan, and speaks of the defendants as the borrowers. The correspondence after the advance was made has the same complexion, and indeed, when it turned out in 1897 that the mortgage security was inadequate and the present action was threatened, neither of the defendants Glenton nor Saunders suggested nonliability; and as regards the defendant Lewis, his only answer was that he had (as was the fact) ceased to act as a trustee since 1882. Further, there is the express stipulation that Maria Barber should be under no personal liability in respect of the advance, and an absence of the suggestion of any such stipulation on the part of the defendants. Lastly, the declaration of trust recites that the advances were made to the defendants by the plaintiffs at their request. In my judgment the conclusion properly to be drawn from the facts is that the transaction was a loan by the plaintiffs to the defendants accompanied by the security of the transferred mortgages, for which (unless there is any other defence) they are liable. It was insisted in argument that the defendants were trustees. At best this is only one of the facts to be considered in determining what is the proper inference to draw, and it is to be pointed out that the trustees received a portion of the money advanced and that all was applied for the purposes of the trust, and that Maria Glenton is one of the beneficiaries of that trust. As Maria Glenton and Saunders have no other defence there must be judgment against them. But a further contention was raised on behalf of the defendant Lewis, with which I must now deal. It was contended that the claim against him was within, and was barred by, 21 James I., cap. 16. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, argued that it was not within 21 James I., cap. 16, but that it was an action to recover a sum of money secured by or charged upon, or payable out of, land within the meaning of section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that the payments of interest to the plaintiffs by his former co-trustees from time to time kept the claim alive against him. It was admitted on his behalf that, if the plaintiffs' contention was correct, he could not claim the benefit of section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (see "Re Frisby," 43 Ch.D. 106, at p. 116). The question then is—Does the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, govern this case? (His Lordship read section 8 of the Act.) In my opinion this section applies. By the deed now sued on the money advanced is made a first charge on all moneys recovered by virtue of the mortgages, and the plaintiffs have the power to foreclosure, subject only to the defendant's consent, which they could withhold only in the event of their preferring to pay off the debt. Therefore, having regard to the terms of this deed, I think this money was secured by mortgage and was charged upon and was payable out of land within the meaning of section 8. It was argued in Frisby's case that the section applies only to actions against a mortgagor, and Lord Justice Bowen appears to have held that view; but Lord Justice Cotton said he could find nothing in the section pointing at such a limitation. In my view, however, it is not necessary in this case to express an opinion on the point, for I think the transaction between these parties amounted at least to an equitable mortgage, and the defendants are practically in the position of mortgagors. Section 8 of the Act of 1874, therefore, applies to this case, and, if so, the defendant Lewis is not entitled to the benefit of section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. It follows that the payments made by the co-trustees of Lewis are sufficient according to the decision in "Re Frisby" to keep the claim alive against him. It was also contended on behalf of Lewis that if the two sections are read together, 21 James I., cap. 16, would govern all cases where there was a contract without specialty, and that section 8 of the Act of 1874 applied only where there was a specialty. It was argued that here there was no specialty contract, and therefore the case fell within 21 James I., cap. 16, and therefore Lewis was entitled to the benefit of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. I do not agree with this contention. I think the effect of this section 8 is to take out of 21 James I., cap. 16, and for all purposes, all actions of debt secured by mortgage or otherwise charged upon or payable out of land. But, further, section 8 expressly included cases of security by lien which are not often effected by specialty contract. There must, therefore, also be judgment against the defendant Lewis, but as the question is important there will be in his case stay for an appeal if it is desired. It follows from what I have already said that there will also be judgment for the plaintiffs on the counter-claim.

Licensing Acts—Beerhouse licence—Transfer of licence—Refusal of licence at general annual licensing meeting—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict. c. 27), ss. 8, 19.

Where at a transfer sessions the applicant applied for and obtained a transfer of a licence to sell beer to be consumed on or off the premises, notwithstanding the objection that the house had been a disorderly house,

Held, that the justices at the next general annual licensing meeting, upon the same objection being taken, had jurisdiction to refuse to grant a renewal of the licence, there being nothing upon which an estoppel could be founded.

This was a special case stated by justices on refusing to grant a renewal of a licence for the sale of beer to be consumed on or off the premises. It appeared that the applicant had applied to a sessions held for the purpose of transferring licences for a transfer to him of the licence then existing in respect of the house in question. Objection was taken that the house was a disorderly house, but notwithstanding the objection the justices granted the transfer. At the next general annual licensing meeting the applicant applied for a renewal of the licence, and, on the same objection being taken, the justices refused to grant a renewal. The applicant desired to appeal, on the ground that the justices were bound by their previous decision on the question whether the house was a disorderly house, and that, therefore, by virtue of sections 8 and 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, they had no jurisdiction to refuse to grant a renewal, and this special case was stated for the purpose of raising that point.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Jordan, appeared for the appellant; Mr. Danckwerts for the respondents.

MR. JUSTICE WILLIS, in giving judgment, said there was nothing on which an estoppel could be founded in this case, and he had no doubt the justices were acting within their jurisdiction in refusing to renew this licence.

THE GEMMA.*

Admiralty—Arrest of ship—Bail—Agreement as to—Value of ship in her damaged condition and her "freight"—Meaning of.

This was a summons adjourned into Court to decide the amount of bail that ought to be given by the owners of the Gemma in a collision action.

MR. BUTLER ASPINALL, on behalf of the plaintiffs in the collision action, said that the claim against the Gemma amounted to about £7,000. The Gemma was only worth in her damaged condition £4,500, and her gross freight £374. After the collision the Gemma was arrested, and the defendants' solicitors then wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitors saying that if the Gemma was released they would give an undertaking to put in bail for a sum not exceeding the value of the Gemma in her damaged condition and her freight. On this undertaking the Gemma was released and proceeded on her voyage and earned her freight. The defendants now claimed to be entitled to deduct the expenses of earning the freight incurred since the arrest in estimating the amount of bail to be given. He contended that they were precluded from doing this by the terms of the letter by which they purchased the release of the ship.

DR. STUBBS, for the defendants, contended that the plaintiffs were not entitled to be placed in a better position than if they had arrested the cargo of the ship. In that event they could not have obtained bail for more than the amount of the freight then due.

THE PRESIDENT, in giving judgment said that this agreement to give bail was made by persons who knew what they were doing. In construing this agreement he could only construe the word "freight" in its ordinary sense as meaning the whole freight due under the charterparty, and the defendants must therefore give bail in accordance with that ruling.

HEAD V. GOULD.†

Trustee—Breach of trust—Liability of retired trustees for acts of successors.

Trustees who retire from the trust and pass on the trust property to their successors are not liable for a breach of trust committed by their successors when the breach of trust is not the outcome of their retirement and the appointment of the new trustees, and was not contemplated by the retiring trustees at the time of such retirement and appointment.

This case raised a question of great interest and importance to trustees—namely, whether retiring trustees are responsible for a breach of trust committed by their successors whom they have appointed under a power vested in them for the purpose under the instrument of trust. The facts, so far as it is necessary to state them, were shortly as follows:—Two of the defendants in this action, Messrs. Houlditch and Clapp, were formerly trustees of the marriage settlement, made in 1865, of Mr. and Mrs. Head. Mrs. Head survived her husband, and in 1895, owing to Mrs. Head's importunities, those trustees applied £1,500, part of the trust funds, in paying off a mortgage debt of hers, taking a transfer of the security, being a mortgage of her life interest under the settlement, and of a policy on her life. The transaction was not one authorized by the trust. From time to time, Mrs. Head and her family being in difficulties, those trustees were pressed for further assistance out of the trust funds, and at length, in 1894, being apparently wearied out by these importunities, they retired from the trust, appointing by deed as trustees in their places a Mr. Gould, a solicitor's clerk, and Miss Head—who had just attained 21—a daughter of Mrs. Head. Shortly afterwards these two new trustees disposed of the rest of the trust property, consisting of a house at Seaton and some life policies, and handed the proceeds over to, or applied them for the benefit of, Mrs. Head. Last year this action was commenced by Mrs. Head's infant son against the old and new trustees and also Mrs. Head for the purpose of having the trust funds replaced. The only point of public interest was as to the liability of the old trustees for the breach of trust committed by the new. The defendant Mr. Gould did not appear, and his defence had been ordered to be struck out. At the conclusion of the arguments on the 11th inst. his Lordship reserved judgment, which he delivered this morning.

MR. P. O. LAWRENCE, Q.C., and Mr. Methold appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Rowden for the defendants Messrs. Houlditch and Clapp, and Mr. G. M. Gover for the defendant Miss Head.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH, after stating the facts, proceeded:—This brings me to the large and important question whether Messrs. Houlditch and Clapp can be held responsible for the breach of trust committed by the present trustees in selling the house, surrendering the policies, and spending, it matters not how, the produce of the two transactions. To the parties concerned the question is both large and important. As regards those not concerned in the particular case the amount involved is immaterial, but the alleged liability of the former trustees is of vast importance, affecting as it does not only the two large classes to one or both of which most men belong, trustees or cestuis que trustent, but also all members of the legal profession, to whom the position and duties of trustees are a source of constant anxiety. The case made against Messrs. Houlditch and Clapp may be thus fairly stated:—You had exhausted all the trust property except this house at Seaton and the policies. You knew that this remaining property was barely sufficient to provide the plaintiff's portion, even assuming that the policies were maintained; and you further knew that the income derived from the house was not more than sufficient to maintain these policies. You were urgently pressed to make further advances to Mrs. and Miss Head, and you asserted with perfect truth that no further advances could properly be made—that is to say, could not be made at all without a breach of trust far more serious in fact and in its consequences than any that had yet been committed. In order to relieve yourselves and to indirectly assist Mrs. and Miss Head, you suggested, or, if you did not suggest, assented to, the appointment of new trustees who, you knew, would be more accommodating and contemplated, if they did not actually intend, that which you had properly declined to do. I have no doubt that if this charge can be regarded as proved against Messrs. Houlditch and Clapp the responsibility insisted on must follow, and that they must be held liable to make good the loss to the trust occasioned by the breach of trust which they did not themselves commit. This doctrine, to the authorities in support of which I will presently refer, is based, according to a passage in Lewin on Trusts, p. 752, on agency, and the retiring trustee is treated as actually doing what he does not do in person, because his successor is treated as his agent for this purpose. This view is also taken by Vice-Chancellor Stuart in one of the cases to which I have to refer. Far be it from me to say that it is not a sound and satisfactory view; but I venture to think that a different and equally satisfactory explanation of the doctrine can be given. It is the duty of the trustees to protect the funds entrusted to their care, and to distribute those funds themselves or hand them over to their successors intact—that is, properly invested and without diminution, according to the terms of the mandate contained in the instrument of trust. This duty is imposed on them as long as they remain trustees, and must be their guide in every act done by them as trustees. In retiring from the trust and passing on the trust estate to their successors—and this whether they appoint those successors or merely assign the property to the nominees of those who have the power of appointment—they are acting as trustees, and it is equally incumbent on them, in this ultimate act of office, to fulfil the duty imposed on them as at any other time. If, therefore, they neglect that duty and part with the property without due regard to it, they remain liable, and will be held by the Court responsible, for the consequences properly traceable to that neglect. This explanation will, I think, be found consistent with all judicial utterances on the subject, and help to make them consistent with themselves. It is strange that so little authority should be forthcoming on a point of such importance, especially as no one presumes to cast doubt on the doctrine which may be regarded as an integral part of accepted legal lore. In former days, when students learned law and practice not only by reading books and attending lectures (means, of course, which cannot be safely neglected), but at least equally as much from the precept and example of a master and animated discussion in the pupil-room, doctrines such as this not calling for frequent practical application were passed from one generation to another and became ingrained in the minds of practitioners without being formulated in reported cases unless a precise question was raised between litigants in a concrete form. This possibly explains why, for a doctrine in substance undisputed, there is so little authority to be found. It is right that I should say a word on the few cases cited, which are admitted to be all that can be discovered in the books. His Lordship then referred to and commented on three cases—viz., “Webster v. Le Hunt” (8 W.R., 534; 9 W.R., 918), “Palairot v. Carew” (32 Beav., 564, 567-8), and “Clark v. Hoskins,” before Vice-Chancellor Stuart and the Lords Justices (36 L.J., N.S., Ch., 689; 37 L.J., N.S., Ch., 561). His Lordship then came to the conclusion that, in his belief, Messrs. Houlditch and Clapp did not contemplate any breach of trust at all; and his Lordship was convinced that they never contemplated that actually committed. With the judgment (his Lordship continued) of the Court of Appeal in “Clark v. Hoskins” before us, it is easy to understand the Master of the Rolls as meaning what he probably intended to express, that in order to make a retiring trustee liable for a breach of trust committed by his successor you must show, and show clearly, that the very breach of trust which was in fact committed was not merely the outcome of the retirement and new appointment, but was contemplated by the former trustee when such retirement and appointment took place. That is clearly the doctrine of “Clark v. Hoskins.” It will not suffice to prove that the former trustees rendered easy or even intended a breach of trust if it was not in fact committed. They must be proved to be guilty as accessories before the fact of the impropriety actually perpetrated. His Lordship accordingly held that the charge against Messrs. Houlditch and Clapp of responsibility for the acts of their successors fell to the ground, but he reserved their costs for further consideration after the result of inquiries and accounts directed under the judgment, which was in form one for the execution of the trusts of the settlement.

THE QUEEN V. FRY AND OTHERS, JUSTICES, AND

Justices—Petty sessions—Conviction—Separate informations—Separate offences—Hearing of subsequent informations after adjournment of first—Validity of conviction.

The applicant was charged before justices upon three informations with three separate offences under the Licensing Acts. The justices, after hearing the first charge, were in favour of a conviction, but decided to adjourn their decision and the consideration of the amount of the penalty until after the other charges were heard. The second and third charges were then heard and dismissed. The justices then announced their decision upon the first charge, and convicted the applicant and imposed a penalty. Upon an application for a certiorari to bring up the conviction that it might be quashed, the justices made an affidavit setting out the above facts, and stating that in adjudicating on each case they applied to each the evidence given in reference to it, and none other.

Held, that in these circumstances, as the justices had decided to convict upon the first charge before hearing the others, the only question left unsettled being the amount of the penalty, the conviction was right.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi that had been granted for a writ of certiorari to bring up a conviction in order that it might be quashed. It appeared that one Masters, a licensed victualler, was charged on March 11, 1897, before the Right Hon. Sir Edward Fry and two other justices of the county of Somerset on three informations with three different offences against the licensing laws. The first information charged Masters with permitting drunkenness on his premises on February 7, 1898; the second charged him with selling intoxicating liquor during closing hours on February 8; and the third charged him with keeping his premises open after closing hours on February 8. The first information was heard first, and in an affidavit filed by them the justices said that, speaking to the best of their recollection of what took place, they were unanimous in favour of convicting, but adjourned their decision and the consideration of what penalty should be inflicted till after the other informations were proceeded with. The second information was then heard and dismissed, whereupon the superintendent of police in charge of the third case informed the justices that the evidence he proposed to tender was the same as that already given in the second case, and that he could not expect to succeed in this case after the decision in the second case. The justices then reverted to the first case and announced their decision on it—namely, that they had decided to convict, and they imposed a fine of £5 and costs, and ordered a record of the conviction to be endorsed on the licence. The justices in the affidavit above mentioned which was filed by them said that in adjudicating on each case they applied to that case the evidence that was given in reference to it, and no other, and that the evidence given in the second case in no way influenced their decision or the amount of the fine imposed in the first case.

The case was argued on May 10, when Mr. Danckwerts appeared to show cause against the rule, and Mr. Eldon Banks and Mr. H. H. Gregory appeared in support of the rule. The Court took time to consider their judgment.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS now delivered the written judgment of the Court, discharging the rule, and upholding the conviction, as follows:—We are of opinion that this rule should be discharged. We should be very sorry to give any countenance to the notion that justices may mix up two criminal charges and convict or acquit in one of them with any reference to the facts appearing in the other. Such a course would be contrary to law, and, undoubtedly, as a general rule, it will be prudent and right for the justices to avoid any course which reasonably bears the aspect of such a mistake. If a prima facie case is made out that such an error has, or may have, been committed, it will in general lie upon the justices to show very clearly that it has not been committed. On the other hand, we should be equally sorry to throw any doubt upon the right of the justices in any case for reasons of justice arising out of the circumstances of the case itself and for its better determination to adjourn or to postpone their decision; and, if their discretion in this respect be honestly exercised, and not, directly or indirectly, with the view of throwing in facts or evidence which have no legitimate bearing on their decision, it must not be interfered with. In this instance we think the case put forward against the proceedings of the justices is completely answered. It is impossible, in considering the weight to be given to what the justices said and the effect to be given to what they did, to leave out of sight the fact that their chairman is a great lawyer of long judicial experience and as thoroughly capable of appreciating the impropriety involved in any mixing up the evidence in the several cases which were heard before the decision upon the first was pronounced, and of dealing with each case separately and upon its own merits, as we ourselves are. It is most unlikely that a bench of justices whose deliberations were guided by him should have been permitted to fall into such an impropriety of procedure as is suggested by the appellant. We entirely accept the statement that the justices were at the close of the evidence and speeches in the first case unanimously of opinion that there should be a conviction in that case; and we accept it none the less because, with that caution which we might expect from the chairman when speaking of matters which had happened some weeks earlier, they so state "to the best of their recollection." We entirely accept also their statement that they applied to the case the evidence that was given in reference to it and none other. It may be added that in these cases the circumstances were such that it was singularly easy to keep the case in which they convicted apart from the other two, which related to a different date and involved different charges. The extent of the penalty to be awarded in the case in which they were unanimous as to conviction might not improperly be influenced by what might belearnt by the justices in the course of the two other cases. Indeed, Mr. Banks, the counsel for the appellant, admitted in the course of the argument before us that if the amount of the penalty was the only matter involved in the postponement of the judgment there was nothing illegitimate or improper in the proceeding. We cannot doubt that, inasmuch as the justices had made up their minds in the first case to convict, the only question then left unsettled was the amount of the penalty to be imposed, and that they forebore immediately upon the close of the first case to publish their decision as to conviction or acquittal only on account of the obvious inconvenience of splitting the publication into two parts. A case of "Hamilton v. Walker" was relied upon by the applicant for the certiorari as to which a word must be said. It is reported in four different reports—(61 L.J., M. C., 134; L.R. [1892], 2 Q.B., 25; 8 The Times L.R., 531; and 56 J.P., 583.) Of these by far the most complete is that in 56 J.P., 583, to which I therefore refer. In that case Hamilton was summoned before the justices on two summonses—first, for delivering to one Farrell a number of indecent advertisements to the intent that they should be delivered and exhibited to certain inhabitants, &c.; secondly, for that Farrell exhibited to certain inhabitants, &c., certain indecent advertisements, and that Hamilton aided, abetted, counselled, and procured Farrell to do so. The magistrates heard the first summons and were asked to dismiss it, but said that they would hear the second summons before doing so, and having heard it they convicted upon both. The Court held that neither conviction could be supported. Both Pollock, B., and Vaughan Williams, J., held that the first was bad because the statute (Jervis's Act) requires that each case shall be considered on its own merits and on the evidence given under that one information. As to the second conviction, Pollock, B., held that it was bad for the same reason as the first, and Vaughan Williams, J., upon a totally different ground—viz., that if the first case had been decided first, the defendant could have set up autrefois convict as an answer, and had been deprived of the opportunity of doing so. Pollock, B., however, said "I do not go so far as to say that the justices might not reserve their judgment after hearing the evidence (upon the first case)." Here there is nothing to show that the justices, in acting on each information, proceeded on the evidence applicable solely to that information. In the present case there is most explicit evidence, coming from a deponent whose assurance upon this point is most satisfactory and conclusive, that, in regard to the information now in question, the parties proceeded solely upon the evidence applicable to it; and it is clear that the ground of the decision in "Hamilton v. Walker," as stated in the judgments of both the learned Judges who formed the Divisional Court, does not exist in the present case, and its existence is negatived by the affidavit to which we have referred. The same observation applies to the judgment of Pollock, B., in respect of the second information before him. The reason given by Vaughan Williams, J., for holding the second conviction bad has no application whatever to the present case. There is therefore no conflict between our present decision and that given in "Hamilton v. Walker"; and it becomes unnecessary for us to express any opinion as to whether we should assent to the reasons given by the members of the Divisional Court for the judgment given in that case. This rule must be discharged with costs.

WHITE V. BRADFORD UNION.*

Rating—Rateable value—Tied publichouse.

In estimating the annual value for rating purposes of a tied publichouse, the rent which would be obtained from a tenant from year to year, including the brewers as possible competitors, but excluding the special price which the brewers would give owing to personal considerations apart from the value of the house and unfettered by any personal contract, must be considered.

This was a special case stated by the quarter sessions of the county of Wilts on an appeal against a rate on a publichouse, raising a question as to whether the possible competition of brewers as hypothetical tenants, who would relet the premises as "tied houses," should be taken into consideration in estimating the value.

Mr. Bucknill, Q.C., and the Hon. H. L. Lopes appeared for the appellant at quarter sessions; Mr. Foote, Q.C., Mr. Radcliffe, and Mr. T. H. Parr for the respondents at quarter sessions, who were the appellants in this Court.

The quarter sessions had held that in arriving at the value for rating purposes of the premises it was the hereditament, independently of and without reference to any personal contract with brewers, that had to be assessed—in fact, the free house, not excluding brewers as competitors, but treating them, like other tenants, as tenants of an hereditament unfettered by any personal contract. They put the rateable value at £35. The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment given this morning.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said,—This was a case stated by the quarter sessions for the county of Wilts upon an appeal by the occupier of a publichouse in the parish of Bradford-on-Avon against the assessment of such house to the poor-rate. The assessment committee had assessed the house at £85 gross estimated rental and £70 net rateable value, but the quarter sessions reduced the assessment to £35 gross estimated rental and £28 net rateable value. It was not contended before us that the value put on the house by the assessment committee could be maintained, but it was contended that the gross estimated rental should be £45, and not £35. The point arose in the following way:—The house in January, 1897, was purchased by a firm of brewers for a large sum and by them let to the appellant as a tied house on a rental of £27 10s. per annum. It was not argued that this figure furnished the proper rental on which to base the rateable value, nor, since the decision of "Sunderland-near-the-Sea v. Sunderland Poor Law Union" (34 L.J., M.C., 121), was it possible to do so with success. The rental must be estimated according to the statute 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 96, which statute requires it to be based on the corporeal hereditament, taking into account the mere permanent elements of value to be found therein, but without allowing for the effect of temporary contracts and other such accidents.

It is the rent at which the premises may reasonably be expected to let on a yearly tenancy, not that at which they may let when certain contracts of a personal nature affecting the rental are in existence between the landlord and tenant. The hypothetical tenant is to be a tenant supposed to take the hereditament as it stands and used as it is, so far as the nature of the premises goes—that is to say, as a publichouse, as ironworks, or dwelling-house, as the case may be; but, while that is true, the value of the hereditament is not to be affected by contracts or conditions not directly bearing on the occupation or use of the property, but of a personal and collateral character. Now in this present case the contention of the appellant is set out in paragraph 11 of the case as follows:—"The true test was the rent an ordinary tenant intending to occupy the premises from year to year as a 'free' house for the purpose of carrying on his own retail business as a publican would give, not what a brewer in competition with other brewers would give for the purpose of converting the premises into a tied house for the exclusive sale of his (the brewer's) beers, thereby increasing the profits of his own business." This appears to me to be correct according to the rules above stated. The "ordinary tenant intending to occupy the premises as a free house from year to year" is in the same position as the hypothetical tenant of the statute; he is willing to give the rent for the premises, not for the business carried on upon them. The rent so estimated is found by the case to be £30 to £35. What, on the other hand, was the contention of the respondents? It is set out in paragraph 12, and was that the net annual value of the premises was "their value to the owner, and not their value to the tenant in fact occupying the same, and that the premises should be assessed at the value at which they would let to a hypothetical tenant from year to year (all possible competitors who would be willing to take the premises from the owner being taken into account as possible hypothetical tenants), and that therefore the competition of brewers ought to be taken into consideration, although they did not in fact themselves intend to occupy the premises, and that the area of competition ought not to be restricted to such intending tenants as would themselves occupy the premises in question." This can hardly be understood without reference to the earlier paragraph, No. 10, from which it appears that if brewers were to be included as competitors, though they did not in fact occupy but only intended to convert the premises into a tied house, the rent would be high enough to support a gross estimated rental of from £40 to £45, and if such brewers were excluded and the area of competition was restricted to such tenants as would occupy the house as a free house the rent would only support a gross estimated rental of £30 to £35. But upon reading the two together it appears sufficiently clear that the respondents' contention, as against that urged by the appellant (and on which he relied to raise the rent from £30 to £35 to £40 to £45), was this—that not only the competition which would be due to the situation and character of the hereditament, but also the competition of brewers intending to use the premises as a "tied" house was to be taken into consideration. In so far as this contention introduces into the estimate an element not referable to the rateable hereditament itself, but to some personal or temporary contract under which the business is to be carried on upon it, I think it is clearly wrong. And from the findings in the case it is clear that it was by the introduction of such an element—that is, by the use of the house as a tied house—that the gross estimated rent of £40 to £45 was arrived at by the respondents. That is the only difference between the two contentions, and in my opinion the quarter sessions were right in holding that the hereditament only had to be assessed, and that, although the competition of the brewers was not to be excluded in estimating the rent, they must be treated like other tenants from year to year of an hereditament unfettered by personal contract. The order should therefore be confirmed.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL delivered a judgment to the like effect. The difficulty of ascertaining the correct amount at which the publichouse should be rated arose from the fact that a firm of brewers recently purchased the house at a large sum and had let the house to a tenant as a "tied" house at a rent less than that which he would pay if it were not tied. It was clear that the sum so nominally paid as rent, but really as part of the terms of a somewhat complicated contract, was no test of the market value of the premises. Even the actual rent paid for a tenement where there were no such complications was only some evidence of the rateable value, and where there were such complications the sum called rent was not any evidence at all. The rating authority, therefore, had to assess this tenement without regard to the sum actually paid by way of rent and without reference to the sum actually paid by the brewer for the purchase of it. What they had to do was to find the annual market value in the way provided by the Parochial Assessment Act, 6 and 7 Wm. IV., c. 96. The contest between the parties was as to what effect, if any, ought to be given to the competition amongst brewers competing to get publichouses into their hands. The contention of the appellants at quarter sessions was that the true test of the net annual value was the rent that an ordinary tenant, intending to occupy the premises from year to year as a "free" house for the purpose of carrying on his own retail business as a publican, would give. That contention did not appear to be precisely correct. It was rather liable to be misunderstood, and could not be adopted in the terms in which it was stated, though, perhaps, there was no substantial inaccuracy in it. The Act said nothing about the hypothetical tenant occupying. The purpose for which a particular tenant wanted the premises might possibly induce him to pay more than the market value for them, but, unless that was the case, the purpose for which the tenant wanted the premises had nothing to do with the matter, except in this way that property was to be rated rebus sic stantibus—that was to say, that a publichouse was to be rated on the assumption that it continued a publichouse; and the question was not to be entered into as to whether a higher rent could be got for it by turning it into a bank or any other kind of business premises. To introduce the purposes for which the tenant was going to use the premises, and to consider whether that purpose was to carry on the trade himself or to underlet it to some one else to carry it on, was to introduce extraneous considerations such as those unsuccessfully put forward in "Dodds v. South Shields" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 133; 64 L.J., Q.B., 508). If, in fact, there were so many competitors, whether brewers or others, desiring to obtain possession of publichouses as to raise the value, that fact necessarily affected the sum which any tenant, whether brewer or not, might reasonably be expected to give. He would have to give that which the landlord would expect to get from others or he would not be taken as a tenant. Any circumstance which affected the annual value in the market must be considered in arriving at the gross estimated rental; and, therefore, the demand which existed for publichouses, whether by brewers or others, must be considered, for that demand directly affected the value. The contention of the appellants was, however, well founded to this extent—any sums paid by the tenant, not by reason of the value of the premises, but for reasons personal to himself, ought not to be taken into account. This followed from the Sunderland case (34 L.J., M.C., 135). Suppose the owner of a publichouse received an offer from a brewer to take it as a tenant from year to year at a certain rent, the owner might say, "I know the house is worth more to you, and you must give me more." If the brewer gave the larger sum, that would be given for reasons personal to the brewer, and it had nothing to do with the market value of the premises, though the possibility of its being given might be a matter tending to raise the market value. Such a rent as that could not be treated as a rent which might reasonably be expected to be got for the premises, and could not be taken as the gross estimated rental. Again, if the owner of a publichouse had an offer from an ordinary tenant of a certain sum, the owner might say that he would not take that sum as there were brewers who would probably give more. If the man gave more, that would be evidence of an increase in the market value of the premises, and, where such a demand for houses by brewers existed as to make it probable that the landlord would get from any one a higher rent than that he would have if that demand of brewers did not exist, then that higher rent might be considered in assessing the rateable value. It was not right, therefore, that the competition of brewers should be wholly excluded from consideration, but the special prices which they might give owing to personal considerations and not on account of the value of the premises should be excluded, except so far as the possibility of such special prices being obtained raised the market value generally. Turning to the contention for the respondents set out in paragraph 12, that seemed correct, subject only to the doubt as to what was meant by the "competition of brewers being taken into consideration." If it meant that the question should be considered whether the brewers' competition had raised the market annual value, then it was right. If, however, it meant that the special values which the brewers might for reasons connected with their own business be willing to give were to be treated as the gross estimated rental of the premises because those sums might be got from brewers, then it was wrong. The decision of the quarter sessions was right in principle. They did not appear to have adopted that part of the appellants' contention which was erroneous. They had not "excluded brewers as competitors," as they were invited to do, but they had for some purpose considered the effects of that competition. Their order must be affirmed.

 Rigby and Collins, L.J.J.) May 25.
 BAWTREE V. THE GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY AND OTHERS.*

Practice—Parties—"Necessary or proper party"
 O. XI., r. 1 (g)—Foreign company.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, Mr. F. P. Bawtree and others, from a decision of Mr. Justice North's dated May 18 last. The plaintiffs were holders of certain land grant mortgage bonds of the above-named company, a railway company, duly incorporated under the laws of the Dominion of Canada. They brought this action on behalf of themselves and all other holders of such bonds against the company and the Right Hon. Edrie Frederic, Baron Gifford, V.C., and Mr. Robert Lothian Curzon. They claimed (inter alia) a declaration that the plaintiffs and the other holders of land grant mortgage bonds of the defendant company were entitled to the benefit of an indenture, dated June 2, 1890, and made between the defendant company of the one part and the defendants, Lord Gifford and Mr. Curzon, of the other part; and to a first charge on the defendant company's railway land grant, undertaking, and other assets; and to have such charge enforced by foreclosure or sale; and to have the trusts of the said indenture administered and carried into execution. The defendants, Lord Gifford and Mr. Curzon, were within the jurisdiction of the Court, and were duly served with the writ of summons in this action. The registered office of the defendant company was situated at the city of Toronto, in the Province of Ontario. The plaintiffs contended that the defendant company were necessary and proper parties to this action within the meaning of Order XI., Rule 1 (g), of the Rules of Court. That Order provides that "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the Court or a Judge whenever (g) any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction." On March 21, 1898, an order was made by Mr. Justice North, sitting at Chambers, on the application of the plaintiffs, giving liberty to the plaintiffs to serve the concurrent writ of summons in this action on the defendant company in the Dominion of Canada. A motion was subsequently made to the learned Judge to discharge the order which he had then made, and asking that the service of the writ on the defendant company and all subsequent proceedings in this action against them might be set aside on the following grounds (inter alia):—That the railway, lands, &c., were not situated within the jurisdiction; that the defendant company were not domiciled within the jurisdiction and were not necessary or proper parties to this action. Upon reconsideration of the matter his Lordship was of opinion that he ought to discharge the order which he had previously made. The plaintiffs now appealed. It appeared that the question of the validity of the land grant mortgage bonds had been raised in the Canadian Courts and was still unsettled; and that very many persons were interested in the question what, if any, were the rights of those who claimed to be bondholders and who disputed on various grounds the title of the alleged bondholders.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Beddall were for the appellants; Mr. Everitt, Q.C., and Mr. Hadley were for the respondents.

Their LORDSHIPS reversed the decision of Mr. Justice North and allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the case was of importance not only to persons who lent money in this country on debentures issued by colonial companies, but also to the colonial companies themselves. For if they issued debentures payable in London and protected the lenders by deeds here, and the lenders found that they could not get any redress here, it would be a very serious thing for the borrowers, as it would not be so easy to borrow money here as it was now. That was the general view of the matter. [His Lordship referred to the facts of the case and continued.] The plaintiffs said that they wanted to obtain a decree for the execution of the trusts of the indenture of June 2, 1890. The feature in the case was that the validity of the plaintiffs' charge was denied; their security was impeached. In a case of that description how could it be said that the company were not "necessary or proper parties" to the action? Not only were they "proper" parties, but, having regard to that view of the case, they were "necessary" parties. His Lordship could not, therefore, agree with the judgment appealed from. It was said that the power to make an order of this kind was discretionary, but his Lordship failed to see that Mr. Justice North's mind was addressed to the cardinal point of this case which impressed him (the Master of the Rolls) so much. If the plaintiffs' security was impeached the case could not get on unless the defendant company were made parties. That being so, the plaintiffs brought their action against them, and then applied for leave to serve the writ upon them. His Lordship thought that Mr. Justice North had failed to appreciate the importance of the denial of the plaintiffs' title, and that the appeal should consequently be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY delivered judgment to the like effect.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

LOGSDON V. HOLLAND.*

Local Government—Infectious Diseases—
Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851, sec. 11—
Failure to give notice of infectious disease Conviction of keeper of lodging-house.

This was a case stated by Mr. J. R. W. Bros, the metropolitan police magistrate, before whom the appellant was charged, on the information of the respondent, for that on October 16, 1897, he, being the registered keeper of a common lodging-house in London, did neglect to give immediate notice to the London County Council or some officer thereof of a person having been ill of fever or infectious or contagious disease in such common lodging-house, contrary to section 11 of the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851. The facts were shortly as follows. The respondent was the registered keeper of a common lodging-house situate at Nos. 14 and 16, Middle-row, St. Luke's, and one Patrick Breen acted as his deputy at the common lodging-house and had the care and management thereof. On October 14 a son of Patrick Breen was taken ill at the common lodging-house and the same day was removed to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and on October 16 was brought back to the common lodging-house suffering from scarlet fever, and was afterwards removed to a fever hospital. Patrick Breen knew on October 16 that his son was ill of scarlet fever, but no notice was given to the London County Council as required by section 11 of the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851, until October 22, when notice was given by the deputy. There was no evidence that the fact of a person being ill of fever in the common lodging-house came to the personal knowledge of the respondent before October 23, 1897, and the learned magistrate found as a fact that he did not previously know of it before that date. The learned magistrate refused to convict upon the ground that the respondent could not give notice of what he did not know, and that there was no neglect of duty by him.

Mr. AVORY appeared for the appellant, and contended that the section imposed a duty on the keeper of a common lodging-house from which he would not escape by leaving the management of the house to a deputy.

The respondent did not appear.

The COURT allowed the appeal, and remitted the case to the learned magistrate with directions to convict.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the case was very clear. The section in express terms cast upon the keeper of a common lodging-house the duty of seeing that its provisions were complied with; and, comparing the section with the succeeding sections, it was abundantly clear that the respondent was liable to a penalty under the circumstances.

THE QUEEN V. THE JUSTICES OF STAFFORDSHIRE—EX PARTE FIELD AND OTHERS.*

Licensing Acts—Appeal to quarter sessions—Alehouse Act, 1828, sec. 27—Costs—"Boulter v. Kent Justices" ([1897] A.C., 556).

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi that had been granted for a writ of certiorari to bring up, for the purpose of having it quashed, an order made by the Quarter Sessions of Staffordshire in an appeal, by one Thomas Loughurst, from the licensing justices of the borough of West Bromwich, whereby the appeal was allowed and the licensing justices were ordered to pay the costs of the appeal. It appeared that on the hearing of the appeal the licensing justices were represented by counsel, who stated that he did not appear for them as litigant parties, but to inform the Court as to the facts and what had taken place before the licensing justices. The notice of appeal having been admitted, counsel for the licensing justices opened the case fully and called Henry Jackson, clerk to the borough justices, as a witness. Upon his evidence three technical objections were raised and argued by counsel for the appellant and the respondent justices. Counsel for the respondent justices then called a witness to the value of the premises. Several witnesses were then called for the appellant; and counsel for the respondent justices did not cross-examine any of them, nor did he address the Court in reply. The quarter sessions allowed the appeal, and, being of opinion that the respondent justices had made themselves "parties" on the hearing of the appeal, they ordered that they should pay the appellant's costs. The appeal to quarter sessions was brought under section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61), which gives an appeal to quarter sessions to any person aggrieved by any act of any justice done in or concerning the execution of the Act, and provides, inter alia, that the Court of quarter sessions "shall hear and determine the matter of such appeal, and shall make such order therein, with or without costs, as to the said Court shall seem meet."

Mr. Disturnal appeared to show cause against the rule, and Mr. Avory in support of it. "Reg. v. London Justices" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 616) and "Boulter v. Kent Justices" ([1897] A.C., 556) were cited in the course of the argument.

THE COURT made the rule absolute.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said the section upon which the case turned was section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, illustrated to some extent by section 29. Before discussing the question he would like to point out what Mr. Disturnal's argument really came to. It was established by the decision of the House of Lords in "Boulter v. Kent Justices" ([1897] A.C., 556) that when the question whether a licence shall be renewed comes in the first instance before the licensing justices objectors may be heard and effectually heard without the risk of being mulcted in costs. Mr. Disturnal's contention came to this—that when there is an appeal by a person the renewal of whose licence is refused then, unless the licensing justices come forward and effectually fight the question whether the refusal was right or not, at the risk of being made to pay costs, the appellant is to have it all his own way, so far as concerned the examination of witnesses, argument, and so on. Such a conclusion would be so utterly wrong in itself that the Court ought to look very closely to see whether the statute must necessarily be so construed. The interest of the public was just as great on the hearing of the appeal as it was on the hearing of the original objections, and yet if Mr. Disturnal's argument was to prevail the public interests could not be protected on the appeal, because persons who might be willing enough to object in the first instance would not come forward at quarter sessions at the risk of being made to pay costs. And in particular the licensing justices would not come forward to fight such cases at the risk of having to pay costs. Lord Herschell in "Boulter v. Kent Justices" ([1897] A.C., 556), at page 569, had enumerated the considerations which led him to the conclusion that in proceedings before licensing justices there is no litigation and no parties, and that there is, therefore, no person whom the licensing justices can order to pay costs. All these considerations seemed to his Lordship to apply equally to proceedings before quarter sessions on appeal. It followed that quarter sessions had no power to award costs against the justices or any other person objecting to the renewal of the licence. It was said that this could not be so because the quarter sessions were given power to make such order, with or without costs, as to them seemed meet. But there was plenty of material upon which those words would operate as the Act originally stood, because originally the action applied to appeals against convictions and other appeals in which there would be parties in the ordinary way as well as to an appeal against a refusal to renew a licence. "Reg. v. London Justices," which was the authority for the giving of costs in this case, had lost its foundation by reason of the decision of the House of Lords, in "Boulter v. Kent Justices," that licensing justices are not a Court of summary jurisdiction. The view that the quarter sessions had no power to give costs to an appellant was strengthened by the fact that, while in section 29 of the Act of 1828 provision was made for the levy of costs given to the justices against the appellant, there was no corresponding provision for the levy of costs awarded to the appellant.

Limitations, Statute of—Personal actions—Acknowledgment—Abortive submission to arbitration.

In this case the plaintiff sued as executor of the will of John Fenner, of Brookside, Dedham, and Colchester, in the county of Essex, for £3,616 9s. 10d., balance of the price of goods sold and delivered, and for money lent and interest thereon. The defence was that the claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jas. I., cap. 16. section 3).

Mr. E. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. C. E. Jones appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., and Mr. Boxall for the defendant.

The plaintiff's case was that the late Mr. John Fenner, who was a farmer and cattle dealer, as a result of transactions extending over several years and concluding in 1886, had a claim against the defendant for £3,616 9s. 10d. The last item of the account being dated July, 1886, the Statute of Limitations would prima facie apply, but on April 25, 1896, it being alleged by either party to this action that the other was indebted to him in a large sum of money, it was agreed between them that there should be a reference of the account to two arbitrators, and that either should pay to the other the amount found due by the arbitrators. Both parties agreed not to take any advantage of the Statute of Limitations. The arbitration was held but it proved abortive.

Mr. TINDAL ATKINSON, Q.C., on behalf of the plaintiff, contended that the agreement in the submission to arbitration to pay the sums which should be found due from the parties to each other respectively amounted to a promise to pay, which took the case out of the operation of the statute. In support of this contention he cited the cases of "Prance v. Sympon" (Kay's Reports, (678); and "Banner v. Berridge" (18 Ch. Div., 254).

Mr. BOSANQUET, Q.C., for the defendant, said that the account on which the plaintiff now claimed was a different one from that which was submitted to arbitration, and also that the arbitration having proved abortive the agreement entered into by the parties prior to that arbitration was not an admission sufficient to take the case out of the statute. In order to do so there must be a definite promise to pay. The learned counsel on this head referred to the cases of "Morgan v. Rowlands" (L.R., 7 Q.B., 493); "Cheslyn v. Dalby" (4 Younge and Collyer's Reports, 238); and "Hales v. Stevenson" (7 L.J., N.S.).

Mr. JONES having replied for the plaintiff,

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment for the defendant, said that there was no doubt that if the arbitration had proved effective the Statute of Limitations could not have been set up. At the time the submission to arbitration was signed the debts were not statute barred. The submission was a conditional agreement to pay, if the arbitration was held, the amount found by the arbitrators. The arbitration having proved ineffective, the condition on which the admission was made had not been fulfilled, and there was, therefore, no admission in this case to take it out of the operation of the statute. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant, with costs, but allowed a stay of execution for three weeks, provided that notice of appeal was entered within that time.

IN RE OLYMPIA (LIMITED) (REGISTERED 1893).*

Company—Directors—Liability—Misfeasance
Summons—Companies (Winding Up) Act, 1890, sec. 10.

Decision of Wright, J. (ante, p. 236), reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Wright's dismissing a summons taken out by the Official Receiver and liquidator under section 10 of the Companies (Winding Up) Act, 1890, against Mr.

Montague Gluckstein. The summons asked for a declaration that Mr. Gluckstein was guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust, in that he and Messrs. Joseph Lyons, John Hart, and Harold Thomas Hartley, being promoters and directors of the company, had secretly obtained and retained for their own use out of the purchase-money paid by the company for Olympia the sum of £6,341, which was alleged to have been divided among them; and that Mr. Gluckstein might be ordered to pay the whole amount, with interest. The facts are fully stated in the report of the proceedings in the Court below (ante, p. 236) and in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. The appeal was argued on May 12 and 13.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Kirby were for the Official Receiver and liquidator, the appellant; Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Mr. Muir Mackenzie, and Mr. Cassell were for the respondent.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

THE MASTER of the ROLLS said,—This is an appeal from the dismissal by Mr. Justice Wright of a summons issued by the liquidators of a company called Olympia (Limited) against a person named Gluckstein, under section 10 of the Companies (Winding Up) Act, 1890. The allegation is that Gluckstein and others, being promoters and directors of the company, made a secret profit of £20,000 at the expense of the company. The defence is that the profit in question arose from a transaction with which the company had no concern, and was, moreover, fully disclosed to the company. The case is important, not only to Mr. Gluckstein and those associated with him, but to all persons engaged in forming companies and who take shares in newly-formed companies. The most ingenious mechanism has been devised in order to bleed this company to the extent of £20,000, without the knowledge of the shareholders, and the question is whether the mechanism will answer its purpose. The facts are not in dispute, and were shortly as follows. In 1893 a company called the National Agricultural-hall Company (Limited) was being wound up. Its property consisted inter alia of some land and buildings known as Olympia, and fixtures, machinery, furniture, and effects in and upon the same. This property was used for exhibitions and purposes of amusement, and licences for the sale of beer, wine, and spirits on the premises were held by the company. This property was for sale. The property was subject to heavy encumbrances—viz., £100,000 in debentures and £10,000 on mortgage, and its value was not sufficient to pay off all these charges in full. To what extent these securities could be realized depended mainly, if not entirely, on what could be got by a sale of the above property. It is obvious that the more the property sold for the better for those who held the securities. If the securities could be bought up cheap and the property could be sold for much more than the sum due on them a substantial profit would be made. Further, if the same persons could buy the debentures cheap and could also buy for a sum more than sufficient to pay off the securities, and if they could resell the property at an advanced price, they would make a double profit—viz., first, by paying themselves as holders of the securities the amount due on them; and, secondly, by paying themselves as vendors the advanced price at which they resold the property. Moreover, if it could be arranged that they should not pay for the property until they got paid the advanced price at which they resold it, they would not be under the necessity of making cash advances themselves to any considerable extent. These observations will render what was done quite clear. In January, 1893, what is called the syndicate agreement was entered into. It is an agreement between Hart (described as secretary to the Freehold Syndicate) of the one part and the subscribers of the other part. It recited that the syndicate proposed to purchase Olympia with a view to a re-sale to a company to be registered or to some other purchaser. The agreement shows that the syndicate here referred to was to be composed of the subscribers to the agreement. The agreement then provides for the formation by the subscribers of a fund for the above purpose, which fund was to be placed in the names of trustees. This fund was to be applied in paying for the purchase, and, secondly, in payment of the expenses of forming the company. It was then agreed by clause 2 that the trustees should do their best to buy Olympia for the syndicate and resell the same at a profit. By clause 3 it was stated that if such company should be formed four persons—viz., Lyons, John Hart, Hartley, and Gluckstein, members of the syndicate—had consented to become directors if duly elected. Clause 4 bound each subscriber to take shares in the company to the amount of his subscription if the capital should not be otherwise fully subscribed or underwritten. Clause 6 nominated the four above-named persons trustees, with full powers of management and to do whatever might be necessary to buy and resell Olympia and to promote and register the company and to purchase “as an interim investment” any first mortgage bonds of the National Agricultural Hall Company (Limited). Clause 7 provided that the sale to the proposed company or any other purchaser should be made subject to and with the benefit of two other provisional contracts of even date. One of these was for the supply of refreshments to the proposed company by J. Lyons and Co. (Limited) (in which Lyons and Gluckstein were stated to be directors and shareholders). The other contract was that J. and H. Hart should be the advertising agents of the new company. These contracts were between the contractors of the one part and H. Hart as secretary or agent for the syndicate of the other part, and they contained recitals showing that the syndicate contemplated buying Olympia and selling it to a new company which they proposed to form for the purpose of taking Olympia from them or their trustees, and that if they did so the company should take subject to and with the benefit of that contract and should enter into an agreement with the contractor adopting the same with or without modification. If the syndicate should sell to any other purchaser such sale should also be subject to, but with the benefit of, the contract. The first clause of each of these documents expressed that the agreements contained in them were made by the syndicate for themselves and, so far as they lawfully could, on behalf of the proposed new company or other purchaser. It is unnecessary to refer further to these contracts. These three documents were contemporaneous documents. The first of them—viz., the syndicate agreement—was signed by several persons for various sums amounting altogether to £35,950, of which, however, only £7,192 10s. was ever actually paid. Pursuant to this agreement the syndicate, by their trustees—Lyons, J. Hart, Hartley, and Gluckstein—bought up £32,000 debentures (on which considerable interest was due) and also the £10,000 mortgage, which were encumbrances on the property known as Olympia. They gave £27,320 for the debentures, which afterwards realized £42,358, and they gave £500 for the mortgage, which afterwards realized £6,096. The profit on this transaction amounted to £20,734. These purchases were made in the course of January and the early part of February, 1893. At about the same time the syndicate agreed to buy the property called Olympia for £140,000, and on February 8, 1893, a formal agreement for sale to the aforesaid trustees at that price was executed; £20,000 was paid by the purchasers as a deposit, and May 8, 1893, was the day fixed for completion of the purchase.

The property was bid for in the Chambers of the Judge who had ordered the sale; £140,000 was the highest bid, and it was higher by £8,000 than that which last preceded it. This last large bid secured the property. No previous bid had exceeded £1,000 over the last before it. By March 20, 1893, all necessary arrangements had been made by the syndicate trustees for the registration of a new company to buy the property thus acquired for £180,000—that is, £40,000 more than the sum for which the trustees had acquired it. There was no concealment about this, nor does any one complain of it except so far as it enabled the syndicate to make a secret profit out of the debenture transaction. In order to carry out the arrangements for forming the company an agreement dated March 20, 1893, was executed between the syndicate trustees called the vendors of the one part and a person called Close, a trustee for the intended company, of the other part. This agreement recites the agreement of February 8, 1893, by which the vendors had agreed to buy the property for £140,000; then it recites that a company is about to be formed for the purchase of such property, and that the memorandum and articles of such company have been prepared with the privity of the vendors, and that the capital of the company shall be £155,000, divided into 31,000 shares of £5 each, and that by the articles of association it is provided that the directors shall adopt and carry out that agreement. Then it is agreed (1) that the company shall buy the property known as Olympia, subject to, and with the benefit of, the two agreements of January 19, 1893, with J. Lyons and Co. for refreshments and with Hart for advertising; (2) that the price shall be £180,000—that is, £20,000 to the vendors in repayment of their deposit, £120,000 into Court in discharge of the unpaid balance of £140,000, and the rest to the vendors; (7) that the vendors shall pay all the expenses of forming and bringing out the company and issuing its capital and of completing the purchase and of the mortgage to secure debentures, and then come these words:—“The validity of this agreement shall not be impeached on the ground that the vendors parties hereto as promoters or otherwise stand in a fiduciary relation to the company, nor shall the vendors parties hereto be required to account for any profit made or to be made by them by the purchase of any debentures of the National Agricultural Hall Company (Limited) or of any other charges upon any of the property of the last-mentioned company which are to be satisfied wholly or in part out of the fund paid or to be paid into Court in the said action.” This clause is naturally relied upon by the defendant as affording a complete answer to the present application. Its effect is obviously one of the principal matters for our consideration, and it will be necessary to return to it. For the present, I pass it over and continue the statement of the material facts of the case. On this same March 20 the new company was registered by the name of Olympia (Limited). Its objects are stated to be (1) to purchase the property known as Olympia; (2) to adopt and carry into effect, with such (if any) modifications as may be agreed, the last-mentioned agreement with Close. The capital is £155,000, divided into 31,000 £5 shares. Seven subscribers signed the memorandum of association for one share each. The articles of association provide (4) that the last-mentioned agreement is ratified and binding, and the directors are directed to carry it into effect with such modifications, if any, as may be agreed on. The directors are also required to adopt and give effect to the refreshment and advertising contracts with J. Lyons and Co. and Hart, already referred to, with or without modification as the directors may think fit. By Act 73 the first directors are named. They are Lyons, Gluckstein, J. Hart, and Hartley—i.e., the four trustees of the syndicate, and the vendors to the company. Article 40 confers on the directors power to borrow on debentures. Much turns on the constitution of the company. Shortly after the registration of the company a prospectus was issued. It refers to the company as incorporated. The capital is stated to be £155,000 in 31,000 £5 shares, and first mortgage five per cent. debentures £70,000, total £225,000, to be applied as follows. Purchase price £180,000, working capital £45,000. The directors are stated to be Lyons, Hart, Hartley, and Gluckstein. The prospectus contains the following very important statement:—"The promoters of this company, hereinafter called the vendors, who constitute the entire board of the company which lately produced Venice in London, recently entered into a contract on behalf of a syndicate, of which they themselves are members, for the purchase of the entire Olympia property. The vendors effected this purchase on February 8, 1893, at competition before the chief clerk of Mr. Justice North, in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, for £140,000, payable in cash, and they will, acting on behalf of such syndicate, be the vendors of that property to this company. Any other profits made by the syndicate from interim investments are excluded from the sale to the company. A printed form of the memorandum of agreement, which was signed by each member of that syndicate, may be inspected by intending applicants for shares or debentures at the offices of the solicitors of the company." The prospectus also stated that the property had been recently valued at £107,876, and that the vendors had agreed to sell the whole to the company for £180,000, payable as to £155,000 in cash, and the balance in cash or shares of the company. The prospectus then stated that out of the profit to be made by the vendors on behalf of the syndicate the vendors had agreed to pay the promotion expenses and other moneys, and it also stated that the four following agreements had been entered into—viz., those of February 8 and March 20 for the purchase and resale of the property, and the agreements of January 19, 1893, relating to the refreshment and advertising business of the company. The syndicate agreement of the same date was not here enumerated, but the prospectus stated that "applicants for shares will be deemed to have waived the insertion of the dates and names of the parties to that agreement, and to have accepted the above statement as a sufficient compliance with the requirements of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, or otherwise, and all allotments will be made on this basis." The rest is soon told. Applications for 17,000 shares and 272 debentures were received, and these were issued. The contracts with Close, Lyons and Co., and Hart were adopted by the directors, with, however, a variation to the effect that £40,000, part of the £180,000, might be paid in shares. The £180,000 was paid as to £171,000 in cash and as to £9,000 in shares. Out of this transaction £40,000, being the disclosed profit on the sale of the property bought by the company and a further profit of £20,134 made by the syndicate by buying up the debentures, went into the pockets of the syndicate. Of this last sum Lyons, Hart, Hartley, and Gluckstein received £6,741, and this sum the liquidator of the company sought to recover from them by the summons which we have to consider. The only person with whom we have to deal is Gluckstein. The other three are not before us. But if any of them are liable they are all liable jointly and severally to make good the sum in question. The question therefore is whether these persons are liable to account to the company for the profit they made out of the purchase of the debentures and mortgage, which were encumbrances on the property sold to the company. It is plain that they took an active part in forming the company and in framing or approving its memorandum and articles of association and also its prospectus. They were parties to the agreement with Close. They in fact were the creators of the company, and were the persons who brought it into existence fettered by the agreements with Close, Lyons, and Hart, and with themselves as sole directors. The company was skilfully formed, so that it should not be able to escape from the performance of those contracts, and so that no director should have an interest in investigating the conduct of those who created the company, and who were to obtain benefits from the payment of the £180,000 which the company had to pay. But more. All this was done pursuant to the syndicate agreement of January 19, 1893, which provided for the formation of a company of which these four persons should be directors. Everything was done in order to enable the syndicate to make the double profit there contemplated. The formation of some such company as Olympia (Limited) was essential to the carrying out of this agreement, and it was then agreed to form one, if possible, and the persons who then agreed to form a company, and ultimately did form it, in order to carry the agreement into effect, owed duties to that company when it came into existence; and one of such duties was not to make a profit out of it without informing it of the fact and giving the company an opportunity of declining to allow such profit to be made at its expense. These duties are imposed by the plainest dictates of common honesty as well as by well-settled principles of company law. They have invariably been enforced by the Courts of this country. The leading case on the subject is, "Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Company" (3 App. Cas., 1,218, and 5 Ch. D., 73), every judgment in which may be referred to as an authority for the above statement of the law. The next question is, Have the syndicate trustees and promoters of this company performed this duty or have they not? Any evasion of it, however ingenious and skilful, in making that which is not a performance look as if it was will not suffice; and the main question which has to be determined in this case is whether the documents to which I have referred contain a sufficient disclosure of that which it was the duty of the promoters to disclose to the company and to those who were invited to join it. In considering this question we must recollect that we are dealing with matters of daily business, and must have regard to the habits and practical necessities of ordinary business men. Refined equitable doctrines of constructive notice have little, if any, application to such matters as are now being dealt with. To inform a person of a fact is one thing; to give him the means of finding it out, if he will take trouble enough, is another thing. A promoter of a company whose duty it is to disclose what profits he has made does not perform that duty by making a statement not disclosing the facts but containing something which, if followed up by further investigation, will enable the inquirer to ascertain that profits have been made and what they amounted to. I pass now to consider (1) the disclosure which was made; (2) to whom it was made; and (3) its sufficiency. The disclosure made is contained in clause 7 of Close's agreement. If this is enough this will protect the defendants; if it is not nothing else will. The reference in the prospectus to profits made by "interim investments" and to the syndicate agreement may be disregarded as wholly insufficient. The expression "interim investments" hardly points to such a transaction as the purchase and realization of the debentures and mortgage. The utmost that can be said of this part of the prospectus is that it suggests inquiry. Close's agreement is the real document to be considered. The company was formed to carry this out and the directors were required by the articles to adopt and carry out this agreement with such modifications, if any, as might be agreed upon. Close's agreement, moreover, is referred to in the prospectus. But clause 7, which shows that the promoters and directors were making a profit out of the securities is not referred to, but is left to be discovered by the directors, who have to consider the contract, and by such other persons as may take the trouble to see the contract itself. Whilst the prospectus states clearly that the promoters were making a profit of £40,000, it says nothing about the further £20,000. The contrast is most marked. It comes, therefore, to this, that the fact that the promoters were to make an additional profit was not stated to any one, but might be found out and must become known to the directors if they attended to their business when Close's agreement came before them for adoption. It may be that this would have been enough if the directors had been an independent board and if they had adopted the contract with full knowledge of all the facts. But it is not necessary to determine whether even then the disclosure would have been sufficient. Let us see to whom this clause 7 and the real facts were known. They were known to the four directors who were the creators of the company, and who were to share the profits which would be got from the purchase money which the company was to pay. Clause 7 and the facts were not known to any one else connected with the company except to such members of the syndicate who took shares in the company. What effect, then, has such a knowledge by such persons on the right of the company to claim the profits thus being made by its directors and promoters out of it? My answer is none whatever, except to deprive the directors who shared the profit of all possible defence to such claim. To say that the knowledge of such persons of their own conduct, which from first to last they were doing all they could to conceal, is to be treated as the knowledge of the company or of the shareholders, is to say that which is opposed not only to common sense but also to well-settled principles of law. Having arrived at the conclusion that knowledge of clause 7 of Close's agreement cannot be imputed to the company it is difficult to see upon what principle that clause can be binding on the company as part of the contract of purchase. The contract with Close, including clause 7, is said to be binding on the company by reason of section 11 and section 16 of the Companies Act, 1862, which say that the memorandum and articles of association shall bind the company and the members as if each member had covenanted to observe the conditions and regulations therein contained. But a series of decisions beginning with "Eley v. Positive Assurance Company" (L.R., 1 Ex. D., 20 and 28), including but not ending with "Browne and La Trinidad" (37 Ch. D., 1), show that, notwithstanding these sections, contracts entered into before the formation of a company cannot be enforced against it until the company after its formation has agreed to be bound by them. Then how did clause 7 of Close's agreement become binding on the company? It is said because the directors adopted it, as they had power to do by the articles. This might be a good answer if the directors had been an independent body, but considering who they were and their position the adoption of Close's contract by them with this term in it would not render the contract binding on the company, and the company might have repudiated the contract as soon as the company discovered how it had been tricked. Having regard to the constitution of this company and to the concealment of the real facts I regard clause 7 as absolutely nugatory. Not only does it fail to give notice to the company of the facts really concealed from it, but it also fails to preclude the company from seeking redress by reason of such concealment. There remains, however, the further difficulty, that the company has not repudiated the contract and is not now in a position to restore the property to the vendors. It is said that in such a case as this rescission of the contract is the only remedy. This is, in my opinion, quite wrong. The same people who saddled the company with the property have prevented its restitution in the condition in which the company acquired it. The company as distinguished from its promoters and directors never was in a position to consider whether it would take or keep the property or return it to the vendors in the condition in which the company took it. The company no doubt got the property; but it got it volens, and its inability to return it as it got it does not justify the conclusion that the company has elected to keep it on the terms of complying with clause 7. Upon principle it appears to me clear that there is nothing to prevent the company from claiming the profit secretly got from it by those whose duty it was not to make such profit without informing the company of what they were doing. After discussing the authorities in considerable detail his Lordship continued as follows:—The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the persons who promoted this company and were its sole directors did in fact obtain from it a profit for themselves without letting any persons except themselves and their associates know that they were doing so. No ingenuity is required to disclose the truth, but much is required to disclose it and form a company without frightening persons by the disclosure. But where there is a duty to disclose a fact no mechanism for concealing it, however ingenious, can avail, unless indeed it fails to answer its purpose by really disclosing what it is intended to hide. In my opinion the order appealed from must be reversed and an order be made for the payment by Gluckstein of the sum mentioned in the summons (after deducting what, if anything, may have been recovered from the other defendants) and of interest at 3 per cent. and of the costs here and below.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and COLLINS gave judgment to the like effect.

EX PARTE ELLIS.*

Bill of Sale—Seizure of goods by grantee—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, sec. 7—Application for relief.

The Judge in chambers has no jurisdiction to grant relief under sec. 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, where the grantee has seized, not for the purpose of realizing his security, but for the purpose of maintaining it.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Darling at Chambers. On October 8, 1897, Ellis gave a bill of sale of his furniture to Edward Shuckburgh, who carried on business as the Clerical and Medical Advance Bank, to secure the repayment of an advance of £30 and interest thereon at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum, and the grantor covenanted to pay the principal sum of £30 on October 8, 1899, and in the meantime £1 10s. on the 8th of each month for the interest. The grantor having made default in one of the monthly payments of £1 10s. for interest, the grantee seized the chattels comprised in the bill of sale, the warrant authorizing the bailiff to take and hold possession until payment of the £1 10s. The grantor thereupon applied for relief under section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and Mr. Justice Darling ordered that, upon payment of £31 10s. and the costs of the application, the grantee should release the goods and hand over the bill of sale to the grantor. The grantee appealed, and contended that the Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order.

Mr. Crump, Q.C., and Mr. W. de B. Herbert appeared for the grantee; Mr. Herbert Chitty appeared for the grantor.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, reading the bill of sale with the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, there was power to seize the goods when any of the contracted payments fell due and were not paid. Here £1 10s. fell due for one month's interest, and was not paid, whereupon the grantee seized for the purpose of maintaining the security so as to get payment of the £1 10s. for interest. He never seized for the purpose of selling or realizing the security. The question was whether the Judge had jurisdiction to order the bill of sale to be given up. He had jurisdiction to order the grantee to withdraw from possession upon payment of the sum due and costs. This Court decided in "Ex parte Wickens" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 543), under a bill of sale similar to this one, that when the grantee took possession, not for the purpose of maintaining his security, but for the purpose of realizing it, the Judge had jurisdiction to order the bill of sale to be given up. In his opinion the Judge had no jurisdiction to order the bill of sale to be given up where the grantee took possession for the purpose of maintaining his security, and not for the purpose of realizing it. If the law were otherwise the bill of sale holder would be under this hardship—he would have taken a contract for the payment of interest on the principal sum advanced at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum for a fixed period, and yet he could take no step for the purpose of maintaining his security during that period without exposing himself to the risk of being paid off and the security put an end to. The learned Judge therefore, had no jurisdiction to make the order he did.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

READ V. PUNTER.*

Justices—Jurisdiction.—Precept for rates—
Enforcement—Legality of charges.

Justices to whom application is made to enforce a precept for rates have no jurisdiction to question the legality of the charges for which the precept is issued.

This was a case stated by Justices of the Peace for the County of Bucks, raising a question as to the right of justices, when asked to enforce a precept by a district council, to consider the legality of the charges for the payment of which the precept is issued. The respondents, overseers of the parish of Wendover, were summoned under 2 and 3 Vict., c. 84, s. 1, as applied by section 231 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to show cause why they have not paid the amount required by a precept of the Wycombe Rural District Council for expenses.

Mr. Bethune (Mr. R. Cunningham Glen with him) appeared for the appellant; Mr. Bonsey for the respondents.

The facts were these:—In February, 1896, the Wendover Parish Council requested their district council—the Wycombe District Council—to repair a certain public footway. As the district council did not proceed with the work application was made to the county council who requested the district council to give the matter attention. The district council accordingly in September, 1896, passed the following resolution, "That the Wendover footpath . . . be repaired at once under the superintendence of Mr. Stevens and the district surveyor." A Mr. Marshall, at that time a member of the Rural District Council, though he had since retired, associated himself with the two gentlemen above named, and supplied materials for the repairs required to the extent of £134 4s. 7d. The Mr. Stevens named was an independent gentleman residing at Wendover. When the work was completed the district council received a bill made out in the name of Mr. Stevens but without his authority, and a cheque for £134 4s. 7d. was drawn payable to Mr. Stevens. The cheque was handed to Mr. Marshall and his son endorsed the same with the name of Mr. Stevens. On July 9, 1897, the expenses in respect of the footpath were declared by order of the Local Government Board to be "special expenses" and to be charged as such to Wendover Parish. On August 9, 1897, a precept was issued by the district council requiring the respondents to pay £229 9s. 8d., in which was included the sum of £134 4s. 7d. Credit had been given for £50 paid by the vicar of Wendover. It was admitted that £95 5s. 1d. was properly due. The district auditor, on November 5, disallowed the payment of £134 4s. 7d., and surcharged the three councillors who had signed the cheque. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the duty of the magistrates was purely ministerial and that the magistrates could not, if satisfied that the precept was properly made, question its amount; that the mere fact of an item in the precept being disallowed by the district auditor did not affect the validity of the precept, and that therefore the precept should have been enforced. On the part of the respondents it was contended (a) that the magistrates must be satisfied with the validity of the precept, and that it was in respect of legal payments, and that section 231 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was only conclusive as to the amount of the expenses incurred but not as to the legality of any payments included in the precept. (b) That the payment by the rural district council to Mr. Marshall for the materials supplied by him while he was a member of the district council was an illegal payment, and as such had been disallowed by the district auditor. (c) That as the precept included such illegal payment it should not be enforced. The justices held that as a point of law had arisen as to the validity of the precept and this had been clearly raised by the auditor, they did not feel they should issue a distress warrant; but they stated the case as requested, leaving it to the Court, if it should be of opinion that the justices ought to have enforced the precept, to remit the case to the justices.

Mr. BETHUNE argued that the precept was binding. He cited "Tynemouth Union v. Backworth" (69 L.T., 178). The payment was not an illegal payment. The fact that a member of a district board supplied materials for repairing the road rendered him liable to a certain disqualification. It did not make the payment of his account illegal. He cited "Melliss v. Shirley Local Board" (16 Q.B.D., 446) and "Reg. v. Handsley" (7 Q.B.D., 398).

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. BONSEY, for the respondents, said there were two questions. The first was, had the justices power to go behind the precept? He contended that they could under the circumstances of the case. On this he cited "Newbould v. Coltman" (20 L.J., M.C., 149). If the payment was an illegal payment the overseers were entitled to refuse to pay it. "Pedley v. Davis" (5 L.T., N.S., 253). The magistrates were not acting purely ministerially. Re "Bridgend Union" (9 L.T., N.S., 720), "Reg. v. Boteler" (33 L.J., M.C., 101). The next question was whether there was an illegal payment at all. The material section as to this was section 46 of the Local Government Act, 1894. "Reg. v. Mayor of Ramsgate" (23 Q.B.D., 66) was also cited.

Mr. GLEN, in reply, said this was not the kind of illegality the justices could inquire into. The application of the money was not their business. The justices had gone beyond their proper functions in inquiring into it.

The COURT held that the justices ought to have enforced the precept.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS said this was another of those Chinese puzzles, of which he had had 20 or 30 these sittings, in regard to local government. The facts were that the district council had ordered the footpath to be repaired under the superintendence of Mr. Stevens and the surveyor. Stevens had associated with himself Mr. Marshallsay, a member of the district council, and Mr. Marshallsay had supplied materials and perhaps labour to the amount of £134. Now, if Marshallsay had been present at a meeting of a committee which had entered into a contract with himself for the supply of materials, that contract would be a void, because, while voting for the contract eo instanti, he would be disqualified from entering into it. But it was not stated that that took place here. There was no meeting of the council at which such point was discussed. Marshallsay had nothing to do with voting. There was no such illegality here as to make the contract void. If that were the right view, the justices had acted erroneously in not enforcing the precept, notwithstanding the surcharge by the auditor. That was really enough to settle the case, but it might be well to add some observations as to the extent to which the justices might inquire into the validity of a precept. The justices had in this case similar powers to justices asked to issue a warrant of distress in respect of poor-rates. It was an obvious convenience that they should not have to inquire into the purpose for which the money was to be expended. Objections on the face of the warrant, objections personal to the person against whom the rate was to be levied, objections that the contributory place was outside the jurisdiction might perhaps be considered; but objections to the composition of the money to be raised ought not to be entertained. Another objection which might be considered would be that the parish had already paid. That did not warrant a notion that there might be a roving inquiry as to what items should be allowed. The appeal must, therefore, succeed.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said the case, put in the strongest way for the respondents, was that there was an item as to which a substantial doubt existed. If that were so, section 231 prevented the question being raised, for by that section the precept was to be conclusive as to amount. On the whole, he agreed that the facts in all probability pointed to the conclusion that the payment was a legal payment. But that did not arise in the present case. The disallowance of the auditor was not conclusive in this case. If the money were paid back the parish would get the benefit. This was really a dispute between Wendover and the other parishes in the union. Until it was paid back it would be the parish that would be out of pocket for the time.

The result of the case was that there was a question as to one item in the precept—a large one, it was true; but that was not a ground for questioning the precept. The justices ought, therefore, to have made the order enforcing it.

RENDELL V. HEMINGWAY.*

Local Government—Offences—Nuisance—Unwholesome meat—Meat not for sale—Public Health Act, 1875, secs. 116 and 117—Conviction quashed.

This was a case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Bradford raising the question as to the power to convict under sections 116 and 117 of the Public Health Act, 1875, a person who has meat unfit for human food on his premises for consumption by himself, his servants, and workpeople, and not for sale. An information had been preferred by William Hemingway, the respondent, against Albert Rendell, the appellant, under sections 116 and 117 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and part 3 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, section 28, charging Albert Rendell for that William Hemingway at the meat-house, Eldon-lodge, in the said city, in which part 3 of the Act of 1890 had been duly adopted, did find deposited for the purpose of sale the carcase of a sheep unfit for food.

Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. Longstaffe appeared for the appellant; Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. Carson, Q.C., and Mr. Chitty for the respondent, the inspector.

The facts were that Mr. Hemingway, an inspector of nuisances, on January 27 found in the larder of Eldon-lodge deposited and intended for the food of man the carcase of a sheep unfit for food. The carcase was intended to be used by the appellant for food for himself, his family, the servants, and workpeople who were in fact supplied with their food by him. It was not proved that the carcase was deposited for the purpose of sale or of preparation for sale. It was contended on behalf of the inspector, on the authority of the case of "Mattinson v. Carr" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 48), that the defendant was liable to be convicted. It was contended on the other side that as the carcase was neither exposed for sale nor deposited for the purpose of sale, but was intended for consumption by himself, his family, and servants, no offence had been committed. The magistrate, considering himself bound by the authority cited, convicted. The question of law for the Court was thus stated:—Is it sufficient to create an offence that the said carcase was on the appellant's premises intended for the food of man, or is it necessary in order to create an offence that the said carcase should have been exposed for sale or deposited for the purpose of sale or of preparation for sale?

Mr. TINDAL ATKINSON said the case was unarguable. The words of the section were that an inspector might inspect a carcase exposed for sale "and," not "or," intended for the food of man. The carcase here was intended for food, but was not for sale. He referred to the 28th section of the Act of 1890, which also dealt with food exposed for sale, and it did not extend the liability. A private individual who had some too high game in his larder or an egg which had gone bad and was kept perhaps for political purposes could not be convicted. He cited "Vinter v. Hind" (10 Q.B.D., 63).

Mr. LAWSON WALTON, Q.C., said the machinery under section 116 was different from that under section 117. If the inspector made a seizure it was not for the justices to inquire whether the seizure was right or wrong. The only question left for them was whether it was unfit for human food. Further, the meat was for the food of the workpeople. Therefore it was part payment of the labourers, and constituted a sale.

Mr. JUSTICE WILLS, in giving judgment, said the conviction could not be sustained. It was argued that the inspector who seized the meat, who might not even see the owner of the meat or give him any opportunity of explanation, could give a conclusive decision, which might even have the effect of rendering the owner of the meat liable to a sentence of imprisonment. That was an extravagant proposition. As to the decision of the inspector it might well be that for the purpose of saying whether food should be destroyed or not his decision might be final. The justices had to decide on the state of the food when brought before them. It might be in quite a different condition from what it was when it was seized. It was preposterous to say that the inspector could decide whether the person in whose possession the food was found had been guilty of an offence. That was a matter for the judicial powers of a magistrate. The inquiry was a judicial matter. There was no hardship in making a person who had food to sell give a guarantee that it was fit. That was totally different from the case where meat was in the house for consumption by the owner and his family. The meat here was not for sale. The conviction must be quashed.

Mr. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred.

BRUTTON AND ANOTHER V. BRANSON.*

County Court—Practice—Pleading—"Statutory Defence"—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 4—County Court Rules, 1889, O. X., 18 (a).

This was an appeal from the City of London Court raising a question as to whether it was necessary in a County Court to plead section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vic., c. 71), if a defendant desired to set up a defence under that section, which is practically equivalent to section 17 of the Statute of Frauds.

Mr. W. O. Hodges appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. C. Godwin appeared for the respondents the defendants.

The Judge of the City of London Court had entered a non-suit in the action, which was a remitted action for whisky supplied for a sum exceeding £20. The following is the material part of the rule on which the question turned:—County Court Rules, 1889, Order X., 18 (a):—"When in any action the defendant relies upon any statutory defence, or any defence of which he is required by any statute to give notice, he shall in his statement set forth the year, chapter, and section of the statute."

Mr. HODGES contended that the judgment of non-suit was wrong. A statutory defence had to be pleaded beforehand. This the defendant had not done in this case. A statutory defence was a defence on which but for the statute a defendant could not rely. If there was no defence at common law and the statute only made a defence the case came within the rule requiring notice. He cited "Conroy v. Peacock" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 6) and "Lewis v. Burrell" (77 L.T., 626).

Mr. RUSSELL said the rule did not apply. The class of defence aimed at was one which amounted to confession and avoidance—namely, a real defence. This was a matter which was part of the plaintiff's case, for, unless he could prove a memorandum in writing or acceptance, he could not make out his case. The Statute of Frauds had altered the position of the plaintiff. He cited "Buttermere v. Hayes" (5 M. and W., at p. 462), "Leaf v. Tuton" (10 M. and W., 393), and referred to Order XIX., rules 15 and 20, of the Supreme Court.

The COURT held that such a defence as this was a statutory defence.

Mr. JUSTICE WILLS said the County Court rule in question applied to actions on contracts. On such an action the Statute of Frauds was a very ordinary defence. He was quite at a loss to give any definition of a "statutory defence" which would not include a defence under the Statute of Frauds. In two rules of the High Court it was clearly treated as a special defence, and he thought that, though that was not conclusive in respect of County Court matters, it helped to throw light on the point. He decided on the broad ground above-mentioned.

Mr. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. He could conceive no meaning for the words "statutory defence" which would exclude such a defence as this. There was nothing to go by but the words themselves, and they covered a defence under the Statute of Frauds.

IN RE WOODS AND LEWIS'S CONTRACT.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Contract—Construction—Default of vendor, what is—Defect in title.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Romer, the question raised being as to the meaning of the word "default" in a condition contained in a contract for the sale of real estate. In the present case the contract provided that the purchase should be completed on August 31, 1897. The purchaser was to pay a deposit of 10 per cent. on the purchase money; and there was a condition that "if from any cause whatever other than the default of the vendor the purchase shall not be completed on the 3rd day of August the purchaser shall pay to the vendor interest, after the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, on the residue of the purchase money from that day until the completion of the purchase." The vendor had purchased the property from the Standard Life Assurance Company, and the purchaser took the objection that the assignment from the company to the vendor was not executed as it ought to have been in accordance with the company's private Act of Parliament, and the purchaser required that a deed of confirmation should be executed. The vendor obtained the execution of this deed, but this led to delay, and the purchase was not completed until November 24, 1897. The vendor claimed interest from the purchaser for the period from August 31 up to the completion. The purchaser insisted that the delay had arisen from the "default" of the vendor. Mr. Justice Romer decided that there had been no default on the part of the vendor and that the purchaser must pay interest as claimed. The purchaser appealed.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. J. W. M. Holmes were for the purchaser. Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. G. Cave, for the vendor, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the key to the whole situation was that there had been no want of reasonable care on the part of the vendor in not discovering the blot on the title, which was discovered by the extreme vigilance of the purchaser's advisers. Mr. Neville had argued that every omission on the part of a vendor was a "default" within the meaning of such a condition. But the history of these conditions showed that such an extreme construction had not been given to them. The object of the condition was to give the vendor a hold upon the purchaser, or otherwise the completion might be delayed for ever. But some limitation must be put upon the clause. A vendor could not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong. In the present case his Lordship did not think that the purchaser would have sustained a farthing's worth of injury if he had not insisted on the deed of confirmation. It was nothing but an extraordinary precaution. To say that under such circumstances there had been a "default" by the vendor within the meaning of the condition would be going too far.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY was of the same opinion. The question was as to the meaning of "default" in a contract for the sale of real estate. It was not like a contract for the sale of goods. Contracts for the sale of real estate stood on a special footing. His Lordship said this in order to meet Mr. Neville's argument that "default" was equivalent to mere failure to perform. The present case was by no means a difficult one. There was nothing more than that the title might be said to be defective. The purchaser had an excellent title subject to this slight defect. The vendor had no reason to believe or to suspect that there was any defect in his title, and, in his Lordship's opinion, there had been no want of reasonable care on the vendor's part, and there was not enough to establish "default" on his part.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

MARSHALL V. MACKINTOSH.*

Damages—Measure of—Breach of contract—
Building contract—Forfeiture.

This action, which was brought against a builder to recover damages for breach of a building agreement, raised an important question—namely, whether, when a landowner has exercised the power of re-entry provided by a building agreement in the event of the builder making default and has taken possession of the builder's plant and material on the premises, the landowner is also entitled to recover from the builder the actual damage he has suffered by reason of the latter's breach of contract. The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. E. Morten appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. G. A. Scott for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY said that the only point which he had to decide was the question of the damages which the plaintiff was entitled to, and, as Mr. Justice Field said in "Wigsell v. School for Indigent Blind" (8 Q.B.D., 357), few questions as to the principle upon which damages ought to be assessed were free from difficulty. By an agreement in writing of June 10, 1896, the defendant contracted with the plaintiff (in substance) to pull down and remove certain buildings at 47 and 48, Dover-street, Piccadilly, and to build on the site a new structure, which was to be erected "in carcase" before December 25, 1896. Upon that being done the plaintiff contracted to grant to the defendant a lease of the land and buildings for a term of 80 years from June 24, 1896, at a peppercorn rent for the first year, and thereafter at a yearly rent of £1,100. Clause 2 provided that if the defendant made default under the agreement "he shall forfeit all benefit under this agreement, which shall thereupon cease and be determined, and all the materials and buildings on the said premises shall be forfeited to, and become the absolute property of, the lessor." Under Clause 11 there was reserved to the lessor, on default being made by the defendant, a power to re-enter upon, and to the immediate possession of, the premises and plant "without making to the lessee any allowance or compensation in respect thereof." The defendant got possession of the site on June 10, 1896, but, except that he took down and removed £200 worth of materials from the old buildings, he did nothing whatever towards the fulfilment of his contract. The fact was that he had entered upon the undertaking as a speculation without the means of fulfilling it. There being no prospect of anything further being done, the plaintiff re-entered on January 19, 1897, as he had a right to do. It was clear that the mere fact of re-entry did not of itself exonerate the defendant from the liability to damages for breach of contract prior to re-entry; see "Hartshorne v. Watson" (4 Bing., N.C., 178); but it was contended for the defendant that the effect of Clauses 3 and 11 did limit the plaintiff to such compensation as might be afforded to him by taking possession of the materials, plant, and buildings on the premises at the time of re-entry without any allowance or compensation to the defendant, and that the plaintiff could not claim damages beyond that. His Lordship could not accept that view, for that would be to read with these clauses "as and for liquidated damages," or words to the same effect, and his Lordship was not entitled to do that. It was common enough to find the insertion of such words when there was an intention of the parties so to limit the liability for a breach of the contract. Instances of this were to be found in "Reilly v. Jones" (1 Bing., 302), "Lea v. Whitaker" (L.R., 8 C.P., 70), and in "Ex parte Newitt—in re Garrud" (16 Ch. D., 522). His Lordship referred to the judgments in the last case. In the absence of some such express words Clauses 2 and 11 could not be construed so as to deprive the landowner of the right to prove actual damage for the defendant's failure to perform the contract; but the words in Clause 11 "without making any allowance or compensation in respect thereof" would not, his Lordship added, operate to prevent the builder from having included in the damages any value which might exist in the buildings, plant, &c., seized by the landowner when he re-entered. The damages must be assessed rebus sic stantibus, and it might be the case that, if the structure was nearly completed "in carcase" at the time of the re-entry, the landowner would fail to prove any substantial damage at all to flow from the breach on which he sued, as he had failed in

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"Oldershaw v. Holt" (12 A. and E., 590). The question of the amount of damages had been referred to the official referee, who had made two alternative assessments. He reported that the plaintiff had, after entering, relet at the best rent he could—viz., £900 a year, after the first year, and he assessed the damages at the loss of two years' rent of £1,100 and the loss of £200 a year from June 24, 1899, at 25 years' purchase amounting to £5,000, making in all £7,200. In the alternative, if the plaintiff was only entitled to recover damages caused by the removal of materials by the defendant and by the loss of possession from June 24, 1896, to January 19, 1897, the official referee found that the amount of such damage was £200, and one year's rent of £900 from June 24, 1896, to June 24, 1897, the earliest date at which the plaintiff was able to relet the premises. The damages must be assessed, his Lordship said, upon well-recognized principles. They must be such as flowed naturally, and, in the circumstances of the case, necessarily from the breach of contract; further, they must be such damages as might reasonably be shown to have been in the contemplation of the parties when they entered into the contract. Subject to this, the plaintiff was, in the language of Mr. Justice Field in "Wigsell v. School for Indigent Blind," "entitled to have his damages assessed at the pecuniary amount of the difference between the state of the plaintiff upon the breach of the contract and what it would have been if the contract had been performed." If the defendant had performed this contract before the date of re-entry, the old building would have been removed, and a new and valuable structure erected on the site, and if he had then failed to complete the plaintiff would have had no difficulty in getting some one to take up the undertaking on at least as profitable terms. But, as it was, the plaintiff had only been able to relet on terms involving a loss of £7,200. His Lordship could find no fault of principle in this assessment. "Oldershaw v. Holt" was the case most in point, and there it was held, it being a case of re-entry after neglect to build, that the jury might properly give a verdict on an estimate of the plaintiff's real damage, taking into consideration an increased rent secured by the agreement which he had made with a new lessee. Upon the same principle it was right in this case to consider the reduced rent which the plaintiff had been obliged to accept from a new contractor. As to the alternative assessment, his Lordship did not think that the damages could, according to legal principle, be assessed upon that basis. There would, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff for £7,200.

SMITH.*

Insurance—Marine—Underwriter's slip—Stamp Act, 1891, secs. 91 and 93.

Decision of Mathew, J. (ante, p. 366, and [1898] 1 Q.B., 829), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Mathew, reported ante, p. 366; and in [1898] 1 Q.B., 829. The action was brought to recover the sum of £350 16s. 5d. under a contract of reinsurance underwritten by the defendant and other Lloyd's underwriters, dated July 26, 1896. The plaintiffs' case was that the defendant agreed to reinsure the plaintiffs to the extent of the excesses over certain amounts upon risks which the plaintiffs had then taken, or might take, on goods by vessels of certain named steamship lines. In June, 1896, goods insured by the plaintiffs per the Golden Fleeco, a steamship belonging to one of the named lines, were totally lost, and the plaintiffs paid a total loss in respect of them to the amount of £5,008 4s. 5d. The excess which fell upon the reinsurance contract was £3,808 4s. 5d., of which the defendant's proportion was £350 16s. 5d., the sum claimed in the action. The plaintiffs claimed in the alternative a declaration that under the contract above-mentioned they were entitled to have issued to them by the defendant a duly subscribed policy in respect of the lost goods and to recover under such policy when issued. The defendant contended that the plaintiffs had by their conduct repudiated and terminated the contract of reinsurance, and, further, that there was no contract of reinsurance expressed in a policy sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the 54 and 55 Vict., c. 39, section 93 (the Stamp Act, 1891). The contract sued upon was expressed in words, initial letters, and figures, the signification of which was as follows:—"Open cover, 30-6-96. Dawson Brothers (the plaintiffs' brokers). Cash. Steamer or steamers and steamers. United Kingdom and (or) Continent and (or) America to West Indies. Merchandise. Reinsurance. Rates as per endorsement." Then followed the amounts taken by each underwriter and initialled by them. "F.C.A. and York-Antwerp rules. Detention clause. Old or new bill of lading, including all risks from warehouse lighterage and until delivered at destination. Negligence clause. £4,000." This was explained to be the limit of excess taken on any ship. On the back there was a list of the steamship lines on which excesses on goods were insured and the amount of the line reserved by the plaintiffs and the rate of premium in each case. By an order made in Chambers by Mr. Justice Bigham it was directed that the question raised in the defence on the Stamp Acts should be determined before the trial of the action. Mr. Justice Mathew gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Scruton for the defendant.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said he was of opinion that the appeal failed, and that it failed on one point, with which alone he would deal. They had to consider a document, which was called an open cover, but which in more ordinary language was called a slip. The question was whether the plaintiffs could maintain an action on this slip, no policy having been issued in pursuance of it. Now, what was this slip? It certainly did not cover anything except marine risks. The object of it was to cover the plaintiffs with regard to excesses over certain amounts upon risks which the plaintiffs had taken, or might take, on goods by vessels of certain named lines. It seemed to him impossible to say that it was not a contract of sea insurance. The argument was that it was not valid because, being, as he thought it was, a contract of sea insurance, it did not satisfy the requirements of section 93, subsection 3, of the Stamp Act, 1891, which said that a policy of sea insurance should not be valid unless it specified the sum or sums insured. This slip did not specify any sum as the sum insured. The sum of £4,000 mentioned in the slip was the sum beyond which the underwriters were not to be called upon to pay on any one ship. He could not say that this document specified the sum insured so as to satisfy subsection 3, and so as to be a valid contract. He therefore thought that the appeal must be dismissed, and that it ought to be declared that the plaintiffs could not sue on this document.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY delivered judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

HOWCROFT V. LAYCOCK.*

Sale of Goods—Goods not according to contract —Non-warranty clause in invoice—Liability of vendor.

This was an appeal from his Honour Mr. Lumley Smith, County Court Judge, raising a question as to the effect of a clause very commonly put at the head of seed merchants' bills. The clause was as follows:—"Messrs. — give no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter connected with the seeds they send out, and they will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms they are at once to be returned." The plaintiffs had supplied some seeds to the defendant's order. The order was for a species of cabbage called Couve Tronchuda. The seed sent when it grew up turned out to be Jersey kale, a species of tree cabbage, only suitable for making walking-sticks. The action was brought for the price of the seeds; the defendant counter-claimed for damages for breach of contract. The County Court Judge had an unreported case named "Reynolds v. Wrench," in the Court of Appeal, cited to him, and he referred to "Bowes v. Shand" (2 A.C. 455). He thought that the non-guarantee clause protected the plaintiffs. But for that he would have found for the defendant.

For the appellant, the defendant, Mr. A. T. LAWRENCE, Q.C., and Mr. G. B. HAMILTON appeared, and cited the cases "Josling v. Kingsford" (13 C.B., N.S., 447) and "Nichol v. Godts" (10 Ex., 191).

Mr. EARLE appeared for the plaintiffs, and cited "Allan v. Lake" (18 Q.B., 560) and "Randall v. Roper" (27 L.J., Q.B., 266). He contended that when, in ordinary cases, goods had been accepted the purchaser could only recover for breach of warranty. Here, however, the purchaser had agreed not to raise any question of warranty and therefore had no remedy. It was an important matter for seed sellers and seed growers all over the country. In this case the seed sellers had bought the seed from some one else, so there was no imputation on their bona fides. Seed would be very much dearer if the sellers had to guarantee it.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE DAY was of opinion that the County Court Judge had been misled by a case which had no bearing on the question. The clause in question could not be construed to mean that no action should be brought. When Couve Tronchuda was ordered the seed sellers were not entitled to deliver something quite different. The custom of a trade might qualify a contract, but it could not destroy it. A rational construction must be put on the words relied upon. The construction desired by the respondents to be established was unreasonable.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

Leave to appeal was granted if an indemnity to the costs were given to the defendant.

ALTREE V. ALTREE—STAFFORDSHIRE FINANCIAL COMPANY, CLAIMANTS.*

Bill of Sale—Validity—Form in schedule—Address and description of grantee.

This was an appeal from the County Court Judge at Staffordshire sitting at Lichfield, who decided that a bill of sale was void, because neither the address nor the description of the grantees, the Staffordshire Financial Company, was given in the bill of sale.

Mr. J. B. Matthews appeared for the appellants, the grantees of the bill; Mr. Disturnal for the respondent.

The material words of the bill of sale in question were as follows:—"This indenture made the 12th day of March, 1898, between John Altree, of Triangle Farm, Chase Town, in the parish of Hammerwich, in the county of Stafford, farmer, hereinafter called 'the borrower' of the one part, and the Staffordshire Financial Company (Limited) hereinafter called 'the lenders' of the other part."

MR. MATTHEWS contended that the bill of sale was valid. It was necessary in a bill of sale to give the address and description of the grantor; that was clear. But there was no need to put the address of the grantee. The only part of the statute relating to this was that in the form given in the schedule a space was left for the address of a grantee. He referred to the rules of the Supreme Court, 1884. R. 3 dealt with the abstracts of the contents of bills of sale which the registrar had to prepare. The registrar was not bound under them to give the address of the grantee in such abstract. Further, even if a grantee, an individual, had to give an address, a corporation or a limited liability company was under no such necessity. The old and well-known practice of conveyancers was not to put the address of a joint stock company in any conveyance. It was always easy to identify a registered company. He cited the following cases:—"Ex parte Stanford" (17 Q.B.D., 259), "Thomas v. Kelly" (13 App. Ca., at p. 511), "Linfoot v. Pockett" ([1895] 2 Ch., 835), "Simmons v. Woodward" ([1892] App. Ca., 100), "Murray v. Mackenzie" (L.R., 10 C.P., 625), "Maugham v. Sharpe" (34 L.J., C.P., 19), "Parsons v. Brand" (25 Q.B.D., 110), "Sims v. Trollope" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 24), "Dolcini v. Dolcini" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 898), "Smith v. Hammond" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 571) and "Shears v. Jacob" (L.R., 1 C.P., 513).

The COURT, without calling on counsel for the respondent, supported the decision of the County Court Judge.

MR. JUSTICE DAY said the Bill of Sales Act of 1882, by section 9, provided that a bill of sale should be void unless drawn in the form given in the schedule to the Act. Then, turning to the schedule, it would be found that a blank was left in the form for the address of the grantee equally with that of the grantor. That showed that the address of the grantee should appear in the bill. The objection taken by the County Court Judge was quite right.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

JAYS (LIMITED) V. SALA AND ANOTHER.*

Principal and Surety—Guarantee—Letter—Acceptance of guarantee.

In this action the plaintiffs sued as the assignees of Mr. Tom Simson Jay for £121 16s. 9d., the price of goods sold and delivered to the first defendant, the widow of the late Mr. G. A. Sala, on the guarantee of the second defendant, her sister, Mrs. Crafton Smith. The defence was that the document in question was not a guarantee, that if it was it had never been accepted by Mr. Jay, and that neither it nor the debt had been assigned to the plaintiffs by Mr. Jay.

Mr. Macaskie appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. W. E. Hume-Williams for the defendant Mrs. Crafton Smith.

The plaintiffs' case was that early in December, 1895, Mr. George Augustus Sala died. On December 8 in that year Mrs. Crafton Smith wrote to the manager of the widows' mourning department at Messrs. Jays, asking him to send a competent person to Mrs. Sala to take her orders for mourning. That letter was followed by another from Mrs. Smith which contained the sentence "Kindly keep my enclosed card as a guarantee for Mrs. Sala's personal order, should you require it." This was the guarantee relied on by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs sent one of their assistants to Mrs. Sala, and goods were supplied to her to the amount of £121 16s. 9d., the orders being given for the most part in the presence of Mrs. Smith. Application for payment was made to Mrs. Sala without success, and judgment had been obtained against her and she had become a bankrupt. On her failure to satisfy their claim, the plaintiffs had recourse to Mrs. Smith as surety, and in February, 1897, their solicitor wrote to her for the amount due. In her answer to that letter Mrs. Smith said that, although she had given some sort of a guarantee, it was only intended to cover one suit of mourning to be used at the moment, and eventually, on her refusal to pay, the plaintiffs brought the present action.

Mr. HUME-WILLIAMS, for the defendant Mrs. Smith, contended that this was a guarantee which required to be accepted, and that, no acceptance having been given by them, the plaintiffs could not sue upon it. In support of this view he cited the cases of "Mozley v. Tinkler" (1 C.M. and R., 692) and "McIver v. Richardson" (1 M. and S., 557). He further relied on the fact that the deed of assignment from Mr. Jay to Jays (Limited) purported to assign book debts due on February 2, 1896, and that as Mrs. Smith's name did not appear in the firm's books the plaintiffs had no right as against her transferred to them by the assignment. He also submitted that this was an attempt by one person to sue on a guarantee given to another, and that, even supposing the debt had been assigned to the plaintiffs, no sufficient notice as required by the Judicature Act, section 25, subsection 6, had been given to Mrs. Smith.

His LORDSHIP, at the conclusion of the arguments, reserved his judgment, and, in deciding in favour of the plaintiffs, said that a technical objection had been raised that the alleged guarantee had not been transferred from the old firm to the new. That being a purely technical objection, it ought to be got rid of, and he would accede to an application that Mr. Jay should be joined as a plaintiff in the present action. A second technical objection which had been taken was that no notice of the assignment of the debt and guarantee had been given to the defendant, but on looking at the circumstances of the case and the letter written to Mrs. Smith by the plaintiffs' solicitor on February 23, 1897, he was satisfied that such notice had been given. With regard to the question of whether there was a guarantee at all, that point had admitted of some discussion. On behalf of the defendant it had been alleged that there was only an offer of a guarantee, and that the goods must be taken to have been supplied on the credit of Mrs. Sala only, and that unless there had been an acceptance of the proposed guarantee by the plaintiff firm no contract of guarantee could be proved. It seemed to him that Mrs. Smith's letter clearly meant that she thought that Messrs. Jays would probably refuse to deliver the goods without a guarantee, and so she gave them hers. It was so understood by the plaintiffs, and they at once sent a person to take the orders, which were given for the most part in the presence of Mrs. Smith. The plaintiffs appeared to him to have acted on that as a guarantee; the subsequent correspondence clearly disclosed that that was the view they took of it, and, further, that Mrs. Smith knew that they were acting on the faith of the guarantee. In these circumstances it appeared to him that there was abundant evidence to show that the letter was far more than a mere offer of a guarantee—it was a contract of guarantee, and was so understood by the plaintiffs and the defendant. The cases of "Mozley v. Tinkler" and "McIver v. Richardson" had been cited in support of the defendant's contention that a guarantee could not be established unless there was an acceptance of it. The first of these cases was distinguishable from the present because it was not shown in it that the alleged guarantee had been acted upon as a guarantee, and the second on the ground that in it the offer of a guarantee was made conditionally. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, with costs.

SMITHWHITE V. MOORE AND SONS (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Personal injuries—Liability of master—No evidence of negligence—Nonsuit.

This action raised a point of law as to the liability of a master for injury sustained by his servant in the course of his employment. The plaintiff, who sued by his father, was employed at the Cheshire Cheese in Fleet-street, and on November 6 of last year he was sent up, between 6 and 7 in the evening, by James, the head waiter, to clean the windows in a room on the fourth floor. The room was imperfectly lighted, and the plaintiff did not observe a crack in one of the panes. While cleaning this pane the glass fell out, and his right wrist was severely cut, the nerve being severed. He claimed damages from the proprietors of the Cheshire Cheese.

Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. F. S. Cooper appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and Mr. Beaufoi Moore for the defendants.

Mr. DODD, after evidence of the injury had been given, submitted that there was no case to go to the jury. The master at common law was responsible only for personal negligence, and there was no evidence that Mr. C. Moore, the managing director of the defendant company, knew that the window was cracked. If there was any negligence it was the negligence of James, a fellow-servant. He referred to "Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Company" (12 A.C., 41).

Mr. WITT, after mentioning "Griffiths v. the London and St. Catharine's Dock Company" (12 Q.B.D., 493) and "Smith v. Baker" ([1891] A.C., 325), submitted that the defendant company were responsible for the actions of James, and that the question of negligence should be left to the jury.

His LORDSHIP held that the plaintiff had no claim in law, and gave judgment for the defendants with costs, but granted, by consent, a stay of execution till June 14 with a view to an appeal.

ECROYD V. COULTHARD.*

Enclosure Acts—Land abutting on river—Fishery—Right to fish—Effect of enclosure award.

The ownership of common rights over land abutting on a river does not confer any rights over the river.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice North, reported in The Times of August 12. The object of the action was to determine the ownership of the soil or bed of the river Eden ad medium flum aqua, so far as it abutted on an estate called Edenbanks, above Carlisle, and the right of fishing therein as incidental to the ownership of the soil. The plaintiff claimed title under a deed of conveyance dated May 14, 1890, from the then Earl of Carlisle, who was lord of the manor of Cumwhitton, in which the Edenbanks estate was situate. This deed conveyed to the plaintiff, inter alia, the several fishery in that part of the river Eden which ran through the parishes of Ainstalle and Cumwhitton. The defendant, Mrs. Leach, derived title under an award of Enclosure Commissioners acting under the provisions of a private Enclosure Act passed in 1796. The other defendants were members of an angling society, and claimed as licensees of Mrs. Leach. It was found to the satisfaction of the Court that at the time when the Enclosure Act was passed the lord of the manor, as owner of one-half of the bed of the part of the river in question had rights of fishing therein and had exercised those rights, and there was no evidence that the tenants of the manor had any commonable rights over the river. The Enclosure Act contained no mention of the river, and it expressly reserved the manorial rights of the lord. By the award of the commissioners, dated April 13, 1801, the property now known as the Edenbanks estate was allotted to William Leach, a predecessor in title of the defendant, Mrs. Leach, and its area was stated in acres. The area so stated was the exact measure of the land if no part of the river bed was included in it. The defendant, Mrs. Leach, claimed that according to the ordinary legal presumption arising on a conveyance of land abutting on a river she was entitled to half of the bed of the river which was adjacent to her estate. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contended that the bed of the river never was part of the waste of the manor, and was not affected by the Enclosure Act, and that, consequently, the ordinary presumption did not apply. And he claimed not only the right of fishing in that part of the river, but also the right of passing along the shore of the river within the Edenbanks estate for fishing purposes. Mr. Justice North held, first, that the half bed of the river did not pass by the award, but belonged to the plaintiff; secondly, that no right of way along the river was reserved to the lord of the manor under the saving clause in the award, and that the defendant, Mrs. Leach, was entitled to an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from trespassing on the Edenbanks estate. Both parties appealed from this decision.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Micklem were for the defendants; Mr. Cripps, Q.C., Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Stuart Moore were for the plaintiff.

The COURT dismissed both appeals.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that at the date of the passing of the Enclosure Act the then Earl of Carlisle was the owner of the soil of the waste abutting on the river, and he was the owner of the right to fish in the river, and the first question was whether the Enclosure Act had any reference at all to the bed of the river. It was a strange thing to say that an Act passed for the purpose of appointing commissioners to allot portions of the waste of the manor should apply to the bed of the river abutting on the waste, notwithstanding that it contained no mention of the river, at any rate when the soil of the river was enjoyed by the lord as a separate tenement. It was argued that prima facie the waste lands extended to one-half the soil of the river, and "Attorney-General v. Harmer" (27 L. J., Ch. 887) was relied on; but that was a case of a grant from the Crown, not an award under an Enclosure Act. It was new to his Lordship that an Enclosure Act could deal with anything except lands over which there were commonable rights, and, looked at from a commonsense point of view, the presumption was against the commoners having anything to do with any other lands. The defendant's case depended entirely upon the assumption that the bed of the river was part of the waste, but, although the owner of land adjoining a river was prima facie the owner of half the bed of that part of the river, no decision could be found which went the length of saying that commoners having rights of turbary or other common rights over lands adjoining a river had any rights over the river. No doubt where the waste was bounded by a river and there was evidence that by the custom of the manor the commoners had a right of fishing in the river, one-half of the river might be presumed to be included in the waste. See "Tilbury v. Silva" (45 Ch. D., 98, 110); but here the river was part of the demesne lands, and was not part of the waste for the purpose of this Enclosure Act. His Lordship therefore thought that Mr. Justice North was right in saying that the defendant, Mrs. Leach, did not acquire any right of fishing in this river. With regard to the cross-appeal the case was covered by the "Duke of Devonshire v. O'Connor" (23 Q.B.D., 468), a decision upon a saving clause in another Enclosure Act framed in identical terms. It was there held that the clause did not preserve to the lord of the manor any right of shooting over the allotted lands. There was no difference between such a right and the right of landing fish and walking over the lands for fishing purposes as was claimed in this case. It was to be observed that this right of fishing, being incidental to the ownership of the bed of the river, was a territorial and not a manorial right. The view taken by Mr. Justice North was right on both points, and both appeals should be dismissed.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and COLLINS gave judgment to the like effect.

IN RE CLARK—EX PARTE SCHULZE.*

Bankruptcy—Husband and wife—Money lent by wife to husband—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, sec. 3—Construction.

*Reported by F. G. BUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sec. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, applies only to money lent by a wife to her husband for the "purpose of any trade or business."

In this case, Mrs. Clark, the wife of the debtor, Matteo Clark, claimed to prove for a debt of a large sum of money against her husband's estate under a receiving order. The sum in respect of which the claim was made consisted of various items, all of which in substance represented money lent or entrusted by the wife to the husband. The principal question was whether the wife was entitled to prove in respect of money which had been lent or entrusted by her to her husband otherwise than for the purposes of trade or business. The proof was admitted for voting purposes by the chairman at the first meeting of creditors, and Mr. Justice Wright held that it was rightly admitted. From his decision an appeal was brought by Schulze, one of the creditors. Section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, enacts that "any money or other estate of the wife lent or entrusted by her to her husband for the purpose of any trade or business carried on by him, or otherwise, shall be treated as assets of her husband's estate in case of his bankruptcy," and that the wife's claim shall be postponed to the claims of the other creditors. Mr. Justice Wright, following the cases of "In re Tidswell" (57 L.T., N.S., 416) and "In re Tuff—ex parte Nottingham" (19 Q.B.D., 88), held that the words "or otherwise" in the section merely qualified the words "carried on," and that, inasmuch as the money in question was not lent for the purpose of trade at all, the section did not apply, and the wife was not postponed to the other creditors. In support of the appeal it was argued that the words "or otherwise" ought not to receive so narrow a construction, and that the section applied to any money lent by a wife to her husband, whether it was lent for the purpose of trade or not.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Hansell appeared for Schulze; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Frank Mellor for Mrs. Clark.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said he could not read the section as meaning that whenever a wife lent any money to her husband she was in the event of his bankruptcy to be postponed to the general creditors. He felt firmly convinced that that could not be the true construction of the words; for it cut out what seemed to be the most important limitation in the section restricting its application to money lent to the husband "for the purpose of any trade or business carried on by him or otherwise." As to what was the true meaning of the words "or otherwise," on that he did not feel so positive. They might mean carried on by his agents, or carried on by him in partnership with others. He thought that the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright was correct, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY said he agreed, though he felt great difficulty in the question. He could not give the words of this section such an interpretation as to make them rational. Any construction of them seemed to be beset with difficulties. But he thought the construction which they were adopting was the least unreasonable.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed. He said that the construction which the appellant invited them to put on the section would lead to an absurd practical result. But quite independently of that consideration he thought that, according to the general rules of construction, the meaning put on the words by Mr. Justice Wright was the true meaning. The section contained a specific proposition followed by general words. He thought that those general words were ancillary in their nature, and that they ought not to be so construed as to do away with the specific proposition.

BAILEY V. WATSON.*

County Court—Costs—Remitted action—Part recovered under O. 14—Transfer as to remainder of claim—Scale of taxation.

This was an appeal from a decision of the learned County Court Judge of the Swansea County Court as to the scale on which certain costs should be taxed. The action was brought in the Swansea Registry of the High Court for the sum of £44 9s. 11d.; and a summons for judgment was taken out under Order XIV. On the hearing of that summons on January 24, 1898, an order was made by the district Registrar that the plaintiff should be at liberty to sign final judgment for £27 18s. 5d., with costs, that the defendant might defend as to £2 0s. 6d. (the remainder of the claim being abandoned), and that the action should be remitted to the Swansea County Court. The defendant paid the £27 18s. 5d., with taxed costs, and afterwards, on February 25, the plaintiff entered the claim for the £2 0s. 6d. in the County Court. The plaintiff recovered judgment for that sum, with costs. And he claimed that these costs should be taxed upon the scale applicable where the amount recovered is between £20 and £50, on the authority of "Keble v. Bennett" (L.R., 1894, 2 Q.B., 329). The Registrar of the County Court held that the costs ought to be taxed on the scale applicable where the amount recovered is between £2 and £5. The learned County Court Judge, however, on appeal to him held, on the authority of "Keble v. Bennett," that the plaintiff was entitled to have the costs taxed on the £20 to £50 scale. From this decision the defendant now appealed.

Mr. R. O. B. Lane appeared for the appellant, and Mr. Meager for the respondent.

The Court allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE DAY, after stating the facts, said that when the district Registrar made the order of January 24, 1898, he finally disposed of the claim as to £27 18s. 5d. There remained the claim for £2 0s. 6d., as to which the Registrar gave leave to defend. And it seemed to his Lordship that the order remitting the action to the County Court was in substance an order remitting the action for £2 0s. 6d. Then the plaintiff recovered judgment for that amount. And the question was whether he could add the £2 0s. 6d. to the £27 18s. 5d. and say that he had recovered £29 18s. 11d. in the County Court. In his Lordship's opinion the plaintiff could not do so. The £27 18s. 5d. was recovered in the High Court, and the costs in respect of that sum had been paid, and the only sum recovered in the County Court was £2 0s. 6d. His Lordship entirely accepted the case of "Keble v. Bennett," which, in his opinion, was rightly decided. But in that case there was no judgment of the High Court, no order for costs, no taxation of costs, and no payment of costs; and what was there remitted to the County Court was the action for the whole amount of the original claim. The case was therefore entirely distinguishable from the present case, where what was remitted was a portion of the original claim only.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

IN RE PERKINS—POYSER V. BEYFUS.*

Landlord and Tenant.—Lease—Assignment—Covenant to indemnify against liability for rent —Sub-assignment—Claim against executors of sub-assignee.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 246), affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice North declaring the estate of a deceased person named Perkins first to be indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £215 4s., paid by the plaintiff for rent and insurance of a house comprised in a lease to the plaintiff dated October 5, 1891; and, secondly, to be liable to indemnify the plaintiff against future rent and insurance and damages for breaches of covenant in the same lease. (See ante, p. 246.) The facts (as stated by the MASTER of the ROLLS) were as follows:—By a lease dated October 5, 1891, a certain house was leased to the plaintiff for a term still unexpired, and by this lease the plaintiff covenanted to pay rent and to insure the house and perform certain other obligations usual in leases. On May 8, 1893, Poyser, the plaintiff, assigned this lease to Plaistowe, and on April 1, 1895, Plaistowe assigned it to Perkins. Each of these assignments contained a covenant by the assignee with his assignor to pay the rent and perform the covenants reserved and contained in the lease of October 5, 1891, and also to keep him, the assignor, indemnified against the same. In June, 1895, Perkins died. On June 12, 1897, Plaistowe was adjudicated bankrupt, and Berry was appointed his trustee. The plaintiff Poyser was called on to pay, and did pay, the arrears of rent, which became due under the lease of October 5, 1891, and he tendered a proof against Plaistowe's estate for £1,353, the amount paid by the plaintiff and the estimated amount of his liability under his covenants contained in such lease. Thereupon a compromise was agreed to between the plaintiff and the trustee in bankruptcy, and was carried out by a deed of August 31, 1897, which gave rise to the present controversy. This deed was made between the trustee of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part. It recited the facts above stated, and then proceeded as follows:—

"Whereas the said Oscar Berry has, with the permission of the said committee of inspection, testified by a resolution passed at a meeting of the said committee of inspection, held the 31st day of August, 1897, at 8, Southwark-street, Borough, in the county of Surrey, and by way of compromise of the claim of the said E. J. Poyser against the estate of the said bankrupt, agreed to sell and dispose of to the said E. J. Poyser the full benefit of the said covenant on the part of the said G. F. Perkins with the rights and powers hereinafter assigned in consideration of the said E. J. Poyser paying to him the sum of £5, and executing such release as is hereinafter contained. Now this indenture witnesseth that, in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the sum of £5 now paid by the said E. J. Poyser to the said Oscar Berry (the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged) and of the release hereinafter contained, the said O. Berry, as trustee, and with the permission testified as aforesaid of the said committee of inspection, doth hereby assign unto the said E. J. Poyser the full benefit of the covenants by the said G. F. Perkins with the said F. M. E. Plaistowe contained in the hereinafter recited indenture of April 1, 1895, as aforesaid, with the right to recover and receive from the said G. F. Perkins, his heirs, executors, or administrators estate or effects, and to retain for the benefit of the said E. J. Poyser, his executors, administrators, and assigns all and every such damages, costs, or other sums of money, if any, and to enforce for the like benefit all such other relief by way of indemnity or otherwise as the said F. M. E. Plaistowe, his executors, or administrators, but for his bankruptcy, or the said O. Berry or other the trustee for the time being in the bankruptcy might have been entitled now, or at any time or times hereafter, to recover or to enforce for the benefit of the said F. M. E. Plaistowe or his estate for any breach or breaches committed or hereafter to be committed of the said covenants or any of them, or otherwise under or in respect of the liability of the said G. F. Perkins or his estate by virtue of such covenants or any of them if these presents and the arrangement hereby entered into had not been executed or made and the right to bring, prosecute, carry, or compound, or release any action or proceeding for any such purpose, and all other rights, powers, privileges, and authorities which the said O. Berry, as such trustee, with such permission as aforesaid, can lawfully transfer to the said E. J. Poyser in connexion with the premises to hold the premises unto the said E. J. Poyser, his executors, administrators, and assigns for his and their own benefit absolutely, and this indenture further witnesseth that in further pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the assignment herebefore contained the said E. J. Poyser hereby withdraws the said proof for the sum of £1,353 0s. 4d., and releases and discharges the estate of the said bankrupt and the said O. Berry as such trustee as aforesaid from all claims and demands under or in respect of the covenants by the said F. M. E. Plaistowe with the said E. J. Poyser contained in the herebefore recited indenture of May 8, 1893, as aforesaid."

Under this deed the plaintiff carried in a claim against Perkins's estate for payment out of his assets of what the plaintiff had paid for rent and insurance and for future indemnity against liability under the covenants contained in the lease of October 5, 1891. It appeared that shortly after Plaistowe's bankruptcy Perkins's executors assigned the lease to a person named Jay, who, however, did not pay the rent or perform the covenants so as to relieve Perkins's estate from liability to Plaistowe, or, rather, to his trustee in bankruptcy. The defendants were Perkins's executors, and they admitted assets. Mr. Justice North made an order allowing the claim, and from this order Perkins's executors appealed.

Mr. Everitt, Q.C., and Mr. E. Ford were for the appellants; Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Wace were for the respondent.

The case was argued in May last.

The MASTER of the ROLLS now delivered the judgment of the Court dismissing the appeal. After stating the facts as above, his Lordship continued:—The appeal raises two questions—viz. (1) whether the rights vested by the Bankruptcy Act in Plaistowe's trustee could be assigned by him to the plaintiff; and (2) whether, having regard to the terms of the deed and the release of Plaistowe's estate, the plaintiff acquired any right to sue Perkins's executors. The first of these questions turns on the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The material sections are 20, 44, 50 clause 5, 56, 57 and 168, which defines "property." It is plain from sections 20, 44, 50 clause 5 and 168, and from the decision in "Hardy v. Fothergill" (13 A. C., 351), that the plaintiff Poyser had a right of proof against Plaistowe's estate not only for the sums paid by the plaintiff for rent and fire insurance, but also in respect of Plaistowe's future liability under his own covenants with the plaintiff. It is also plain from sections 56 and 57 that it was competent for the trustee in bankruptcy to compromise the claim made by the plaintiff and to assign to the plaintiff any assignable asset vested in the trustee upon the terms that the plaintiff should accept such asset in satisfaction of all demands against Plaistowe's remaining assets. It is also plain that the right of the trustee to sue Perkins upon Perkins's covenant was an asset—i.e., was property within the meaning of section 168, and was assignable to the plaintiff or to any one else (see section 56 and “Seear v. Lawson,” 15 Ch.D., 426), and that the damages in an action by the trustee against Perkins's executors would not be confined to the dividend payable to the plaintiff in respect of his proof against Plaistowe's estate. See “Cruse v. Paine” (6 Eg., 641, and 4 Ch., 441.) This disposes of the first ground of appeal. The second turns on the true effect of the release contained in the deed of August, 1897. If this release is to be construed as a release by the plaintiff of Plaistowe or of his estate from all liability under his covenants, then the effect will be to discharge Perkins's estate from all liability under his covenant to indemnify Plaistowe. A liability to indemnify against a liability which has no existence, and which can never arise, is a contradiction in terms. A distinction was attempted to be drawn between the covenant by Perkins to pay the rent and perform the covenant to insure on the one hand, and his covenant to indemnify Plaistowe on the other, and it was contended that, although the release might extinguish all liability on the covenant to indemnify, it did not affect the covenant to pay the rent and to insure. Much time was spent in discussing these points and in examining such cases as “Saward v. Anstey” (2 Bing., 519), “Carr v. Roberts” (5 B. and Ad., 78), and “Ashdown v. Ingamells” (L.R. 5, Ex. D., 280), and in considering the amount of damages which could be recovered if the distinction suggested could be drawn and had in fact to be made. But in the view we take of the true construction of the deed of August 31, 1897, these questions do not arise. The release contained in the deed, although couched in very general terms, must, if possible, be so construed as not to defeat the object or purpose of the deed of which it forms part. The recitals and first witnessing part show that the release cannot be rationally construed as extending to all Plaistowe's estate, including the asset assigned to the plaintiff. The estate released must exclude that asset. Again, the claims and demands from which Plaistowe's estate is released cannot be rationally construed as all claims and demands in respect of Plaistowe's covenants. The claims and demands released must be confined to those against the released assets, and cannot be rationally held to include those the preservation of which is essential to the recovery by the plaintiff of the asset assigned to him and which asset he is to take in satisfaction of all demands. In so construing the release the Court is not departing from well-settled principles applicable to the construction of such documents. General words of release are always controlled by recitals and context which show that, unless the general words are restricted, the object and purpose of the document in which they occur must necessarily be frustrated. General words are always construed so as to give effect to, and not so as to destroy, the expressed intentions of those who use them. Good illustrations of this principle will be found in “Payler v. Homersham” (4 M. and S., 423) and “Lindo v. Lindo” (1 Beav., 496). In our opinion, therefore, the appeal fails on this ground also. It is to be observed that Mr. Justice North has merely given the plaintiff liberty to apply in respect of future breaches of covenant. He has not impounded assets to meet them, nor attempted to estimate damages in respect of them. The order is right both in substance and in form, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

THE QUEEN V. PEARCE—EX PARTE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.*

Lands Clauses Acts—Compensation—Lands injuriously affected—Land taken for School Board—Depreciation of adjoining land through noise made by school children.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi that had been granted for a certiorari to bring up, for the purpose of being quashed, an inquisition, with the verdict and judgment thereon, taken before the Sheriff of London. The case arose out of proceedings for the assessment of the compensation due to Mr. Pearce, certain land belonging to whom was compulsorily taken by the London School Board as the site for a school. The land taken formed part of a building estate in the parish of Paddington belonging to the claimant, Mr. Pearce. The estate was already partly built on, and in the proceedings for the assessment of the compensation, which took place before the learned Under-Sheriff of the county of London and a jury, it was proposed on behalf of the claimant to give evidence that the houses on his estate in the immediate vicinity of the land taken would be depreciated in value owing to the noise that would be caused by the children attending the school. This evidence was objected to on behalf of the School Board on the ground that such depreciation in value did not form a subject for compensation. It was thereupon arranged that the jury should assess the compensation on this head separately in order that the question whether such compensation could properly be given might be brought before the High Court. The jury assessed the compensation on this head at £1,000. The rule nisi in the present case was then obtained.

Mr. FREEMAN, Q.C., and Mr. E. BOYLE appeared to show cause against the rule. They argued that, as part of the claimant's land had been taken, he was entitled to the compensation in question on the principles established in the cases of “Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works” (L.R., 5 H.L., 418) and “Cowper Essex v. Acton Local Board” (L.R., 14 App. Cas., 153).

SIR EDWARD CLARKE, Q.C., Mr. ~~DAY~~, and Mr. MARCHANT appeared in support of the rule. They contended that the damage to the claimant's property would not arise out of the use of the school by the School Board, but from the conduct of the children outside the school—a matter for which the School Board were not responsible—and that the damage, therefore, did not give rise to a claim for compensation. They cited “Caledonian Railway v. Ogilvy” (2 Macq., 229), “City of Glasgow Union Railway v. Hunter” (L.R., 2 H.L., 58, 78).

The COURT discharged the rule.

MR. JUSTICE DAY said that it seemed to him, without giving any opinion as to whether the amount awarded by the jury was right, that the question had been properly left to the jury in accordance with established principles of law. Part of the claimant's land had been taken, and the jury had found that a school carried on in the usual way on the land so taken would injure the residue of the claimant's land; and they had assessed the injury at £1,000. That they were entitled to do, and it was not for the Court to say whether the sum awarded was reasonable or not. It appeared to him that there was no ground for disturbing the verdict of the jury.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

IN RE THE EARL OF SEFTON.*

Lunacy—Property of lunatic—Settlement—Jurisdiction of Court to deal with lunatic's real estate.

In this case an important question was raised as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Lunacy—viz., whether the Court has jurisdiction to direct the committee of the estate of a lunatic to elect on behalf of the lunatic to accept a devise of land made to him, on condition that the devisee should within a year from the death of the testator execute a resettlement of certain family estates and to execute on behalf of the lunatic a resettlement of those estates. The present Earl of Sefton became a lunatic in consequence of a serious accident which he met with, and it was not expected that he would live many months. His father, the late Earl of Sefton, who died in June, 1897, was the tenant for life of settled estates, of which the net rental was about £30,000 a year. The present earl had, in his father's lifetime, and before he became a lunatic, disentailed the settled estates, so far as he could do so without the consent of his father as "protector" of the settlement, and had thus created a "base fee." The late earl was also the absolute owner of some other estates, the net rental of which was about £21,000 a year. By his will, made in 1893, the late earl gave the estates of which he was absolute owner (subject to a term of 1,000 years given to trustees on certain trusts) to the present earl (then Lord Molyneux) and his two younger brothers, the Hon. Osbert and the Hon. Richard Molyneux, as successive tenants for life, with remainders to their issue respectively in tail male after the respective life estates, with remainders over. The testator directed that every person who under the will should become entitled (subject to the term of 1,000 years) as tenant for life or tenant in tail male by purchase to the possession of the devised estates, and who should also become entitled as tenant in tail male or in tail whether by purchase or descent to the possession of the settled estates, should within one year after becoming entitled both under the will and the settlement, or, if an infant, within one year after attaining 21, disentail the settled estates and resettlement them on the same trusts as the devised estates. If the person required to do this should refuse or neglect to do so, then on the expiration of the year the estate given to him by the will was to determine. Power was given to a tenant for life of the devised estates to appoint a jointure not exceeding £5,000, or not exceeding £3,000 if no resettlement should be executed, and to charge portions for younger children to an amount varying, according to the number of the children, from £20,000 to £50,000. The testator also gave a legacy of £10,000 to the present earl if he should execute the resettlement, and also in the same case directed that his executors should, out of the income of his residuary personal estate, pay the debts of the present earl. The next-of-kin of the lunatic (other than the Hon. Osbert Molyneux) took out a summons asking that the committee of the estate might be directed in the name and on behalf of the lunatic to execute a resettlement pursuant to the testator's will of the settled estates. The master refused the application, and the applicants appealed to this Court. The application was made by the next-of-kin, because they would, if the lunatic should not recover, derive benefit from the legacy of £10,000 given to him and from the payment of his debts. It was opposed by Mr. Osbert Molyneux, because he would be prejudiced if it were granted. The main question was whether the Court had jurisdiction, either original or statutory, to do what was asked, and there was the further question whether it would be for the benefit of the lunatic to do so.

Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy were for the next-of-kin; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Arkle were for Mr. Osbert Molyneux; Mr. P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Sargent were for the committee.

The COURT granted the application.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that he had come to the conclusion that the Court had jurisdiction to make the order asked for, and that the Court ought to exercise its jurisdiction. Lord Sefton, who was unfortunately a lunatic, was entitled to a base fee in certain estates of considerable value, and by his father's will certain other valuable estates were left to him on condition of his resettling the estates which he already had, and so cutting down his interest in those estates. Bearing in mind that, under his father's will, Lord Sefton obtained other benefits besides the valuable estates devised to him, it could not be doubted from any point of view that if this gentleman was at all likely to live and was actuated by respect for his father's wishes, he would accept the condition imposed by the will. His Lordship was not prepared to say that the question of what was for the lunatic's benefit was simply a question of whether he would get a little more money or not, but in this case it was also for the pecuniary interest of the lunatic to accept the condition. It was plain that it was for the benefit and interest of the lunatic to perform the condition upon which alone he could keep the estates devised by his father's will. If the matter were looked at apart from the Lunacy Act, 1890, speaking generally, and without reference to the Statute De Prerogativa Regis, the following propositions were elementary and beyond dispute:—First, that a lunatic could accept a gift or bequest or devise of property; secondly, that he could accept such gift, bequest, or devise subject to conditions, provided that it was for his benefit to do so; and, thirdly, that it was the duty of the committee in such circumstances to perform the conditions; and, if one of the conditions was that the lunatic should give up some interest in real estate to which he was entitled, these general propositions would apply to that case. It was said that the Statute De Prerogativa Regis prevented this. That statute directed the King to provide that the lands and tenements of lunatics should be safely kept without waste or destruction, and that they and their families should be competently maintained out of the income, and that the residue beyond their maintenance should be kept for their use to be delivered to them so soon as they should have recovered their memory, so that such lands and tenements should in no wise be aliened, and the King should take nothing for his own use. That last proviso had received a very narrow construction, and it had been held that the Court had no power to sell or mortgage the property of the lunatic, even to protect him from arrest under a ca. sa. But it would be introducing a still narrower construction to say that it was not competent for the Court to give up an interest in real estate belonging to a lunatic to enable him to obtain a larger estate. That would be to establish a bad precedent and to defeat the object of the statute, which was to preserve the property of the lunatic. In his Lordship's opinion, this application was within the general jurisdiction of the Court. With regard to the Act of 1890, it appeared from a careful examination of all the sections that this case could not be brought within any of them without unduly straining the language. His Lordship therefore based his judgment upon the general jurisdiction of the Court.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and COLLINS gave judgment to the like effect.

THE GRAND JUNCTION WATERWORKS COMPANY V. THE HAMPTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Streets—Line of buildings—Action for a declaratory judgment—Pending criminal proceedings—Discretion of the Court.

In this action the plaintiffs sought to obtain a declaration that they were entitled to erect an engine-house and any other buildings they might think proper for the purposes of their undertaking upon certain land belonging to them without the consent of the defendants. The circumstances under which the action was brought were shortly as follows:—The plaintiffs were by their Acts of Parliament authorized and bound to supply water to a large district on the western side of London in the counties of London and Middlesex, and had constructed waterworks for that purpose. In 1853 they had, under the powers of the Grand Junction Waterworks Act, 1852, and the Acts incorporated therewith, acquired a piece of land adjoining the Upper Sunbury-road within the defendants' district, upon which the plaintiffs had constructed certain works, and from time to time had added to such works. In 1897, additional pumping accommodation having become necessary, the plaintiffs desired to further extend their works by erecting upon the piece of land referred to an engine-house in connexion with their existing works. A dispute having arisen between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to whether or not the plaintiffs had power to erect the engine-house without the defendants' consent, considerable correspondence took place between them. On October 20, 1897, the plaintiffs gave the defendants notice of their intention to proceed with the construction of the proposed work, and afterwards commenced the same. Upon this the defendants' clerk wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitors that if the work was proceeded with he was directed to take legal proceedings against the plaintiffs for contravening the provisions of the Public Health Act (Buildings in Streets), 1888, by bringing their proposed engine-house beyond the front of the main walls of the buildings on either side. The plaintiffs then issued the writ in this action, in which they contended that under their Act of 1852 they had power to erect buildings on the land in question, and that such power overrode the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1888, with reference to the building line so as to admit of the company erecting their building where they found it necessary, even if it were beyond the general building line. The defendants had on March 15, 1898, laid an information before the Middlesex magistrates alleging that the plaintiffs had by the erection of so much of the engine-house as was then erected committed an offence under the Public Health Act, 1888. The magistrates had decided against the company, who had appealed to the Divisional Court, and those proceedings were still pending. In their statement of defence to the action the defendants relied upon section 93 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, by virtue of which they contended that the plaintiffs were not exempted from the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1888. They further contended that the Court had no jurisdiction to make the declaration asked for, and that, if there was jurisdiction, it was discretionary and ought not to be exercised, but that the plaintiffs should be left to establish their defence before the special tribunal entrusted with the determination of the question involved. The case now came before the Court upon a summons for the determination of the points of law raised upon the pleadings.

Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. R. C. Glen appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. C. E. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Courthope-Munroe for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING said that the statement of claim asked simply for a declaration of right. That form of action was justified by reference to Order 65, rule b, of the rules of the Supreme Court, which provided that "No action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the Court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not." The latter part of that rule was expressed in the very widest terms. It was said, however, it must be read with some limitation, and it was suggested that the Court had no jurisdiction to make any declaration, because neither before nor after the passing of the Judicature Act could such relief have been given. His Lordship was not called upon to decide whether any such limitation was to be read into the rule. He was not satisfied that in this case there was an entire absence of jurisdiction, having regard to the authorities. His Lordship then referred to and discussed the cases of "Lord Auckland v. Westminster District Board of Works" (L.R., 7 Ch., 597); "Kerr v. Corporation of Preston" (L.R., 6 Ch. D., 463); and "Stannard v. Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell" (L.R., 20 Ch. D., 190). In the face of these authorities it could not be said that there was no jurisdiction in the Court to restrain the proceedings before a magistrate. But, assuming the jurisdiction, it seemed to his Lordship it ought to be exercised with the greatest care. He adopted the language of the Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) in "Stannard v. Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell":—"Where the Legislature has pointed out a mode of proceeding before a magistrate it is not, as a general rule, for another Court to interfere to stop that proceeding by injunction." His Lordship desired to add that in contests between local authorities and private owners that rule ought to be adhered to very strictly. The Legislature had provided a mode of obtaining a decision, and it would be a matter of regret if a more expensive method were resorted to in such cases. His Lordship's own experience led him to believe that vestries and other local authorities were too ready to embark in costly litigation where there was no equivalent advantage to the public whom they represented, and he would be sorry, in cases where a cheap and speedy method of procedure was pointed out by the Legislature, to see a more expensive one resorted to. The Court, therefore, in the exercise of its discretion, ought to be slow to restrain proceedings before a magistrate where that method of procedure was pointed out by the Legislature. A fortiori the Court ought to be slow, in the absence of special circumstances, to make a declaration in such a case as this. That brought his Lordship to the question whether there were in this case any such special circumstances, and, in his judgment, there were not. He thought he ought not to interfere either by way of injunction or by making a declaration in accordance with the claim. The matter ought to be left to the tribunal pointed out by the Legislature. The action must be dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Rigby, } 1898. and Vaughan Williams, L.J.J.) June 15.

STANGE AND CO. V. LOWITZ.*

Principal and Agent—Stockbrokers—Secret commission—Repudiation of contract.

The defendant discovered that the plaintiffs, who were stockbrokers but not members of the Stock Exchange, besides charging commission had in their contract notes sent to him added something to the price at which they had really bought. Held, that he was entitled to repudiate such contracts.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Ridley at the trial of an action without a jury. The action was brought by a firm of stockbrokers, who were not members of the Stock Exchange, to recover from their customer, the defendant, a sum of money which they alleged to be due to them in respect of transactions for the purchase of shares carried out by them on his behalf. The transactions took place in July and August, 1897. On August 27 the plaintiffs asked for payment of the sum which they alleged to be due—viz., £219. The defendant having discovered that the plaintiffs, besides charging commission, had in their contract notes sent to him added something to the price at which they had bought through a member of the Stock Exchange, claimed the right to repudiate the transactions altogether. The plaintiffs admitted that they were not entitled to recover overcharges, and submitted to have them deducted, but claimed that they were entitled to recover, after such deduction, £178. At the trial of the action Mr. Justice Ridley gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed.

Mr. RUFUS ISAACS, for the defendant, said his contention was that, where an agent employed to carry out a transaction made a secret profit, his principal, on discovery thereof, might either claim the secret profit or, if he thought fit, repudiate the whole transaction ; and where an agent acted as principal, his principal might, on discovery, repudiate the transaction. He would take one instance out of many to show the way in which the plaintiffs acted. Their account showed on one side a purchase of 100 Louisville shares by the plaintiffs through a Mr. Johnson, a member of the Stock Exchange, at 60½ ; and on the other side it showed a sale of 100 Louisville shares by the plaintiffs to the defendant at 60½. The plaintiffs, besides charging commission in the usual way, added one-sixteenth to the price. In a number of cases they made similar overcharges, and in all the other cases they made no purchase at all. They were therefore not entitled to recover anything in this action.

Mr. T. W. CHITTY and Mr. SCHILLER, for the plaintiffs, argued in support of the judgment of the learned Judge.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that this was an action by outside stockbrokers, who sued the defendant for an indemnity in respect of certain contracts for the purchase of shares. They alleged that they had entered into those contracts with third parties acting on behalf of the defendant as brokers, and had incurred liabilities under them to those parties to the amount claimed in the action. The defendant called on the plaintiffs to show him the contracts which they alleged they had so entered into on his behalf with third parties, and in which they alleged they had incurred the liabilities in respect of which they claimed indemnity. He would take by way of example one of the contracts in respect of which the plaintiffs claimed indemnity—viz., that for the purchase of 100 Louisville shares. The contract which the plaintiffs passed on to the defendant in that case was a contract for the purchase of the shares at the price of 60 10-16ths. When the plaintiffs were called upon to produce the contract to that effect made by them on behalf of the defendant upon which they claimed indemnity, they could produce no such contract. They produced a contract for the purchase of 100 Louisville shares, but at a different price—viz., 60½. That was not the contract which they alleged they had effected for the defendant, and upon which they claimed indemnity. They did, no doubt, effect a contract through a broker named Johnson for the purchase of 100 Louisville shares, but they never passed that contract on to the defendant ; the contract which they passed on to the defendant was not that contract but a different one—viz., a contract for the purchase of 100 Louisville shares at 60 10-16. That was one instance only, but the case was similar with regard to the other contracts in respect of which indemnity was claimed. In no single case could the plaintiffs show that they had effected the contract for the purchase of shares which they alleged they had effected on behalf of the defendant, and upon which they claimed indemnity. That being so, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the indemnity which they claimed, because they could not show that they had in fact made upon behalf of the defendant as agents the contracts in respect of which they claimed indemnity.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgments to the same effect.

Revenue—Income-tax—Enforcing payment—Distress—Liability of occupier of premises—5 and 6 Vict., c. 35, sec. 70—17 and 18 Vict., c. 34, sec. 35.

In this case Mr. Kemp, Q.C., and Mr. J. B. Matthews appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Finlay, Q.C. (the Solicitor-General), and Mr. Danckwerts for the defendant.

The action was for damages for wrongful distress and raised a question of considerable importance—namely, the liability of the occupier of premises to pay arrears of income-tax, under Schedule A, which had accrued during previous years during which the premises had been unoccupied. The facts, as given in the evidence for the plaintiff (the defendant's witnesses were not called), were briefly as follows. The plaintiff is a cooper, carrying on an extensive business at various places, including No. 286, High-street, Stratford. The defendant is the district collector of taxes. The plaintiff entered into possession of the premises on April 22, 1897, under a lease for 60 years from December 25, 1896, but in consideration of the plaintiff doing certain repairs rent was only to be paid from June, 1897. For two or three years before the plaintiff took possession the premises had been unoccupied. In August, 1897, a demand for £9 3s. 4d., income-tax under Schedule A for the year from April 6, 1896, to April 5, 1897, was served upon the plaintiff. He went to the office and, as he alleged, satisfied the collector that he was not liable to pay. The demand was, however, made again in October and, upon his refusal to pay, a man was put into his premises, who took an inventory of his goods. The plaintiff complained, and the defendant, coming to the conclusion that the distress was wrongful, withdrew it. Upon these facts the Solicitor-General contended that, it being admitted that the premises were rightly assessed to the amount in question, the plaintiff should have paid it and deducted it from his rent. The assessment not having been appealed against was conclusive. Moreover, the defendant was protected by his warrant ("Henderson v. Preston," 21 Q.B.D., 362). Mr. Kemp and Mr. J. B. Matthews having replied, the Court adjourned, and this morning

His LORDSHIP delivered the following judgment:—The plaintiff complains that the defendant on November 15, 1897, broke and entered premises in the possession of the plaintiff, 286, High-street, Stratford, and took an inventory and left a man in possession of the plaintiff's goods. The question in the case is whether the entry, which it is admitted was made by or under the direction of the defendant as a duly appointed collector for the purpose of the Income-tax Acts, was a lawful entry. I am of opinion that it was and that no action will lie. The question arises in this way:—A lease was granted to the plaintiff by the owners of the premises in question on April 22, 1897, for 60 years from December 25, 1896, at the rent of £65 a year, payable quarterly, the first payment not to be made till September 29. In consideration that the plaintiff had agreed to carry out certain repairs on the premises he was to have the premises rent free until June. An assessment amounting to £9 3s. 4d. had been made on the premises for the year April 6, 1896, to April 5, 1897, inclusive, pursuant to the Finance Act, 1896. The plaintiff did not take possession of the premises in question until the end of April, 1897. On August 9 a demand for the sum of £9 3s. 4d. was made upon the plaintiff, and again about the end of September a demand notice for the same sum was handed to him. He declined to pay, contending that he was not liable, and on November 17 an entry was made upon his premises to enforce the payment of the £9 3s. 4d., which is the entry complained of. The point raised by the plaintiff is that, as he was not in occupation of the premises during any parts of the financial year in respect of which the assessment was made, the defendant had no right to enter the premises for the purpose of making a distress to enforce the payment of the amount assessed. But it seems to me that section 70 of the 5 and 6 Vict., c. 35, meets the case. That section is as follows:—
 "That the said several duties shall be assessed on all lands, tenements, and hereditaments whether occupied at the time of assessment or not; and so far as respects the duties chargeable under Schedule A, in case any lands charged to the said duties shall be unoccupied, and no distress can be found on the same at the time such duties shall be payable, it shall be lawful for the collector of the parish or place where the said lands are situate for the time being, at any time after, to enter upon the said lands when there shall be any distress thereupon to be found, and the distress to seize and sell, under the like powers as he might have distrained on the same lands if in the occupation of such person at the time the duties became due. Provided always that the said duties or either of them shall not be levied on any house which shall be or become unoccupied for such year or portion of the year as the same shall be unoccupied, but the assessment thereupon for such year or portion of the year as aforesaid shall upon appeal be discharged or diminished by the Commissioners on due proof of the time during which such house remained unoccupied." That seems to me to be an enactment expressly providing for this very case and the only question which arises is how far the provisions of section 70 are qualified by the subsequent provisions contained in the 16 and 17 Vict., c. 34, section 35. That section enacts that tenants of land who are called upon to pay arrears due from former occupiers may deduct the amount from their rent. Then follows this proviso:—"Provided that nothing in the said Act of the 5 and 6 year of her Majesty c. 35, or in this Act contained shall extend to authorize the levying upon any such occupier for the time being any arrear of the duty assessed under Schedule A . . . which ought to have been levied upon and ultimately paid and borne by any former occupier of the same land." This proviso undoubtedly qualifies the former general enactment, but the proviso only applies in terms to cases where the arrear of duty ought to have been ultimately paid and borne by a former occupier of the land. If the tax gatherer has no opportunity of getting the tax from an owner who is the actual occupier and neglects his opportunity then the tax gatherer cannot avail himself of the 70th section of the earlier Act in order to make up for his own neglect. But no such state of things existed in the present case. The owner was not in occupation at the time of the assessment, and there is nothing in the circumstances of this case to qualify the operation of section 70. I should have been glad to have left the question of damages to the jury, so that in the event of the Court of Appeal taking a different view of the law, it would not be necessary to come down again for trial, but the Solicitor-General informs me that several of the facts which may have some bearing on the amount of damages are in dispute and that he has several witnesses to call if the question of damages is gone into. In the circumstances I think I ought to act upon my own view of the law and not to allow time to be taken up in hearing evidence which, according to the view I take, is immaterial. The Solicitor-General agrees if the Court of Appeal should consider that an action will lie to assent to the damages being assessed in any manner the Court of Appeal may direct, and of course the Court of Appeal will have power to direct who shall pay the costs of assessing the damages if an assessment of damages should become necessary.

Judgment was given for the defendant, and, on Mr. Kemp's undertaking not to appeal, the Solicitor-General agreed not to ask for costs.

the Court of Appeal, Lord Esher (Master of the Rolls) and Lord Justice Rigby, from whom Lord Justice A. L. Smith dissented. The case was opened on May 23 and the arguments finished on June 14. The case, which involves an important point of commercial law, is reported, 13 The Times L.R., 375, 553; [1897] 2 Q.B., 485; 66 L.J., Q.B., 819.

Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton appeared for the appellants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. James Fox for the respondents.

The facts are thus stated by LORD WATSON in his judgment:—The respondent company had on February 1, 1897, contracted to provide steam tonnage for the conveyance of a quantity of material to be used in the construction of the Pretoria-Pietersburg Railway from Maryport, and other ports in the United Kingdom or the Continent, to Delagoa Bay. With a view to part fulfilment of that contract they, on February 22, 1897, chartered from the appellant company the steamship Carlton, about 4,000 tons burden. At the date of the charterparty the Carlton was at Barry taking in her bunker coal; and by its terms she was to proceed “to Senhouse Dock, Maryport, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there load in the customary manner (Sundays and holidays excepted), always afloat as and when ordered by the said charterers, a full and complete cargo of rails and (or) accessories, say, about 2,850 tons and not more than 3,000 tons, and there-with proceed to Delagoa Bay.” No time is specified for the arrival of the Carlton at Maryport beyond the expectation that she would reach that harbour on Wednesday, February 24; but it was stipulated that in the event of the ship not being at their disposal at Maryport not later than March 5 the charterers should have the option of cancelling the charter. It was by the charterparty provided that demurrage, if any, was to be paid for at the rate of £30 for each working day, “except in case of strikes, lock-outs, labour disturbances, trade disputes, accidents, or other hindrance beyond charterers’ control.” The depth of water in the Senhouse Dock, Maryport, depends upon the state of the tides, and may be affected to some extent by the winds which happen to prevail at the time. Each period of high water lasts for about a fortnight, during which there may be a depth of upwards of 14ft. relied on. Between these periods there is an interval of six or seven days during which the depth of water in the dock may not exceed 14ft. 6in. in the morning or 14ft. 7in. in the evening. The Carlton arrived in the basin of Maryport harbour on the night of Saturday, February 27, and on the morning of Sunday, the 28th, she went into the Senhouse Dock. At that time, owing to her bunker coal being on board, the ship was not upon an even keel, her draught forward being 11ft. and aft 17ft. 5in. On Monday, March 1, the charterers’ agent gave an order to the master in these terms, “You will please place your steamer into the middle berth east side Senhouse Dock, where your cargo is waiting shipment.” From that time the controversy began which has developed into this litigation. On the evening of Friday, March 5, the Carlton was admitted by the harbour-master to the berth to which she had been ordered, which had just been vacated by the Abermaid. At that date the current period of spring tides had so far elapsed that it had become impossible to begin and complete the loading of the ship before the return of the neaps. Between the Friday evening and the morning of Tuesday, March 9, 675 tons of cargo were put on board, after which the ship drew 15ft. 9in. forward and 16ft. 11in. aft. The tides were then gradually ebbing, and even with the amount of cargo already on board, the Carlton could not have lain afloat in the dock during the neaps. Accordingly, on the Tuesday morning, the Carlton left Maryport

Dock and went to Barrow, where she offered to ship the remainder of the cargo. Whilst matters stood in that position an application was made to Mr. Justice Mathew to determine the relative rights and obligations of the shipowners and the charterers; but a compromise was effected by which it was arranged that, without prejudice to the rights of either party, the Carlton should return to the Senhouse Dock at Maryport, there load the remainder of her cargo, and get away by the next spring tides after March 17. In pursuance of that arrangement, the Carlton returned to her berth in the Senhouse Dock upon the morning of Tuesday, March 16, and immediately commenced loading. On Saturday, March 20, she left the dock with 2,860 tons of rails on board. On March 12, 1897, the appellants brought the present action, in which they claim demurrage or damages, in respect of (1) detention of their ship for 15 days; (2) port and other charges during that period; and (3) dead freight upon the cargo short shipped. The third of these claims is not now insisted on, and need not be further noticed. Mr. Justice Mathew entered judgment for the appellants, for an amount to be agreed upon by the parties, or in case of their differing to be settled by the Court. His order was set aside and judgment entered for the respondents by a majority of the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Esher, M.R., with Lord Justice Rigby, Lord Justice A. L. Smith dissenting.

LORD HERSHELL, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, and after stating the facts, said,—It is said that the charterers were bound to know the condition of the harbour, and that they were under some obligation in that respect which did not rest on the shipowner. I do not propose to discuss the extent of the knowledge of one party or the other. But I cannot see that the obligation is different in one case or the other, or that the charterer is specially bound to know the conditions of the harbour; because, without inquiring into the actual knowledge possessed, I can entertain no doubt that the obligations and rights created by the charterparty must be construed with reference to the natural conditions of the particular harbour, which is the place of loading according to the charterparty. It was suggested that there are cases in which particular berths are less favourable than others for loading cargoes, and that where the charterer has the right to name the berth it would be unreasonable that he should name a berth which would prolong the loading to the detriment of the shipowner. That is a question which I do not think it necessary to consider, because considerations would arise in that case which have no place in the present. The difficulty in the present case existed in respect not of a particular berth, but of the entire dock. The charterparty provides no lay days. The obligation, therefore, was to load within a reasonable time. The question is, What elements are to be taken into account where a vessel is to load within a reasonable time? The judgment in the case of “Hick v. Raymond” in this House (7 The Times L.R., 732; 62 L.J., Q.B. 98; [1893] A.C., 22) clearly lays down the conditions, and it was there held that the obligation is performed within a time which is reasonable when the circumstances which caused the delay are not imputable to personal fault or negligence; and Lord Watson stated that the rule as to reasonable time is not to be confined to contracts for goods to be carried by sea, but that a party must be held to have fulfilled his obligation so long as the delay is attributable to causes beyond his control, and he has acted neither negligently nor unreasonably. If that be the true test, it is difficult to see why the natural conditions of the harbour, which prevented the loading except after some delay, are not to be taken into account in determining whether there was unreasonable delay or not.

It is said you are not to take that into account, because the stipulation is to be inserted for the protection of the shipowner, and you ought to discuss the question of reasonable time as if there were no such stipulation. But there is no such thing as "reasonable time" in the abstract. The question is whether, having regard to all the stipulations of the contract and to all the conditions, there has been anything like negligence or wilful delay. It is quite inadmissible to shut out consideration of the actual circumstances. You must not exclude any terms of the contract between the parties. Taking the law to be as I have stated, is there any case here made out that the charterer took more than a reasonable time to load this vessel? It is admitted that the vessel could not by any human being have been loaded before she was, in fact, loaded. Then it is said that by this charterparty the charterer was bound as soon as the vessel arrived to name a berth where she could lie always afloat. But where is any such obligation to be found in the charterparty? There is no provision to that effect. If it exists, it can only be because that must be inferred to have been the intention of the parties. But it is impossible to find by implication in this contract any such condition. It is obvious that the time of the arrival of the vessel in the port depends largely upon the shipowner. Until she arrives the charterer has no control over her, and it is clear that in such a port the ship might arrive at a time when it would be impossible to name a place where she could load a cargo. It would be unreasonable to suppose that the parties contracted to accomplish the impossible. I am disposed to surmise that these contingencies were not foreseen. But we must consider the charterparty according to its terms. It is urged that it was hard upon the shipowner; that is naturally his view; but it can have no effect on the rights of the parties as they are to be ascertained. For these reasons I confess that I am unable to see any ground for differing from the decision of the Court of Appeal.

LORD WATSON, after stating the facts as above, proceeded:—If the Carlton had reached Maryport, as her owners anticipated, on Wednesday, February 24, she would, if her berth had been then available, have been able to lie afloat from the commencement to the completion of her loading; and it is clear that, had her loading not commenced until March 16, the whole cargo might have been put on board continuously whilst she was afloat. The appellant company maintain that, under the charterparty, as soon as the Carlton arrived at Maryport it was the duty of the respondents forthwith to provide a berth for her in which she could at once, and without any delay proceed to take on board her cargo continuously, and could remain afloat until her loading was completed and she left her port. I do not think that any such obligation is imposed upon the respondents by the language of the charterparty, which is exceptional; and in construing the terms of that instrument it appears to me to be legitimate to take into account the fact, which was not disputed, that the character of the harbour of Maryport was known to the appellants as well as to the respondents. As was pointed out by Lord Justice Rigby, the correspondence produced shows that the owners of the Carlton were quite alive to the risk, if not the certainty, to which their ship was exposed of touching and resting upon the ground at some states of the tide. In my opinion, the construction for which they contend is unreasonable and objectionable. It makes the nature of the obligation incumbent upon the charterers variable, and entirely dependent upon the time at which the Carlton might find it convenient or possible to arrive at the harbour. If she arrived about the commencement of a period of spring tides it might not be difficult to find a berth for her at which she could begin and complete the loading of her cargo, she being during the whole time afloat. On the other hand, if she arrived towards the termination of the same period, it would be simply impossible to provide a berth for her in the Senhouse Dock, where, if she began to take in cargo at once, she could remain afloat until her loading was completed. The charterparty does not contain any provision to the effect that the ship shall "lie afloat" at all times whilst she is in the harbour of Maryport. It merely provides that she is to "load in the customary manner, always afloat." These words, according to their natural meaning, go no farther than to impose a qualification of the charterer's right to load by negating his right to put cargo on board except at times when the ship is afloat. In these circumstances I concur in the result which commended itself to the majority of the Appeal Court. I think the Carlton was rightly directed to a berth, where if she had chosen to wait, she could have continued afloat until the whole of her cargo was continuously shipped, and that the respondents cannot be held responsible for delay occasioned by natural and physical causes which were beyond their control.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. Maryport is a tidal harbour. Tables are published showing the expected height of water for every day of the year. A shipowner may be presumed to know the draught of his own ship with a cargo on board which he proposes to carry. It must therefore be taken that the shipowner in this case entered into the charterparty with the knowledge that in the ordinary course of navigation his ship, if she arrived at her destination at certain states of the tide, would be delayed in shipping her cargo, assuming that she was going to ship it (as provided by the contract) "always afloat." The substantial question is, Who is to suffer for that delay—the shipowner or the charterer? There is no special provision throwing the loss on the charterer. The loss has arisen in the ordinary course of navigation, and therefore, as it seems to me, the shipowner must bear it. I quite agree with the Court of Appeal in their view of the order which was given to the shipowner to proceed to the berth in Senhouse Dock. It seems to me to have been a proper and a reasonable order. It was for the shipowner to consider, having regard to the state of the tides, whether he would go to the berth at once and take in part of his cargo or wait until he could ship the whole of it continuously, "always afloat." To complete the loading, whether he began it at once or not, he would have to wait till the next spring tides. That, say Mathew, J., and A. L. Smith, L.J., is an unreasonable time to wait. I cannot understand how it can be unreasonable when it is the period required by the character of the harbour, the laws of nature, and the regular recurrence of spring tides. Having regard to the known accommodation of this harbour and upon this contract, it seems to me that it would be most unreasonable to hold that at the time when this vessel arrived and in the state of the tides the charterers were bound to provide a berth with a depth of water which both parties knew was physically impossible. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD SHAND, in the course of his judgment, said,—The charterer has done all that is possible and all that can, I think, be inferred from his obligation under the charterparty if he provides the cargo as soon as, having in view the nature of the harbour, the loading can be proceeded with and effected without grounding the ship. Accordingly I have only to add that the respondents in this case fulfilled this obligation. The contract admitted of being fulfilled in its very terms, although in certain contingencies delay would certainly occur with the loading. I can find no breach of contract on the part of the charterer. He could not, consistently with the shipowner's stipulation that the loading should take place only when the ship was afloat, do more than he did. The unfortunate delay was the result of a stipulation by the shipowner, necessary no doubt for the safety of his ship, but having made that stipulation he must bear the loss consequent on its fulfilment. The learned Judge in the Court of Appeal who differed from the majority of the Court put the case of a delay in the loading which might last for six months or one month under such a charterparty as the present. It is difficult to suppose that any shipowner would make a contract so improvident as to produce this result. But, with the utmost deference to the very learned Judge, I can only say that, even with such a case, the responsibility of the charterer would not thereby be enlarged. The shipowner must still bear the consequence of the delay. But it may very well be that, as the consequence of the adventure was found to be so disastrous to the shipowner, on the authority of the cases cited by Mr. Robson, he might be held entitled to abandon the contract and leave the harbour unloaded, a course which would certainly not entitle him to make a claim for damages like the present, in which no provision is made for such a contingency or even for a limited number of lay days on the expiry of which a claim for demurrage would arise.

WARD V. PORTSMOUTH CORPORATION.*

Burial Ground—Burial Acts, 1852 and 1853—Construction—"New burial ground"—Burial authority—Power to buy land—Approval of Secretary of State.

A burial authority may buy land for purposes of interment at a future date without the sanction of the Secretary of State.

Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 321), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne (reported ante, p. 321), in which he held that under the Burial Acts, 1852 and 1853, a burial authority had no power to buy land intended to provide at a future date for interment without the previous sanction of a Secretary of State. The decision of the case turned on the meaning of the expression "provide and use" a burial ground, which by force of certain sections of those Acts a burial authority is prohibited from doing without the sanction of a Secretary of State. The short facts of the case were as follows:—The plaintiff, Mr. William Ward, being then the owner of certain land in the parish of Portsea, in August, 1889, agreed with the burial board for the parish of Portsmouth for the purchase of the land for £6,270, of which £100 was to be (and, in fact, was) paid at the time and the balance on completion of the purchase on June 24, 1896. Before the agreement was entered into the consent of the Portsmouth Vestry was obtained, as required by section 26 of the Burial Act, 1852. In January, 1895, the Corporation of Portsmouth, as the urban sanitary authority, passed a resolution under section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1894, in pursuance of which the corporation became the statutory successors of the burial board on June 11, 1896. The corporation intimated to the plaintiff, Mr. Ward, that it did not intend to complete the contract. The land had been agreed to be bought for the purpose of enlarging the then existing cemetery for the parish of Portsmouth, but the Home Secretary had refused to give to the corporation the approval required by the Burial Act, 1853. The plaintiff contended that this refusal did not justify the corporation in refusing to complete their contract to purchase, and brought the present action for specific performance of the contract, or, alternatively, for damages. Mr. Justice Byrne gave judgment for the defendant corporation, and the plaintiff appealed.

Their LORDSHIPS unanimously reversed the decision. They gave damages instead of specific performance.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Methold were for the appellant; Mr. Robson, Q.C., Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. George Williamson for the respondent corporation.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said,—The Burial Act, 1853, extends the Burial Act, 1852, with some modifications, to the whole of England and Wales, and is the Act on which the decision of this Court turns, and it is impossible to understand the Act of 1853 without understanding the Act of 1852 and the machinery provided for carrying it out within the limits to which, until extended, it was confined. I will first, therefore, examine that Act. Sections 2 to 8 provide for closing burial grounds where the continued use of them may be injurious to public health. This part of the Act introduces the Secretary of State and Orders in Council. Sections 9 to 32 relate to the provision of new burial grounds. It is first necessary to constitute some authority to provide a ground. This is done by sections 10, 11, and 24. The first step is to convene a meeting to consider whether a burial ground shall be provided; and if it is resolved to provide one a copy of the resolution is to be sent to the Secretary of State (see section 10), but no approval by him of the proceeding is required; if the resolution is passed then a burial board is to be formed (section 11), and when formed it is incorporated (section 24). As soon as a burial board is formed it is to provide a burial ground (section 25). This necessarily involves obtaining or appropriating land for the purpose. Section 24 authorizes the board to take and hold land for such purpose, and this section therefore enables the board to accept a gift of land from any one who may be willing to make such gift, whether by deed or will. But the Act further empowers the board, with the consent of the vestry, to buy land for providing a burial ground (section 26); and with the consent of the vestry and the guardians to appropriate parish land for the purpose of a burial ground (section 29). Further, the board is empowered to lay out and embellish any burial ground provided by the board (section 30), and to build a chapel on any land purchased or appropriated for a burial ground (section 30), and such burial ground may be consecrated when in a fit and proper condition for interment (section 30); and in providing any burial ground the board is required to set apart a portion which shall not be consecrated. Supposing all this to be done, the land does not become the burial ground of the parish until the Bishop has consecrated it, or, if no consecration is necessary, has fixed a time for its becoming such burial ground (see section 32). Provision is made by section 23 for providing burial grounds for several parishes; and by section 20 for borrowing money with the sanction of the vestry and the Treasury for providing and laying out burial grounds and building chapels upon them. Then by section 28 the board is empowered, with the approval of the vestry, to sell land purchased by the board under the Act and in which no interment has been made, and which the board may consider to be sold. Such being the scheme of the Act, I return to the prohibition contained in section 9. The word "provide," as applied to new burial grounds, clearly in some cases includes purchase—e.g., under section 20 money may be borrowed for providing, which must include buying. So in section 25 as regards access providing seems to include buying. But buying and providing are not synonymous expressions. Burial grounds may be acquired without buying, and the words "in providing" which occur in the proviso at the end of section 30 can hardly mean in buying or acquiring; they point to a later stage in the process of rendering the land referred to fit for a burial ground. The process of providing a parochial burial ground begins with acquiring it and ends with its consecration or the appointment by the Bishop of the time fixed for its becoming a burial ground under section 32. Section 26 clearly authorizes the purchase of lands out of the metropolis and the two-mile limit without the consent of the Secretary of State. When, now, we turn back to section 9 and consider the language of the prohibition contained in it I cannot think it prevents a burial board from taking the first step towards providing a burial ground without the sanction of a Secretary of State. The prohibition is not against acquiring land, but against providing and using burial grounds, and does not, I think, control section 26 even within the metropolitan limits. The Secretary is brought in to protect public health and the maintenance of public decency (see sections 2 and 34) and the prohibition against "providing and using" serves every useful purpose if it is held to apply to some later step than the first in the process of providing. Mr. Justice Byrne was impressed by the difficulty that, unless the prohibition includes acquiring, the prohibition might just as well have been confined to "using." But, feeling as I do the full force of this observation, I feel greater difficulty still in cutting down the plain language of sections 26 and 29, which are addressed specifically to the first step in providing a burial ground—viz., buying land or setting apart parochial land for that purpose. Upon this Act of 1852 the only conclusion at which I can arrive is that a burial board can buy land or appropriate parish land or accept a gift or devise of land for the purpose of a burial ground without the sanction of the Secretary of State, and that, whatever "providing" means in section 9, the prohibition therein contained does not extend to the acquisition by purchase or otherwise of land for a burial ground. The Act of 1853 extends the Act of 1852 to places to which that Act did not apply. But the prohibition contained in section 6 of the Act of 1853 is a mere repetition of and is open to the same observations as section 9 of the earlier Act. I cannot accede to the argument that section 6 does not apply to new additions to burial grounds as distinguished from new burial grounds. The Burial Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict., c. 128), amends the two former Acts, but throws no light on the construction of the prohibitory sections contained in them. The end of section 6 tends to show that the consent of the Secretary of State is not wanted for purchasing if they do not want to borrow under section 30 of the Act of 1852. Further, section 17 of this Act of 1855 enables burial boards, with the sanction of a Secretary of State, to let land purchased for burial purposes, and not consecrated, and in which no interment has taken place. This shows that land may be purchased before being consecrated or used. This really disposes of the case. It follows that the contract of August 1, 1889, was and is a valid and binding contract enforceable by action. Specific performance is not insisted on, the plaintiff being content with damages. The appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below, and there must be an inquiry as to damages and an order for their payment when ascertained.

The LORDS JUSTICES gave judgments to the same effect.

THE RHYMNAY STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) v.
THE IBERIAN IRON ORE COMPANY (LIMITED).—THE FOREST STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) v. SAME.*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—Demurrage
—"Working day of 24 hours"—Meaning of.

The questions raised in these two cases being the same they were heard together before his Lordship on Monday last. In each case the action was brought to recover demurrage under a charterparty in the same form; the questions raised turned upon the construction of certain clauses in the charterparties. At the close of the arguments his Lordship reserved judgment until Thursday morning. The facts of the case and the material terms of the charterparty appear fully from his Lordship's judgment.

Mr. Boyd, Q.C., appeared with Mr. J. E. Banks for the plaintiffs in the first case and with Mr. Montague Lush for the plaintiffs in the second case; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs appeared for the defendants in both cases.

His LORDSHIP read the following judgment:—By a contract dated December 14, 1897, the plaintiffs undertook with the defendants to provide ships for the carriage of 50,000 tons of iron ore from Seville, in Spain, to ports in the United Kingdom and elsewhere over a period of 12 months. The contract was drawn up on an ordinary printed charterparty form as used for single voyages, alterations being introduced in writing for the purpose of adapting the form to the particular contract in question. Disputes have arisen as to the meaning of the provisions in this contract as to demurrage. Those provisions are as follows:—"Charterers or their agents to be allowed 350 tons per working day of 24 hours, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), for loading and discharging, same to be reversible and to be averaged voyage by voyage to avoid demurrage, and to count from 6 a.m. of the day following the day when steamer is reported at the Custom-house, unless she be reported before noon, in which case time to count from notice of readiness and in every respect ready to load or discharge respectively and in free pratique. Steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used." The plaintiffs contend that these words mean that the defendants are to perform the loading and discharging at the rate of 350 tons per working day, such days to be made up of periods of 24 hours reckoned from the hour when the vessel starts the one operation or the other. The defendants, on the other hand, say that the words mean that 24 working hours are to be allowed for loading or discharging each 350 tons. I am of opinion that the defendants' contention is the right one. The important words are "charterers to be allowed 350 tons per working day of 24 hours for loading and discharging." What in this connexion is a "working day of 24 hours?" All days, whether they are working days or holidays, are days of 24 hours. Therefore I do not think the words "of 24 hours" are introduced to explain the word "day." It seems to me that they are introduced to show of what duration the working is to be before a so-called day is to count; and that they mean that 24 hours in which work is usually done at the port of loading or discharging, as the case may be, are to elapse before a day can be reckoned against the charterers. This view, I think, is strengthened by the provisions as to night work and work on Sundays and holidays. The charterers may, if they choose, work only at night, or on Sundays or holidays, and, if they do, such time is to count as lay days. How could hours of night work count as lay days except by treating the time as so many working hours going to form part of the stipulated periods of days made up of 24 working hours? A further contention of the plaintiffs is that in ascertaining whether any demurrage is payable each voyage must be treated separately. The defendants, on the other hand, insist that the plaintiffs must wait until the whole 50,000 tons have been carried and then see whether, on the average of the whole, demurrage has been incurred. I think the expression "voyage by voyage" clearly shows that the plaintiffs' contention is right. Mr. Walton suggested that the use of the word "averaged" in the printed form involved the notion that more than one voyage was to be taken into consideration. I think the answer is that the word is introduced into a form which was intended to apply to one voyage only and that, therefore, it cannot be said to involve the meaning suggested. The word "averaged" merely relates, in my opinion, to averaging the work done in the two operations of loading and discharging on the one voyage. Further, I agree with Mr. Boyd that the lien clause in the contract supports the plaintiffs' contention on this point. If the defendants are right the last cargo of the 50,000 tons would be subject to all the arrears of demurrage which might have accumulated during the past 12 months—a result which I do not think either party contemplated. As each party has succeeded upon one of the questions raised, there will be no order as to costs. Judgment to be entered, upon the ascertaining of the figures, in accordance with the principles laid down.

SEA INSURANCE COMPANY V. BLOGG.*

Insurance—Marine—Policy on goods in vessels "sailing" on and after a certain date—"Sailing," what constitutes—Intention of master.
Decision of Mathew, J. (ante, p. 20), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew at the trial of the action without a jury (reported ante, p. 20; 3 Com. Cas., 1; [1898] 1 Q.B., 27). The action was brought on a policy of reinsurance effected by the plaintiff company with the defendant on goods in steamers "at and from ports in the United States to ports in Europe . . . sailing on and after March 1, 1896." Between 9 and 10 p.m. on February 29 the steamship Massasoit finished loading a cargo of flour, which was covered by the reinsurance, at a wharf at Newport News, Virginia, on the James River. By a rule of the pilotage commissioners of that port vessels were not allowed to go to sea after dark. On the completion of her loading the ship was moved out about 500 yards into the river and there anchored till the following morning. The ship's husband had given orders that she should not start on her voyage before daylight on March 1. Soon after 8 on the morning of that day the ship proceeded to sea, and was eventually lost with all hands. The defence was that the Massasoit sailed on February 29, and that therefore the loss in respect of which the action was brought was not covered by the policy. The learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, being of opinion that the master, in moving the vessel into the stream, had no intention to commence the voyage, but that his object was to keep his crew together and prevent their going ashore. It appeared that vessels sometimes anchored in mid-stream during the night before they proceeded to sea, and that they thereby obtained an advantage of a few minutes in getting under way. The learned Judge, however, thought there was no reason to suppose that that consideration entered into the calculations of the master.

Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the defendant in support of the appeal; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. G. Carver, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether or not the ship sailed on February 29. If she sailed on that day the loss was not covered by the policy, whereas if she sailed on March 1 the loss was covered by the policy. Whether a ship sailed as soon as she left the wharf where she was loading depended upon the intention of the master. "Cockrane v. Fisher" (1 C. M. and R., 809). The question then arose whether there was evidence in this case that, when the ship moved from the quay into the river, it was the intention of the captain that the ship should then sail. In his opinion the evidence did not show any such intention. No doubt a ship might leave a quay with the intention of doing a little bit of the voyage, but that was not the intention in the present case. The ship, therefore, did not commence her voyage on February 29, and the loss was covered by the policy.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

TOMS V. THE GLACTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*
Practice—Costs—Solicitor and client costs—
Public Authorities Protection Act, 1903.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using land as a cemetery on the ground that the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of a prohibition in section 5 of the Burial Act, 1855, against burying within 100 yards of a dwelling-house. His Lordship, however, held that it was unnecessary to decide that point, as the plaintiff was the tenant of the vendor who had sold the land to the defendants for the purposes of being used as a cemetery and was plaintiff in name only, being the vendor's nominee for the purposes of the action. Taking, therefore, the view that the case fell within the maxim that a grantor cannot derogate from his own grant his Lordship dismissed the action with costs. The question was, however, reserved whether the defendants were entitled as of right to costs as between solicitor and client by virtue of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. (See The Times, June 10, 1898.)

MR. LEVETT, Q.C., and Mr. C. E. JONES, for the plaintiff, had argued on the question of solicitor and client costs that the Act of 1893 only conferred its benefit on public authorities in cases where the cause of action involved a public duty. Here the cause of action was one of private right, as was shown by the judgment of his Lordship. In the case of the Somersetshire Drainage Commissioners v. Corporation of Bridgwater before the Court of Appeal on April 4, 1898, the plaintiffs were unsuccessful in a claim for an injunction restraining the defendants from carrying out public sewerage works so as to interfere with the banks and bed of the river Parrett, the Court being of opinion that the defendants had a customary right to do the acts complained of. Counsel for the defendants in that action having asked for solicitor and client costs on the ground that they were entitled to them under the Act, their Lordships looked at the Act and held that the Act was not applicable, inasmuch as the question in dispute was on a custom, and that the Act was meant to apply only to frivolous prosecutions and actions. The question, however, was not argued.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. Ingpen appeared for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER said:—I have considered the matter as to the question of costs, and I cannot see in the Act any limitation beyond that imposed by the very words of the Act. This action appears to me to be one against the defendants for using or being about to use certain land for burial purposes, and is in my opinion within the words of the Act an action against the defendants for an "act done in pursuance of public duty," and I cannot see, therefore, why the Act does not apply. I shall direct the Registrar to draw up the order with costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client. I should like to have a decision of the Court of Appeal to guide me in determining the classes of cases to which the Act is not to apply.

JOHNSTON V. BOYES.*

Practice—Injunction—Sale of real estate—
Specific performance.

Application for an injunction to enforce an agreement to enter into a contract for the sale of real estate refused.

This was a somewhat peculiar case. It was a motion by the plaintiff, a married woman, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling certain premises known as the White Hart, South Mimms, in the county of Middlesex, to any person other than the plaintiff, her case being that she had bought the same at a public auction. The plaintiff had, with the assistance of her husband, formerly carried on the business of an hotel-keeper at Finchley in a house which belonged to her for her separate use. She had recently sold the house and business, and, being desirous of acquiring another, she ascertained that the White Hart was to be sold by auction, and arranged with her husband that he should attend the sale as her agent and bid for the property. The husband accordingly attended the sale, which was held on May 24 last in the City of London. According to his evidence he commenced bidding at £4,500 and was declared the purchaser of the property at £4,900. He immediately went up to the rostrum of the auctioneer for the purpose of paying the necessary deposit, when the auctioneer asked the name of his solicitor. Upon his giving the name one of the defendants, the vendors, who was present at the sale, said, "Oh, I know him," and then went to the other end of the room. On coming back he inquired how the deposit would be paid, and upon being told by cheque he thereupon said he could not accept it or permit the plaintiff's husband to sign the formal contract, and he then told the auctioneer not to accept the cheque nor to permit the husband to sign the contract. The next day the plaintiff's husband wired to the defendant that he would attend at his office and pay the deposit in cash. He kept the appointment, and waited three hours, with the necessary money, but the defendant did not come. The conditions of sale under which the property was put up to auction provided (inter alia) as follows:—"1. The highest bidder shall be the purchaser, and if any dispute shall arise respecting a bidding the property shall be put up again at the last undisputed bidding. No person shall advance at any bidding a less sum than shall be fixed by the auctioneers at the time of sale, and no bidding shall be retracted. There will be a reserved price. The vendors reserve the right to bid either by themselves or their agent. 2. The purchaser shall immediately after the sale pay to the auctioneers a deposit of £10 per cent. on the amount and in part payment of his purchase money and sign the subjoined agreement to complete the purchase according to these conditions." The subjoined agreement was in the following form:—"At the sale by auction made this day of the property described in these particulars — of — was the highest bidder for and was declared the purchaser of the said property at the price of £ , and he has paid to Messrs. Rodwell and Son, of Watford, Herts, as agents for and on behalf of William Osborn Boyes, of Barnet, and A. W. Adams, of 98, Ladbroke-grove, Notting-hill, the vendors, the sum of £ by way of deposit and in part payment of the purchase money, and hereby agrees to complete the purchase in accordance with the above conditions; and the said Messrs. Rodwell and Son, as the vendors' agents, hereby confirm the said sale and acknowledge the receipt of the said deposit." The defendants subsequently entered into a contract to sell the property at a higher price to a firm of brewers, and the plaintiff then commenced this action, in which she claimed (1) a declaration that, by reason of her having been by her agent the highest bidder at the sale, she was entitled to be regarded as the purchaser of the property at the price of £4,900; (2) an order on the defendants directing them to accept from the plaintiff or her agent the deposit of £10 per cent. on the amount of the purchase money, and to allow the plaintiff personally or by her agent to sign a copy properly filled in of the agreement annexed to the conditions of sale; and (3) an injunction as above stated.

MR. UPJOHN, Q.C., and Mr. ONSLOW, for the plaintiff, contended that the defendants were bound to perform the contract which they had entered into for the signature of the memorandum annexed to the conditions of sale. If the Statute of Frauds was relied upon, then that statute could not be used to cover a fraud, and under the circumstances the setting up of that defence would be a breach of good faith, and ought not to prevail against the plaintiff's right to become the purchaser of the property.

MR. JENKINS, Q.C., and Mr. INGPEN argued that on the question of law the motion was untenable. When evidence was given at the trial a different complexion would be put upon the facts. The plaintiff in order to succeed upon the motion must make out a prima facie case that she had some interest legal or equitable in the property. So that she was in a dilemma, because if she had no interest in the land then she could not get an injunction, and if she had, then the Statute of Frauds applied, and there was no written contract upon which she could sue. In fact, she set up a contract which would not satisfy the statute to enter into a contract which would do so. Such a contract as that could not be specifically enforced.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING said that the motion was made in an action which was of a very unusual character. The action was framed on the view that there was not yet a complete contract for sale, but that a preliminary contract had been entered into which the plaintiff was entitled to have performed. His Lordship then stated the facts of the case as disclosed by the plaintiff's evidence, and said that the defendants had not thought fit to file any evidence in opposition to the motion, and it must be taken that the defendants had deliberately and wilfully prevented the auctioneers from filling up the agreement in accordance with the conditions of sale. It was said that at the trial an explanation of this course of conduct would be forthcoming, but if the plaintiff's account turned out to be true, his Lordship hoped the law was such that she would be able to recover substantial damages. But the defendants said, and were entitled to say, that the plaintiff had made out no case for an injunction. In order that the Court might grant an injunction, it was necessary for the plaintiff in such a case to show that he was the owner of the land whose rights would be interfered with by the defendant. The law was stated by Lord Justice Turner in the case of "Hadley v. the London Bank of Scotland" (3 D.J. and S., 63). Having regard to that statement, the general rule in cases between vendor and purchaser was that the Court would not interfere unless a valid contract was proved. But the plaintiff was not in the position of a purchaser. By her writ she asked for a declaration that she is entitled to be treated as the purchaser, and for specific performance of an agreement by the defendant to accept a deposit and sign the contract. Various cases had been referred to in support of the contention of the plaintiff, that by reason of what took place, such a preliminary agreement had been entered into. It might be that she would, at the trial, establish the existence of such a contract, but would it be in accordance with the practice of the Court to grant specific performance of such a contract. His Lordship had never met with such an action before—an action to enforce an agreement to enter into a contract for the sale of real estate. It was better for the Court in such a case to leave the plaintiff to recover damages. There was considerable doubt that the plaintiff would succeed in obtaining specific performance of such a contract as was suggested in the claim of the writ. Then it was said that the Statute of Frauds ought not to be set up in such a case as this. His Lordship was unable to accede to that. No doubt the Court had said that it would not allow the statute to be used to cover a fraud, but his Lordship was unable to see that the conduct of the defendants brought them within that rule. It could not be said that it was fraudulent so as to prevent them from having the benefit of the statute. No case had been made out for the granting of an injunction. The motion must, therefore, be refused, but the costs would be reserved.

HOLFORD V. URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL OF ACTON.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Conditions of sale—
Affirmative covenant—Injunction refused.

This was an action for an injunction restraining the defendants from erecting upon certain plots of land belonging to them a fire-engine station or any buildings other than shops and dwelling-houses of a certain value in alleged breach of a condition of sale under which the plaintiffs had bought from the defendants an adjoining plot of land. The land in question, together with other land, was originally acquired by the defendants under their compulsory power for the purpose of street improvements in their district. In 1894 they sold a portion of the land so acquired by auction under conditions of sale which provided (inter alia) that the respective purchasers of certain specified lots should in their respective conveyances enter into covenants with the vendors to erect within two years from the day of sale upon each of the lots bought by them a shop and dwelling-house of not less value than £650. The plaintiff bought one of the plots at the sale and erected thereon a shop and dwelling-house in compliance with the condition. Certain of the plots were not sold, and the defendants had since been unable to sell the same. The defendants had recently determined to erect upon the plots remaining in their possession a fire-engine station which was required for the purposes of their district, and had obtained the sanction of the Local Government Board to the issue of a loan for the purpose of providing the necessary funds. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action, contending that the proposed erection of the fire-engine station would be a breach of the condition under which he had bought his property and by which the defendants were themselves bound.

MR. JENKINS, Q.C., and Mr. TANNER appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that he was entitled to restrain the defendants from dealing with the land in any way inconsistent with the condition.

MR. BUTCHER, Q.C., and Mr. MACSWINNEY, for the defendants, argued, first, that the covenant was affirmative in form, and there was no negative stipulation not to erect upon the land any buildings other than shops or dwelling-houses, and as no such negative stipulation could be implied the defendants could not be restrained by injunction. Secondly, they contended that even if the covenant could be enforced as between the respective purchasers, it was not binding as against the defendants, inasmuch as it would be beyond their powers to subject the land in their hands to a restrictive condition which would have the effect of preventing them dealing with it for the purposes of the requirements of their district.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING gave judgment, and came to the conclusion that, having regard to the authorities, no negative stipulation could be implied in the condition. That being so, the restrictive covenant could not be enforced against the defendants and the action failed and must be dismissed, and (except as to a special direction on one point) with costs as between solicitor and client pursuant to the powers of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

PENNY V. WIMBLEDON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL AND ILES.*

Principal and Agent—Contractor—Liability of principal for negligence of contractor—Public body—Personal injuries.

In this action, the hearing of which began on June 15, Lord Coleridge, Q.C., and Mr. Stephen Lynch appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Rawlinson, Q.C., and Mr. Newson for the defendant Iles; and Mr. C. T. Giles for the district council.

It appeared that the plaintiff, an elderly widow lady residing at Cromwell-road, Wimbledon, went out shopping on October 23, 1897. While returning home she was passing down Queen's-road, when she stumbled and fell over a heap of soil and grass left on the roadway unprotected. The accident happened about 7 p.m. on a dark evening, and resulted in severe injuries, for which she claimed damages. At the time of the accident the district council had not taken over the road, but had served notice on the owner, under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to make up the road, and on his failure to do so had taken the matter in hand and entered into a contract with the defendant Iles that he should do the work. By the terms of the contract Iles was to provide all materials, plant, labour, watching, lighting, fencing, and everything necessary for the speedy and effectual completion of the work. The work was to be carried out in the best and most workmanlike manner. It was to be in accordance with the specification and certain plans and drawings prepared by the surveyor and such working and explanatory drawings and instructions as he might from time to time furnish. The surveyor could require improper materials to be removed and others substituted, and could procure the discharge of incompetent workmen. The work was commenced on the day before the accident, and the heaps were of dirt and grass formed in the course of the preliminary process of "cleaning-up" the road. After the accident lights were placed on some of the heaps by order of the surveyor. The defendants delivered separate defences. Both denied liability. The defendant Iles paid £75 into Court. The defendant district council paid nothing into Court, but pleaded that "the defendant Iles, while denying liability, has paid into Court £75, and these defendants say that sum is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim."

The jury returned a verdict for £50, and judgment was thereupon ordered to be entered for the defendant Iles; £25 to be paid out to him, together with the £50 on account of costs.

On the following morning LORD COLERIDGE moved that judgment should be entered against the district council. He argued, first, that they were liable for their contractor's negligence ("Hardsaker v. the Idle District Council," (1896) 1 Q.B., 335); and, secondly, that they could not take advantage of the money paid into Court by their co-defendant, Iles.

Mr. GILES argued that they were not liable for the negligence of an independent contractor, citing "Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway" (4 Ex., 244); and, secondly, that, the verdict having been satisfied by the payment into Court of a joint tort-feasor, they were, on their pleadings, entitled to judgment.

HIS LORDSHIP delivered the following written judgment this morning:—In this case the action is brought against the Wimbledon Urban District Council and Edmund Iles to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by falling over a heap of surface soil and grass placed by the defendant Iles in Queen's-road, Wimbledon, and left there on the evening of October 23 after dark without any light or precaution to warn persons passing along the road of the obstruction caused by the heap. Queen's-road is a road within the jurisdiction of the Wimbledon Urban District Council, which, although for some considerable time prior to the happening of the matter complained of it had been set out as a road by the owner of the land and used by the public, had not become repairable by the inhabitants at large, and had not been taken over by the district council. The district council had given notice under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to the owner requiring the road to be sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, and made good, and, the requirements of such notice not having been complied with, the district council proceeded to procure the works to be carried out under their direction. With this view they entered into a contract with the defendant Iles, who is a contractor, and, in the course of carrying out his contract, he trimmed up the surface of the road, took away the grass which had been allowed to grow on the "haunches" of the road and in the waterways, and put the surface soil and grass in heaps on the side of the road. The plaintiff on the night when the accident happened had walked down the path on the south side of Queen's-road, and at the foot of the road she proceeded to cross the road in order to get over to Cromwell-road, where she lived, when she fell over one of the heaps. The district council and Iles, the contractor, delivered separate defences. Both denied liability, but the defendant Iles paid a sum of money into Court. The defendants the district council did not bring any money into Court, and they pleaded that the money paid into Court by Iles was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. The jury found that the leaving of the heaps in the position in which they were left after dark without a light or other warning was an act of negligence, and they assessed at damages a sum of money less than the amount paid into Court by the defendant Iles. I thereupon directed judgment to be entered for the defendant Iles. The question arises, Are the defendants the district council entitled to have judgment entered for them? Mr. Giles, who argued the case on behalf of the district council, contended that they were not liable, said that Iles was an independent contractor employed by the district council to do work which was in itself lawful, and that the district council was not liable for any negligence that Iles or his men may have been guilty of in the course of the execution of the work. This question resolves itself, I think, to a large extent into a question of fact depending upon the terms of the employment of Iles. The question is whether Iles was an independent contractor or whether the district board reserved the power of controlling the contractor and of regulating the manner in which he did the work. I have looked carefully at the terms of the contract between the district council and Iles, and I have come to the conclusion, having regard to the whole terms of the contract, that the district council, by their surveyor, reserved powers which conferred upon them entire control over the work and the manner in which it was to be done. I do not rely upon the clauses giving power to the surveyor to require incompetent workmen to be dismissed or unsound work to be removed, because those clauses standing alone would not, I think, give the district council such control over the work as to make the contractor their agent or servant. But the first operative clause in the contract, which requires Iles to execute all the works mentioned in the specification and the signed plans according to such explanatory drawings and instructions as may from time to time be furnished to the contractor by the surveyor, seems to me in effect to give the surveyor of the district council complete control over the work and over the manner in which it is to be done. There is, further, a circumstance in the case which I think is not without its bearing on this part of the case. As soon as the attention of the officers of the district council was called to the circumstance that the plaintiff had fallen over one of the heaps, lights were ordered to be placed near the heaps at night, and lights were placed accordingly. That seems to me to show that the district council not only had the power, but they did in fact during the continuance of the contract exercise the power, of directing lights to be placed as a warning to the public. I have come to the conclusion that the defendants, the district council, having the control of the works, are liable for the negligent acts which they permitted. But there is another ground upon which the plaintiff argued that the defendants were liable. It is contended by Lord Coleridge, who argued the case for the plaintiff, that, even if lles is to be regarded as an independent contractor, still, upon the principle of "Hardaker v. Idle District Council" (1896, 1 Q.B., 335), the district council in this case is liable. In that case of the Idle District Council the works which were being executed were being executed by the contractor of the local board pursuant to the powers of the same section of the Public Health Act, 1875 (section 150), as applied in the present case, and I find it difficult to draw a distinction between the two cases. "Pickard v. Smith" (10 C.B., N.S., 470) is another case that closely resembles the present. In that case the defendant was the lessee of refreshment rooms and a coal-cellar, and there was an opening for putting coals into the coal-cellar on the arrival platform at a railway station. The defendant employed a coal merchant to put coals into the cellar, and the coal merchant's servants, while putting coals into the cellar, left the hole insufficiently guarded. The plaintiff, whilst passing in the usual way out of the station, fell into the coal-cellar and was injured. It was held that the defendant was liable. The principle of the decision, I think, is this—that when a person employs a contractor to do work in a place where the public are in the habit of passing, which work will, unless precautions are taken, cause danger to the public, an obligation is thrown upon the person who orders the work to be done to see that the necessary precautions are taken, and that, if the necessary precautions are not taken, he cannot escape liability by seeking to throw the blame on the contractor. "Pickard v. Smith" is an authority for the proposition that no sound distinction in this respect can be drawn between the case of a public highway and a road which may be, and to the knowledge of the wrongdoer probably will in fact be, used by persons lawfully entitled so to do. The district council employ the contractor to do work upon the surface of a road which they know is being used by the public, and they must have known that the works which were to be executed would cause some obstruction to the traffic and some danger unless means were taken to give due warning to the public. The duty of affording protection to the public was in the circumstances incurred by the district council, and the district council could not avoid the obligation of the duty by entering into a contract with lles. The question remains, Can the defendants, the district council, avail themselves of the separate defence which is pleaded by lles? The two defendants might, if they had pleased, have joined in a defence of payment into Court which would have been available for both. But the district council have chosen to put in a separate defence. I cannot see in the circumstances that they can avail themselves of the payment into Court by lles. So far as their defence is concerned it simply amounts to a denial of liability, but in that defence they have failed. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to judgment for £50 and costs. Of course, as the £50 has been obtained from the other defendant, lles, the judgment against the district council will be confined to costs only.

SAMUEL HEATH AND SONS V. ROLLASON AND ANOTHER.*

Copyright—Design—Novelty—Pattern—Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883, secs. 47, 51, 60.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 71, and [1898] 1 Ch. 237) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal dated November 27, 1897, and reported 14 The Times Law Reports, 71; 1898, 1 Ch., 237; 67 L.J., Ch., 100, under the title of "Rollason's Design." The appellants are manufacturers at Birmingham and their business includes a coffin furniture department. The respondent is a coffin furniture manufacturer of the same place and is the registered proprietor of the design No. 232,908, the registration of which is dated May 28, 1894. In August, 1896, discovering, as he alleged, that the appellants were infringing his design, Rollason complained to them and subsequently, in April, 1897, brought an action for infringement in the County Court. The question, however, was not to be tried before the local tribunal, as the appellants gave notice of motion on May 31, 1897, that the Register of Designs might be rectified by expunging therefrom the respondent's design, on the grounds that the design was not a new or original one at the date of registration and, further, that Rollason had delivered on sale articles to which the design had been applied without having caused the same to be marked with the prescribed word or words and figures as required by section 51 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883. These articles had other marks and figures than those which ought to have been marked thereon. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the respondent Rollason had taken all proper steps to ensure the correct marking of the articles, and therefore brought himself within the protective proviso of section 51, but that the design was not new or original, but virtually the same with one previously registered by Messrs. Sanders, Son, and Payne. The Court of Appeal, consisting of the Master of the Rolls and Lords Justices Chitty and Vaughan Williams, held that the design was new and original, but agreed with the Judge below on the question under section 51.

Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. W. N. Lawson appeared for the appellants; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. E. P. Hewitt for the respondents were not heard.

LORD HERSCHELL, in moving that the appeal be dismissed with costs, said that the sole question on that part of the case which was an application for the removal of the respondent's trade design from the register was whether it was a new and original design. The respondent, in accordance with the rules, was on registration required to state the nature of the design and whether it was applicable to the pattern, shape, or configuration, and stated that it was applicable to the pattern. The appellants contended that the respondent could not be said to be registered only as applicable to pattern, inasmuch as the depression in the centre was "shape" or "configuration," and not pattern; and, secondly, the drawings did not indicate that the centre was to be depressed. These words "applicable for the pattern or for the shape or configuration" were to be found only in the interpretation clause of the Act. The word used in the other sections was "design." The intention was to ensure that the word "design" should be sufficiently extensive, and it was not intended to draw a hard and fast distinction between each of these words and the others. The object was to use words which would include everything ordinarily falling within the meaning of the word "design," and all that the applicant for registration was required to do was to state the nature of the design. Then certain rules were made to the effect that design should include such matters as shape and configuration. But the rules did not intend that an applicant should be so limited as to be obliged to indicate which part was pattern, which shape, which was configuration or ornament. It was not necessary on that occasion to say whether the drawings did or did not indicate that the centre was to be depressed, because, in his judgment, this design ought to be upheld as new or original whether or not the centre was depressed. As to Sanders's pattern, it was, in his opinion, not identical with the respondent's, but it was not necessary to analyse the points of difference, or to decide which was the more attractive of the two. As to the point under section 51 which requires that "before delivery on sale of any articles to which a registered design has been applied the proprietor of the design shall cause each such article to be marked with the prescribed mark, &c., . . . denoting that the design is registered," he did not think that the omission so to mark in the case of some of the plates was fatal to the respondent, inasmuch as it was by inadvertence, and as soon as the omission was pointed out Mr. Rollason took steps to rectify it.

The other noble and learned LORDS concurred, and the appeal was dismissed with costs.

EASTERN TELEGRAPH COMPANY (LIMITED) V. DENT AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Forfeiture—Breach of covenant not to sublet without lessor's consent.

This was an action of ejectment for breach of a covenant not to sublet without the lessors' consent. The defendants were Sir Alfred Dent and Edward Dent (trading as Dent Brothers) and Messrs. Burn and Berridge, solicitors.

Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Roskill appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. Muir Mackenzie for the defendants.

The plaintiff company had let to Dent Brothers certain rooms on the upper floors of the company's offices, 11, Old Broad-street, under a lease which contained a covenant that the lessees should not "underlet, assign, or part with possession of" any part of the rooms without the consent in writing of the company first obtained, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld; and there was a proviso for re-entry in case of breach. Messrs. Burn and Berridge also occupied some rooms on the same floors as tenants of the company, and it was admitted that they were desirable tenants. In 1889 Dent Brothers (with the company's consent) sublet a room on the third floor to the Amsterdam Tobacco Company. In January, 1898, Burn and Berridge applied to Dent Brothers for the use of a portion of this room. Dent Brothers accordingly (having arranged with the Amsterdam Company) erected a partition to divide the room into two parts, so arranged that one part could only be approached from Burn and Berridge's office in the adjacent room by a door cut at the cost of the latter firm. This part Dent Brothers let to Burn and Berridge without obtaining or asking the plaintiffs' consent. On January 14, 1898, Messrs. Burn and Berridge wrote to Dent Brothers a letter in which they put on record the terms of the agreement, stating the time of the letting as follows:—"The term to commence from the date of your giving us possession." About February 4 Burn and Berridge sent some furniture and a clerk into the new room, but Dent Brothers were unaware of it until, on February 10, their attention was called by the plaintiffs to the fact that they had not obtained permission to sublet. This was the breach now sued upon. The agreement to sublet had been immediately cancelled, therefore no relief was claimed against the defendants Burn and Berridge.

Mr. DICKENS, Q.C., for the defendants, contended that the plaintiffs could not have refused their consent to the underlease to such tenants as Burn and Berridge, and that in such a case it was immaterial that the defendants had not asked for it—"Hyde v. Warden" (3 Ex. D. at p. 81) and "Bates v. Donaldson" (1896, 2 Q.B., 241). "Barrow v. Isaacs" (1891, 1 Q.B., 417) only decided that the Court would not grant equitable relief in the circumstances of that particular case. Secondly, there had been no underletting in law. The only agreement was contained in the letter of January 14, 1898. There the term was not stated with sufficient certainty in point of time to constitute a letting without part performance, and possession had never been given. Giving up possession implied an act on the part of Dent Brothers, and there was no such act. Thirdly, this was a case for equitable relief.

Mr. BRAY, Q.C., in reply, relied on "Barrow v. Isaacs," in which "Hyde v. Warden" was quoted and disregarded. As to the second point, the question was the same as if Burn and Berridge were suing for specific performance of their agreement with Dent Brothers. On February 10 Burn and Berridge were in actual possession under the agreement, and could not have been turned out. Any work done on the premises referable only to the agreement was sufficient part performance to complete the lessees' title, and after Burn and Berridge had cut the door they could not have been turned out. Since their possession was rightful Dent Brothers must have "parted with possession."

Mr. JUSTICE KENNEDY gave judgment for the plaintiffs. In his opinion it was impossible to deny that Dent Brothers both underlet and parted with possession. The letter of January 14 amounted to an agreement which would have been enforceable. In that letter the date of the term was sufficiently expressed by reference. That being so, the question arose whether, seeing Burn and Berridge could not have been objected to as tenants, non-compliance with the letter of the lease necessarily led to forfeiture. It was not easy to reconcile "Hyde v. Warden" with "Barrow v. Isaacs," but in face of the latter case it was impossible to say that there was no forfeiture. The same case was conclusive against Dent Brothers' claim to equitable relief. But it was fair and proper that the defendants should contest such a case, and judgment would be for the plaintiffs without costs.

A stay of execution was granted pending appeal.

HOTEL AND GENERAL ADVERTISING COMPANY V.
WICKENDEN AND STENE.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Personal contract terminated by death.

This was an action brought to recover damages for breach of a contract in writing dated November 29, 1893, and made between the plaintiffs and one John Braby, formerly proprietor of the Wellington Hotel, Tunbridge Wells. The defendants were the executors of John Braby. The facts were as follows:—The plaintiff company was formed to carry out a scheme of advertising by means of "hotel tariff frames." The manner in which the scheme was worked was that the plaintiffs printed and prepared for different hotels a tariff frame consisting of a framed printed tariff surrounded by advertisements of local and other tradesmen and containing a list of hotels recommended by the management. The contract sued upon was in the form of a letter signed by John Braby and addressed to the plaintiffs, and was so far as material in these terms:—"Wellington Hotel, Tunbridge Wells. Upon the Hotel and General Advertising Company (Limited) delivering at their convenience to this hotel 50 of their hotel tariff frames I agree to give a receipt for the same and properly hang and maintain them in the first-floor bed and dressing rooms and also (in certain other parts of the hotel) during five years to commence from the date of delivery of the frames. In consideration the company agrees to insert a recommendatory notice of this hotel in 2,000 of their hotel tariff frames to be exhibited in other hotels during the like term of five years, commencing as to 500 notices within six months from the delivery of the frames in this hotel, and the remainder to be published within the term of this agreement." The 50 tariff frames were delivered to the Wellington Hotel in the summer of 1894, and were duly exhibited. The plaintiffs entered into contracts with various tradesmen to insert advertisements in these tariff frames during the period of five years from the delivery of the frames at the hotel, for which they were to be paid certain sums annually in advance. On July 15, 1896, John Braby died. His executors, the defendants, obtained a continuation of his licence until the next licensing sessions and sold the hotel to a company, who removed the tariff frames in the spring of 1897 and refused to continue to exhibit them. Owing to this refusal the tradesmen who had made agreements for advertisements in the tariff frames refused to continue their annual payments, and it was for the loss thus sustained that the plaintiffs claimed to recover in this action.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Hohler (Mr. H. F. Dickens, Q.C., with him) for the defendants.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the arguments:—"Hamlyn v. Wood" (1891, 2 Q.B., 488), "Taylor v. Caldwell" (3 B. and S., 826), and "Finlay v. Chirney" (20 Q.B.D., p. 494).

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said he thought that the parties to the contract in question contemplated that Mr. Braby would continue to be the proprietor of the Wellington Hotel, and therefore he ought to imply a condition into the contract that it was only to be performed so long as Braby was alive. The contract was a somewhat peculiar one (his Lordship referred to its terms); no time was mentioned during which delivery of the frames was to be made. It might not suit the convenience of the plaintiffs to deliver them for ten years, and the time during which the contract was to remain in operation did not begin to run until the plaintiffs had found it convenient to make delivery, and that was so although the 2,000 frames which the plaintiffs were to deliver about the country advertising Braby's hotel were to be delivered as to 500 within six months from the delivery of the frames at Braby's hotel, and as to the remainder within the currency of the agreement. That might mean ten years or more, or it might mean long after the hotel had ceased to be an hotel and long after Braby was dead. The learned Judge could not help coming to the conclusion that this was a contract intended to be operative only so long as Braby was the proprietor of the hotel and personally able to do that which he had personally undertaken to do and so long as he had control of the place where those things had to be done. The contract was personal in its terms, and could not be meant to continue after Braby's death. There would therefore be judgment for the defendants, but in case there should be an appeal he would assess the damages at £60.

ARMYTAGH V. ARMYTAGH.*

Divorce—Judicial separation—Cruelty—Jurisdiction of Court.

The Court has jurisdiction to entertain a suit for judicial separation where the parties are not domiciled but are only resident in this country.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES delivered the following considered judgment in this case. The facts and arguments have already been reported in The Times for March 10 and May 13 and 18:—This is a suit for judicial separation by Mrs. Armytage against her husband on the ground of his alleged cruelty towards her. By his answer the respondent has denied the alleged cruelty, and by an act on petition he has further pleaded that the Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. I have, therefore, to determine a question of fact, whether there has been cruelty by the respondent to the petitioner, and a question of law whether the Court has jurisdiction in the circumstances to entertain the suit. The second question raises a point of considerable importance in private international law. The parties were married at Toorak, near Melbourne, Australia, on April 11, 1888, and there are two children of the marriage, whose custody the petitioner seeks to obtain. The respondent is by birth an Australian, and his domicile is in the colony of Victoria. He was educated at Cambridge, and has been called to the English Bar. The petitioner is an Englishwoman, born in England, of parents residing at Blackheath, near London. The respondent and petitioner became acquainted on board ship on passage from this country to Melbourne, and their marriage was celebrated shortly afterwards. They cohabited in Australia and in England, and afterwards in Italy, and the occurrences which give rise to this suit took place at Florence in April and May, 1897. The letters put in at the hearing show that as late as the year 1896 the husband and wife were living on terms of affection, but between that date and the spring of 1897 a state of friction seems to have arisen between them, the precise causes of which I have some difficulty in determining, the wife attributing it partly to temper on the part of the respondent, and partly to certain differences which she referred to in her evidence, and the husband, as I understand, attributing it to a dislike on his wife's part to residence in Australia. He also referred to correspondence in which she blamed herself for loss of self-control. The petitioner alleges that in April and May, 1897, her husband committed certain acts of violence towards her which caused her to leave him and come over to England with her children to seek her father's protection. These acts are denied by the husband, and he alleges that his wife has merely come to this country to endeavour to give this Court jurisdiction in the matter. It is unnecessary to go into the charges made in this case in detail. The petitioner gave her evidence very clearly, and is corroborated by her sister and a servant, and her story is supported by the strong fact that she wrote letters to her sister after that lady left her in Florence, which she stated gave accounts of what was taking place, for the purpose of obtaining advice as to her position, and that, after advice had been obtained from counsel on her behalf, her brother went over to Florence and brought her and her children to this country. The respondent, in his evidence, gave his account of what he stated had taken place between his wife and himself, and he also put in, with the consent of the petitioner's counsel, an affidavit by another servant, which he had obtained. The respondent's evidence and this affidavit do not really answer the petitioner's case; statements and admissions are contained in them which tend to confirm her story, and after making due allowance for any exaggeration there may not unnaturally be in accounts given of what has taken place when those present have been excited by the occurrences, I have come to the conclusion that the petitioner has established a case of cruelty on the part of the respondent towards her at Florence in April and May, 1897. I further find that she left him in Florence and came to England bona fide in order to shelter herself under the care of her parents, and is now resident in this country. No acts of cruelty in this country were alleged or proved, but the petitioner stated that she remained in fear of her husband. I have now to deal with the question of jurisdiction. The further facts necessary to refer to are these:—The petitioner came to this country with her children on or about May 25, 1897, and she and the children have since resided under her parents' roof and at Bexhill. The respondent's solicitor on May 31, 1897, wrote on behalf of the respondent to the petitioner and her father requesting the petitioner to return with the children to her husband, but she declined to comply with this request. At the end of June, 1897, the respondent came to, and has since resided in, England, but I understand he has not taken up a permanent residence here, and has only come to and is remaining in England for the purpose of enforcing, and so long as may be necessary to determine, such rights as he may have against the petitioner with regard to the children. In the month of November, 1897, he settled the sum of £100 on each of his children, and made them wards of Court in Chancery. He thereupon applied to Mr. Justice North for an order for the custody of the children, which was met by a cross-application on the part of the petitioner. In the meantime these proceedings were commenced, and the respondent was served with the citation and petition in this country. Mr. Justice North ordered the application before him to stand over until after the determination of this suit. The question to be decided, therefore, is whether or not this Court can entertain a suit for judicial separation by the petitioner against the respondent in the circumstances above stated. It may now be taken as settled that this Court has no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for the dissolution of the marriage of parties not domiciled in this country at the commencement of the proceedings. Although in the case of "Niboyet v. Niboyet" (L.R. 4, P.D., p. 1) it was held by the majority of the Court of Appeal that residence not amounting to domicile may give the Court jurisdiction, that case, which, if followed, would have the effect of giving the Court a jurisdiction which it does not concede to foreign tribunals, is opposed to the general current of the cases in this Court, and has been practically overruled by the decision of the Privy Council in the case of "Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier" (L.R., A.C., 1895, p. 517). Lord Watson, in delivering their Lordships' judgment after a review of the authorities, stated that "their Lordships have . . . come to the conclusion that, according to international law, the domicile for the time being of the married pair affords the only true test of jurisdiction to dissolve their marriage." The Court does not now pronounce a decree of dissolution where the parties are not domiciled in this country except in favour of a wife deserted by her husband, or whose husband has so conducted himself towards her that she is justified in living apart from him, and who up to the time when she was deserted or began so to be justified was domiciled with her husband in this country, in which case, without necessarily resorting to the American doctrine that in such circumstances a wife may acquire a domicile of her own in the country of the matrimonial home, it is considered that in order to meet the injustice which might be done by compelling a wife to follow her husband from country to country he cannot be allowed to assert for the purposes of the suit that he has ceased to be domiciled in this country. The jurisdiction to dissolve marriages was conferred upon this Court by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and, although that Act does not expressly make domicile a test of jurisdiction, that test is applied by the Court to the exercise of jurisdiction in cases of dissolution of marriage. It is derived from the principles of private international law, an adherence to which is necessary, as Lord Penzance said in "Wilson v. Wilson" (L.R. 2, P. and D., 442), to "preclude the scandal which arises when a man and woman are held to be man and wife in one country and strangers in another." These principles are expounded by many jurists in this and other countries. They are based on the principle that a person's status ought to depend on the law of his domicile, though there may be limitations and exceptions to this principle—see Dicey's "Conflict of Laws," 1896, cap. 18, p. 474, et seq. (conf. Savigny, section 362, Guthrie's translation, second edition, p. 148). The jurisdiction in suits other than suits for dissolution of marriage is conferred on the Court by the sixth section of the Act aforesaid. By other sections judicial separation is substituted for the old divorce a mensa et thoro, and a new ground for separation, viz.—desertion without cause for two years and upwards, is added. Section 22 provides as follows:—"In all suits and proceedings other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage the said Court shall proceed, and act, and give relief on principles and rules which, in the opinion of the said Court, shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts have heretofore acted and given relief, but subject to the provisions herein contained, and to the rules and orders under this Act." There are no special provisions of the Act or rules or orders which directly affect the present question. The present suit is for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty.

Before the Act it would have been a suit for divorce a mensa et thoro on the same ground, and the inquiry is as to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts would have acted in the circumstances. The petitioner maintains that the test of domicile is not applicable as in a suit for dissolution of marriage, and that the Ecclesiastical Courts would have given her relief where she and her husband are both residing in England in the circumstances proved, whereas the respondent maintains that no relief would have been given because the parties are not domiciled in England, and no act of cruelty has been proved within the jurisdiction. In support of her contention the petitioner's counsel cited the judgments of Lords Justices James and Cotton in the case of "Niboyet v. Niboyet," and certain passages from the abovementioned judgment of Lord Watson. "Niboyet v. Niboyet" was a case in which a marriage was solemnized at Gibraltar between a Frenchman and an Englishwoman, and the husband resided for several years in England, but, being a Consul for France, he retained his domicile of origin. The wife presented a petition for a divorce, alleging adultery committed in England and desertion. The husband appeared under protest, and prayed to be dismissed. It was held, reversing the decision of Sir R. Phillimore (by Lords Justices James and Cotton, Lord Justice Brett dissenting), that the Court had jurisdiction to grant a divorce. I have already pointed out that this decision is virtually overruled, but Lord Watson, in "Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier," said,— "The main reason assigned for their decision by the learned Judges of the majority was that before the Act of 1857 became law the petitioner would have been entitled to sue her husband in the Bishops' Court, although he was not domiciled in England, and to ask either for restitution of conjugal rights or for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and in either case for proper alimony, and consequently that after the Act of 1857 passed jurisdiction in divorce might be exercised in the same circumstances. There appears to their Lordships to be an obvious fallacy in that reasoning. It is not doubtful that there may be residence without domicile sufficient to sustain a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, for separation or for alimony, but it does not follow that such residence must also give jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage. Their Lordships cannot construe section 27 of the Act of 1857 as giving the English Court jurisdiction in all cases where any other matrimonial suit would previously have been entertained in the Bishops' Court." The reasons given by Lord Justice James for holding the wife entitled to sue for a divorce a mensa et thoro in the Bishops' Court fully appear at pp. 4-6 of the report; but his observations appear to me to be limited to the case of the parties being resident though not domiciled in a matrimonial home within the jurisdiction and a matrimonial offence being committed during such residence either within or outside the jurisdiction. Lord Justice Cotton proceeded on very much the same grounds except that he does not seem to include the case of offences committed outside the jurisdiction. Lord Esher, who differed from the other Lords Justices, was of opinion that the domicile of the husband in England at the institution of the suit is the fact which gives jurisdiction to the English Divorce Court to decree divorce, and that the same rule applies to suits for judicial separation and to suits for the restitution of conjugal rights. This case cannot, therefore, be considered a distinct authority in the petitioner's favour, but her counsel, in addition to the last-quoted passage from Lord Watson's judgment, placed reliance on the following passage from the same judgment at page 526 of the report:—"No authority can have a material bearing upon that point" (viz.— whether the Courts of a colony have a jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage contracted in England by British subjects who, though resident within the forum, still retain their English domicile) "which does not relate to the dissolution of marriage; because there are unquestionably other remedies for matrimonial misconduct short of dissolution which, according to the rules of the jus gentium, may be administered by the Courts of the country in which spouses domiciled elsewhere are for the time resident. If, for instance, a husband deserts his wife, although their residence be of a temporary character, these Courts may compel him to aliment her; and in cases where the residence is of a more permanent character and the husband treats his wife with such a degree of cruelty as to render her continuance in his society intolerable, the weight of opinion among international jurists and the general practice is to the effect that the Courts of the residence are warranted in giving the remedy of judicial separation without reference to the domicile of the parties. But the circumstances which justify the Courts of the residence in administering remedies for the protection of mutual rights incidental to marriage, which do not involve disruption of the marriage bond, have little or no application to proceedings taken for the purpose of putting an end to the marriage and remanding the spouses to the condition of single persons." It is to be observed that the cases referred to in this passage, in which the remedy of judicial separation may be given, are the same as those contemplated by Lord Justice James and do not necessarily include the present case, where the parties, though within the jurisdiction at the commencement of the suit, had no joint matrimonial home of any kind in this country. Counsel for the petitioner did not cite the works of any jurists who may have been referred to by Lord Watson. The published works of several eminent writers which I have consulted show that doubt has been expressed upon the question which Lord Watson does not consider doubtful. Most of the writers on private international law and the conflict of laws treat at length the question of the laws and principles upon which the dissolubility or indissolubility of marriages depends, but there is little to be found in the works of such writers on the question of jurisdiction to decree the separation or divorce a mensa et thoro of married persons who are residing but not domiciled in the country of the forum. The reasons are not far to seek. Dissolution of marriage has been permitted in some States and not in others and has been allowed in some States on grounds different from those on which it could be obtained in others. There has been want of unanimity as to the forum which ought to take cognizance of the question of divorce and as to the laws to be applied and the recognition to be accorded in one State to a decree of dissolution of marriage pronounced in another. Persons domiciled in a country where divorce has not been permitted or only permitted on certain grounds have in order to obtain divorces temporarily resided or assumed domicile in another country where divorce has been permitted or more easily obtained than in the former country. Hence numerous difficult and varied questions have arisen and been discussed in reported cases and by different jurists upon the question of dissolution of marriage. But in practice suits for judicial separation or divorce a mensa et thoro and restitution of conjugal rights do not appear to have given rise to similar difficulties, and, therefore, cases and discussions as to jurisdiction in these suits are not often met with. Such suits generally occur before the tribunals of the country in which the parties are in fact domiciled, and a case like that before me was not so likely to occur in former days as at the present time, when large numbers of people are to be found residing for more or less lengthy periods away from the place of their domicile. Sir R. Phillimore, in his work on International Law (1861), vol. 4, p. 338 et seq., does not enter upon the question of the validity of a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro by the Court of a State in which the parties are living but not domiciled, though he makes mention of the case of "Connelly v. Connelly" (7 Moore's P.C., p. 438), where, in answer to a suit in the Arches Court of Canterbury for restitution of conjugal rights, a wife relied for her answer partly on a decree of separation between the parties at Rome, and, after her plea had been rejected by the Court of Arches, the Privy Council allowed her to amend her plea by stating that she and her husband were domiciled at Rome at the time when the alleged sentence was passed, and that by the law of their American domicile (the lex loci contractus) that sentence would be held valid, but gave no opinion as to what the effect of such further pleading might be. Burge, in his Commentaries on Colonial and Foreign Laws (1838), section 2, confines his inquiring to the conflict between the law of the one country which treats marriage as indissoluble and that of the other which authorizes its dissolution by judicial sentence. He states that the obligatory effect of a sentence of separation a mensa et thoro by a foreign tribunal will be the subject of inquiry by him in a subsequent part of his work when the nature and effect of foreign judgments and sentences are considered, but I cannot find that he reverts to the subject. He observes, however (p. 669), that generally the law of the actual domicile of the parties is admitted to be competent to decree their separation a mensa et thoro. Bishop, in his Commentaries on the Law of Marriage and Divorce (Boston, 1881), section 158, discusses the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in England and shows how the Bishop's jurisdiction did not extend beyond his diocese, and concludes with this passage:—"Besides the English Courts had no authority to dissolve valid marriages, and it may be doubted whether a suit for separation from bed and board involves a question of status within the principle we are considering. If it does, still no one would seek such a divorce under circumstances to give the decree no personal effect upon the defendant." Dr. Bar considers fully the subject of jurisdiction in divorce in his Theory and Practice of Private International Law, translated by Gillespie, 1892. At p. 381 he says:—"The result in practice will probably be found to coincide pretty much with the doctrine of the text, because wives claiming aliment or demanding protection will resort to the forum of the place of residence, while these Courts will not determine any question of rights so as permanently to affect the marriage relations, unless they have jurisdiction ratione domicilii." And, again, at p. 384, in notes, "The Court of the domicile or even of the place of residence in cases of necessity are competent to lay down provisional rules, e.g., to regulate a provisional separation, to protect the wife from cruelty or to make temporary provision for her aliment, to restore for a time at the husband's instance the domicile conjugal. French practice recognizes this." Professor Westlake (Private International Law, 1890) states that the jurisdiction of the English Court to decree judicial separation depends on the same circumstances as its jurisdiction to grant a divorce (see 47), but he adds:—"If the matter be considered on the ground of social rather than legal principle, a doubt may be suggested whether it is necessary to identify the jurisdiction for judicial separation with that for divorce. The former decree leaves the parties man and wife, but gives to the injured party a protection against some of the consequences of that status, and it may therefore be reasonable to allow its benefit to be enjoyed within the territory by those who are resident in it, even though the Court of their country or domicile should alone be held competent to dissolve the tie of marriage between them." He further appears to consider that the English Court has jurisdiction to decree restitution of conjugal rights where both parties are in England at the time of the commencement of the action (see 48). Dr. Fraser, in his Treatise on Husband and Wife according to the Law of Scotland, 2nd edition, 1878, p. 1,294, under the title of Actions of Separation and Alimment, points out that different considerations come into play when the object is not permanently to affect the status of parties, but to obtain immediate protection from cruel treatment, or the means of daily subsistence, and the hardship which would arise if the rule were established that jurisdiction in actions of separation only exists in the forum of the husband's domicile. I do not find that the point in question is expressly dealt with in Foote's Private International Jurisprudence (1890), Dicey's Conflict of Laws, 1896, Eversley on Domestic Relations, 1885, Story's Conflict of Laws, 1872, or Kent's Commentaries, 1873. But in Wharton's Conflict of Laws, 1881, there is the following passage, section 210, p. 294:—"Cruelty or other misconduct gives jurisdiction for police purposes to the Court of the place where such misconduct takes place and where the offender may be cited though he be not then domiciled; but without such domicile the Court, while it will interpose for the protection of the injured party and for a provisional separation, can grant no permanent dissolution of the marriage tie." And in a note on the same page it is stated that there is much doubt in France whether the Courts have jurisdiction to decree a séparation de corps between foreigners not domiciled but resident in France, and that this jurisdiction is maintained in Switzerland. I conclude from the writers to whom I have referred that most of them are disposed to consider that the Courts of the country in which the parties are living, though not domiciled, ought to have the right in a matrimonial suit to afford protection to an injured party from the cruelty of the other party. Lord Hannen may possibly have had such a case in his mind when, in giving judgment in "Firebrace v. Firebrace" (L.R., 4 P.D., 63), he said:—"The domicile of the wife is that of her husband, and her remedy for matrimonial wrongs must be usually sought in the place of that domicile"; but added:—"It is not, however, inconsistent with this principle that a wife should be allowed in some cases to obtain relief against her husband in the tribunal of the country where she is resident, though not domiciled." This was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights where the respondent, the husband, who was domiciled in Australia, had left England before the institution of the suit, and it was held that the Court had not jurisdiction over him after he left this country, and that the suit could not be maintained. Had he remained in England it would seem from the cases of "Newton v. Newton" (L.R., 11 P.D., 11) and "Thornton v. Thornton" (ib., p. 176) that the suit could have been maintained. In the recent case of "Christian v. Christian" (78 L.T., p. 86), the President said that a suit for judicial separation may be founded upon matrimonial residence only as distinguished by our law from domicile. Having considered sufficiently for the purposes of the case the opinions of the jurists above mentioned, it is necessary that I should revert to the 22nd section of the Act of 1857, which requires the Court in such a suit as the present to act conformably to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts had theretofore acted and given relief. There are several works which deal more particularly with the jurisdiction and mode of proceeding in the Ecclesiastical Courts—e.g., Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, 1842, Roger's Ecclesiastical Law.

1849, Shelford's Law of Marriage and Divorce, 1841, and older works, such as Godolphin's Abridgment; but I cannot trace in them any statement upon the precise point in question, and the principles to govern it must be deduced from the general principles and practice of the Courts. These are stated in general terms so far as concerns the matter under consideration by Lord Justice James in his judgment above referred to, where the jurisdiction of the Court Christian is considered, and it is pointed out that the Church and its jurisdiction had nothing to do with the original nationality or acquired domicile of the parties, that residence as distinct from casual presence on a visit or in itinere was an important element, but that residence had no connexion with or little analogy to the question of a person's domicile. In my opinion, if the parties had a matrimonial home, but were not domiciled within the jurisdiction of an Ecclesiastical Court, that Court would have interfered, if the parties were within the jurisdiction at the commencement of the suit, to protect the injured party against the other party in respect of the adultery or cruelty of the latter, and I can find no authority for the suggestion made by the respondent's counsel that such interference would be limited to cases where the offence complained of was committed within the jurisdiction. In "Warrender v. Warrender" (1835, 2 Cl. and Fin., at p. 562) Lord Brougham said:—"The law either in this country or in Scotland makes no distinction in respect of the place of the commission of the offence." Although the Ecclesiastical Courts could not extinguish the mutual obligations of husband and wife they, acting pro anima salute, suspended these obligations in order to protect and relieve the injured party. It could make no difference where the parties were residing within the jurisdiction that the necessity for protection and relief arose in consequence of adultery committed by the wrongdoer while temporarily outside the jurisdiction, or of cruelty committed while the parties were temporarily outside the jurisdiction and the apprehension of further acts of cruelty remained. If the parties were within the jurisdiction, and the necessities of the case demanded that one of them should be protected against a matrimonial wrong done by the other of which the Courts would take cognizance, I cannot doubt that the Courts would have interfered. The case of "Manning v. Manning" (L.R. 2 P. and D., 223), which was relied upon by the respondent's counsel, is no authority against this view, because in that case the respondent was not within the jurisdiction of the Court and the petitioner was held not to be bona fide resident in England. If the respondent's contention is correct no decree of judicial separation could be made even in cases like "Niboyet v. Niboyet," where the parties, though not domiciled, were resident for years in this country. Then does the present case fall within the principles and rules upon which the Courts have acted? I think it does. The wife, an Englishwoman, whose domicile of origin was English, and who has resided at times in England with her husband, is forced, by the cruelty committed in Italy of her husband a domiciled Australian, to seek the protection of her parents in England. Though legally domiciled in Australia, as a matter of fact she has been forced to separate herself from her husband and establish herself in a home of her own in this country. She and her husband are both within the jurisdiction. She has been required to return with her children to her husband and is afraid to do so owing to her apprehension of the repetition of the acts of cruelty which have been committed against her while they were living together abroad. It is against the repetition of apprehended acts of cruelty that the Court grants its protection, and unless the Court interferes there is nothing to prevent the husband from forcing himself upon his wife and placing her in a position in which she may be subjected to further acts of cruelty. The status of married persons within the country is recognized. Performance of the duties arising from the marriage tie should be required and protection afforded against an abuse of the position resulting from that tie where necessary. Police protection is an inadequate remedy. It may be objected that a decree of judicial separation affects the status of the parties and that a change of status ought on principle only to be effected by the Courts of the domicile. But the relief is to be given on principles and rules which, in the opinion of the Court, shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts gave relief. According to those principles and rules cruelty and adultery were only grounds for a sentence of divorce a mensa et thoro which did not dissolve the marriage, but merely suspended either for a time or without limitation of time some of the obligations of the parties. The sentence commonly separated the parties until they should be reconciled to each other. The relation of marriage still subsisted, and the wife remained a feme covert. A woman divorced by the Court a mensa et thoro and living separate and apart from her husband could not be sued as a feme sole (see "Lewis v. Lee," 3 B. and C., 291). The effect of the sentence was to leave the legal status of the parties unchanged. Although a sentence of judicial separation is to have the effect of a divorce a mensa et thoro under the old law (section 16 of the Act of 1857), and also the further effect of placing the wife in the position of a feme sole with respect to property which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her from the date of the sentence and whilst the separation continues, and also for the purposes of contract and wrongs and injuries and suing and being sued during that period (sections 25 and 26 of the said Act of 1857); yet as the relief to be given now is to be given according to the principles and rules in force in the Ecclesiastical Courts, I am of opinion that the effect of the said sections 25 and 26, if they affect a wife's status within the meaning of the term as applied to the principles under consideration, which is doubtful, is not to deprive the Court of the power to grant relief in cases where it would have been granted by the Ecclesiastical Courts. It may be further objected that as domicile is considered a test of jurisdiction in cases of dissolution of marriage in order that the decree may be recognized in countries other than that of the domicile for the same reason a similar test should be applied in cases of judicial separation. But the reasons which apply in the one case are not applicable to the other; and even if the principle should be established that the Courts of the country of the domicile of the parties are the only Courts which can pronounce a decree of judicial separation which ought to be recognized in other countries, in my opinion no valid reason can be urged against the Courts of a country in which a husband and wife are actually living pronouncing a decree which will protect the one against the other as long as they remain within the jurisdiction. In the present case the wife's domicile is legally in Australia, but, as a matter of fact, she has justifiably separated herself from her husband and made her home in England, and it is in England that she now requires protection. He has come here and subjected himself to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country. Could anything be more unreasonable than for this Court to hold that it has no power to suspend the wife's obligation to live with her husband while in this country and leave her to proceed in the Courts in Australia to protect herself against her husband in England? It may, I think, be safely laid down that the Ecclesiastical Courts would formerly and this Court will now interfere to protect the wife against the cruelty of her husband, both being within the jurisdiction, when the necessities of the case require such intervention. I therefore hold that this Court has jurisdiction to entertain this suit, and I pronounce a decree of judicial separation in favour of the petitioner with costs. Having held that the Court has jurisdiction to entertain the suit, I think it follows that the Court has jurisdiction under the powers expressly conferred upon it by the 35th section of the said Act of 1857, and the 4th section of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, to make provision for the custody of the children of the marriage; and having heard the case it is probably more convenient that I should dispose of this matter rather than leave it for further contest in the Chancery proceedings. I will hear any application relating to the children in Chambers.

Mr. Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and Mr. Barnard appeared for the petitioner; and Mr. Inderwick, Q.C., and Mr. Lewis Thomas for the respondent.

MACKINNON V. CLARK.*

Election Law—Parliament—Return of election expenses—Duty to transmit within time limited—“Transmit,” meaning of—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 33. Decision of Kennedy, J. (ante, p. 90), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendant, and there was also a cross-appeal by the plaintiff, against the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy without a jury, reported ante, p. 90. The action was brought against Dr. Gavin Brown Clark, M.P. for the county of Caithness, to recover £4,900 penalties for having sat and voted in the House of Commons on 49 days without having transmitted a proper return and declaration respecting his election expenses. Mr. Justice Kennedy gave judgment for the plaintiff for one penalty of £100. The facts are fully stated in the judgment hereunder.

The defendant appeared in person. Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Courthope-Munroe appeared for the plaintiff.

The arguments were reported in The Times of the 18th inst.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal of the defendant, and dismissing that of the plaintiff.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment of the Court:—This is an action by the plaintiff, as a common informer, to recover from the sitting member for the county of Caithness penalties amounting to the sum of £4,900, for having sat and voted in the House of Commons as member for that county 49 times without, as it is alleged, having made a return of his election expenses, pursuant to section 33 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict., c. 51). My brother Kennedy has held that the defendant is liable for one penalty of £100, that is, for voting upon August 28, 1895, and the defendant appeals against this judgment of the learned Judge. The plaintiff appeals against the learned Judge for having held that the plaintiff was not entitled to 48 other penalties of £100 each, amounting to the sum of £4,800, for having voted after the return reached the returning officer upon August 29, 1895. The facts are extremely short. Upon July 23, 1895, the defendant, Dr. Clark, was declared elected to represent the county of Caithness in the House of Commons. At midnight of August 27, 1895, the 35 days within which Dr. Clark, who was his own election agent, had to make (I use here advisedly a neutral word) his return of election expenses to the returning officer expired. Before midnight of that day—viz., at 10 45 p.m. upon August 27, 1895—Dr. Clark in London posted his return to the returning officer, who was resident at Wick, in Caithness. Upon the next day (August 28, 1895) Dr. Clark sat and voted in the House of Commons, and also upon 48 occasions subsequent to the receipt of the return by the returning officer, which reached him upon August 29, 1895. The question is, in these circumstances, has Dr. Clark become liable to any, and what, penalties under the Act of 1883? This depends, first of all, upon what in section 33 of the Act is the meaning of the words “transmit to the returning officer.” Subsection 1 of that section runs thus:—“Within 35 days after the day on which the candidates returned at an election are declared elected, the election agent of every candidate at that election shall transmit to the returning officer a true return (in this Act referred to as a return respecting election expenses)”; and by subsection 5 the candidate is liable to a penalty of £100 for each day he votes without having done so. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the words “transmit to the returning officer” mean not only that the return shall be sent off to the returning officer within the 35 days, but that it shall actually be delivered to or lodged with him within that period. It will be observed that the section says nothing about delivery to or lodgment of the return with the returning officer within the 35 days. This is remarkable, for if lodgment with the returning officer is what the Legislature was aiming at, why has it not said so in distinct terms? All the section enacts is, that the agent shall within the prescribed period transmit the return to the returning officer. This is what the agent has to do from where he happens to be, and I can find no obligation cast by this section upon the agent to go, as in the present case, from London to the other end of the United Kingdom to ascertain whether the returning officer has received the return; nor in the Act is there to be found any obligation upon the returning officer to forward to the agent an acknowledgment of the receipt of the return. The word “transmit” in this section in my judgment means the same thing as the word “send” or “remit,” and, for reasons I will presently give, it does not mean “lodge,” as the plaintiff contends. The plaintiff’s construction of the word “transmit” brings about the extraordinary result that if the return is sent off, say, a week before the expiration of the 35 days, and in ample time to reach its destination within the 35 days, yet the candidate is guilty of an illegal practice (see section 33, subsection 6) if the return happens to perish upon its way and does not reach the returning officer within the prescribed time and the member votes, unless he can obtain an “authorized excuse.” It is said by the plaintiff that section 33, subsection 6, makes the non-lodgment of the return within the 35 days an illegal practice only if the candidate does not get an “authorized excuse” as provided by that section, and if the return perished upon the way through no fault of the candidate he could always obtain such an excuse. Is this correct? We must look to section 34 of the Act to see in what cases the Court can make an order allowing an “authorized excuse.” Now it appears to me strange that the statute should make the failure to transmit the return within the 35 days within the meaning of the section an illegal practice dependent upon whether an “authorized excuse” for not doing so can be obtained or not. But in respect of what can an “authorized excuse” be obtained? Section 34 is explicit upon the point. It enacts by subsection 1 (a) that "if the candidate . . . shows that the failure to transmit such return . . . has arisen by reason of his illness . . . or misconduct of his election agent or sub-agent, or of any clerk or officer of such agent, or by reason of inadvertence, or of any reasonable cause of a like nature, and not by reason of any want of good faith on the part of the applicant," the Court may grant an "authorized excuse." Take the case of the return being destroyed whilst in transit to the returning officer, say, in the Abergele railway accident or in the Tay-bridge accident, under what head of "authorized excuse" in this section does this come? It seems to me under none, and if this be so it is cogent, if not conclusive, to show that the plaintiff's reading of the word "transmit" is erroneous, for if it means lodgment of the return with the returning officer within the 35 days, and not the sending off of the return within that time, there would surely have been an "authorized excuse" obtainable under section 34 for what might happen to the return during its transit to the returning officer, so that if it arrived with the officer outside the 35 days by reason of circumstances beyond the control of the candidate he might be able to obtain the "authorized excuse" provided for by the section; for it must be admitted that under section 33, subsection 6, without obtaining an "authorized excuse," the candidate in such circumstances would be guilty of an illegal practice and liable to the consequences thereof. It is said that the words in section 34, subsection 1 (a), "by reason of inadvertence," cover the case of the return perishing during transit, but this, in my judgment, is not the meaning of those words, for they mean the overlooking or forgetting of something, and not accidents which may happen to the return itself after it is sent off, and whilst on its way to the returning officer. It also appears to me that such a loss of the return is not covered by the words "any reasonable cause of a like nature" in the section, for the perishing of the return is not of a like nature to the other matters mentioned in the section. In my judgment, the "authorized excuses" in section 34 do not cover the case of a return perishing during transit. By section 23 of the Act power is given to the Court, irrespective of granting an "authorized excuse," to except innocent acts from being illegal practices, and under this the candidates might obtain relief, but this in no way affects the question, What are the acts for which "authorized excuses" are to be given under section 34, subsection 1 (a), so as to cause the non-sending of the return within the prescribed period not to be an illegal practice within section 33, subsection 6? I do not myself think that the cases cited—viz., "Pennell v. Uxbridge" (31 L.J., M.C., 92) and "Banks v. Goodman" (32 L.J., M.C., 87) and others—throw any real light upon what is the meaning of the word "transmit" in section 33 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883, and if I were to refer to cases I would cite the case of "Comber v. Leyland," recently decided, but not yet reported, by the House of Lords upon the word "remit" in the contract in that case. The word "transmit" may well have a different meaning in different statutes and in different contracts. For the reasons above I cannot agree with my brother Kennedy in thinking that the word "transmit" in this section means "lodge," and, in my opinion, Dr. Clark did not violate section 33, subsection 1, when he voted upon August 28, 1895, having sent off his return to the returning officer at 10 45 p.m. upon the day before—viz., August 27, 1895. Another point was taken by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, which has only to be stated to show that it is utterly untenable. It is this—that a return with an error in it is no return at all; that although an agent of the candidate has sent off to the returning officer the return of the candidate's election expenses within the 35 days, and such return has reached the returning officer within that period, yet if it be subsequently discovered that an expense, say, of 2s., which should have been returned, has by error been omitted, nevertheless, if the sitting member in utter ignorance of this omission has voted, say, ten, 20, or even 100 times in the House of Commons, he is liable to a penalty of £100 upon each day upon which he votes. This notion is to me preposterous. I entirely agree with what my brother Kennedy has held as to this. It is said that section 33, subsection 1, enacts that the return to be made within the 35 days is to be a true return, and that a return with a blunder in it is therefore no return at all within the Act. But section 34, subsection 1, shows clearly that this is not so, for by it the Court may grant an authorized excuse for the failure to "transmit such return," and also for "any error . . . in such return," which shows to demonstration that a return with errors in it is still a return within the Act. For the errors which did exist in the return sent in by Dr. Clark he has obtained "authorized excuses" in the Court in Scotland, excepting as to a sum of £2 9s. which was overlooked when "authorized excuses" were applied for and obtained. We have nothing to do with any proceedings which may be taken as regards the £2 9s. item, for it in no way affects the claim of the plaintiff for penalties against Dr. Clark for having voted either before or after the return with the omission in it reached the returning officer. For the reasons above I think that Dr. Clark has not brought himself within the meshes of the Act so far as to be liable to penalties for having voted without having made a return within the Act, and that the appeal of Dr. Clark, the defendant, succeeds, and should be allowed with costs here and below, and that the appeal of the plaintiff fails and should be dismissed with costs.

HARROLD V. WATNEY.*

Nuisance—Highway—Defective fence—Personal injuries—Liability.

Decision of Ridley, J. (ante, p. 364), reversed.

This was an application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Ridley and a common jury, reported ante, p. 364. The action was brought by the plaintiff, a boy of four years of age, by his next friend, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained through the defendant's negligence. The defendant was the owner of a piece of waste land in South-street, Wandsworth, separated from the highway by a wooden fence belonging to him. Upon June 27, 1897, the plaintiff was in the act of climbing on to the fence to look at some children playing on the other side, when the fence fell, and the plaintiff was injured. The jury found that "the fence was very defective, but actually fell through the child standing wholly or partly on the fence not for the purpose of climbing over." The jury assessed the damages at £45. The learned Judge, upon further consideration, entered judgment for the defendant.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. CHAMIER (Mr. Moyses with him), for the plaintiff, contended that the defendant was bound to keep his fence adjoining the highway in a safe condition. This fence, being dangerous to those using the highway, including children, amounted to a nuisance. He referred to "Jewson v. Gatti" (2 The Times Law Reports, 441), "Barnes v. Ward" (19 L.J., C.P., 195), "Lynch v. Nurdin" (1 Q.B., 29), "Tlott v. Wilkes" (3 B. and A., 304), "Clark v. Chambers" (3 Q.B.D., 327). The fact that the boy was a trespasser did not prevent him from recovering. "Maugan v. Atterton" (L.R. 1, Ex., 239) and "Abbott v. Macfie" (33 L.J., Ex., 177) were not applicable even if they were good law.

Mr. A. J. DAVID, for the defendant, said that the case at the trial was fought upon negligence, and not upon nuisance. He contended that the climbing of the fence was a purely voluntary act on the part of the boy, and that to give a right of action for a nuisance it must be shown that what happened to the person injured was the result of an involuntary act on his part. He contended that the case of "Abbott v. Macfie" was in point and covered this case. The boy had no right to touch the fence for the purpose of climbing on to it.

The COURT allowed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, speaking for himself, it did not seem to him that the real question upon which the action ought to have been fought—namely, nuisance, was by name mentioned at the trial. The facts were these:—The defendant was the owner of a fence alongside the highway, and the evidence was overwhelming that the fence was rotten, and the jury so found. The plaintiff, a boy of four years of age, was using the highway, and in order to look over the fence at some boys who were playing in a piece of waste ground on the other side of the fence, he put his foot upon the fence, when the fence came down and injured him. He (the Lord Justice) could not agree with Mr. Justice Ridley, who entered judgment for the defendant. In the first place, this rotten fence was close to the highway, and was obviously a nuisance to the highway. If a person passing along the highway had felt tired and leant against the fence and it came down, that person would have a right of action. Here the boy was lawfully using the highway. The decisions in "Lynch v. Nurdin" and "Jewson v. Gatti" were in point. In the latter case the defendant owned an open cellar alongside the highway, and some painting was going on in the cellar. The cellar was protected by a bar, and a child going along the highway looked down the cellar and leant against the bar, when the bar gave way and she fell in. Mr. Justice Day nonsuited the plaintiff, but this Court set aside the nonsuit. That case was in point. For these reasons they would enter judgment for the plaintiff for the £45 damages awarded by the jury.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred. The jury were not asked the specific question whether the fence was in such a condition as to be a danger to persons using the highway. But when the evidence and the finding of the jury were looked at the only conclusion possible was that the fence, in the condition in which it was, constituted a danger to persons using the highway—that was, it constituted a nuisance. The plaintiff had further to prove that this nuisance caused the injury. It was said that the child ought not to have put his foot on the fence; but that in reality a suggestion that the conduct of the child caused the accident. The defendant created this nuisance, and when one asked oneself whether the nuisance was the cause of the accident, one got such a test as this, Was that which the child did here something which ought to have been present to the mind of the defendant as the probable result of leaving the fence in a dangerous condition? If the defendant were to say that what happened was not fairly the result of the fence being left in a dangerous condition, as no grown-up person would think of touching it, the answer would be that the Queen's highway was not intended for grown-up people only, and that a fence of this sort would be most likely to cause injury to children using the highway. If so, the nuisance was the cause of the injury, and not the act of the child.

MAXIM-NORDENFELT GUNS AND AMMUNITION COMPANY AND H. S. MAXIM V. ANDERSON.*

Patent—Validity—Alleged Infringement—Explosives—Cordite.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 510) dated July 12, 1897, which affirmed the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright dated March 14, 1897. The action was brought by the appellants as owners of letters patent granted in March, 1889, for an invention of "Improvements in the manufacture of explosive compounds," for an injunction to restrain the respondent, who is her Majesty's Director-General of Ordnance Factories, from infringing the patent. This was the final stage in the hearing of the well-known cordite case. The arguments were necessarily of a highly technical character, and were directed to ascertain the true construction of the appellants' specification. The appellants' contention was that the use of a mineral oil (such as the "mineral jelly" used by the respondent) in combination with nitro-glycerine and tri-nitro-cellulose was an infringement of their patent, and that the proportions used of the several ingredients of the explosive were not the only proportions protected by the patent. For the respondent it was argued that the invention, which was alone disclosed and claimed, was one for the production of an explosive compound consisting of gun cotton, nitro-glycerine, and castor oil, in or about the proportions specified in the body of the specification, and that if the specification was construed so as to be irrespective of proportions, the patent was invalid for want of precision.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Roger Wallace, Q.C., Mr. A. J. Walter, and Mr. Felix Cassel were counsel for the appellants; the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. Ingle Joyce, and Mr. Henry Sutton, for the respondent, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

LORD HERSCHELL, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said that the question was whether the defendant had infringed Mr. Maxim's patent by the use of the explosive which was known as cordite. The validity of the patent was not in question. The point in issue was the extent of the operation of the words in the specification. If those words were to be restricted as the respondent contended, cordite would not be an infringement. On the other hand, it was argued that if they were to have so general an application as the appellants claimed for them, the patent itself could not be sustained. The patentee declared that his invention related to the manufacture of an explosive "produced by mixing gun-cotton, nitro-glycerine, and castor oil in or about in the following proportions." Then the proportions were given. It was, in his opinion, impossible to dissociate the claim from the specification. Both these substances were known to be explosives; it was known there was a solvent; but it was said that it was not, previously to Mr. Maxim's invention, known that they could be safely combined so as to make a useful powder. But to allow a patentee to have a monopoly in the combination, however effected, of these substances would be unreasonable, because if experiments in various proportions of these substances were to lead to fresh and valuable discoveries, the inventor could not have the benefit of his researches. The proportions "in or about in" which the ingredients were combined were of the essence of the patent. There were other points in the argument upon which it was not necessary that he should express any opinion.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, LORD MORRIS, and LORD SHAND concurred.

The appeal was dismissed with costs.

HARDING AND ANOTHER V. THE COMMISSIONERS OF STAMPS FOR QUEENSLAND.*

Privy Council Appeals—Queensland—Revenue—Succession duty—Foreign domicile—Will.

The Succession and Probate Duties Act, 1892, Amendment Act, 1895, of Queensland, is not retrospective.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of Queensland of December 18, 1896.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Samuel Dickinson were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. W. W. Grantham for the respondents.

LORD HOBHOUSE, in giving their Lordships' judgment, said the appeal arose out of a claim by the Crown to charge succession duty on the estate of Silas Harding. The appellants were his executors and the respondents were the Stamp Commissioners, who claimed the duty. The Supreme Court decided that duty was chargeable. The executors maintained that no duty was payable at all. Mr. Harding died in 1894, domiciled in the colony of Victoria. In September, 1894, his will was proved in Victoria, and in April, 1895, ancillary letters of probate were granted by the Supreme Court of Queensland. He had a large property and among it were the following particulars:—(1) A debt of £102,036 due from a Mr. Doneley; (2) a debt of £20,868 due from the Queensland Brewery; and (3) 3,000 shares in the Royal Bank of Queensland. The two debts were secured by mortgages on land, stock, and goods in Queensland. It is on these three items that the Supreme Court has held duty to be chargeable under the terms of the Succession and Probate Duties Act, 1892, as amended in 1895. From the written reasons of the learned Judges their lordships collected that if the Act of 1892 had stood alone they would have felt constrained by the course of decisions in England, though not fully assenting to them, to hold that no duty was chargeable. Their judgment in effect turned on the application of the Act of 1895, and the first question was, What was the law immediately before that Act was passed? Section 4 of the Act of 1892 is in effect, as the learned Judges pointed out, a transcript of Section 2 of the English Succession Duty Act of 1853. The material words are "Every . . . disposition of property by reason of which any person . . . shall become beneficially entitled to any property upon the death of any person . . . shall be deemed . . . to confer on the person entitled by reason of such disposition . . . a succession," and on that succession the duties are fastened. The literal force of those expressions included the estate of Silas Harding. But then it included a great deal more which nobody could suppose that the legislature intended to tax; it included all persons and all property all over the world, and if not confined within reasonable limits would enable the Queensland authorities to levy a tax in respect of foreign property on foreigners when within their power. Abnormal consequences such as those have been avoided by judicial decisions in England. In "Thompson v. The Advocate General" (12 Cl. and Fin. 1) the question arose under words of a similar character in the Act of 55 Geo. III., cap. 184. That Act imposed duties on "every legacy given by any will of any person." A gentleman domiciled in Demerara owned money locally situate in Scotland on which the Crown claimed legacy duty. The case was ultimately decided in the House of Lords. The Judges were consulted and their joint opinion delivered by Chief Justice Tindal, who pointed out the absolute necessity of limiting the sense of the words, and laid it down that such necessary limitation was that the statute did not extend to the will of any person domiciled out of Great Britain whether the assets were locally situate there or not. That opinion was adopted by the House. In "Wallace v. the Attorney-General" (L.R., 1 Ch., 1.) a similar question arose under section 2 of the English Succession Duty Act of 1853, which defined a succession in the same way as the Queensland Act, 1892. A gentleman domiciled in France owned personal property in England consisting of a sum in Consols. The Crown claimed succession duty on that property. Lord Cranworth held that the same limitation which had been put on the words "every legacy given by any will of any person" must be put on the words "every disposition whereby any person becomes entitled," and that the person intended was a person who became entitled by the laws of this country. The soundness of that principle of construction had never been impugned, nor had the British Legislature thought fit to put any different limitation upon the generality of the terms in which legacy duty and succession duty were imposed. The matter appeared to be well summed up in Mr. Dicey's work on "The Conflict of Laws" (p. 785), in which he paraphrased Lord Cranworth's application of the principle "Mobilia sequuntur personam" by saying that the law of domicile prevailed over that of situation. It was, of course, a maintainable opinion that the law of situation should prevail and that a law which brought under the general words of taxation property which was protected by the taxing State and which in case of dispute was administered by it would form a more reasonable limitation of such words than the limitation by domicile. The learned Judges below inclined to that principle, and the Queensland Legislature had adopted it. But the Court had only to decide what the Legislature meant when it passed the Act of 1892. Now the decision in Thompson's case was given in 1845, that in Wallace's case just 20 years later, and it had been taken over since that the expressions in question did not apply to movable property belonging to persons of foreign domicile. Nearly 30 years after the later decision the Queensland Legislature passed their Succession Duty Act in terms identical with those of the English Act of 1853. It was impossible to suppose that they did not intend those terms to be read in the sense affixed to them by the English tribunals, and in which they would be read by every lawyer and every official conversant with the subject matter. Arguments had been presented at the bar which were founded on definitions of real estate in Queensland statutes, and on decisions respecting the locality of mortgage debts and similar property. Their Lordships failed to see that the definitions were intended to apply or did apply to the principle that movables follow the person. And as regarded locality, it was clear that the assets now in question had locality in Queensland, but that did not affect the beneficial interest to which succession duty was attached and which devolved according to the law of the owner's domicile. It remained to see whether the Act of 1895 alters the incidence of the Act of 1892 upon a will which took effect in 1894, and the probate of which was granted in Queensland several months before the latter Act came into force; in other words, whether the Act of 1895 was retrospective. The Act was entitled "An Act to amend the Succession and Probate Duties Act, 1892," and section 1 provided that it might be cited as "The Succession and Probate Duties Act, 1892, Amendment Act of 1895." The important section was the second, which ran thus:—"2. It is hereby declared that upon the issue of any grant of probate or administration in Queensland, succession duty is chargeable in respect of all property within Queensland, although the testator or intestate may not have had his domicile in Queensland." That enactment was calculated to meet such cases as the present; and, if retrospective, would be conclusive in favour of the respondents. The Supreme Court thought that the section was declaratory because of the opening expression "it is declared"; and then they go on to reason that a declaratory Act was prima facie retrospective, and confined themselves to examining whether it contained anything of a contrary nature so as to neutralize its declaratory and retrospective character. Their Lordships could not take such a view of the Act. The use of the expression "it is declared" to introduce new rules of law was not incorrect, and far from uncommon. The nature of the Act must be determined from its provisions. Now the Act did not contain any words to show that it purport to construe the Act of 1892; it did purport to amend it; every other of its provisions was in language prospective, and in section 2 itself the new rule was to take effect "upon the issue of any grant of probate," which was not fitting language to apply to estates for which probate has already been granted. In fact, the language of the Act pointed, as their Lordships thought, distinctly to future operations. And, inasmuch as it fell under two well-established canons of construction, both requiring that, as against the persons sought to be affected, it should be shown quite clearly and strictly to affect them—first, that which related to statutes imposing liabilities, and, secondly, that which related to retrospective statutes, their Lordships felt no hesitation in deciding that the Act could not be retrospective. The result was that, when the will of Mr. Harding took effect and when the Queensland letters of probate were granted, the law of 1892 did not subject his moveable assets to succession duty, and that the state of things so existing had not been disturbed by subsequent legislation. They would humbly advise her Majesty to discharge the order appealed from, so far as it declared that the succession duty was chargeable on all the property of the testator which was in Queensland at the time of his death, and, instead thereof, to declare that no succession duty was payable on the three items of the testator's property which were the subject of the appeal. The respondents must bear the costs of the appeal.

ANDERSON V. MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY—MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY V. ANDERSON.*

Railway Company—Statutory powers—Demised premises—Purchase of reversion—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Liability.

Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 317), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne, reported ante, p. 317, but the appeal related to the second action only.

In the first of these actions the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant company from interfering with the support of a certain passage or otherwise with the peaceable enjoyment by the plaintiff of his right of user of such passage, and he claimed damages in respect of that matter as well as in respect of the injury done by the company in excavating the ground adjoining the plaintiff's premises, whereby, as he alleged, they had caused the walls and ceilings of his premises to crack. The plaintiff was the lessee and occupier of No. 1, Goldhurst-terrace, Hampstead, under a lease dated April 7, 1894, and made between James Findlay of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, whereby the premises in question, together with a right of way in common with all other parties then entitled or thereafter to be entitled to a like right over the passage above mentioned at the side of the premises, were demised to the plaintiff for a term of 21 years from March 25, 1894, determinable at the option of the tenant at the end of seven or 14 years, at a yearly rent rising from £180 to £250 and subject to the covenants and conditions contained in the lease. The lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessor that the lessee, on paying the rent reserved and performing the covenants, might peaceably hold and enjoy the demised premises without any interruption by the lessor or any person claiming through him. The ground floor of the house was used as a shop, where the plaintiff carried on the business of a plumber and other businesses of a kindred nature. By the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway (Extension to London) Act, 1893, the defendant company were authorized to make and maintain a certain railway, and for that purpose were empowered to enter upon, take, and use the property demised by the lease, but that property did not form any portion of the actual site of the railway as constructed. The company, however, acquired by agreement the reversionary interest of the plaintiff's lessor in the demised premises, and by an arrangement made in October, 1895, the lessor assigned the property to the company subject to the plaintiff's lease. The company proceeded with the construction of their railway in pursuance of their statutory powers, and in the course of such construction they to some extent injured the structure of the plaintiff's premises, but, as was admitted, without negligence on the company's part. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to damages for such injury on the ground that the company, by taking an assignment of the reversion, had rendered themselves liable under the covenant for quiet enjoyment. The second action was brought by the company against Anderson for rent due under his lease, and in this action the defendant set up the covenant for quiet enjoyment as a defence, and counterclaimed for damages for its breach on the ground that the company had by their hoardings, machinery, and carts blocked the access to his premises and interfered with the use and occupation thereof. On behalf of Mr. Anderson it was conceded that but for the covenant for quiet enjoyment he would not be entitled to sue for damages in respect of the injury, but would be relegated to such remedy as he might have under section 6 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, and section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1846; but it was contended that the company, having neglected to acquire his interest in the property, and having put themselves into the position of assignees of the reversion, were liable by reason of the existence of the covenant. Mr. Justice Byrne held that the company had acted within their legal rights and that Mr. Anderson's remedy, if any, was under his statutory right to compensation. He therefore dismissed the first action so far as it related to injury to the structure of the house and dismissed the counter-claim in the second action, and he also gave judgment for the company for the rent claimed, but stayed execution pending the appeal. Mr. Anderson appealed from this decision in respect of the second action, but did not appeal as to the first action.

Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Statham were for the appellant; Mr. Eve, Q.C., the Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. S. A. Sampson were for the company.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the railway company, in the course of constructing their railway, had done that which had led to the structural injury of Mr. Anderson's house; they had also more or less obstructed the public thoroughfare; they had taken up one half of the road, leaving the other half free for traffic, as was usual in such cases; they also had a great number of horses and carts in front of Mr. Anderson's premises, which caused some injury to his shop; they had also temporarily blocked up with rubbish, &c., a passage which led to the house. That was the kind of act which Mr. Anderson said entitled him to bring an action in the High Court for breach of his covenant for quiet enjoyment. The answer of the company was that everything they had done was done in the exercise of their statutory powers and without negligence, and that Mr. Anderson's remedy was under the Railway Clauses Act and the Lands Clauses Act. That was the view taken by the learned Judge below, and it appeared to his Lordship to be a complete answer, but there were some observations of the learned Judge which might be construed as meaning that, in his opinion, the covenant was gone. The railway company bought the reversion on the lease, and, like any other assignee, they were bound by the covenant. This was not a question of right but of remedy. The objection of the company was that no action could be brought against them for anything lawfully done under their Act; but it did not follow that the covenant was useless, because a lessee might prove, having regard to the covenant for quiet enjoyment, that his land was injuriously affected, though it would not be if there were no such covenant. Moreover, an action would lie against the company for any breach which was not authorized by their statutory powers. The fact that the company were acting under their statutory powers was sufficient to dispose of this appeal, but his Lordship desired to add that a mere temporary inconvenience which for a short time rendered the access to the lessee's house a little less easy could not be said to interfere with his possession or his title and was not a breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The language of Sir Edward Fry in the case of "Sanderson v. Corporation of Berwick-upon-Tweed" (13 Q.B.D., 547), which was the case most in favour of the appellant, must be taken in connexion with the facts of that case, which differed materially from the present. In the opinion of the Master of the Rolls none of the acts done by the railway company here amounted to a breach of the covenant, but even if a breach had been committed the answer was that the acts were done by the company in the exercise of their statutory powers, and the remedy was under the Act of Parliament.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and COLLINS concurred.

KING V. HENDERSON.*

Privy Council Appeals—New South Wales—
Bankruptcy—Action for maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause instituting bankruptcy proceedings—Motive.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of February 17, 1897.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. John Andrew Hamilton appeared for the appellant; Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., Mr. Montague Shearman, and Mr. J. M. Easton for the respondent.

LORD WATSON, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the appellant in August, 1896, brought the present action against the respondent, alleging that the latter falsely and maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause presented a petition to the Judge in Bankruptcy praying that a sequestration order might be made in respect of his estate, on the allegation that he had committed an act of bankruptcy in not complying with the terms of a bankruptcy notice. The case was tried before Mr. Justice Cohen and a jury. At the close of the appellant's evidence the respondent moved for a non-suit, which was allowed. The appellant thereupon filed a rule nisi in the Supreme Court calling upon the respondent to show cause why the non-suit should not be set aside and a new trial granted, and the Court, by a majority, refused the rule. The appellant entered into partnership in August, 1893, with Mr. W. Collins, under the name of H. J. King and Co., as wool-pressers, stevedores, and shipping agents, at Sydney and elsewhere. The respondent was the manager of the German Australian Steamship Company, and through him advances were made to the firm by a Mr. Wood, amounting in all to £1,599 to March 26, 1896. In July, 1894, Mr. C. Taylor, who had been introduced by the respondent, became a member of the firm, and in June, 1895, Mr. Collins left it. In the beginning of 1896 the firm of H. J. King and Co. was evidently not in a prosperous condition. One of their employees named Hallen, who had been injured on board a ship which they were loading, recovered judgment against them for

*Reported by W. J. SOULAMY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£341. The injured man had been insured by the firm, but the office with which the insurance had been effected had gone into liquidation. The respondent in March, 1896, acting on behalf of his constituent, Mr. Wood, gave formal notice to the firm that in default of immediate payment of £1,599 then due to Mr. Wood he would take possession of the goods and chattels comprised in the indenture, which he did. On April 7 Hallen, the injured employee, took out a bankruptcy notice against the appellant, requiring the firm to pay the £341 due to him. The evidence was not conclusive to support the allegation of the appellant that such notice was procured by the respondent. The appellant's partner, Taylor, by a loan from the respondent, discharged his share of the indebtedness, and on May 7, 1896, the appellant paid Hallen the balance with costs, and the sequestration notice was withdrawn. The next day the respondent, who was a creditor of the appellant for £260 under a promissory note, filed a petition for sequestration, alleging that the appellant had committed an act of bankruptcy by failing, within the period prescribed by the Act, to comply with the notice in the previous demand of Hallen. That petition was dismissed, and later on the bankruptcy notice in Hallen's matter was set aside, the Judge holding that no act of bankruptcy had been committed. Their Lordships were of opinion that the order of the learned Judge, in so far as it declared that no act of bankruptcy had been committed by the appellant, went beyond his jurisdiction, and was unwarranted by the Bankruptcy Act of the colony. Those Acts defined with great minuteness the various ways in which an act of bankruptcy might be constituted, one of them being by a bankruptcy notice under section 4 (2) of the principal Act. When an application was made for a sequestration order, which complied with the requirements of sections 6, 7, and 8 of the same Act, ample discretion was vested in the Judge either to grant or refuse the petition; and, if a sequestration order be made, it might subsequently—section 5 (II.)—be discharged or annulled. But, whilst the Judge might, in his discretion, competently refuse to follow up an act of bankruptcy by issuing a sequestration order, the statutes gave him no jurisdiction to annul an act of bankruptcy or to declare that it had never been committed. There was no authority to be found for the procedure of the learned Judge save in the 51st of the General Rules framed by the Court, which provided that "when the Judge makes an order setting aside the bankruptcy notice, he may at the same time declare that no act of bankruptcy has been committed by the debtor under such notice." Now the only power which the Court had to frame rules was confirmed by section 119 of the principal Act, and it was strictly limited to rules "for the purpose of regulating any matter under this Act." In the opinion of their Lordships, a rule empowering the Judge to make a declaration that no act of bankruptcy had been committed under the notice was in no sense a regulation either framed or calculated to carry out the objects of the Act. It was, in their opinion, the new creation of a jurisdiction which the Legislature withheld, it was inconsistent with and so far repealed the plain enactments of the statute, and it took away from creditors the absolute right which the statute gave them of founding a petition for a sequestration order upon the bankruptcy notice. Upon the hearing of this appeal it was maintained for the appellant that the orders of the Court below ought to be reversed and the action remitted for new trial upon two separate grounds, the first of those being that certain documentary evidence had been unduly rejected by the presiding Judge, and the second that the learned Judge, instead of directing a nonsuit, ought to have submitted to the jury certain issues which were only fitted for their consideration.

Their Lordships did not think that either of those objections was well-founded. The appellant's counsel mainly contended that in presenting his petition for a sequestration order the respondent was actuated, not by an honest wish to secure payment of the debt which the appellant owed him, but by a desire to effect the exclusion of the appellant from the firm of H. J. King and Co. He maintained that the respondent's resort to sequestration in bankruptcy with that object and motive constituted an abuse of the process of the Court and a fraud, and that the Judge ought, in some form, to have remitted to the jury the question whether the respondent had been guilty of such abuse and fraud, with the direction that, in the event of their answering the question in the affirmative, they ought to return a verdict for the appellant. Their Lordships did not dispute the soundness of the proposition that a plaintiff or petitioner who instituted and insisted in a process before the Bankruptcy or any other Court in circumstances which made it an abuse of the remedy sought or a fraud upon the Court could not be said to have acted in that proceeding either with reasonable or probable cause. But, in using that language, it became necessary to consider what would, in the proper legal sense of the words, be sufficient to constitute what was generally known as an abuse of process or as fraud upon the Court. In the opinion of their Lordships, mere motive, however reprehensible, would not be sufficient for that purpose; it must be shown that in the circumstances in which the interposition of the Court was sought the remedy would be unsuitable and would enable the person obtaining it fraudulently to defeat the rights of others. Citing the cases "ex parte Gallimore (2 Rose, 424), "ex parte Wilbran (5 Maddock, L.), and "ex parte Harcourt" (2 Rose, 208), their Lordships went on to say that motive could not in itself constitute fraud, although it might incite the person who entertained it to adopt proceedings which, if successful, would necessarily lead to a fraudulent result, and it was not the motive, but the course of procedure which led to that result, which the law regarded as constituting fraud. In "ex parte Davis" (3 Ch. Div., 461), the Court of Appeal refused to make an adjudication in bankruptcy where it was clearly shown that the proceeding had been used and was meant to be used for the illegitimate and fraudulent purpose of extorting money from the debtor. And, again, in "ex parte Griffin (12 Ch. Div., 480) the same Court, although there was a good petitioning creditor's debt, and an act of bankruptcy had been committed, refused to make an adjudication. The ratio of the decision was thus explained by Lord Justice James,—“I think I never knew a case so transparent as to the fraud with which the whole thing was conceived, and the oppression which it was intended to exercise. It would, I think, be a shocking thing for any Court of justice in a civilized country to be made the instrument of proceedings like these.” Counsel for the appellant argued, with great plausibility, that on the trial of a case like the present, involving the inquiry whether the proceedings complained of were taken without reasonable and probable cause, it was within the province of the jury, and not of the Judge, to find the facts upon which the question of probable cause depended, and that it was for the Judge, upon those facts, to determine the question of law. The rule was so laid down by the House of Lords in "Lister v. Perryman" (4 E. and L. Ap., 521). Their Lordships admitted the propriety and cogency of the rule in any and every case where the facts admitted of its application. But it appeared to them that the circumstances of the present case, as disclosed in the evidence of the appellant, were very different in their character from the facts, as appearing in the evidence, with which the House of Lords had to deal in "Lister v. Perryman." It certainly was not the duty of the presiding Judge to submit any issue of fact to the jury which was not fairly raised by the evidence. There was, no doubt, evidence by the appellant tending to show that the respondent, in petitioning for a sequestration order, was influenced by a desire to get him out of the firm of King and Co., but their Lordships were unable to find in the evidence any fact or circumstance calculated to raise the question whether, in petitioning for sequestration of the appellant's estate, the respondent had committed a fraud upon the law or upon the Court, and in their opinion the learned Judge would not have been justified in raising such an issue even if he had been invited to do so. Their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty to affirm the judgment appealed from. The appellant must pay to the respondent his costs of this appeal.

Stock Exchange—Outside broker—Defence of gaming and wagering.

This was an action by an outside stockbroker to recover £257 6s. 8d., money alleged to be due in the purchase and sale of stocks and shares by the plaintiff for and on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. CANNOT, in opening the plaintiff's case, said that the plaintiff only acted as an agent for the defendant, and employed another broker to buy and sell for him on the defendant's behalf. He could prove that the stocks and shares were purchased for the defendant, and the plaintiff was liable to pay the broker he employed in the transaction and had given him security. He ought to mention that in three instances the plaintiff had overcharged the defendant £20, for which sum he was willing to give the defendant credit in the account. It was not an ordinary gaming and wagering transaction such as a speculation in differences. The case was like "Forget v. Ostigny" ([1895] App. Cas., 318), where a broker was employed to make purchases and sales on behalf of a principal when it was not held to be gaming and wagering. He put in the contract notes between plaintiff and defendant and he had also all the bought and sold notes between the plaintiff and the broker he employed.

Mr. MONTAGUE SHEARMAN, for the defendant, contended that the only intention was to pay differences. It was proved in three instances that plaintiff had charged a different price to what the broker had charged him, and therefore he could not be taken to be an agent. The gaming and wagering defence was a good one. It was not intended that any stock should be delivered. "The Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan" ([1896] App. Cas., 166).

Mr. JUSTICE DAY said he had to answer the question put by Mr. Justice Cave in the "Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan" (supra), "Were the transactions real bargains for the purchase of stock or were they simply gambling transactions intended to end in the payment of differences?" In his mind they were simply gambling transactions in the price of shares. To say that these were not gambling transactions would nullify the Act of Parliament. The items in three instances were fictitious, and not real. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant with costs.

INNES V. SHORT AND REAL.*

Patent—Validity—Infringement—Inviting the public to use zinc powder so as to infringe patent—Injunction.

In this cause the plaintiff claimed a declaration that a patent granted to him in 1895 was valid and an injunction restraining the defendants from infringing the same. The defence was that the invention was not new and that there had been no infringement.

Mr. Colam appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. C. Graham for the defendants.

The plaintiff's invention was an improved method of preventing corrosion and incrustation in steam boilers by the introduction of metallic zinc into the boilers in a powdered state in order to obtain a much greater surface for the action of the water than if the zinc was in the solid or plate form. The defendants relied on a patent granted in 1880 to Messrs. Weir as being an anticipation of the plaintiff's patent. The Weir patent was also intended to prevent corrosion in boilers by introducing zinc into boilers either in the form of a rod through a stuffing-box, or it might be introduced in small pieces or in a granular form through a pipe or passage fitted with two valves. The facts as to the alleged infringement were as follows:—The defendant Short was the patentee of an injector for injecting Innes's zinc powder or any boiler-preserving or scale-removing composition into boilers. From May, 1895, to July, 1897, Short acted as agent for the sale of the plaintiff's zinc powder, and he drew up and issued a circular headed "Innes's Patent Metallic Zinc Powder: Directions for Use." After Short had ceased to be the plaintiff's agent he continued to sell zinc powder, the defendant Beal acting as his agent. With each packet of the powder sold he issued a copy of the above circular, with the words "Innes's Patent" struck out. The circular also contained an advertisement of Short's patent injector.

Mr. GRAHAM contended that there had been no infringement. Zinc powder was an ordinary commercial article which was not the subject of a patent, and which the defendants were entitled to sell. The fact that the purchaser of the powder purposed to use it in such a way that he would infringe the patent did not make the sale an infringement on the part of the vendor, even if the latter knew the purpose with which the powder was bought. "Sykes v. Howarth" (12 Ch.D., 826) and "Townsend v. Howarth" (unreported, but cited in a note to the former case) were decisive authorities in the defendants' favour.

Mr. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that the essential part of the plaintiff's patent was that, whereas the earlier processes only acted locally, the powdered zinc used by the plaintiff acted generally through the whole of the water. By the use of zinc in a powdered condition the zinc was held in a state of suspension and operated far more effectively than when introduced in small pieces or in granular form. There was sufficient novelty in the plaintiff's patent to distinguish it from Weir's patent, and it was therefore valid. His Lordship also came to the conclusion that there had been an infringement by the defendants. He found as a fact that the defendant Short had invited and requested people to use zinc powder in such a way as to infringe the plaintiff's patent, and on that ground the case was distinguishable from "Sykes v. Howarth" and "Townsend v. Howarth." In the latter case Sir George Jessel said:—"You cannot make out the proposition that any person selling any article, either organic or inorganic, either produced by nature or produced by art, which could in any way be used in the making of a patented article can be sued as an infringer, because he knows that the purchaser intends to make use of it for that purpose." It would be nonsense to say that a person must be restrained from legitimate trade in an article because he knew that the buyer meant to put it to an improper purpose. The seller had nothing to do with the buyer's purpose; but it was a very different case when the seller asked and invited the buyer to use the article in such a way as to infringe a patent. That was what the defendant had done in this case. There would, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff for a declaration that his patent was valid, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from selling powdered zinc with an invitation to the purchaser to use it so as to infringe the plaintiff's patent.

BAYLIS AND ANOTHER V. JIGGENS AND ANOTHER.*
Landlord and Tenant—Lessee's covenants—Covenant to pay all rates, taxes, and assessments—Certain expenses of paving held not within covenant.

The facts and arguments in this case sufficiently appear from the following judgment of MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL:—This was a case argued before me a few days ago by Mr. Galbraith for the plaintiffs and by Mr. Turner for the defendants. The question is whether expenses of paving, &c., recovered in a summary manner from the owner of premises outside the metropolis under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, can be recovered by him from his tenant under a covenant whereby the tenant covenants to pay "all rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever, which now are, or during the term shall be, imposed or assessed upon the premises or the landlords or tenants in respect thereof by authority of Parliament or otherwise, except the landlord's property tax." The reported cases on similar covenants are very numerous, but it seemed to me on the argument, when the principal cases were quoted, that no case exactly covered the present one, and I still think so. In considering cases of this kind it is necessary, in the first place, to notice what the payment sought to be recovered is for, and next the exact words of the covenant. Expenses for abating nuisances and for drainage and other works on the premises are in some respects different from paving and works done in the street upon which the property abuts, and expenses of paving within the metropolis differ from similar expenses under the Public Health Act outside the metropolis in this respect, that under the Public Health Act such expenses are a charge upon the premises, whereas under the Metropolitan Management Acts they are not. In the present case the expenses in question were payable under the Public Health Act, and the sum is therefore both a charge on the premises, and it is also, I think, beyond doubt a charge on the landlord in respect of the premises. Several of the reported cases which have been decided in favour of the tenants have been so decided by reason of the absence from the covenants there in question either of words covering charges upon the premises or of words covering charges upon landlords in respect of the premises, as, for instance, "Allan v. Dickinson" (9 Q.B.D., 632) and perhaps "Wilkinson v. Collyer" (13 Q.B.D., 1), when the words were absent; but it is not quite clear that this was the sole ground of the decision. Such cases are no authority in the present case, for here we have the words "imposed or assessed upon the premises or the landlords in respect thereof." In the present case therefore the only question is whether the payment in question comes within the words "rates, taxes, or assessments." Now there are many of the reported cases in which these words occur, but there are generally one or more other words. Thus, in "Hartley v. Hudson" (4 C.P.D., 367) the word "charges" occurred in the covenant. In "Budd v. Marshall" (5 C.P.D., 481) the word "duties" occurred. In "Aldridge v. Frae" (17 Q.B.D., 212) the word "outgoings." These cases do not, therefore, conclude the present. The nearest case to the present is, perhaps, "Wilkinson v. Collyer," where the words were as here "rates, taxes, or assessments" without further addition, but, as I have already remarked, the words "imposed on the landlord in respect of the premises," which we have here, were absent. Mr. Turner relied very much on a passage in "Hartley v. Hudson" (4 C.P.D., 367, at p. 368), where Mr. Justice Lindley says, "The expense of paving, &c., can hardly be said to be a rate, tax, or assessment; hence it only remains to consider whether it is a charge." But as he had got the word "charge," obviously a wider word and one which he held covered the paving expenses, it is clear that it was not really necessary for him to consider whether the words rate, tax, or assessment were sufficient, and that the passage is a dictum only. It seems to me necessary, therefore, for me to consider the question. I agree that these expenses cannot be considered either a rate or a tax, but I have had a good deal of doubt whether they are not "an assessment imposed on the landlord in respect of the premises." Mr. Turner contended that nothing could be an assessment which was not apportioned according to the value of the premises, and here the apportionment is according to frontage. I do not think that argument conclusive. Some sewer rates, for instance, are raised "per acre," and these would properly be described as assessments, and I think a sum to be paid out of or in respect of a particular property might be an assessment if the amount were arrived at in proportion to acreage or in proportion to frontage just as much as if it were in proportion to rateable value. On the whole, however, having regard to the opinion of Mr. Justice Manisty in "Wilkinson v. Collyer," that prima facie such covenants as this are confined to rates and assessments of a temporary and a necessary nature, and do not include a sum which is a charge on property giving it an increased permanent value, and also to the dictum of the present Master of the Rolls in "Hartley v. Hudson," which I have quoted, I come to the conclusion that I am justified in holding this payment not to be a rate, tax, or assessment within the meaning of the covenant. It is obvious that in leasing at a rack-rent and for a short term the tenant would not be likely to have intended to bear it, but that would be immaterial if the words were clear. I therefore give judgment for the defendant, and, of course, costs will follow.

Master and Servant—Neglect to fence dangerous machinery—Personal injuries—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, sec. 82.

*Reported by H. G. SNOWDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.
No. 29.—VOL. XIV.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, does not take away the right of action for personal injuries caused by neglect to perform the statutory obligation of fencing dangerous machinery.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Mr. Justice Grantham at the trial of an action heard before him and a jury at Cardiff Assizes. The action was brought to recover damages for injuries received by the plaintiff, a boy in the employment of the defendant at the Dowlais Ironworks, in consequence of certain machinery being unfenced. The action was brought against the defendant for breach of a statutory duty in not maintaining the fencing of the machinery; and, in the alternative, for negligently allowing the machinery to become dangerous. It was admitted that the machinery in question, a steam winch, was machinery which ought to have been fenced under section 5 of the Factory Act, 1878. That Act contains a section—viz., section 82—imposing a penalty by way of fine not exceeding £100 in case of a breach of any of its provisions, with regard to the fencing of machinery causing loss of life or bodily injury. At the trial the learned Judge held that an action did not lie, and directed that judgment should be entered for the defendant. The damages were assessed by the jury at £150 in case the Court of Appeal should take a contrary view.

MR. ABEL THOMAS, Q.C., and Mr. S. T. EVANS appeared for the plaintiff, and said that he complained of the judgment of the learned Judge and asked for a new trial. An action lay for injuries caused by a breach of a statutory obligation. A long series of cases beginning with "Coe v. Platt" (7 Exch., 460, 21 L.J., Ex., 146) showed that the Judges had assumed over and over again that an action might lie for a breach of the provisions of the Factory Acts, notwithstanding the fact that the Acts contained provisions for penalties.

MR. FRANCIS WILLIAMS, Q.C., and Mr. BAILHACHE, for the defendant, argued that, looking at the whole of the Factory Act, it was clear that the intention of the Legislature was that the penalty imposed by the Act should be the only remedy which a person injured by a breach of the Act should get from the factory owner. If they were wrong on that point the defendant was entitled to rely on the defence of common employment.

The COURT allowed the appeal, and entered judgment for the plaintiff for £150.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that Mr. Justice Grantham entered judgment for the defendant upon the ground that no action would lie for breach of the statutory duty, and that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. The Factory Act, 1878, was passed by the Legislature in favour of the workmen in order to compel the master to do certain things for their protection. An obligation was imposed upon the master in favour of the workmen and that obligation was enforced by a penalty. Section 5 imposed an unqualified obligation to fence certain machinery and to maintain the fencing. It was conceded that the machinery here came within the section. The machinery was not fenced, and the breach of the statutory obligation caused damage to the plaintiff. It could not be doubted that, if section 5 stood alone, a cause of action would have accrued to the plaintiff. Unless they could find that upon the whole purview of the Act it was intended that the only remedy should be the imposition of a fine upon the master for the breach of his statutory duty, it was clear that the Act gave a right of action to the injured person upon proof of the breach of the statutory duty and the injury caused thereby. Had the prima facie civil remedy been taken away by some other provision in the Act? That brought him to sections 81, 82, and 87. He asked himself whether, considering that the Act was enacted in favour of the workmen and in coercion of the master, the penalty could have been intended to be the only remedy, when not one penny might ever go to the injured workman, because, by section 82, the Home Secretary might, in his discretion, but was not bound to, apply the whole or any part thereof for the benefit of the injured person. Could that be so? Upon an information for a penalty, the magistrates would probably take into account the character of the failure to fence. If the failure to fence was of a venial character, but the injury caused thereby to a workman was of a serious character, what fine should the magistrates impose? Ought they to impose a fine such as they would impose in a flagrant case? It seemed to him that the fine was a punishment on the master for his breach of duty, and that the fine should be proportionate to the character of the offence, and not proportionate to the injury that might be inflicted upon the workman. However, whatever penalty was inflicted, it was not made necessarily to go into the pocket of the injured workman, and that seemed to him almost conclusive that the imposition of a fine did not take away the right of action. Another consideration made it still more clear, because it did not necessarily follow that the occupier was the person to be fined. By section 87 the occupier might be exempt from a penalty, and a workman who was the real offender might be fined instead, when he might not have a penny to pay the fine with, and yet the argument was that in such a case the injured workman must look to the fine as his sole possible compensation. He could not think that that was so. In his opinion section 5 gave a right of action upon the statute for breach of duty occasioning injury to a workman, and there was nothing in the Act to deprive the injured workman of this right of action. As to the authorities, no case showed that the defendant's contention was correct. There were cases which tended to show that that contention was unsound. One of those cases was "Britton v. Great Western Cotton Company" (L.R., 7 Ex., 130). It was said that in that case the breach of duty was in not providing a fence, whereas here the breach was in not maintaining the fence. He could see no difference between the two. For these reasons, in his opinion, the plaintiff had a cause of action. It was next said that the doctrine of common employment afforded a defence to the action. A master was liable to a third person for the negligent act of his servant acting within the scope of his authority. Then came "Priestley v. Fowler" (3 M. and W., 1), which imposed a limitation upon that doctrine in favour of the master. That case decided that if a servant was injured by the negligence of a fellow servant while acting within the scope of his employment the master was not liable, the ground being, as it seemed to him, that the servant, when entering the master's employment, undertook the risk of injury arising from the negligent act of a fellow servant. That was the doctrine of common employment. It was a defence to an action by a servant against his master, but it did not apply to any case except an action by a servant against his master for the negligence of a fellow servant. In this case there was no question of any negligence. The plaintiff had only to prove a breach of the statutory duty and injury to himself therefrom, and it would be no answer to say that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. The defendant could not delegate his statutory duty to another. The appeal must therefore be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for the £150 damages awarded by the jury.

THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD V.
R. HUNTER, CRAIG, AND CO.*

Shipping—Port dues on goods—Upper Mersey Dues Act, 1860—Construction.

Decision of Mathew, J. (ante, p. 38), reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew at the trial of the action, without a jury, reported ante, p. 38; 3 Com. Cas., 6. The action was brought to recover £1 5s., being town dues at the rate of 8d. per ton on 37½ tons of flour imported into the port of Liverpool and landed at the Duke's Dock in that port. The flour in question formed part of the cargo of the ship Oliva, and was brought from Fiume under a bill of lading in which the ship was described as "bound for Liverpool, via Manchester." The vessel proceeded to Manchester by the Manchester Ship Canal, and the whole cargo, including the flour, was discharged and landed at Manchester. The flour was subsequently carried in lighters by the Manchester Ship Canal and over a part of the River Mersey into the Duke's Dock, and there landed in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading. In accordance with the usual practice of the Customs authorities, when the Oliva arrived at Manchester the flour was entered with the Customs there, and when it was carried to Liverpool no entry was there made or required by the Customs. Before 1861 town dues were levied by the plaintiffs and their predecessors in respect of goods loaded or discharged within the port of Liverpool. No service was performed in return for these dues. By the Upper Mersey Dues Act, 1860, it was provided that an imaginary line was, for the purposes of the Act, to be drawn across the River Mersey from Eastham Ferry Slip to the north-westerly boundary of the present Garston Dock Quay, and that so much of the port as lay seaward of the line should be designated the Lower Mersey. The dues receivable in respect of goods imported into, and exported from, the port of Liverpool, except those specified in section 17, were to remain the property of the plaintiffs, but dues in respect of goods carried over any part of the Upper Mersey were to be transferred to and vested in trustees to be called the Upper Mersey Trustees. The consideration for the transfer was £105,000, and it was provided that, when this amount and certain other charges had been paid out of the dues receivable by the trustees, the dues should be abolished. When this action was brought, these conditions had been complied with, and no dues were payable to the trustees. The entrance to the Ship Canal is about a quarter of a mile above Eastham Ferry, and the Duke's Dock is in the Lower Mersey, so that the flour was in fact carried over a portion of the waters of the Upper Mersey, both on its way to Manchester in the Oliva, and on its way from Manchester to the Duke's Dock in lighters. The town dues transferred to the trustees by the Act of 1860 were thus described in section 17:—"All such and so many of the said town dues as shall be payable for or in respect of any goods which shall be carried or conveyed upon, over, or along any part of the Upper Mersey." A separate issue was ordered to be tried to determine the question, apart from other questions in the action, whether, assuming that the plaintiffs would otherwise have been entitled to succeed on their claim, they were disentitled by reason of the provisions of the Act of 1860. The question in effect was whether the town dues claimed were "payable for or in respect of any goods which had been carried or conveyed upon, over, or along any part of the Upper Mersey." Mr. Justice Mathew gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts appeared for the defendants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Carver, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.

The Court allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in this case he could not agree with the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew. The point to be decided was—What was transferred from the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to the Upper Mersey Trustees by section 17 of the Act of 1860? The facts of the case were that a general ship came from abroad into the Mersey and the port of Liverpool, and proceeded thence along the Manchester Ship Canal to Manchester. Some of the goods on board were destined for Liverpool, via Manchester. These goods having been discharged at Manchester were sent in lighters down the canal over a portion of the Upper Mersey into the Duke's Dock in the Lower Mersey. The question was whether the Docks and Harbour Board were entitled to town dues in respect of those goods. The defendants' case was that the Board were not entitled to town dues on those goods, because town dues payable in respect of such goods were transferred to the Upper Mersey Trustees by the Act of 1860, and therefore nobody could be entitled to them except the trustees, and, inasmuch as the dues had since then been abolished, neither the board nor the trustees could now claim them. Section 17 of the Act of 1860 made a division of the river into two parts. A line was drawn across the river separating the Upper Mersey from the Lower Mersey, and a transfer of town dues was made to the Upper Mersey Trustees. What were the town dues so transferred? "All such and so many of the said town dues as shall be payable for or in respect of any goods not liable under, or by virtue of, the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, to the payment of dock rates on goods specified in Schedule C to such Act annexed, or any of them, which shall be carried or conveyed upon, over, or along any part of the Upper Mersey." The argument on the part of the plaintiffs was that those goods were not carried over a part of the Upper Mersey within the meaning of the section. In his opinion, notwithstanding the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew, that argument was untenable. The case was suggested in argument of a ship being carried across the line by a storm, or a sailing ship going across the line while tacking. But this was a case in which goods were carried over part of the Upper Mersey in the ordinary course of their transit. He therefore thought that the appeal must be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY was of the same opinion. If the town dues, which would have been payable in respect of these goods in 1860, were then transferred to the trustees, the Harbour Board clearly no longer had the right to recover them. The argument on the part of the plaintiffs was that town dues in respect of goods landed below the imaginary line were not transferred but were still payable to them. If that had been the intention of the Legislature, it would have been simple to say so. Whatever difficulty there might be in the section, it seemed to him clear that it did not mean that. The transfer was of all such town dues as complied with certain conditions, one of such conditions being that the goods should be carried over part of the waters of the Upper Mersey. These goods were carried over part of the Upper Mersey. He thought that the town dues payable in respect of such goods were transferred, and that the Board could not now claim them.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said it was not denied that the goods in question were not liable to dock rates, but it was argued that the town dues claimed were not dues included in the transfer because the goods were not carried over any part of the Upper Mersey within the meaning of section 17. That conclusion seemed to have been arrived at from some consideration of the state of things existing at the date of the transfer. But he was inclined to give the words of the section their literal construction, and he certainly thought that, where goods were carried in the ordinary course of their voyage to Liverpool and thence on to Manchester, and were then carried back in lighters to the Duke's Dock, such goods were within the section.

WALL V. THE LONDON AND NORTHERN ASSETS CORPORATION AND OTHERS.*

Company — Management — Interference of the Court—Majority and minority of shareholders — Injunction refused.

This was a motion by the plaintiff, suing on behalf of himself and all other shareholders in the defendant company except those who voted for a certain special resolution which had been passed by the shareholders, asking for an injunction to restrain the company and the directors from carrying that resolution into effect. The London and Northern Assets Corporation was incorporated in 1888, its principal object being to carry on a financial and investment business. In 1889 another company, called the London and Northern Debenture Corporation, was incorporated, its objects being practically the same as those of the Assets Company, and the two companies had for some years past been working a joint business, and the board of directors of each company was the same. The capital of the Assets Corporation consisted of 100 founders' shares and 50,204 ordinary shares, all of £2 each, of which £1 10s. per share was paid up. The issued capital of the Debenture Corporation was 99 founders' shares and 34,600 ordinary shares of £2 each, fully-paid, but in March, 1898, these had been subdivided into £1 shares. In February, 1898, as the plaintiff alleged, the annual report of the Debenture Corporation stated a deficiency of assets to the extent of £5,165, and that only £1 17s. per £2 share was represented by assets. The market value of the shares at that date was £1 5s. per £2 share. In that month a scheme and agreement for the amalgamation of the two corporations was proposed by the directors. The scheme provided for the purchase of the whole undertaking of the Assets Corporation by the Debenture Corporation in consideration of shares in the Debenture Corporation, and the agreement further provided that out of the proceeds of sale each holder of a founder's share in the Assets Corporation should receive 13 ordinary fully-paid £1 shares in the Debenture Corporation, while each ordinary shareholder in the Assets Corporation was to receive 13 ordinary fully-paid £1 shares in the Debenture Corporation and 5s. in cash or shares for every ten ordinary shares held by him in the Assets Corporation. The plaintiff, who was the holder of three founders' shares and 1,800 ordinary shares in the Assets Corporation and of one founder's £2 share and four ordinary £2 shares in the Debenture Corporation, objected to the scheme on the ground (inter alia) that the Debenture Corporation were making a profit out of the Assets Corporation, because the scheme provided for paying for the assets of the Assets Corporation on a cash basis in shares in the Debenture Corporation on the basis of their nominal value, whereas the fact was that the Debenture Corporation shares were much depreciated in value. An extraordinary general meeting of the Assets Corporation was held on March 22, 1898, to consider the requisite resolutions to carry out the proposed scheme. The plaintiff complained that at this meeting, while he and other shareholders were desirous of addressing the meeting, the chairman put a resolution that the discussion should be terminated. That resolution was carried, and then a resolution approving of the scheme was also passed. A meeting to confirm that resolution was held on April 6. On that occasion, the resolution having been proposed and seconded, an amendment was proposed, but ruled out of order by the chairman. The plaintiff alleged that a shareholder then moved the adjournment of the meeting, and upon his rising to second that resolution the chairman refused to allow him to speak, but at once put to the meeting a resolution that the original resolution "be now put." That resolution was carried. The plaintiff thereupon demanded a poll upon the question that "the resolution be now put," but the chairman refused to grant a poll thereon. The special resolution was then put and carried. The plaintiff thereupon demanded a poll, which was granted by the chairman, and the holding of which resulted in 25,593 votes in favour of the resolution, and 10,866 against it. The plaintiff then commenced this action, and moved for an injunction upon the grounds—(1) that the company had no power to sell its undertaking; (2) that the proposed distribution of assets was not in accordance with the rights of the shareholders; (3) that the minority had been unfairly treated; and (4) that the proceedings at the meetings were irregular.

Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy was for the plaintiff; Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Hamilton for the defendants, the company; and Mr. Lailey for the directors.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that four points were raised by the plaintiff. The first was that the company had no power to sell its assets. This was not a proceeding under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, but it turned upon the powers of the company as defined by its memorandum of association. His Lordship then considered the terms of the memorandum, and came to the conclusion that the scheme in question came within the powers of the company. Then it was said, in the second place, that the distribution of the assets contemplated by the scheme was not in accordance with the rights of the parties interested. Upon this point his Lordship came to the conclusion that, inasmuch as the scheme altered the relative rights of the holders of shares which were already in existence, that part of the scheme was not, in the absence of special words in the memorandum, within the powers of the company, and he did not think that the terms of the memorandum were sufficient to justify what was proposed to be done as regards distribution. On the whole, however, he thought that the justice of the case would be met by accepting from the defendants an undertaking similar to that which was given in the case of "Griffith v.

*Reported by W. W. KNOX, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Page 77 (L.R., 5 Ch. D., 894)—viz., an undertaking not to distribute the shares to be received under the agreement. There were, however, two further points. It was said that the minority had been unfairly treated, because, as alleged by the plaintiff, the shares of the Debenture Corporation were not worth their nominal value. No personal imputation was made against the directors, but it was said that their judgment had been biased by their having a larger interest in the Debenture Corporation than in the Assets Corporation; and the like was said of a certain number of shareholders in the latter company. The case relied upon was "Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works" (L.R., 9 Ch. App., 350), but here it was not a question of the majority keeping the consideration to themselves, but simply whether the consideration was adequate, and upon that the view of the majority must prevail. Moreover, in this case the majority included a large number of shareholders not alleged to have any adverse interest. Then the last point urged by the plaintiff was that the proceedings at the meetings were irregular, and, in particular, that the closure was applied on two occasions. It certainly was of importance that free and fair discussion in meetings of shareholders should be supported by the Courts. In his Lordship's opinion, however, it had never been held that any particular shareholder had a right to insist upon being heard at any time and at any length that he pleased. That was a matter which must be left to the control of the chairman, supported by the meeting itself. His Lordship was referred upon this point to some remarks of Lord Justice James and Lord Justice Melish in the case of "Macdougall v. Gardiner" (1 Ch. D., 21). In that case Lord Justice Melish said:—"I think it is of the utmost importance in all these companies that the rule which is well known in this Court as the rule in 'Mozley v. Alston,' 'Lord v. Copper Miners' Company,' and 'Foss v. Harbottle' should be always adhered to—that is to say, that nothing connected with internal disputes between the shareholders is to be made the subject of a bill by some shareholder on behalf of himself and others, unless there be something illegal, oppressive, or fraudulent." In the present case there was nothing illegal or fraudulent in what the company proposed to do, and it seemed to his Lordship that the application of the closure on the two occasions complained of was not shown to be oppressive or an undue interference with the rights of the minority. It was not made out that the minority had not had a fair opportunity of placing their case before the shareholders. Another point was that at one of the meetings a poll had been refused by the chairman, but his Lordship thought that the chairman was justified, in the construction which he placed upon the articles, in refusing a poll. This was borne out by the decision in "Reg. v. Government Stock Investment Company" (L.R. 3, Q.B.D., 442). His Lordship then lastly dealt with the contention of the plaintiff that the chairman had at the confirmatory meeting refused to put an amendment which was proposed by the plaintiff. In his Lordship's view the amendment really amounted to a negative of the confirmation. The question before the meeting was, aye or no, should the resolution be confirmed? If the amendment had been carried the resolution would not have been confirmed. Consequently, by ruling the amendment out of order and putting the question directly as he did, the chairman withdrew nothing from the meeting. On the whole case, therefore, his Lordship considered that the motion failed, and, upon the defendants giving the undertaking referred to, there would be no order upon the motion, except that the costs be costs in the action.

WARREN V. MOORE.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Deposit—Sale of public-house—Vendor's inability to complete—Action to recover deposit.

Decision of Hawkins, J. (ante, p. 138), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Hawkins in favour of the plaintiff at the trial of the action without a jury, reported ante, p. 138. The action was brought to recover £500 paid as a deposit upon a contract dated October 26, 1896, to purchase the lease of a publichouse called the Prince Albert, Albert-road, Peckham. The Wenlock Brewery Company (Limited) held a lease of the publichouse, of which about 65 years had still to run, which lease was a free lease. The defendant was tenant of the house to the brewery company under a sublease for 40 years, this being a tied lease. The defendant advertised the lease of the house for sale, and negotiations were carried on between the plaintiff and the defendant through Mr. Beard, and on October 26, 1896, the contract was signed. By the contract the defendant, the vendor, agreed in consideration of the sum of £500 paid to him by the plaintiff, the purchaser, by way of deposit, and the further sum of £9,000 to be paid on November 30 to assign to the plaintiff the lease of the publichouse for the remainder of the unexpired term of 65 years, the same not being a brewer's lease, possession to be delivered on November 30, and the purchaser to make no objection should the lease be an underlease. It was further agreed that if either party should refuse or neglect to perform his part of the agreement he should pay to the other £500 as agreed damages, and in case of default by the purchaser the deposit money was to be forfeited. The date for completion was extended to December 17. Before this date the defendant's solicitors, who were also solicitors for the Wenlock Brewery Company, wrote to the effect that the brewery company had agreed to free the lease, and would join in the assignment. Upon December 18 the plaintiff rescinded the contract upon the ground that at the date for the completion the defendant had no power to convey the lease as specified in the contract, nor was the brewery company, who were not parties to the agreement, under any legal obligation to join in the assignment. Mr. Justice Hawkins gave judgment for the plaintiff for £500, holding that, time being of the essence of the contract, "Cowles v. Gale" (L.R., 7 Ch., 12), the defendant was not on December 17 in a position to fulfil the obligation into which he had entered. The defendant appealed.

Mr. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. R. A. GERMAINE, for the defendant, said that the brewery company did not first convey their lease to the defendant so that he might then convey that lease to the plaintiff, because it was thought advisable to have only one deed instead of two, but that the company were to join in the deed of assignment for the purpose of conveying the term vested in them. This was the position of the parties at the date fixed for completion, which was the material date, and therefore at that date the defendant was ready and willing to carry out his contract. They referred to "In re Bryant and Barningham's Contract" (44 Ch.D., 221), "Forrer v. Nash" (35 Beav., 167), "Bellamy v. Debenham" (1891, 1 Ch., 412), "Paton v. Rogers" (6 Madd., 256).

Mr. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C., and Mr. H. A. FORMAN, for the plaintiff, contended that up to the date fixed for completion there was no contract binding the brewery company to concur in the assignment, and that therefore the defendant was not in a position to fulfil his contract.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether the defendant on December 17, the date for completion, was in a position to convey the lease to the plaintiff, which he had contracted to convey. The defendant, by the contract of October 26, 1896, agreed in his own name to convey the lease of the house as a free house for 65 years to the plaintiff. When the title of the defendant came to be inquired into, the solicitors who were acting for the defendant and who were also solicitors for the Wenlock Brewery Company, a limited company, wrote to say that the company had agreed to free the lease and would join in the assignment to the plaintiff. He (the Lord Justice) could not see how, without a resolution of the board of directors, or some document under the seal of the company, there was anything in law to bind the company, or how the defendant could say in tendering his title for acceptance that the company were bound in law to carry out the representation and to join in the assignment. For these reasons, in his opinion, the judgment must be affirmed.

Practice—Costs—Evidence on affidavit—Attendance of country solicitor on hearing of summons—Discretion.

In this case his Lordship was sitting as the Judge of the Chancery Division to whom Chancery matters commenced in the Manchester and Liverpool District Registries of the High Court of Justice are assigned. In these cases a London agent is not usually employed by the country solicitor, and the latter often comes up to town to attend proceedings in Court or Chambers which come before the Judge personally. This was a summons to review taxation as between party and party in respect of allowances by the District Registrar for the attendance of Liverpool solicitors in London on the hearing of an originating summons, all the evidence having been by affidavit. The case, as his Lordship pointed out, was a peculiar one. Although initiated by summons under the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, it was equivalent to a most hostile action to remove trustees on the ground of misconduct. What his Lordship described as "unjustifiable charges (including charges of gross personal misconduct, unsupported by evidence)" were made, and his Lordship dismissed the application with costs. On taxation the District Registrar allowed for the attendance in London of Liverpool solicitors at the hearing upon two occasions—viz., when the case was part heard and on the adjourned hearing.

Mr. Torrell was for the applicant, and Mr. Rotch and Mr. Preston were for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE, in delivering judgment, said,—In my opinion, so far as the Chancery Division is concerned, the rules and practice in respect of the taxation of party and party costs are the same in the London

Taxing Masters' offices and in the offices of the District Registrars of Liverpool and Manchester; and I consider that such rules and practice apply in respect of cases heard in London exactly as if proceedings had been initiated in any other district registry than those of Liverpool and Manchester and had been taxed in London. In other words, the District Registrars in Liverpool and Manchester ought to act upon the same principles as the London Taxing Masters act in taxing costs where the proceedings have been commenced in district registries in other parts of the country. I have given the matter careful consideration and have made inquiry of two of the London Taxing Masters. In the result I am satisfied that there is no such hard and fast rule as that suggested by the applicant's counsel—namely, that in no case where all the evidence is taken by affidavit ought the costs of the attendance of the country solicitor to be allowed. On the contrary, I believe it to be in accordance with the existing practice to allow such costs in certain rare and exceptional cases, in the exercise of the discretion of the taxing officer. This discretion ought to be, and is, exercised with the utmost care and caution. One of the London Taxing Masters informs me that he does not think he has allowed such costs on a party and party taxation in more than about half a dozen instances. I can well understand that cases do occur where personal fraud or misconduct has been charged and has failed, where all the preliminary proceedings have been taken in the district registry, and where all the facts are known in the offices of the country solicitor that the taxing officer may fairly consider the presence in London of the country solicitor to be reasonably necessary for the conduct of the defendant's case. At the same time, it affords no reason at all for exercising the discretion that no London agent has been employed. If the charges for attendance of the country solicitor are allowed in the rare and exceptional cases referred to, it is not in accordance with the practice, as I understand it, to allow charges also for the attendance of the London solicitor. I have confined my remarks to cases arising in the Chancery Division, and I do not consider that I am departing from the general rule laid down in the case of "The Soto" (L.R., 1893, P.D., 73). My view is that upon a party and party taxation the costs of an unsuccessful litigant are not to be increased simply by reason of the opponent client, or his local solicitor in Liverpool or Manchester, electing that such solicitor should attend in London instead of employing a London agent; that no different rule or practice ought to prevail upon taxation before a Liverpool or Manchester District Registrar than that prevailing upon taxation in London of the costs arising in any other of the numerous district registries throughout the country; and that the discretion of the taxing officer ought always to be exercised in such a matter (as I have no reason to doubt it is) with very great care and only in exceptional cases. The present case was a very exceptional one, and the discretion of the taxing officer having been exercised with care, and after consultation with a most experienced London Taxing Master, I am not prepared to interfere with such discretion or to go into the question of the amount of the allowances complained of. I may add that the items 173 and 174 in Appendix N. to the R.S.C., 1893 (Annual Practice, Vol. II., p. 202), cited by the respondent's counsel, have no bearing upon the present case, inasmuch as they do not apply to cases heard in London or Middlesex. The summons must be dismissed, with costs. Leave to appeal was granted.

WOOLF V. HAMILTON.*

Gaming and Wagering—Bets upon horse races—
Cheque in payment—Illegal consideration.

An endorsee who takes a note or bill which he knows to have been given in payment of a bet on a horse race cannot recover upon it.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Mr. Justice Darling at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in The Times of December 22. For the purposes of this report it is only necessary to state the following facts:—The action was brought by the endorsee of a cheque for £84 3s. 9d., which had been drawn by the defendant in favour of a bookmaker in payment of bets lost upon horse races, and which had been endorsed by the bookmaker to the plaintiff for value, the plaintiff having notice that the cheque was given in payment of bets. The plaintiff contended that the cheque was not given upon an illegal consideration, but merely upon a consideration that was void, and that, therefore, as he was a holder for value, he could recover. Mr. Justice Darling held that the plaintiff could not recover, and gave judgment for the defendant.

Mr. RITTER and Mr. F. W. SHERWOOD, for the plaintiff, contended that a bet on a horse race was not an illegal contract, but that the consideration for the contract was merely void. Therefore a holder for value of a cheque with notice that it was given in payment of a bet on a horse race could recover upon it. Horse racing did not come within the statute of 9 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, and therefore a cheque given in payment of a bet on a horse race was not given on an illegal consideration, and did not come within 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 41. The cases of "Goodburn v. Marley" (2 Str., 1,159), "Lynall v. Longbottom" (2 Wils., 36), "Blaxton v. Pye" (2 Wils., 309), which decided that horse racing was a game within the statute of 9 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, were wrong, and ought not to be followed. They also referred to "Lilley v. Rankin" (56 L.J., Q.B., 248).

Mr. F. Shewell Cooper, for the defendant, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that it had been held on more than one occasion that horse racing came within the provisions of 9 Anne, c. 14, s. 1. Horse racing was specially mentioned in the statute 16 Car. II., c. 7, and the authorities had held that the same kinds of games were covered by the statute of Anne as were covered by the statute of Charles. They were not going to overrule those authorities, seeing that the Legislature had on many occasions legislated upon these matters, and had not in any way touched those cases. Being within the statute of Anne the case was clear. The statute 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 41, had repealed those parts of the statutes of Charles and Anne, which said that any note, bill, or mortgage given as therein mentioned should be absolutely void, and enacted that any such note, bill, or mortgage, should "be deemed and taken to have been made, drawn, accepted, given, or executed for an illegal consideration." The meaning of that obviously was that a person who for value took a note or bill which he knew to have been given in payment of a bet on a horse race—that was, with notice that it was given for an illegal consideration, could not recover upon it. The action, therefore, was not maintainable.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

KENNAIRD V. WILLIAM CORY AND SON.*

Local Government—River Thames—By-law—
Validity—Watermen and Lightermen Act,
1859 (22 and 23 Vict., c. cxxxiii., sec. 2).

This was a special case stated by the police magistrate for West Ham on an information against the respondents, the owners of the steamboat Rotifer, for unlawfully towing a barge, such steamboat not having a licensed waterman on board, contrary to By-law 60.

Mr. Ashton appeared for the prosecution; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Tudor Howell for the respondents; Mr. Scrutton appeared for the Watermen's Company with a watching brief.

The arguments took place on May 24. The question raised was as to the validity of the above by-law made by the company. The magistrate had refused to convict.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS delivered the judgment of the Court in a written judgment, upholding the decision of the magistrate. The by-law was one made by the Court of the Master Wardens and Commonalty of the Watermen and Lightermen of the River Thames under section 80 of their Act of 1859 (22 and 23 Vict., cap. cxxxiii., section 2). That section provided that they could make by-laws "for the government of the company and for the government and regulation of lightermen and watermen, and for carrying into effect the purposes of this Act, and the several powers and authorities hereby vested in the company." The by-law in question was the 60th. It provided that "every steamboat navigated in the river within the limits of this Act in the towing of barges, lighters, vessels, or craft shall have one licensed waterman on board such steamboat for the purpose of assisting in the management and navigation thereof," and imposed a penalty for contravention of the by-law. The word "vessel" in this by-law must be read as vessel of the like kind with barge or lighter. The only craft which the Act of 1859 dealt with excepting passenger boats were lighters, barges, and kindred craft, and when vessel was introduced it referred to vessels of the like kind with lighters and barges and not to vessels of all sorts. It was fair, therefore, in favour of the by-law to give it the same meaning in the by-law, otherwise it would be preposterously beyond anything within the purview of the Act. Now, the by-law was clearly not one for the government of the company, nor for the governing and regulation of lightermen or watermen. It could only be supported, therefore, if it aided in carrying into effect the purposes of the Act or the powers and authorities vested in the company. Part of the preamble to the Act recited that it was expedient that proper regulations should be made for the navigation of barges, lighters, boats, or other like craft carrying goods and for the regulation of persons employed to navigate the same, and for the security of passengers, and for the orderly conduct of traffic on the river, and it was argued broadly that all these matters referred to in the recital were amongst the purposes of the Act. If that were sound, hardly any subject connected with the traffic on the river might not be dealt with, from a cork boat to an ocean steamer, or the speed, manning, lights, and everything else which might be considered to bear upon the security of passengers or the orderly conduct of traffic. This argument, however, distorted the proper office of a preamble. It did not follow because large words were used in a preamble that everything to which they could be referred was within the scope of the Act. They did not extend the provisions of the Act beyond what the enacting parts of the Act contained. His Lordship then went carefully through the different sections of the Act. Section 2 defined a "passenger boat"; section 3 defined a lighterman as "any person working or navigating for hire a lighter, barge, boat, or other like craft," and "waterman" as "any person navigating, rowing, or working for hire a passenger boat." Section 66 enacted that "no barge, lighter, boat, or other like craft for the carrying of goods . . . shall be worked or navigated . . . unless there be in charge of such craft a lighterman licensed in manner hereinbefore mentioned" or an apprentice duly qualified. A penalty was imposed unless the owner of the boat proved that he was unable for the usual compensation to obtain the services of a licensed waterman or apprentice. After referring to other sections his Lordship continued. It appeared to the Court that there was no single provision or purpose of the Act which was subserved by the requirement that a steamboat towing barges should have on board one licensed waterman to assist in the navigation and management thereof. The by-law did not even provide for compulsory pilotage, but merely for compulsory employment. A person who was to assist in such a way would necessarily be under the orders of the captain. He would have no right to give an order or to take the helm or do anything but obey the captain's orders, a position for which any able-bodied man accustomed to a tug was just as competent as the waterman. It was curious to observe that the person who under the by-law was to be taken on board the tug was not even to be a lighterman, but a waterman, who according to the Act was a person having to do especially with passenger boats. The Act gave no special privileges of employment to watermen or lightermen except to the extent provided for by section 66 as to lightermen, or 67 as to watermen. The by-law attempted to extend these privileges and to force upon the owners of tug boats members of the company to perform services for which the owners, so far as the Act was concerned, were at liberty to go into the open market. The tug was not a lighter or other craft for the carrying of goods. There was nothing in the Act giving the company power to interfere with the owner or master of the tug in managing his steamboat. The framers of the by-law had taken a very extravagant view of these powers of legislation. His Lordship then referred to by-law 98, the effect of which was that no one could use the waterway of the Thames for any purpose if the journey was begun or ended within the limits of the Act without putting a licensed waterman or lighterman in command. The learned Judge was not surprised to be told that no attempt had been made to enforce that by-law, but it afforded a key to a good deal that otherwise would be startling in the by-laws. The Court had no doubt that the by-law in question in this case was radically bad. Even if it were within the general scope of the by-laws, it would be in the highest degree unreasonable on another ground. There was no exemption from the penalty, whatever be the circumstances under which the failure to take a waterman on board the tug occurred. There might be none available, or the one available might demand an exorbitant sum. The penalty attached notwithstanding, and the saving provision which in the Act was made applicable to a case under section 66 was wanting in the by-law. But the objection of the Court was far deeper, and could not be removed by any mere modification of the by-law. The learned Judge then commented on the cases of "Elmoire v. Hunter" (3 C.P.D., 116) and "Rolles v. Newell" (25 Q.B.D., 335), which had been cited for the prosecution, and was of opinion that they did not affect the present case. In conclusion, he said, by-law 60 would seem to subserve no purpose except to find work or at all events pay for watermen, and, except in the very general words of the preamble, nothing was to be found in the Act to support it.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MAYOR, &C., OF PRESTON V. BIORNSTAD AND OTHERS—THE RATATA.*

Ship—Harbour authority—Duty of—Damage by stranding—Contract of towage.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1897] P., 118) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Esher and Lords Justices Lopes and Chitty, dated March 3, 1897, which reversed the decree dated July 22, 1896, of Sir Francis Jeune. The case is reported below 1897, P., 118; 66 L.J., P., 39, and the facts sufficiently appear in the Lord Chancellor's judgment. The arguments were heard on March 24 and 29 last, when the House took time for consideration.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Frederick Laing appeared for the appellants; Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. H. Stokes for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said,—The plaintiffs in this case are the owners of a Norwegian barque called the Ratata, and they sue the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the Borough of Preston for damage caused to that vessel by the grounding of it in the river Ribble on July 24, 1895. The Corporation of Preston are the port and harbour authority, and, besides filling that character, they have the right to make contracts for towage of vessels using the port of Preston, and to licence other persons to exercise the same business. It is important to bear in mind the two capacities filled by the corporation. It appears that the port of Preston is a considerable distance from the sea, and the ordinary course of business is that the harbour-master, who appears to act in a double capacity, arranges the time when vessels shall be towed up the river during the time that the state of the tide allows them to reach their destination in safety. The width of the river is such that only one vessel can occupy its width at the same time; when, therefore, there are more vessels to be towed up in the same tide they must go in line one after the other. On the occasion on which the accident arose the directions as to the time of departure were given in ordinary course by the harbour-master. The Ratata was towed by a steam tug, and two other vessels started to accomplish the same end—namely, the arrival at Preston during the same tide, before the ebb should create any danger of grounding. The vessel now in question was placed last of the line of ships, and according to the evidence there should have been no difficulty in arriving at the port before the tide should ebb. The Vixen was the name of the steamer which was towing the foremost vessel, and for some reason the Vixen was unable to proceed at the ordinary rate at which it was expected and intended to proceed. The result was that the Ratata grounded before arriving at her destination, and received considerable damage in so doing. The action was brought to recover the damage incident to this misfortune. The contract of towage was preceded by a correspondence, which in substance invited the owners of the Ratata to come to the port, but undertaking to lighten the ship, if it should be proved to be necessary, at the expense of the corporation. No written contract between the parties has been put in evidence, but your Lordships are invited to infer what the contract was from the ordinary course pursued between shipowners and contractors for towage. Looking at the facts, I should infer, that while on the one hand there is no warranty by the contracting towers that the vessel shall arrive in time to avoid grounding, on the other hand I think it is clear that they undertook to exercise reasonable care and skill in the performance of the obligation which they have taken upon themselves for hire and reward in conducting the business of the towage to its consummation. Looking at the nature of the thing to be done, I should say they were bound to have reasonable knowledge of the state of the tide, inasmuch as they are to give the signal for the starting of the operations; reasonable care and skill in conducting the operation itself, where, as in this case, a number of vessels have to be brought up during the same tide; and reasonable care in providing adequate steam power to accomplish the object in question. It appears to me that in this case it is made out that they failed in the contract obligation which they undertook, and I think the plaintiffs were entitled to complain that in the combined operations the defendants were conducting—either, first, they did not lighten the ship sufficiently; or, secondly, that they did not place the Ratata, considering her draught as lightened by them, as first in the line; or, thirdly—and on this matter most reliance was placed at the trial—that they supplied an inefficient steamer to the leading vessel, the necessary effect of which was to delay the Ratata, which could not pass or go abreast of the vessel thus made to proceed too slowly, and the catastrophe undoubtedly did arise from the unusual and abnormal slowness of the Vixen. It is said that the Vixen was not the property of the corporation, but was only hired by it for the occasion. It appears to me that that consideration is immaterial. The Vixen was engaged in what I have called the “combined operation,” an operation which is necessarily combined by reason of the circumstance that the river will not permit two vessels to go abreast. If the corporation put an inefficient tug at the head of the line it follows that the effect of that inefficiency of the leading tug will involve the consequences not only to the vessel that that tug itself is drawing, but to all the other vessels that follow it. Indeed, it was but faintly contended that, if the vessel had belonged as property to the corporation that the corporation would not have been liable for the inefficiency of the tug which they provided. It was said that the corporation were not liable for a chartered tug; but this chartered tug was under the general direction and control of the corporation. It was performing corporation work for which the corporation was to be paid, and it appears to me that the ownership of the tug in the sense of its ultimate ownership is immaterial. For the time during which this contract business was being performed it was the tug of the corporation, and its inefficiency was an insufficiency for which the corporation, as contractors for towage with reasonable care and skill, were responsible. But it is then said that the plaintiffs should have given evidence to show that the Vixen on this occasion was inefficient, and should have proved the cause of its inefficiency, which might, peradventure, be some cause for which upon the contract in question the corporation would not have been responsible. My lords, I am of opinion that this is altogether erroneous. The fact that it was an inefficient tug on this occasion is proved by the defendants themselves, when they show how on other occasions it had properly and efficiently performed its functions. If it was suggested that it was some extraordinary and unusual event—and as this was not a contract of warranty the defendants would have been entitled to insist on that as a defence—it was for the defendants to prove it. Two causes only are suggested in the course of the trial—one, the badness of the coal, itself supplied by the corporation, the other the unskillfulness or neglect of the stokers. In either event, as it appears to me, the corporation cannot avail themselves as against the owners of the Ratata of the unskillfulness of their tug or the bad material, the use of which placed the obstruction in the way of the Ratata and was the cause of the calamity. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON, LORD MACNAGHTEN, and LORD MORRIS concurred, and the appeal was dismissed.

PHILLIPS V. LONDON SCHOOL BOARD—COCKERTON V. THE SAME.*

Education Acts—School Board—Power to establish superannuation fund—Deductions from teacher's salary—Acquiescence—Action to recover deductions dismissed.
Decision of Divisional Court (ante, p. 4) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment (reported ante, p. 4) of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Kennedy) on the hearing of two appeals from the Westminster County Court. The actions were brought against the London School Board by two plaintiffs, Miss Phillips and Mrs. Cockerton, to recover the amounts of certain deductions which had been made from their salaries as teachers. The facts of Miss Phillips's case were as follows:—The plaintiff was, from 1888 to 1897, on the permanent staff of the School Board, first as assistant teacher and afterwards as head mistress at a certain salary. When she entered the service no superannuation fund existed, and it was admitted that no express statutory power enabling a school board to establish such a fund exists or ever existed. In 1888 the School Board decided to establish such a fund, and promulgated a scheme for forming it by means of deductions from the salaries of the teachers, the scheme to remain in force for two years, after which, if Parliamentary powers were not obtained, the deductions were to be repaid. The plaintiff agreed in writing to come under the scheme. In 1889 the School Board determined to extend the period of two years to five years, and the plaintiff consented in writing to this extension. On March 24, 1893, the School Board gave the plaintiff the option of having the deductions from her salary with interest returned to her or of joining the superannuation fund. The plaintiff on April 13, 1893, in writing elected to join the superannuation fund. In Mrs. Cockerton's case the facts were similar, except that when the plaintiff entered the service of the School Board the scheme was in force, and she was required to come under it when she entered the service. The actions were brought to recover the amounts of the deductions which had been made from the plaintiffs' salaries under the above-mentioned scheme. The County Court Judge found that the deductions were made with the consent of the plaintiffs, and that they were in law not entitled to recover them, and gave judgment for the defendants. The Divisional Court, without calling on counsel for the defendants, affirmed the judgment of the County Court Judge, but they gave the plaintiffs leave to appeal.

The arguments on the appeal were heard on June 16, when the Court took time to consider their judgment, as reported in The Times of June 17.

Mr. Jeff, Q.C., and Mr. Orgran appeared for the plaintiffs in support of the appeal; Lord Coleridge, Q.C., and Mr. Ram for the defendants.

The Court delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—This is an action brought by a teacher who for many years was in the service of the London School Board to recover from that Board the sum of £32 6s. 8d., being the amount of contributions voluntarily subscribed by her towards a superannuation fund promoted and carried on by the School Board for the benefit and aid of the plaintiff and their other employés desirous of subscribing thereto. The plaintiff now seeks to get back the money which has been so paid by her to this fund, and which has been applied by the Board according to her directions, as being money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiff, and in the alternative she claims arrears of salary, and she has brought her action in the County Court in that behalf. The learned County Court Judge—his Honour Judge Lumley Smith—gave judgment against the plaintiff, and the Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Kennedy, have affirmed his judgment, and the plaintiff now appeals to us against the decision of the Divisional Court. The facts material and necessary to this case will be found in the judgment of the learned County Court Judge, but I may add that in the year 1886 the School Board for London started the scheme for superannuation allowances to their employés in case of their becoming disabled by permanent infirmity of mind or body, and took from those desirous of joining the scheme 2 per cent. upon the amount of their respective salaries for the formation of the necessary fund. It may also be stated that the Board has been desirous of obtaining from Parliament authority—(a) to defray the expenses of the management of the fund, (b) to guarantee the safe keeping of the same, but as yet has not obtained that authority. It cannot be doubted that, had the defendants been individuals and not the creation of statute, there could have been no pretext for saying that the plaintiff could recover back the subscriptions voluntarily paid by her for the purpose of this fund, which subscriptions had been applied to such fund in accordance with her directions and desires. Her contract with such a defendant would be a perfectly lawful contract, and if authority were needed, which it is not, Lord Watson's judgment in "Hewlett v. Allen" ([1894] A.C., at p. 394) has only to be referred to as to this. But it is argued on behalf of the plaintiff that, although this may be so, as the School Board is the creation of statute and can therefore only exercise the powers conferred upon it by statute, and as nowhere in the statute creating the Board is to be found the power either to undertake to administer a trust, which it is said the School Board is doing, by collecting, holding, and administering the subscriptions upon the advice and recommendation of a committee on superannuation, composed of the Chairman of the Board, five representatives elected by the Board, and five representatives elected by the subscribers to the fund, or to pay ratepayers' money towards the expenses of carrying out the scheme, which it is said the School Board is also doing, therefore the Board is acting ultra vires, and consequently this action is maintainable, for there has been a total failure of the consideration as to the purposes for which the moneys have been subscribed by the plaintiff to the fund. By section 35 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, which is the Act regulating the School Board, it is enacted that "A School Board may appoint a clerk and a treasurer and other necessary officers including teachers required for any school provided by the Board, to hold office during the pleasure of the Board, and may assign them such salaries or remuneration, if any, as they think fit." The point as to the Board having used ratepayers' money towards the expenses of the scheme, which was the point argued before the County Court and the Divisional Court, is in my judgment untenable, for the contract between the plaintiff and the Board makes no provision that the Board shall use any of the ratepayers' money in carrying out the scheme, and, if they do so, that in no way makes the contract between the plaintiff and the Board illegal, and the suggestion that the contract between the plaintiff and the Board is ultra vires fails, and I agree with the Divisional Court upon this point. But the other point, which came up during the argument in this Court, still remains to be dealt with, and for the purposes of this case I will assume that the School Board has contracted with the plaintiff to administer a trust by undertaking to administer the funds of the superannuation scheme in the manner above mentioned, and that no provision can be found in the Act authorizing the Board to do this. I say I will assume but not decide that this is so, for in my judgment, even if this be so, it will not entitle the plaintiff to maintain this action either for money had and received, as being money paid without consideration, or for arrears of salary. If an action for money had and received would lie, the case of "Lamb v. Great Northern Railway Company" ([1891] 2 Q.B., 281) approved of in this Court in "Hewlett v. Allen" ([1892] 2 Q.B., at p. 674) was wrongly decided, and I am not by any means prepared to hold that it was. But, assuming that what the Board is doing is not authorized by statute, either as regards expending ratepayers' money in the management of the scheme or without spending such money as regards the administration of a trust, can the plaintiff recover back the subscriptions she has heretofore voluntarily made to this fund, which have been applied to the purposes thereof in strict accordance with her mandate? This fund has been in existence from the year 1886 to the present time, and during the years 1889 to 1897 inclusive the plaintiff has been a voluntary subscriber of 2 per cent. of her salary to this fund, thus earning her right during all this time to come upon the fund, when, according to the scheme, upon her becoming disabled by permanent infirmity of mind or body, she would be entitled to do so. The other numerous subscribers to the fund, amounting, it is said, to 10,000 persons, were in like position as the plaintiff, the subscriptions of all going in aid of those who became incapacitated. I find that during this period—i.e., from 1889 to 1897—£7,175 has been paid by way of superannuation allowances to teachers and officers of the School Board when disabled, and that such allowances are continuing to be paid, and that upon March 25, 1897, this fund had a balance in hand of £94,861. That the plaintiff has for years voluntarily contributed to this fund and acquiesced in its being managed and applied as it has been is beyond dispute. If the plaintiff was in a Court of equity, what right would she have after this acquiescence now to demand back her subscriptions, which have been and are being dealt with in the way she has always desired, to the prejudice of the other subscribers who desire to continue to subscribe thereto and thus be protected in case of becoming disabled? She could have no such right after her acquiescence, if she was in a Court of equity. If she goes into a Court of law, as she has done, and seeks to recover back her subscriptions as money had and received, which cause of action is applicable when the defendant has received money which in justice and equity belongs to the plaintiff under circumstances which render the receipt a receipt by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff (see per Lord Mansfield in "Moses v. Macferlan," 2 Burr., 1,005), what must she prove? She must prove that she handed the money she seeks to recover back to the defendants for a purpose, and that they have not applied it to that purpose, and that there has therefore been a total failure of consideration at the time she brings her action. This she cannot prove, for it is not the truth, for during all the time she has been subscriber to the fund she has had the right to a grant according to the provisions of the scheme. Upon these grounds this action fails, as does also the action brought by Mrs. Cockerton. If the plaintiff can establish that the School Board by reason of being the creation of statute cannot in the circumstances of the case administer the fund, it may be that the plaintiff by pursuing the proper course might obtain the appointment of a fit person for the purpose of administering the fund, or it may be that she might obtain a distribution of the fund between the different contributors according to their respective interests therein, but, though I offer no opinion thereon, she cannot maintain an action for money had and received to get back the subscriptions she has voluntarily for years subscribed to the fund and which up to action brought have been and were being applied to the very purposes for which she made her subscriptions, and during all which time she has had the right of participation in the scheme according to its terms and conditions; nor can she bring an action for arrears of salary, for no arrears exist. In my judgment the appeals in both actions must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read an elaborate judgment in which he arrived at the same conclusion.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed. He did not feel at all satisfied that the School Board had done anything ultra vires. He saw nothing in the Act of 1870 which prevented the School Board, if they thought they would get better service thereby, from making it a condition of service that their teachers should take their remuneration partly in deferred salary, and that the part of the salary so deferred should be devoted to a superannuation fund. Assuming that view to be correct, he could not see that it was ultra vires in the Board to take upon themselves the duty of administering the superannuation fund. He also agreed that neither of the plaintiffs could recover from the Board, even assuming that the Board had done that which was ultra vires, moneys which with their consent had been paid to a fund to which other persons had subscribed upon the basis of mutual subscription.

IN RE WHITE—FENNELL V. FRANKLIN.*

Executor—Solicitor—Profit costs—Insolvent estate.

No one can claim the bounty of a testator where the estate is insolvent.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's raised a point of interest to solicitors—viz., whether a solicitor, the sole trustee and executor under a will, could claim profit costs as against the estate of the testator, the estate being insolvent. The testator by his will provided that S. Franklin, one of his three trustees and executors, who is a solicitor, should be the solicitor to his estate, and as such, notwithstanding his acceptance of the trusteeship and executorship of the will, should be allowed all professional and other charges for his time and trouble which, if employed as solicitor to the trustees and executors, not being himself a trustee and executor, he would be entitled to make. The will was proved by Franklin alone, the other executors and trustees having disclaimed. Franklin acted as solicitor on behalf of himself as executor and trustee in some legal proceedings. In the present action, which was brought by a creditor for the administration of the testator's estate, Franklin, who was the defendant, carried in a claim for profit costs due to him as solicitor to the estate. The estate was shown to be insufficient for the payment of the testator's debts in full. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that, in these circumstances, there must be a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to any profit costs under the above clause in the will. His Lordship was of opinion that the gift by the testator of profit charges was a matter of bounty, and therefore a legacy, and could not be claimed in competition with the creditors. His Lordship relied on the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of "In re Thorley" [1891] 2 Ch., 613). The defendant appealed.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. J. G. Wood were for the defendant; Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Charles Church were for the plaintiff.

The COURT, without calling on the counsel for the plaintiff, dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said he did not see that it was possible to differ judicially from the decision of the learned Judge. The trustee and executor of the will happened to be a solicitor, and he was the only trustee and executor, the others having disclaimed. It was impossible to get over the previous decisions and the principle on which they were based. The estate was insolvent, and Mr. Justice Kekewich had decided that the defendant was not entitled to receive any profit costs out of the estate in competition with the creditors. It was not possible to differ from the declaration which he had made. It was hard upon the solicitor, but it could not be helped.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said that no one could claim the bounty of a testator until his creditors had been paid. The rule applied, not only to a solicitor trustee, but equally to a trustee who was an accountant, a surveyor, or an architect.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

SAVILL BROTHERS (LIMITED) V. LANGMAN.*
Licence—Beerhouse—Application for—Agreement to support application—Legality.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Romer dated March 31, 1898. The action was brought by Messrs. Savill Brothers (Limited), brewers, of Essex, for an injunction to restrain the defendant from purchasing beer sold at his off-licensed beerhouse known as the Duke of Portland, East Ham, from any person other than the plaintiffs. In 1889 the defendant was building the beerhouse in question, and was desirous of obtaining a licence for it, and with this view on September 7, 1889, he entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs in the following terms:—"In consideration of your having agreed to pay all the costs of my application for a licence for the sale of beer for consumption off the premises, I agree to apply for such licence and use my best endeavours to obtain the same, and further, for such considerations as aforesaid, I agree to tie the beer trade of the premises when licensed to you and your successors in business for the term of 12 years, you undertaking to supply beers in cask and bottle at such price as you shall supply to your other customers." After this agreement was entered into the defendant, with the assistance of the plaintiffs, applied for a licence and obtained it. Then disputes arose between the parties as to the amount of percentage to be allowed to the defendant, and ultimately this action was brought. The defendant alleged that the true consideration for the agreement was that Mr. Philip Savill, who was the managing director of the plaintiff company, and was himself a magistrate, was to use his influence with his brother magistrates to obtain the licence, and that consequently the agreement was void as against public policy. In support of this allegation the defendant mainly relied upon an affidavit filed by Mr. Savill in which he explained the reasons which induced the plaintiffs to enter into the agreement. In paragraph 3 he said:—"The said firm of Savill Brothers and the plaintiff company have for many years made a speciality of the business of assisting in procuring new licences in new neighbourhoods in Essex as local brewers, and are always prepared to take up an application which has a reasonable prospect of success. The place in which the premises belonging to the said defendant were situate was then a new neighbourhood, and although the trade likely to be done at the time the licence was obtained was not large, it was thought by the firm of Savill Brothers that it would increase in proportion to the increase of population. In these circumstances the firm of Savill Brothers agreed to support the defendant's application for an off-licence on condition that they secured the trade of the house if the licence should be granted"; and in paragraph 6 he said:—"The said firm of Savill Brothers gave the support of their name and business reputation to the defendant's application. It is perfectly well-known in the trade that an application supported by brewers is more likely to be successful than an application not so supported." In cross-examination upon this affidavit Mr. Savill stated that the only assistance he gave the defendant was to place his application before the magistrates in the best form and pay the costs of it, that he did not appear before the magistrates in any way, and that the form of the application contained nothing to show that the plaintiffs had anything to do with it, though in point of fact when these applications were made it generally became known in Court whether they were brewers' applications and where they came from. Mr. Justice Romer upon this evidence came to the conclusion that the agreement was not made for an illegal consideration, and he granted an injunction. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. Micklem were for the defendant; and Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Hugh Humphry for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that this case raised a question of great importance to persons interested in obtaining or opposing publichouse licences. The action was brought upon an agreement in writing dated September 7, 1889, and the defence was that this agreement was illegal. The alleged illegality was not disclosed on the face of the document itself, but that was not necessary. It was suggested that the plaintiff's own evidence showed that this was an illegal agreement because in substance the transaction amounted to the purchase by the defendant of the plaintiff's influence with his brother magistrates. If that were proved the defence of illegality would be made out, but in his Lordship's opinion that was not the true inference to be drawn from the facts. The true inference was that these agreements between brewers and publicans usually got known, and that when they became known they increased the chances of obtaining a licence. The magistrates meeting to consider the granting of licences were not a Court, but they had public duties to perform which involved investigation as to the requirements of the neighbourhood and as to the character of the applicant, and in the case of an old house as to the character of the premises. What was meant by Mr. Savill "supporting" the defendant's application? That did not mean that Mr. Savill was to use his influence with his brother magistrates to induce them to grant the licence. The truth was that brewers were trusted not because they were disinterested but rather the reverse, it being assumed as a matter of business that they would not recommend a man whom they could not have business dealings with, and who was not respectable. This agreement could not properly be said to be an agreement in substance and in fact for the sale and purchase of a recommendation so as to make it illegal within the meaning of the authorities. Then it was suggested that the agreement was void on the ground of champerty, but champerty was only an aggravated form of maintenance, and maintenance meant the fostering of litigation. But there was no semblance of litigation in this case. It would be straining the doctrine of champerty to an absurd extent to make it apply to licensing proceedings such as these. The appeal should be dismissed.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

BIGGS V. HODDINOTT.*

Mortgage—Covenant—Enforcement—Covenant to deal exclusively with mortgagee—Injunction.

This was an appeal by the defendants against a decision of Mr. Justice Romer, reported in The Times of June 11. The question was whether a covenant contained in a mortgage of a publichouse by the publicans to a brewer ought to be enforced by injunction, the covenant being that during the continuance of the mortgage security the mortgagors (the defendants) would deal exclusively with the mortgagee (the plaintiff) for all beer and malt liquor sold upon the mortgaged premises. There was a corresponding covenant by the mortgagee that he would supply the mortgagors with beer, &c. The deed also provided that the mortgagors should not be entitled to redeem the security for five years. The defendants had ceased to purchase beer from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff applied for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants from committing a breach of their covenant. Mr. Justice Romer was of opinion that there was nothing oppressive or unreasonable in the covenant and no "clogging" of the equity of redemption, and held that the covenant ought to be enforced by an injunction. The defendants appealed, and it was contended on their behalf that a Court of equity would not allow a mortgagee to stipulate by the mortgage for any collateral advantage not appurtenant to the mortgage, and it was said that the covenant in question was such an advantage.

Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Ingpen were for the defendants; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. R. F. Norton for the plaintiff.

Without calling on counsel for the plaintiff, The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the Court had listened to a very ingenious and learned argument with the view of inducing them under pressure to lay down a proposition which would be very unfortunate for business men—a proposition which, in effect, came to this, that when two people were engaged in a mortgage transaction it was impossible for them to be at the same time engaged in any other. Such a proposition would be contrary to good sense, and Mr. Farwell, with all his courage, did not attempt to support it on any rational principle, but took refuge in authority. Of course the Court was bound by the authorities.

"Jennings v. Ward" (2 Vern., 520) was the first case relied upon. But there the stipulation which was actually in question did seriously interfere with the redemption of the mortgaged property. No doubt in that case the Master of the Rolls, Sir John Trevor (in December, 1705), said, "A man shall not have interest for his money and a collateral advantage besides for the loan of it, or clog the redemption with any by-agreement." That had been understood as meaning exactly what it said—viz., that a mortgagee could not have both the interest for his money and also any collateral advantage. That proposition had constantly been departed from since—for instance, in the case of West Indian mortgages, in which it had been held that a mortgagee who was not in possession could bargain that he should act as consignee for the mortgagor. It was clear that the proposition as stated in "Jennings v. Ward" did not mean exactly what it said. As stated, the proposition was a great deal too wide, but what it really meant was that a mortgagee could always redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs, and that unconscionable bargains would not be enforced. In no case had anything more than that been enforced. To say that such a covenant as that now in question was an unconscionable bargain would shock any business man. The Court would have to say that any stipulation contained in a mortgage deed in favour of the mortgagee was necessarily oppressive and unconscionable. That would be going a great deal too far. His Lordship thought that Mr. Justice Romer was quite right, and he was glad that the Court was not bound by any authority to uphold such a senseless and unbusinesslike doctrine as that which had been contended for.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said that the covenant in no way affected the equity of redemption, for it was not stipulated that damages for breach of the covenant should be covered by the security. The principle that a mortgage was only a security for the mortgagee money was maintained. It was argued that a mortgagee could not stipulate for a collateral advantage for himself. In his Lordship's opinion that proposition was not made out. He thought the proper statement was that a mortgagee could not stipulate for that which was oppressive and unconscionable. It would be contrary to good sense if such a covenant as this, entered into between business men with their eyes open, should be set aside upon that which would be a fanciful doctrine of equity. His Lordship then referred to some of the authorities and came to the conclusion that there was no such rule of equity as had been supposed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that were it not for the authorities he did not think that any rational man looking at this covenant would say it was otherwise than a reasonable business transaction. His Lordship did not wonder that equity Judges in endeavouring to state the principles on which the interference of Courts of equity in mortgage contracts was based had sometimes laid down the principles too generally. This covenant was perfectly reasonable, and it did not in any way fetter the main purpose of the mortgage as a security for money. There was nothing oppressive or unconscionable in it, and the mere fact that it was contained in a mortgage deed did not make it so. There was no foundation for such a general proposition.

LORD HASTINGS V. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Way-leave over land—Rent—Incorporeal hereditament capable of being inherited by the heir and of being assigned to a purchaser.

In this case the plaintiff, the Right Hon. George Manners, Baron Hastings, claimed payment from the company of 3s. per ton (i.e., 45 tons) for certain coal conveyed over a portion of a railway known as the Morpeth Branch Railway, and shipped at the port of Blyth, and for an account of the coal so conveyed and shipped. Assuming the sum alleged to be payable was a rent, the question of liability turned mainly on the construction of a number of documents, including a deed entered into with one of the plaintiff's predecessors in the title to the land. On this assumption his Lordship delivered judgment some days since in the plaintiff's favour, but reserved for argument, which has since taken place, the question whether the plaintiff, being the successor in title of the former lord in respect of the land, as distinguished from the personal estate, was entitled to the 3s. per ton, which, as the defendant company contended, was not a rent passing with the ownership of the land. His Lordship delivered judgment on the point reserved.

Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. George Henderson were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Mackarness for the company.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE delivered judgment as follows:—The interest conferred upon the railway company—viz., a way-leave over land of the grantor, with the right to make a railway thereover, and with the other powers given to them, is, in my judgment, an incorporeal hereditament, a property, and an estate capable of being inherited by the heir (if granted to an individual) and of being assigned to a purchaser. It is a "tenement" within the definition of Lord Coke (1 Inst., 20a), being an inheritance concerning or annexed to or exercisable within a corporeal inheritance. I have nearly followed the judgment of the Court in the case of "Martyn v. Williams" (1 H. and N., 817, 827), and, following the further reasoning in the same case, I think that the plaintiff is the owner of the reversion within the statute of 32 Henry VIII. To quote from p. 830 of the report:—"There is in reality the relation of reversioner and owner of particular estate between them; there is exactly the same privity of estate as exists between reversioner and tenant properly so called, and upon the determination of the term the entire interest in the land would revert to the plaintiff as upon the expiration of an ordinary lease. In the ordinary case of owner in fee simple and tenant for years, in which the relationship of reversioner and tenant within the statute certainly exists, the owner of the fee, upon the determination of the term, has vested in him a larger and more extensive interest in the corpus of the land than the tenant for years had. His interest in the minerals and timber, and, indeed, in the soil itself, is very different from that of such tenant." In the case of "Norval v. Pascoe" (34 L.J., Ch., 83) the decision in "Martyn v. Williams" was followed by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, who dealt with other authorities bearing on the matter. In both the cases I have referred to the subject-matter was a lease or licence for a term to dig china clay, with ancillary powers, and in the present case the subject-matter is a lease or licence for a term of a way-leave for a railway to be made and used for traffic over the grantor's land. In general structure it follows the form of what is called "Lease of a way-leave" given in Mr. Davidson's Precedents, 2nd ed., vol. v., part 1 (leases). I think that the subject-matter in the present case is such as to bring it within the principle of the decided cases, and I refer particularly to "Buckeridge v. Ingram" (2 Ves. Jun., 652) and "The Earl of Portmore v. Bunn" (1 B. and C., 694) for instances of analogous rights. In the latter of these an action was brought to recover rent against the assignee of the licence for a term to cut a channel to the river Wey, and, although the actual decision turned upon a variance between the declaration and the evidence, it was distinctly held that a mere easement upon the soil of others to make channels and towing-paths is a real hereditament. The covenant to pay rents or annual sums in the present case is in favour of the grantor, his heirs, and assigns, and although it is quite true that some of such rents or sums are, as I have held, payable, even although the traffic does not pass over any part of the plaintiff's lands, and that they are calculated in part on such traffic, nevertheless I consider that the rents are payable in respect of the hereditaments leased, and that the plaintiff is entitled to sue exactly as the original lessor might have done.

Execution was stayed in respect of payment of the amount to be found due on taking the account, pending an appeal.

NEALE AND WILKINSON V. ROSE AND OTHERS.*
Insurance—Marine—Policy on goods—Construction—Intention of the parties—Transshipment.

This was an action brought to recover for a total loss of certain goods under a marine policy of insurance, dated August 23, 1897, subscribed by the defendants. The policy, which was in the ordinary Lloyd's form, was, so far as material, in the following terms:—"At and from London to any ports and for places in Australia upon any kind of goods and merchandise in the good ship or vessel called the P. and O. and Orient steamers, beginning the adventure upon the said goods from the loading thereof aboard the said ship and shall so continue and endure . . . until the said goods and merchandise whatsoever shall be arrived at as above, and until the same be there discharged and safely landed." "It shall be lawful for the said ship, &c., in this voyage to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever necessary or otherwise in any order with all liberties and exceptions as per bill of lading and (or) charter-party especially including the risk of negligence, whether of the owner, master, or crew without prejudice to this insurance. Valued at £5,000 on goods and (or) merchandise to be hereafter declared and valued. Including all risks of transshipment." The policy contained certain marginal clauses, of which the following are important:—"To pay partial loss arising from transshipment including all risk of craft or otherwise to and from the vessel, each craft or lighter to be deemed a separate insurance," "including all risks in transit and (or) while waiting shipment and (or) of boats and craft to and from the ship, each craft or lighter to be deemed a separate insurance." The plaintiff's shipped goods to the value of £300 by the P. and O. steamer Arcadia consigned to Brisbane under a bill of lading, dated October 15, 1897. These goods were duly declared on the policy. The bill of lading for the goods, so far as material, contained the following clauses:—"To be delivered at the port of Brisbane, or as near thereunto as the local steamer can safely get. For transshipment into local steamer at Sydney." The company are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers or ships either belonging to the company or to other persons proceeding either directly or indirectly to such port. "The ships are to be at liberty to sail with or without pilots, and to tow and assist vessels in all situations." The goods in question arrived at Sydney and were transhipped on to a coasting steamer called the Fitzroy for Brisbane. The Fitzroy was not owned by the P. and O. or Orient Companies, and was a vessel of about 500 tons, and was unclassified by Lloyd's. On the voyage from Sydney to Brisbane the goods became a total loss.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. J. A. Hamilton, and Mr. Chaytor for the defendants.

It was proved in evidence that the P. and O. and Orient steamers never went to Brisbane, and that the course of business was to transship goods for Brisbane into local steamers. Witnesses were called for the plaintiffs who stated that these facts were commonly known to underwriters and insurance brokers. Witnesses for the defendants denied this. One of the defendants stated that he knew there were some places in Australia to which the P. and O. and Orient steamers did not go, and that underwriters had an idea that all large lines transhipped goods to other places under through bills of lading.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said:—"I think I ought to give judgment for the plaintiffs. I have to discover what the intention of the parties was, and I have to discover that from the policy by the light of the circumstances in which it was made. The plaintiffs are merchants, shipping goods to various ports in Australia, and they naturally desired to insure these goods and to cover the risk from London, where they were shipped to the different ports where the risk was to terminate. They want a policy to cover the marine risk on their goods from London to any port or places in Australia. It seems to me that if I were driven to give my judgment in this case for the defendants I should take away from the plaintiffs the protection which they stipulated for, and which, in my opinion, the defendants intended to give them—namely, the protection of the risk of the goods being lost between London and any port to which the plaintiffs might desire to export them. There is no doubt in my mind what the plaintiffs intended. What did the defendants intend? The defendants, in my opinion, knew that the P. and O. and Orient steamers did not go to more than a few of the ports in Australia. They knew that they did go to some ports where the largest amount of trade was carried on. And they knew, I have no doubt, that in order that the goods carried by those steamers should reach the other ports in Australia transshipment from the P. and O. and Orient boats into local trading vessels was necessary, and I cannot help thinking that the defendants when they issued this policy knew perfectly well the risk they had undertaken was the whole risk of the transit of those goods from London to the port of destination. What they stipulated for was that the goods should be shipped in this country on board the steamers of the P. and O. and Orient lines; that is to say, that as far as the voyage could be performed in the ordinary course of business in boats of those lines the voyage should be so performed. These goods were reshipped within the meaning of the policy and carried to Sydney and transhipped within the meaning of the policy and carried to the port of destination, at which place the risk was to end. In my opinion, the risk was not to end until they reached that place. I do not think I should cut down the meaning of the policy. I have no doubt in point of business as to what the parties intended, my only doubt arises from the wording of the policy. The policy, I think, means that the risk shall be covered from London to the port in Australia for which the goods are intended, that part of the journey from London to the port of transshipment to be performed in P. and O. and Orient steamers.

Judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

THE FULHAM.*

Ship—Salvage—Arrest by Receiver of Wreck—Legality—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec.
552—Construction.

The operation of sec. 552 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, is not confined to salvage made payable by secs. 544, 545, and 546, but is applicable to all claims for salvage which may become payable by the decree of any Court having jurisdiction to award salvage.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in giving judgment, said,—This action is brought by the owners of the steamship Fulham to recover damages from the defendant for an alleged illegal arrest and detention by him of the steamship Fulham at Plymouth. The defendant was the Receiver of Wreck and Collector of Customs at Plymouth. On December 14 last the Fulham, while on a voyage from Sulina to Dunkerque, ran short of fuel, and when in the English Channel, about 20 miles from Plymouth, was taken in tow by the tug Flying Buzzard and brought to Plymouth. A claim for salvage was made against the Fulham by the Flying Buzzard, and at the request of the master of the Flying Buzzard the defendant directed and secured the arrest and detention of the Fulham. A writ was subsequently issued against the Fulham for salvage, and on security to the satisfaction of the defendant being given the Fulham was released. The question is raised as to whether or not the defendant was entitled to arrest and detain the Fulham under the powers conferred upon him by the 552nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. There was a further point made at the hearing before me that the defendant at first improperly refused to accept bail or the undertaking of the plaintiffs' solicitors to put in bail. I think the defendant acted rightly. He was bound to satisfy himself that the security offered was adequate, and he was justified in not releasing the ship till he had the salvors' assent to the securities offered. The plaintiffs also contended that there was no salvage due to any person under the 552nd section, and that therefore the defendant had no right to detain the vessel, the argument being that "salvage due to any person under the Act" meant salvage made payable by sections 544, 545, and 546, and that the operation of the 552nd section is confined to such salvage, and that the salvage in question did not become payable under any of these sections. It was also argued that the Fulham was "not in distress at any place on or near the coasts of the United Kingdom," because she was picked up 20 miles from the coast. The broad contention for the defendant was that section 552 is applicable not only to causes of salvage made payable by sections 544, 545, and 546, but to all claims for salvage which may become payable by the decree of any Court having jurisdiction to award salvage. The point is not free from doubt. On the whole, I am of opinion that the defendant's contention is correct. The words in section 552 "where salvage is due to any person under this Act" can hardly be construed literally. The term "due under this Act" appears to have been used as a general expression to cover any salvage which the Act contemplates being awarded by the Court mentioned in it. It seems unreasonable to limit section 552 to one class of salvage and not to extend its provisions to salvage claims generally for which process may be issued. It was also contended that the defendant was entitled to detain the vessel because the services in question had been rendered partially in saving life. In the salvage action by the Flying Buzzard (reported in The Times of June 13 last), I was advised by the Elder Brethren that the Fulham was in risk of going ashore and being lost. Therefore there was some risk to life, and it cannot be said that the defendant had no jurisdiction whatever to detain the vessel. Another point on behalf of the defendant was that the Fulham was in distress on or near the coast of the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 546, because part of the assistance rendered to her was rendered within the three-mile limit. I cannot, however, read the words "near the coast" as covering a place 20 miles off the coast. Some limit must be placed on the term, and, as at present advised, I think the limit should be the territorial limits, though it is not necessary in this case to express a final opinion upon the point. Nor is it necessary to decide whether the 546th section could apply because part of the service was rendered within the territorial limits. It is, in my opinion, extremely doubtful whether this section could be made to apply on this ground to the facts of this case. I, however, uphold the defendant's main contention and give judgment for him with costs.

IN RE A DEBTOR, EX PARTE THE DEBTOR.*

Bankruptcy—Married woman—Bankruptcy notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 4, subs. 1 (g).

The hearing of a bankruptcy petition presented against a spinster debtor was adjourned. Before the hearing came on again the debtor married.

Held, that she could not be made bankrupt.

In this case a bankruptcy petition was presented by a judgment creditor against a debtor, who was then a spinster, the act of bankruptcy alleged being non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice within the time prescribed by section 4, subsection 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The petition was adjourned by consent and the debtor got married in the interval and then set up the plea of coverture in answer to the petition. It was admitted that she was not "carrying on a trade separately from her husband" so as to render her, in respect of her separate property, "subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as if she were a feme sole" as provided by section 1, subsection 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Mr. Registrar Giffard made a receiving order against her notwithstanding her coverture. The debtor appealed.

Mr. F. Cooper-Willis appeared in support of the appeal; the creditor did not appear.

The Court allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that it appeared to their Lordships that upon the true construction of the Bankruptcy Act and the Married Women's Property Act this order could not be supported and ought to be discharged. It was one of the additional privileges which married women had acquired by the Married Women's Property Act and the Bankruptcy Act. The case was peculiar. At the time when judgment was recovered and the petition was presented the debtor was a spinster, so that all that was done was perfectly regular. Then she induced the Court to let the petition stand over, and during the interval she got married, and she now said that she was a married woman and not liable to be made a bankrupt. His Lordship thought that she was on the right side of the law. Looking at the Bankruptcy Act and the Married Women's Property Act and the decisions which had been pronounced upon them, "ex parte Jones" (12 Ch. D., 484), "ex parte Holland" (L.R. 3, Ch., 307), and "ex parte Conson" (20 Q.B.D., 249), it was clear that a married woman could only be made liable when she was trading separately from her husband. The order should be discharged but without costs.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and COLLINS concurred.

THE SOUTHWARK AND VAUXHALL WATER COMPANY V.
THE WANDSWORTH DISTRICT BOARD OF WORKS.†

Metropolis—Streets—Water pipes and mains—Repair of streets—Disturbance of pipes—Injunction.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from lowering their streets and footways wherever the plaintiffs' pipes and mains were laid in any manner which would leave such pipes or mains without a sufficient covering of soil or other material to protect them from injury, whether by the passing of traffic, the effect of frost, or otherwise, unless the defendants should first alter the position of the said pipes and mains by placing them at a depth below the proposed new surface of such streets or footway, not being less than the depth at which the same then were below the present surface of such streets or footways. It appeared that the defendants contemplated lowering some of their footpaths to such an extent as to leave only a few inches of surface above the plaintiffs' mains. This the defendants maintained they were entitled to do, and they contended that if the mains, for their protection from frost or otherwise, had to be lowered to a proportionate depth this should be done by the plaintiffs at their own expense.

Mr. WARRINGTON, Q.C., and Mr. GORE BROWNE, for the plaintiffs, referred to section 98 of the Metropolitan Local Management Act, 1855, which empowers a district board to pave and repair streets "and to cause the ground or soil thereof to be raised or lowered . . . and to alter the position of any mains or pipes in or under any such street, such alteration to be made subject to the approval of the engineer of the company to which such mains or pipes belong." They contended that if the defendants exercised their power of altering the level of a street they must exercise their other power of altering the position of the mains, and that the defendants were not to exercise their powers in such a way as to be injurious to the plaintiffs—"Geddis v. Proprietors of the Bann Reservoir" (L.R., 3 App. Cas., 430). All the plaintiffs asked was that the mains should be made as safe as they had been—that is, laid at the same depth as before.

Mr. RENSCHAW, Q.C., and Mr. LYTTELTON CHUBB, for the defendants, contended that the motion was misconceived, that it sought to compel the defendants to do that which if they did not do would be negligence on their part and so give rise to a claim for damages. But it had been laid down in "Bolton v. Crowther" (2 Barn. and Cr., 703) and other cases that turnpike trustees and other public bodies exercising their Parliamentary powers were not liable for consequent injury arising therefrom.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said the Court had a large power in granting an injunction, and he thought this was the exact case in which that large power should be exercised, rather than that the Court should wait until the injury was done and leave the plaintiffs to damages. The plaintiffs were therefore entitled to an injunction, though the form of injunction asked was too wide. The proper form would be to restrain the defendants from altering the position of the plaintiffs' mains by placing them in a position in which they would be more liable to injury than they were at present.

STRANGWAYS V. READ.*

Lunacy—Committee—Annual sum for maintenance—Death of lunatic—Repayment to estate of sums not expended.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

†Reported by G. I. FOSTER COOKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by E. B. SCHOMBERG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this action it appeared that by an order made in lunacy on March 24, 1896, the custody of the person of a lady lunatic was committed to her sister and another lady, and the custody of her estate to the official solicitor, and there was directed an allowance for maintenance of £2,500 per annum from January 20, 1896. The committee of the estate paid the committees of the person the allowance by quarterly payments in advance. A quarterly payment was made on October 29, 1896, and the lunatic died on the following November 11. The executors of her will claimed to be repaid by the committees of her person the sum of £528, being the proportionate part for the period subsequent to her death of the £625 paid in advance as a quarterly allowance. In the alternative the executors claimed an inquiry and account. It appeared that the Master in Lunacy decided that the payment of the £625 by the committee of the estate was a proper payment, and that neither at law, nor in equity, nor in lunacy were the executors entitled to recover any portion thereof. By an order made by the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy the Master's decision was discharged. The executors accordingly instituted the present action against the committees of the person to enforce their claim. The following authorities were cited:—"Jodrell v. Jodrell" (14 Bea., 411); "Re Ponsonby" (3 Dr. and W., 27); "Grosvenor v. Drax" (2 Knapp, 82); "Re Weld" (L.R., 20 Ch. D., 451); "Whincup v. Hughes" (L.R., 6 C.P., 78); "Re French" (L.R., 3 Ch., 317).

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Samuel Dickinson and Mr. E. F. Buckley for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER held that the terms of the order were that £2,500 should be paid for a year's maintenance, and the sum must be treated as a whole, and not as made up of quarterly or de die in diem payments, and the quarterly payments actually made as merely made by arrangement between the committees of the estate and person. As an arrangement the mode of payment was reasonable, but there was nothing binding as against the executors. Having regard to the nature of the order the executors were entitled to recover such portion of the allowance, if any, as was not properly expended on the maintenance.

The order therefore which he made would be for an inquiry, with costs reserved.

THE MAYOR, ETC., OF LIVERPOOL V. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE LLANFYLLIN UNION AND OTHERS.*

Rating—Rateable value—Waterworks—Assessment.

This was a case stated by the justices of the county of Montgomery, sitting at quarter sessions, upon an appeal from the assessment committee of the Llanfyllin Union with regard to the rating of Lake Vyrnwy and other parts of the Liverpool waterworks situated within the parish of Llanwddyn.

Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., and Mr. Honoratus Lloyd appeared for the appellants (the Liverpool Corporation); and Mr. Marshall, Q.C., and Mr. Arnold Herbert for the respondents.

The property of the appellants within the parish of Llanwddyn consisted of a reservoir called Lake Vyrnwy with banks, dam, and appurtenances, the greater part of which was within the parish and of part of the land occupied by the Hirnant tunnel and its appurtenances. The gross rental was £195,000 and the rateable value £15,322. The land was acquired and the works constructed under the provisions of the Liverpool Waterworks Act, 1880, and were by virtue of section 9 to form part of the system of works constructed by the appellants under their Waterworks Acts for the supply of water to the city of Liverpool as if they had been authorized by such Waterworks Acts. They were occupied solely for that purpose. On December 1, 1896, the appellants were rated and assessed by the assessment committee in respect of the reservoir and works upon a net assessment of £15,322 in the sum of £542 13s., being a rate of 8½d. in the pound. The appellants appealed to quarter sessions. The cost of constructing the reservoir and works was £646,932 and the cost of the land upon which they were constructed was £62,250, making £709,182 for the reservoir and site. In addition to this expenditure the appellants were bound by their Act to construct certain roads and bridges and a church, vicarage, and schools. The latter were in substitution of buildings which were submerged by the formation of the reservoir. They spent on roads £55,939, on bridges £8,337, and on the church, vicarage, and schools £13,952. None of these hereditaments were now in the occupation of the appellants. The reservoir was at present capable of delivering 52½ million gallons per day, but the catchment area which was at present connected with the reservoir was only sufficient to provide 41 million gallons. Catchment areas capable of providing the remaining 11½ million gallons could and would ultimately be connected with the reservoir. Of the 52½ million gallons 39 would be delivered by means of three pipes at Liverpool, and the remaining 13½ million gallons would be passed down the river Vyrnwy as compensation water in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1880. At present only one of the lines of pipes, capable of carrying 13 million gallons a day, had been laid. The appellants were able to borrow money at £2 10s. 11d. to £2 11s. 10d. per cent., but the money for the Vyrnwy Waterworks had been raised, part at 3½ per cent., and the remainder at 2½ per cent. The appellants' estimate of the rateable value of property was as follows. They took the total cost of the reservoir and site to be £709,182 and the total cost of the portion within the parish of Llanwddyn as £617,450. As only 26½ million gallons were now being produced instead of the ultimate capacity of 52½ million gallons, they reduced that figure by half, making £308,725 as the total effective cost of the reservoir and site. The total cost of the Hirnant tunnel and appurtenances within the parish they took at £27,936. They divided that figure by three, as only one of the three pipes was being used, making the total effective cost £9,312. This made the present effective capital value of the works £318,037. They put the rateable value at £8,746, being 2½ per cent. of the effective capital value. The respondents in their estimate added to the value of the land the improved value due to the construction of the roads and bridges by the appellants, which amounted to £70,091, and they estimated the total capital value of the reservoir and works at £318,615. They multiplied this by the fraction 27-41 to obtain the present effective capital value, making £539,088, of which £474,574 was apportioned to the parish of Llanwddyn. The fraction 27-41 was used because, though 52½ million gallons was the capacity of the reservoir, yet the catchment areas which were now connected with it only produced 41 million gallons. The cost of the Hirnant tunnel divided by three was estimated at £9,280, making the present capital value of the reservoir and tunnel in the parish of Llanwddyn £483,854. The total capital value of the whole of the Liverpool waterworks undertaking was estimated at £3,880,733 and the gross rental value at £184,163, which was equal to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the total capital value. The gross rental value, calculated at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of £483,854, yielded £22,983, less rates at 2s. 2d. in the pound on a rateable value of £16,920, less 20 per cent. for maintenance and renewal, making the rateable value £16,920. The quarter sessions held that, in order to ascertain the effective capital value of the undertaking, the sums expended, not only on the roads and bridges, but also on the church, vicarage, and schools, ought to be included, making the total capital cost of reservoir and site £787,410; that the effective capital value of the reservoir and site ought to be taken at $26\frac{1}{2}$ -41 of the expenditure—namely, £508,935; and that £9,312 was to be added to that, being one-third of the cost of the Hiramant tunnel, making the total effective capital cost £518,247. They were further of opinion (paragraph 24) that in consequence of the greater demand at the present time for such sites and of the increased cost of labour and materials, the outlay would be greater than the actual cost of the site and works of the corporation, in consideration of which the rateable value should be taken at 3 per cent. on the outlay, rather than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the rate at which the appellants could borrow; and, finally, that if in law the reservoir and dam might be rated separately, and not as integral parts of the appellants' water undertaking, their annual value if let as a separate hereditament should be arrived at by an estimate based upon 3 per cent. of the capital expenditure properly attributable thereto.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY delivered the considered judgment of the Court. He referred to the facts set out in the case. The appellants and respondents had adopted in principle the same method of arriving at the rateable value of the property, but in carrying out the principle the differences arose which required the Court's decision. The quarter sessions had left five questions. The first question was whether the reservoir and works were to be treated as integral parts of the appellants' water undertaking or as severable from the rest of the undertaking. The Court thought that such part of the waterworks as lay within the parish was a separate rateable hereditament in it and should be rated accordingly upon an estimate of the rent which it would yield after making the statutory deductions. See "Reg. v. West Middlesex Water Works Company" (28 L.J., M.C., 135). But it must be taken that the reservoir and works were part of the whole undertaking for the purpose of distributing water as a source of profit and though they did not directly earn anything in the parish, yet they conducted to earnings elsewhere. The whole undertaking continued in operation and, therefore, the owner of the whole must be assumed to pay a contractor adequate remuneration for land and fixed capital vested in these parts of the undertaking and for the labour and skill required for the construction and maintenance. The contractor stood in the relation of occupying tenant in the words of the case cited:—"The part within the parish is the rateable subject and the local rateable value is such sum as will pay the rent of the land and the profit on fixed capital therein." The answer, therefore, was that the reservoir and works were integral portions of the undertaking, and although rateable separately were not to be valued apart from the rest of the undertaking. The second question was whether there ought to be taken into account the circumstances mentioned in paragraph 24 of the case, in addition to the rate of interest at which the appellants could have borrowed money at the date of the making of the rate. The Court, in the absence of direct evidence, could not feel certain that the supposed greater demand for sites existed and that in this case the capital value should be arrived at from the cost of the works as a basis. The third question was whether, in order to ascertain the effective capital value of the undertaking, the amount expended upon roads, bridges, church, &c., ought to be included. The Court were clearly of opinion that none of them ought to be included. It had been argued that the amounts expended were part of the cost of the works. It was clear, however, that they were not; but that they were to be regarded as expenses to which the appellants had been put in carrying out the obligations put upon them by Parliament. If they enhanced the value of the lands, as to which there was not sufficient evidence, that must be taken into account in the rateable value of the lands enhanced. The fourth question was as to whether the value of the reservoir and site ought to be $26\frac{1}{2}$ -41 or $26\frac{1}{2}$ -52 of the total capital expenditure. At present the daily supply was only about one half of the complete or total possible supply. Prima facie, therefore, the effective capital value was also one-half of the total, but on behalf of the respondents it was said that, the total now received into the reservoir being only 41 million gallons a day and the total supply being $26\frac{1}{2}$ millions a day, the proper fraction to be used in the calculations was $26\frac{1}{2}$ -41. In other words, although the supply was only one-half of the intended amount, the rateable value of the effective capital was to be taken at more than one-half. It was also contended that the appellants should, in order to justify their contention, add to the capital value the cost of including the additional catchment area which is required to bring the daily supply into the reservoir to the amount of $52\frac{1}{2}$ million gallons. But it was the reservoir and works which were here rated, not the works which had not been carried out, and, although it was true that the proportion between the gallons supplied out of the reservoir and those actually received into it was at the time $26\frac{1}{2}$ to 41, that proportion did not represent the true relation between effective capital value and total cost of construction. The reservoir was large enough to receive $52\frac{1}{2}$ millions daily, and had been constructed and completed for those dimensions, but it did only supply one-half of that quantity. For the purpose of the rate the Court thought that the comparison supplied the true proportion. The case of "R. v. the South Staffordshire Water Works Company" (16 Q.B.D.) was relied on as showing that the cost of connecting the additional catchment area with the reservoir ought to be added to the capital value. But in that case the works had been completed and formed part of the undertaking. As to the last question, whether the rateable value ought to be taken at 3 per cent. or $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the effective value of the undertaking, that was largely a question of fact as to which the Court would not interfere with the decision of quarter sessions. The principle on which the capital value was to be calculated had been stated. The Court thought that the percentage upon it ought not to be higher than the necessary rate of interest at which the money could be borrowed. At the same time, when all the circumstances were considered, the Court could not say that the percentage had been wrongly fixed at 3 per cent., although it was higher than the rate at which the money could now be raised. The order of quarter sessions ought to be quashed and the rate reduced in accordance with the opinion of the Court.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE TYPESETTING MACHINE COMPANY (LIMITED) AND OTHERS V. THE LINOTYPE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Defamation—Libel—Trade libel—Disparagement of goods—Libel on plaintiffs in the way of their business.

Appeal from judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J. (ante, p. 253), dismissed (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting).

This was an application by the defendants for judgment or for a new trial of an action tried before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, reported ante, p. 253. The action was brought by the British Empire Typesetting Machine Company and the Empire Typesetting Machine Company of New York against the Linotype Company to recover damages for libel. The alleged libel referred to five machines of the Empire Typesetting Machine Company which had been sent to be used in the office of a newspaper in New York called the Evening Sun. It was contained in an article which was sent to the editor of the St. James's Gazette and the editor of the Printer's Register, but it was not published in either of those papers. The article was as follows:—"The Empire Typesetter in America.—The Union Printer and American Craftsman, the most wide-awake and sprited of American trade journals, has recently contained several references to the Empire composing machines, which were installed in the office of the New York Evening Sun with such a flourish of trumpets. From these paragraphs we gather that five machines altogether have been employed in this office, the first being introduced some time in the month of February last, and the other four commencing operations on March 9 last. So short-lived, however, does this installation appear to have been that we learn the machines were discontinued on Wednesday, April 29, and now the Empire Company is in receipt of notice to remove them altogether in the course of a few days. This will be a very serious blow for this machine." It appeared that in consequence of certain trade union rules the presence of the machines in the office of the Evening Sun made it necessary for the owners of that paper to pay the workmen in their employment higher wages than they had been paying before, and that, as they did not think it worth while to do this, the machines were removed. The innuendo alleged in the statement of claim was that the words complained of meant that the plaintiffs the Empire Typesetting Machine Company were unskilful, incompetent, and negligent in the manufacture of typesetting machinery, and that they induced the proprietors of the New York Evening Sun to purchase and install certain of such machines in their office by falsely and fraudulently representing the same to be machines of skilful, careful, and superior workmanship and design, and efficient for the purpose for which they were sold, well knowing that this was not the case, and that the said plaintiffs were dishonest and unskilful in the conduct and management of their business, and that the said plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs the British Empire Typesetting Machine Company, were unskilful and negligent in the management of their business in that all machines sold by them were of an inferior and worthless description. The jury, in answer to questions put to them by the Lord Chief Justice, found that the words complained of were a libel, and that they were directed against the business of the company as vendors of these machines generally, and were not merely a disparagement of the particular machines, and that the defendants published the words maliciously intending to attack the plaintiffs in the conduct of their business; and they assessed the damages at £500. The Lord Chief Justice accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs for that amount.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE, Q.C., and Mr. J. ELDON BANKES (Mr. Lewis Thomas with them) appeared for the defendants in support of the application for judgment or a new trial, and argued that there was no evidence on which judgment could be rightly entered for the plaintiffs, or that, in the alternative, the verdict was against the weight of evidence. They contended that the words complained of contained nothing defamatory of the plaintiffs, and that, at the utmost, they amounted to mere disparagement of the plaintiffs' goods; and an action for libel on goods would not lie unless special damage were alleged and proved, which was not done here. They cited "Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty" (7 App. Cas., 741), "Nevill v. Fine Art and General Insurance Company" ([1897] A.C., 68), and "Evans v. Harlow" (5 Q.B., 624). They also contended that the damages were excessive, inasmuch as there had been no publication of the alleged libel except to the editors of the two newspapers.

SIR ROBERT REID, Q.C., and Mr. GREGSON ELLIS, for the plaintiffs, argued that the words complained of were open to the construction that they bore a meaning defamatory of the plaintiffs, and that it was for the jury to say whether they bore that meaning or not. They relied on the judgment of Lord Esher in "South Hetton Coal Company v. North-Eastern News Association" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 133).

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day, dismissing the appeal, Lord Justice Vaughan Williams dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—"This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, the British Empire Typesetting Machine Company, against a rival trader, the defendants in this action, for having libelled them in the way of their business. The case came to trial before the Lord Chief Justice of England and a special jury, when the latter found—(1) that what the defendants had written and published of the plaintiffs was a libel; (2) that it was defamatory of the business of the plaintiff company; (3) that the defendants published the libel maliciously intending to attack and injure the plaintiffs in their business; and (4) they assessed the damages at £500. There was no suggestion in this case, as was the fact in "The Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty" (7 App. Cas., 741), and also in "Nevill v. Fine Art and General Insurance Company," ([1897] A.C., 68), that the occasion upon which the libel was published was a privileged occasion, and I have not to discuss the law applicable to such a case. No complaint is made by the defendants of the third finding of the jury as to their actual malice, and it is not argued by them that there was not good evidence to support it; but it is said that judgment should nevertheless be entered for the defendants, because what they published was only defamatory of the plaintiffs' goods, and was not capable of being defamatory of the plaintiffs in their business, and, as no special damage was proved, this action is not maintainable. If it were true that the libel in question was only a disparagement of the plaintiffs' goods, I agree that the case of "Evans v. Harlow" (5 Q.B., 624) and the case in the House of Lords of "White v. Mellin" ([1895] A.C., 154), approving of the former case, are conclusive to show that the action would not be maintainable without proof of special damage. The defendants also ask for a new trial upon the ground that the damages are excessive. The Lord Chief Justice was of opinion that the inference which might properly be drawn from the words published was that they conveyed a libellous imputation upon the plaintiffs in their business, and he therefore left the case to the jury, and, as it seems to me, clearly pointed out to them what they had to decide—viz., the difference between a libellous imputation upon the plaintiffs' goods and upon the plaintiffs themselves in the way of their business—and he told them that when considering what the libel meant they must consider what its language would convey to the mind of a person reading it with ordinary intelligence, which is quite correct. I do not dispute that, when a verdict has passed against a defendant in a case of libel and judgment has been given against him, if he asserts that there was no libel, and that both the jury and the Court of first instance have gone wrong, he is not called upon to say that the words are incapable of conveying a libellous imputation—it is enough if he can make out to the satisfaction of the Court above that the onus of showing that they do convey such an imputation is not satisfied by the plaintiffs (see per Lord Blackburn, 7 App. Cas., at p. 776). The question is whether in this case the plaintiffs have satisfied this onus. In my opinion it is the law that, if a publication be such that a person of ordinary intelligence reading it might naturally come to the conclusion that the publication imputed to a trader either misconduct or want of care or of qualification or of skill in his business, and the statement is proved to be untrue, the occasion not being privileged, then the case must be left to the jury, and it is not competent for the Judge to withdraw it from them, for they are the tribunal, if there be ground for assuming that the imputation may be libellous upon the plaintiff, to say whether the document published does in fact make any such imputation upon him. Now, what is it that the libel complained of, which was sent by the defendants to the editor of the St. James's Gazette and also to another newspaper, contains upon its face? I will read the whole of the document as sent by the defendants to the editor of the St. James's Gazette, who refused to publish it in his paper. (His Lordship read the document.) The Empire Company named in this document are the plaintiffs, and the Empire composing machines are the machines the plaintiffs vended and installed in the way of their trade or business. It cannot be disputed that this document contains the allegation that the plaintiffs had installed five type-setting machines at the office of the Evening Star, and so short-lived had been these installations that the plaintiffs had received notice to remove the machines altogether in the course of a few days, and that this would be a very serious blow for this machine. Now, what do these words naturally convey to a reader? What in their ordinary sense do they mean? In my judgment their prima facie and natural meaning is that the five machines which the plaintiff company had installed were worthless or unworkable. What is the meaning of the passage about the installation being so short-lived? Why had the plaintiffs' notice to remove them altogether in the course of a few days? To me the natural meaning of the words is this, that the notice was given because the machines would not work or were worthless; and in my opinion any other meaning is a strained and non-natural meaning of the words. If the meaning of the publication was, as the defendants now assert, merely an imputation upon the machines, what is the meaning of inserting the plaintiffs' name as being the persons who had installed these disparaged machines? The sting of the libel to me is obvious, and so is the meaning of the words, and this has been the opinion of every one who has hitherto had to do with the words—I mean the Lord Chief Justice and the special jury. It is my own opinion and I agree with them. It appears to me unnecessary to inquire how the plaintiff's pleader has set out his innuendo, for that is not what we have to determine in this case. It has been proved to be wholly untrue that the machines or any of them were worthless or unworkable, for on the contrary it was proved that they were excellent machines and worked with perfect efficiency, and there was no pretence for saying that they did not; and it was also proved to be untrue that the plaintiffs had received notice to remove them altogether in the course of a few days. To falsely write of a trader that he sells or sets up worthless or unworkable wares is a libel upon the trader in the way of his trade, for it imputes either carelessness or incapacity therein, and this in my opinion is what the defendants have written and published of and concerning the plaintiffs. A libel may well contain a disparagement of goods and at the same time a disparagement of the trader who in his business sells them or sets them up. Lord Esher, in "South Hetton Coal Company v. North-Eastern News Association" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 133, at page 139), pointed out that, if the libel complained of, although in disparagement of a trader's goods, is stated in such a way as might reflect upon the conduct of the trader's business, it was for the jury to say which sense the libel really bore; and in this I entirely agree. I have no doubt that the libel in this case disparages the plaintiffs' goods, but it does a great deal more, for it also contains a disparagement of the plaintiffs in the way of their business. It is immaterial to consider whether the alleged libel carries the imputation that what the trader did was done knowingly or not, for if knowingly it was an a fortiori disparagement of the trader in the way of his business, for it imputes to him misconduct therein. It was argued for the defendants that, as the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of "Evans v. Harlow" held upon demurrer that the alleged libel in that case was only upon the goods and not upon the plaintiffs in the way of their business, we should in this case do the same. I do not agree with that argument, which comes to this, that, because a Court has held that one particular libel was only a libel upon goods, we should therefore hold that the libel in the present case, a wholly different libel, was also only a libel upon goods. It might just as well be argued that, because the majority of the Court of Queen's Bench held in the "Bag of Bags" case, "Jenner v. A'Beckett" (L.R., 7 Q.B., 11), that the libel in that case was capable of being a libel upon the trader in the way of his trade (as to the correctness of this decision I give no opinion), we should hold that the present publication constituted a libel upon the plaintiffs in the way of their trade. It was further argued by the defendants' counsel that it was unreasonable, as was pointed out by Lord Justice Brett in "Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty," cited with approval by Lord Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, in "Nevill v. Fine Art and General Insurance Company," at p. 73, that, when there are a number of good interpretations, the only bad one should be seized upon to give a defamatory sense to the document; but, in my opinion, the natural meaning of the words used in this case is defamatory of the trader in the way of his trade, and mean what the jury have found, and were perfectly entitled to find, they did mean. Indeed, what is the good interpretation which the words naturally convey? I can see none. The defendants' admitted case is that the document published by them is a libel upon the plaintiffs' goods, false and malicious; where, then, is the good interpretation to be found? As before stated, there is no pretence for suggesting the occasion to have been privileged. For the reasons above, I think the plaintiffs have satisfied the onus upon them, and that we should clearly be wrong if we entered judgment for the defendants. As to damages, if a trader falsely and with actual malice publishes a libel intending to attack and injure a rival in trade, as has been proved to have been done by the defendants in this case, I cannot say, nor do I think, that £500 damages are in such circumstances excessive. In my judgment, the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read a judgment in which he arrived at the same conclusion.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read a long and elaborate judgment, arriving at a contrary conclusion. He was of opinion that judgment ought to be entered for the defendants—first, because the words of the alleged libel in their natural meaning were not in themselves libellous; secondly, because they were not capable of the meaning imputed in the innuendo, and there was no evidence of any extrinsic facts calculated to give the words an extended meaning; lastly, because, even assuming the words to be capable of a defamatory meaning, they were also capable of a meaning innocent of defamation of the plaintiffs as distinguished from their machines, and there was no evidence to satisfy the Court that the words had a libellous tendency.

THE SAILING SHIP BLAIRMORE COMPANY (LIMITED) AND OTHERS V. MACREDIE.*

Insurance—Marine—Constructive total loss—Expenses of raising vessel—Notice of abandonment.

When a vessel capsizes and sinks owing to perils insured against, underwriters cannot, by spending money in raising her, turn what would otherwise be a constructive total loss into a partial loss.

An important question of maritime law was involved in this appeal against two interlocutors, one pronounced by the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland on June 4, 1897, and the other by the Lord Ordinary (Lord Kyllachy) dated February 18, 1897. The question was whether the liability of insurers as for a constructive total loss of the insured vessel is determined according to the state of matters as they existed when notice of abandonment was given by the insured, or at the time when the action was instituted. The appellants, who were pursuers in the action, sued the respondent as one of the underwriters of the Blairmore for his share of the liability for the insured value of the vessel. The ship was insured for the period from April 3 to June 3, 1896, under five time-valued policies amounting in all to £15,000. Of this £100 was underwritten by the respondent, and this was a test action by the result of which the other underwriters agreed to be bound. On April 9, 1896, the Blairmore, whilst moored in the Bay of San Francisco, capsized and sank in a squall. Immediately afterwards the appellants, on the instructions of the underwriters, obtained an offer to raise her for £5,760 on the condition "No cure, no pay." This offer was not accepted, and on April 15, 1896, the appellants gave to the underwriters notice of abandonment as of a constructive total loss. The underwriters declined to accept this notice, and proceeded to raise the vessel. The cost of doing so amounted to £7,600 or more, and the underwriters calculated that when the cost of repairs was added to this sum the total outlay would be about £12,000, and the value of the vessel when repaired would be about £9,600. The appellants did not dispute that, if the cost of raising the vessel was excluded, she was not a constructive total loss; but they contended that the sum so expended had to be taken into consideration in determining that question. The appellants claimed the valued sum in the policies, but payment was refused, and on December 1, 1896, the appellants raised the present action. Lord Kyllachy dismissed the action, without prejudice to the pursuers' bringing another action for a partial loss. This decision was affirmed by Lords Trayner, Young, and Moncreiff in the Second Division. It was matter of discussion in the Courts below whether in such a case the law of Scotland is the same as that of England. On this question Lord Young said:—

"We must decide this question according to the law of Scotland. . . . We are glad to be informed that the law of England is the same as the law of Scotland on any question. Indeed, we are glad to know that the law of America or France is the same as ours in any case. . . . We do not know what may have been decided in England yesterday or last week. It is reported of Lord Eldon that on one occasion he declined to express any opinion on a question of law which was put to him, excusing himself because he had been out of town for a fortnight, and had only just returned."

The case was argued on February 15 and 17 by Mr. Robson, Q.C., Mr. Salvesen (of the Scotch Bar), and the Hon. M. Macnaghten for the appellants; and Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Henry Aitken (of the Scotch Bar) for the respondent.

Judgment was delivered reversing the decision of the Court below.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In "Miles v. Fletcher" (1 Doug. 231a) Lord Mansfield said that the great object in every branch of the law, but especially in mercantile law, is certainty, and that the grounds of decision should be certainly known. In this case a controversy has been raised which I had thought had long since been laid to rest. During the existence of a time policy, a ship covered by it has been struck by a squall and sunk, and it is contended that if the underwriters can raise her up again by an expenditure of their own, and that then when she is raised she can be repaired by the expenditure of less money than her total value, when thus raised they are only to be liable as for a partial loss. It seems to me that such a proposition would unsettle the law as between insurers and insured as it has been understood and acted upon for something like a century. I myself should say a ship was totally lost when she goes to the bottom of the sea, though modern mechanical skill may bring her up again; and I think, in construing a contract now for many years a common contract, no one could doubt that that contract was intended by the parties to contemplate the loss of a ship as comprehending the case of her being sunk. It is, I think, a total misapplication of what has been found to be a convenient test to distinguish a total from a partial loss to apply it to a case where the vessel insured has gone to the bottom. The question is, What did the contract between the parties mean? No such case has arisen before, inasmuch as I think so bold a contention has never been made. The cases of capture and re-capture have sometimes given rise to somewhat difficult questions of fact rather than law, and I think their application to cases of loss by perils of the sea has occasionally given rise to confusion, but even in such cases it has always been held that the principle that the existence of the thing in esse is not conclusive against the loss being a total loss; and I think that now after all the discussion that these questions have received both insurer and insured must be taken to have understood the words

"total loss" in the business sense of those words. I am disposed here to adopt the language of Chief Justice Erle in "Adams v. Mackenzie" (13 C.B. N.S.), where a ship was insured in the peculiar form of "against total loss only." The learned Judge says:—"It has been urged on the part of the underwriters that they only intended to become answerable for one of two descriptions of total loss—namely, the actual total destruction of the subject matter of insurance, and not for that which all persons conversant with insurance business understand as being a total loss. All I can say is, if they so intended they have failed to express their intention." And Mr. Justice Willes, with whom Mr. Justice Willes concurred, says:—"If the parties intended only to insure against the total and absolute physical destruction of the ship, they should have expressed themselves in different language." My view is that in the contemplation of both parties to this contract a total loss is incurred when the ship goes to the bottom. (See "Irving v. Manning," 1 H.L. Cases, 287.) In this particular case, for the reasons I have given, the familiar test which brings a constructive total loss into a partial loss I think is not applicable at all, but if it were the formula would have to be altered. It would no longer be, What would a prudent uninsured owner do? but, How much would an astute underwriter expend to turn a total into a partial loss? The change of circumstances which in our jurisprudence has been held to turn a total into a partial loss has arisen, certainly originally if not altogether, in respect of insurances against capture, where to my mind totally different considerations arise. A vessel by being captured is certainly lost to its owner; but, as in one case where the question arose, a vessel may be taken and re-taken before any one knows of the loss, and as the contract of insurance is mainly a contract of indemnity one can see how the Courts would struggle against a large profit being made out of such a contract. But where the laws of other countries differ from ours in this respect I think it will be found that the difference arose from positive enactments and regulations apparently directed to avoid the solution of difficult and complicated questions of fact. The Scotch Judges have held, apparently, that the law of Scotland is the same as the law of England, and, as in mercantile and maritime law, unlike in this respect to some other parts of Scottish jurisprudence, the sources of the laws of both England and Scotland are the same. I am glad to think, in this respect, the learned Judges are right. It would be very inconvenient if, in such questions as arise in this case, the law were different. I think the judgment should be reversed with the usual consequences as to costs.

LORD WATSON, after stating the facts and discussing authorities, said,—It appears to have been held by the learned Judges in both Courts below that, there being no firmly established rule upon the point in Scotland, the decision of it ought to be in conformity with the law of England. One of the learned Judges observed:—"It has been stated recently, on high authority, that the law upon maritime questions is the same in Scotland as in England, and if this view, so broadly stated, is adopted, then we have nothing to do in this case beyond applying to it the rule which, I have said, is now settled in England. As matter of individual opinion I do not concur in that view." I do not think I am mistaken in supposing that the preceding passage refers to the recent decision of this House in "Currie v. McKnight" (13 The Times Law Reports, 53; 1897, A.C., 97; 66 L.J., P.C., 19). All that was determined in that case was that, in maritime causes which exclusively belonged to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Courts in both countries, the law applicable was neither English nor Scotch, but British law, and, therefore, one and the same code. But the jurisdiction exercised by these Courts in the two countries has never, so far as I am aware, been precisely co-extensive. In Scotland the Admiral's jurisdiction, although cumulative with that of the Court of Session, extended to all questions arising in regard to policies of maritime insurance, and had also been extended, "by long possession," to the right of cognizance in bills of exchange and other mercantile questions which were in no sense maritime (Ersk. Inst., B. I., Tit. III., sections 33 and 34). In England, on the other hand, policies of marine insurance were regarded simply as matters of mercantile contract, and actions brought upon them belonged to the jurisdiction, not of the Admiralty, but of the common law Courts. Accordingly, I do not think that "Currie v. McKnight" has any application to the first point raised by the appellants in answer to the respondent's plea of irrelevancy; and I see no reason to differ from the observations made by Lord Blackburn in the Scotch case of "Shepherd v. Henderson" (7 App. Cas., 71), to which Lord Trayner refers with approval. I may observe, however, that the findings of fact contained in the interlocutor appealed from, which in that case were binding upon the House, were not calculated to raise the question discussed in those observations by the noble and learned Lord, one of them being to the effect that, on the day the vessel was driven ashore, there was, and continued thereafter to be, a reasonable prospect of her being got off without greater expense than a prudent, uninsured owner would reasonably incur. In either view of the law that finding was sufficient to negative the claim made for a constructive total loss. I should have been unwilling to decide the first point without hearing an argument going beyond Scotch and English cases, and embracing the rationes which have governed the practice and decisions of other countries which have not adopted the English rule; but I am relieved from the necessity of considering and deciding it, having come to the conclusion that the second point advanced by the appellants is well founded in law. In considering the second I shall assume that the first point was rightly decided by the Courts below; and also that, if the Blaimore had been raised, after notice of abandonment and before the date of the action, by the operation of natural causes or by the action of neutral persons, without expense to the insured, the appellants would, according to English law, have been disabled from claiming under their policy for a total constructive loss, if it were shown that the value of the ship, when repaired, would have substantially exceeded the cost of repairing her. But the question still remains whether the gratuitous act of the underwriters, in raising the vessel at their own expense, leaving nothing but the cost of repairs to be borne by the insured, will, according to English law, have the effect of reducing a total to a partial loss and of relieving the underwriters from their contract liability. It might be that, in every case where the ship has been raised by causes or persons which entail no liability upon himself, a prudent uninsured owner would repair the vessel; but I have been unable to arrive at the conclusion that, in the circumstances which occur in this case, the consideration of what would be the action of a prudent owner, uninsured, affords the true test of the liability of the underwriters as for a total constructive loss. In my opinion that test is excluded by the contractual relations which exist between the insured and his insurers. Not one of the English authorities, so far as I understand them, goes near to the length of deciding that the insurers can avoid their liability as for a total constructive loss by their intervening gratuitously and taking upon themselves part of the expenses which prima facie fall upon the assured and would otherwise have been taken into account in estimating whether there has been such a total loss. To admit an exception of that kind would be contrary to general law, and it is not, in my opinion, recommended by any principle of equity. The rule of law applicable to contracts is that neither of the parties can by his own act or default defeat the obligations which he has undertaken to fulfil. The result of admitting the exception in this case would be that the underwriters, who would otherwise be bound to pay to the appellants the sum of £15,000, would escape from that obligation by making an expenditure of £8,000, which the contract did not oblige them to make or contemplate that they should make. It was strongly argued for the respondent that if the exception were admitted the appellants would be indemnified, and that, the contract being one of indemnity, their claims under it would be fully satisfied. The conclusive answer to that argument is, in my opinion, to be found in the circumstance that the indemnity which he proposes to give to the appellants is not that which they contracted to get. The underwriters had no larger right, and were under no greater obligation to raise the ship, than to pay for her repairs; and, on principle, if the exception were admitted, I do not see why they should not also have been permitted to avoid their responsibility for total loss by paying the repairing shipwrights' bill or by sending the assured a cheque for its amount. For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be revised and the respondent's plea against the relevancy of the action repelled. I do not think that in the present shape of the record your Lordships are in a position to dispose of the action upon its merits. There must be a remit to the Second Division to give final judgment, after the disputed facts have been ascertained, either by proof or by mutual admission. I think the appellants ought to have their expenses in the Court of Session after the date of closing the record and their costs of this appeal.

LORD HERSHELL.—In this case the Lord Ordinary held that the pursuers' statements were irrelevant as founding a claim under the policy for a total loss, and therefore dismissed the action. To this interlocutor the second division adhered. The averments in the first three articles of the condescendence disclose the following facts:—The Blairmore was insured by time policies for the period from April 3 to June 3, 1896, for £15,000. During this period she was struck by a squall and sunk. The pursuers, having ascertained that the ship could not be raised and repaired except at a cost greatly exceeding her value when raised and repaired, gave notice of abandonment, which, however, the underwriters did not accept. Then follows this averment:—"The cost of raising and repairing said ship would be about £15,000, and her value after being raised and repaired would be about £9,600. The pursuers believe and aver that the underwriters actually expended a sum of £8,000 thereby in raising the vessel and bringing her into a place of safety." It is contended that these averments show that, although the notice of abandonment was properly given, there being at that time a constructive total loss, yet they also show that at the time the action was brought the loss was not total, because, if the cost of repairing the vessel, which was all that then had to be done by the assured, be alone regarded, it would be less than the value of the vessel when repaired. According to the laws of some foreign countries, whenever a notice of abandonment has been properly given the rights of the parties to the contract of insurance are regarded as fixed, and are unaffected by anything which may happen between that date and the time when legal proceedings are commenced. In England a long course of decisions has established a different rule, notwithstanding the unfavourable criticism by Lord Eldon of some of the earlier ones. The decisions referred to have been nearly all pronounced in cases of loss by capture, where, the ship having been recaptured and being in good safety at the time when the action was brought, it was held that the loss was not total. After referring to authorities, the noble and learned Lord proceeded:—"I take it, then, that the general rule applicable is, according to the law of this country, that if in the interval between the notice of abandonment and the time when legal proceedings are commenced there has been a change of circumstances reducing the loss from a total to a partial one, or, in other words, if at the time of action brought the circumstances are such that a notice of abandonment would not be justifiable, the assured can only recover for a partial loss. The question is whether a constructive total loss can be reduced to a partial loss by the expenditure on the part of the underwriters of so much of the cost necessary to enable the vessel again to take the sea as to leave what still needs to be expended for the purpose of putting the vessel into that condition less in amount than the value of the vessel when so repaired. In the present case the assurance is against partial as well as total loss; but the question must, I think, be answered in the same way, whether the policy covers total loss only or partial loss also. Could the underwriter of a policy against total loss escape liability, although there had been a constructive total loss, by doing part of the repairs? I cannot think so. A constructive total loss is as much a total loss within the meaning of a policy of insurance as an actual total loss. And in the case of a total loss by perils insured against, whether constructive or actual, the underwriter has agreed to pay the sum insured. Where such a liability has accrued the underwriter cannot, in my opinion, incur part of the expenditure required to make the ship fit to take the sea, and then insist that the loss has become a partial one only. The rule adopted in this country with reference to a change of circumstances between the time of notice of abandonment and the time when the action is brought has never been applied to a change, such as I have referred to, brought about by the underwriter; and I am not disposed to extend it to a case of this description. I think it would be unreasonable and would not give due effect to the contract between the parties. Although the Lord Ordinary dealt with the point I have been considering, it seems to have passed unnoticed in the Inner House, where it was apparently assumed that, if the law of Scotland was the same as that of England, the judgment must be adverse to the pursuers. The agreement appears mainly to have turned on the question whether the rule established in this country is the law of Scotland also. I think it right to say that, in my opinion, this question is quite open to discussion. It is certainly not concluded in a sense adverse to the pursuers' contention by any authority in the Scotch Courts, and in view of the fact that the English rule does not prevail generally in maritime countries, the reasons on which it is founded, and its reasonableness, will have to be considered if the question, what is the law of Scotland, should ever arise for decision. In the present case it is unnecessary to decide it, because, in my opinion, even if the law of Scotland be identical with that of England, the argument of the appellants must prevail. For the reasons I have given I agree in thinking that the judgment should be reversed.

 GLASGOW CORPORATION V. GLASGOW TRAMWAY AND OMNIBUS COMPANY.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Lease of tramway from corporation—Agreement to keep corporation free from all “expenses”—Liability for rates and taxes.

This was an appeal from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session dated March 14, 1897, in two conjoint actions—the one instituted by the tramway company against the corporation and the other by the corporation against the tramway company. The arguments were heard on February 28 and March 1 last. The question was whether the appellants were bound to relieve the respondents of the landlords’ or owners’ assessments, rates and taxes, local or Imperial, paid by the respondents in respect of the tramways leased by the appellants to the respondents during the period from July 1, 1871, to July, 1894, to the extent and in the manner described by Lord Watson in his judgment. The facts are fully stated by Lord Watson.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Renton were for the appellants; Mr. J. B. Balfour, Q.C. (of the Scotch Bar), and Mr. W. Campbell for the respondents.

Judgment was given allowing the appeal.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the whole question turns upon the true construction of the contract between the appellant corporation and the Glasgow Tramway Company. The corporation agreed to construct certain tramways, and leased the undertaking to the respondent company. It is clear that but for the stipulation in the agreement the respondent company would have had a right to claim indemnity against the corporation in respect of owners’ assessment, rates and taxes, whether local or Imperial. But the answer to that claim is that the respondents had undertaken to bear those burdens themselves, and the sole question is, as I have said, the construction of the particular stipulation which has thus been made. Now, that stipulation is in these terms:—“And the company shall pay to the corporation the expenses of borrowing, management, &c.” and it proceeds thus:—“This provision shall be so construed as to keep the corporation free from all expenses whatever in connexion with the said tramways.” That the rates and taxes levied upon the tramways as such and the expenses involved in making payment in respect of them are expenses within the strictest meaning of those words appear to me to be beyond doubt, and the words “free from all expenses whatever in connexion with the said tramways” appear to me to be so wide in their application that I should have thought it impossible to qualify or cut them down by their being associated with other words, on the principle of their being ejusdem generis with the previous words enumerated. “Expense,” I presume, is itself a very general word, but the construction which limits that word would be strange indeed which should strike out the word “all” and the word “whatever” from the sentence. Neither does it appear to me very intelligible why where the assessment is upon the tramway itself it is not an expense in connexion with the tramway. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Session was erroneous, and I think it ought to be reversed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—The appellant corporation, having obtained statutory authority to construct tramways upon the streets of the city of Glasgow, entered in May, 1871, into an agreement with the promoters of the respondent company, which was then in course of formation, by which the corporation undertook, upon the terms and conditions therein specified, to construct certain tramways and thereafter to grant a lease of the said tramways to the company for the period of 23 years. The corporation proceeded to construct the tramways, and effect was given to an agreement by embodying its stipulations in a contract of lease between the parties, which was duly executed by the corporation and by the company upon the 16th and 17th days of November in the year 1871. By the lease the corporation demised to the company “the sole right to use, for the sole purposes of the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870, carriages with flange wheels or other wheels specially adapted to run on a grooved rail on the whole tramways authorized to be formed by the said Act, and that for the space of 23 years from and after the 1st day of July, 1871.” The tenure of the respondent company being for a period exceeding 21 years the assessor, following the provisions of section 6 of the Valuation Act, 1854, entered their names in the current valuation rolls as “proprietors,” with the result that the company became primarily liable to pay, and regularly paid, the assessments yearly levied in respect of the tramways, whether for Imperial or for local purposes, during the whole term of the lease, which expired in July, 1894. Section 6 provides that a tenant whose name has been so entered “shall be entitled to relief from the actual proprietor thereof and to deduction from the rent payable by him to such actual proprietor of such proportion of all assessments laid upon the valuation of such lands and heritages made under this Act and payable by such lessee as proprietor in the sense of this Act as shall correspond to the rent payable by such lessee to such actual proprietor as compared with the amount of such valuation.” During the currency of their lease the company, although they intimated a claim against the corporation, did not make any deduction from the rents which they paid to the corporation in compliance with the conditions of the lease. This action was brought in January, 1896, and the first and the only conclusion of the summons to which the present appeal relates is for payment by the corporation to the company of the sum of £14,246 5s. 0½d. sterling, or of such other sum as may be ascertained to be the amount of owners’ assessment, rates, and taxes, whether local or Imperial, paid by the company for the period between July 1, 1871, and July 1, 1894, in respect of the tramways leased to them or the proportion of such payments of which the corporation were bound to relieve them. In defence to that conclusion the corporation pleaded—(1) that by the conditions of the lease the respondent company were bound to free and relieve them of those assessments; (2) that upon a sound construction of section 6 of the Valuation Act the only right of recovery given to the company as tenants was by deducting the amount of such assessment from the rent payable by them to the corporation under the lease, a remedy which the company had failed to pursue and had therefore lost; and (3) that, assuming the company to have had, under section 6 of the Act of 1854, the alternative remedy of recovering these assessments by legal process, their claim was, in the circumstances of the case, barred by taciturnity and mora. If any one of these three pleas in defence be sustained the claims for relief made by the company must necessarily fail. After a proof had been led the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) on December 2, 1896, found that the corporation were bound to relieve the company of the owners’ assessments, rates, and taxes, whether local or Imperial, paid by them in respect of the tramways during the period from July 1, 1871, to July 1, 1894.

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He made various subordinate findings bearing upon the proportion of assessments chargeable to the corporation, and, seeing that further inquiry was necessary upon one point, he directed the cause to be enrolled for further procedure. His interlocutor was on March 1, 1897, affirmed simpliciter by the First Division of the Court. The first plea urged in defence by the corporation depends upon the just construction of a single sentence in the second article of the lease of November, 1871. That clause enumerates various payments which are to be made by the lessees to the lessors, and then proceeds thus:—"And the company shall also pay to the corporation the expenses of borrowing, management, &c., and this provision shall be so construed as to keep the corporation free from all expenses whatever in connexion with the said tramways." The question, therefore, comes to be whether the proportion of assessments payable by the corporation as owners of the tramways under section 6 of the Valuation Act are expenses of the corporation "in connexion with the said tramways" within the meaning of the second article, and are therefore within the respondent company's obligation of indemnity. In my opinion, the conditions of the second article which I have just quoted ought to be construed in connexion with the whole stipulations of the lease in so far as these relate to the considerations passing between the corporation and the company. Viewed in that light, the general scheme of the lease is that the obligation of constructing the tramways was to rest upon the corporation, it being in the contemplation of both parties that the corporation was to raise money for that purpose by borrowing upon its own credit. On the other hand, the company (article 6) undertook the whole cost of maintenance and repair during the period of their tenure; they (article 3) agreed to pay half-yearly 3 per cent. per annum on the gross sum from time to time expended by the corporation on capital account, which percentages were to form a sinking fund to be applied "ultimately" by the corporation towards reduction or extinction of the cost of constructing the tramways; by the first part of article 2 the company agreed to pay half-yearly during the term of their lease the whole interest falling due upon the money from time to time borrowed by the corporation on capital account; by the second part of the same article, they agreed to pay interest on the expenses incurred by the corporation and by the board of police in obtaining statutory power of construction in the year 1870, or incident to the execution of the lease, it being declared that the obligation of the company for the payment of such interest was not to be affected by any payment made to the corporation through the medium of the sinking fund. The substance of the scheme, as embodied in these stipulations, appears to me to have been that no pecuniary obligation was to attach to the corporation beyond that of borrowing funds in order to pay for the construction of the tramways; and that the company, during the currency of their right, were to relieve the corporation of all other outlays connected with or incident to the performance of the obligation to construct, or incident to their position as proprietors of that which they had constructed. I have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that payment of assessments, whether Imperial or local, levied from the owner in respect of a tramway or other erection in solo, is an expense connected with such tramway or erection. But for the construction of the tramway no such liability would have arisen. I am, for these reasons, of opinion that the first plea is well founded, and that the company are suing for a sum of which they were bound by their lease to relieve the corporation. In that view, it is neither expedient nor necessary to express any opinion with regard to the other pleas maintained in defence by the corporation. I think that, in so far as they relate to the first conclusion of the summons, the interlocutors of December 2, 1896, and March 14, 1897, ought to be reversed, and the corporation assailed from that conclusion. I also think that the interlocutors of March 14 and March 20, 1897, in so far as they relate to expenses of process, ought to be reversed; and that the appellant corporation ought to have the expenses incurred by them before the Court of Session and their costs of this appeal.

INGLIS V. ROBERTSON AND BAXTER.*

Factors Act, 1890—Pledge of documents of title —"Mercantile agent."

Held, on the facts, that there had been no pledge of documents of title to goods by a "mercantile agent" so as to amount to a pledge of the goods themselves within the meaning of the Factors Act, 1890, sec. 3.

This was an appeal from the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, and was of a remarkable if not of a unique character, inasmuch as the whole strength of the Scottish Bench met for the decision of the question involved. It was also in controversy whether on the important points at issue the laws of Scotland and England were identical, and, if different, which should prevail. Twelve out of 13 of the Scotch Judges were in favour of the respondents, but Lord Young dissented, and held that the law in dispute was that of England. The arguments were heard on March 15 and 17. The facts are fully stated in the judgments.

Mr. Pyke, Q.C., Mr. E. Morten, and Mr. Wootton were for the appellant; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., Mr. Younger (of the Scotch Bar), and Mr. T. T. Robertson, for the respondents, were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the question to be determined is whether a certain parcel of whisky, or rather the sum of £1,000 10s. 6d., representing its value, belongs to the respondents in this appeal, and it cannot be doubted that unless the Factors Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 40), extending the English Factors Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict., c. 45), is in the way of the respondents, who arrested the whisky in the hands of the Clyde Bonding Company, the creditors (that is to say, the respondents, who have arrested the whisky) are entitled to the sum in question. The section in respect of which the question arises is the third section, which enacts that "a pledge of the documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods." It can hardly be denied that if the section is applicable to this case the pledging of the documents of title would be for all purposes as valid to constitute an actual right in the goods themselves as if the goods themselves had been physically handed over to the pledgee. But the only point in this case seems to me to depend upon whether that section is applicable to the facts in this case, and that in turn depends upon whether the person pledging comes within that part of the statute which the Legislature has separated from the other parts of the statute as applicable to "dispositions by mercantile agents." The Act, which is a Consolidation Act and also an amending Act, is separated into parts. Section 1 is "preliminary," and the definition of a mercantile agent is "a mercantile agent shall mean a mercantile agent having in the customary course of his business as such agent authority either to sell goods or to consign goods for the purpose of sale, or to buy goods, or to raise money on the security of goods." From the second section to the seventh inclusive the Legislature has enacted what shall be the law in respect of "dispositions by mercantile agents." From the eighth to the tenth "dispositions by sellers and buyers of goods," and the 11th to the 17th are described as "supplementary." I cannot doubt that each of the sections included in this separate portion of the statute must be read as only applicable to the case of persons indicated by that separate part of the statute, and, if so, it seems to me that the case is free from doubt, since, under the circumstances of this case, there was no disposition by a mercantile agent. This seems to me to dispose of the case, though, indeed, it was suggested that under the ninth section (which comes within the part of the statute applicable to sellers and buyers of goods) it might be contended here that these goods were obtained with the consent of the seller and under the conditions prescribed by that section. But it appears to me the facts raise no such question. I have referred to the English Act exclusively in what I have said, simply because the Act has been extended in its operation to Scotland subject to certain provisions not relevant to any question raised in this case. If the general law of Scotland be different from that of England in respect of pledges—though I do not say it is—the Act certainly did not purport, nor do I think it did in fact alter in any other respect than that specially enacted the law of Scotland as it stood at the passing of the Act. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON, in the course of his judgment, said,—Walter C. Goldsmith, a wine merchant in London, purchased, in December, 1893, from the respondents, Robertson and Baxter, who are wine and spirit merchants in Glasgow, a quantity equal to 600 hogsheads of blended Scotch whisky deliverable during the year 1894. The whisky was stored in a bonded warehouse at Glasgow. From the productions made by the appellant in this process, it appears that Goldsmith, after his purchase, had the whisky transferred to his name in the books of the Clyde Bonding Company, and obtained from them delivery orders in these or similar terms:—"Warrant for ten hogsheads whisky transferred in our books and held to the order of Walter C. Goldsmith or assigns by endorsement hereon." In December, 1894, Goldsmith obtained a loan of £3,000 from the appellant, an English merchant, to whom he delivered a letter purporting to hypothecate 180 hogsheads and 101 quarter casks of Scotch whisky, as per schedule annexed, in security for the loan, with interest at £7 per cent. per annum, and containing a power of sale. The whisky thus hypothecated was part of the quantity which had been purchased from the respondents by Goldsmith, and was still lying in his name in the bonded warehouse at Glasgow. Along with the letter Goldsmith endorsed and handed to the appellant the warrants which he held for delivery of the whisky. The appellant did not intimate the right and interest which he had thus acquired in the whisky to the keepers of the bonded warehouse. Goldsmith having failed to make payment to the respondents, Robertson and Baxter, of the sum of £1,060 10s. 6d., being the balance of price then remaining due to them, they, on February 11, 1895, arrested the whisky in the hands of the Clyde Bonding Company, in order to found jurisdiction against their debtor; and then raised an action against him before the Court of Session, upon the dependence of which they again arrested the whisky, on February 18, 1895. Under an arrangement made between the respondents and Alfred Cotton Harper, chartered accountant in London, as trustee administering the estate and affairs of Walter C. Goldsmith, the whisky was sold in April, 1895, upon consignment of the sum of £1,000 in the British Linen Company's Bank, Edinburgh, as a surrogatum for the goods sold, subject to the arrestments and claims of all parties who had an interest in the whisky. The present action of multiplepoinding was thereafter brought by the holders of the consigned fund, and two competing claims were lodged, which have been keenly contested and have led to this appeal. The respondents claim the fund in medio not as having a right of retention or other interest as unpaid sellers of the goods, but as personal creditors of Goldsmith, in whose name as owner the goods were at the dates of their arrestments held in Scotland by the actual custodiers, the Clyde Bonding Company. The appellant, on the other hand, claims an interest in the fund in medio preferable to that of the respondents, upon the ground that, prior to the date of their arrestments, he had become pledgee and endorsee of the delivery orders which constituted the documents of title to the goods, within the meaning of the Factors Act, 1889. He maintains that the legal effect of such a pledge, both according to the law of England, and according to the law of Scotland as altered by the provisions of the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890, was to vest the property of the goods in him. I can see no reason to doubt that, by Scotch law as well as English, the endorsement and handing over of delivery orders in security of a loan, along with a letter professing to hypothecate the goods themselves, is sufficient in law, and according to mercantile practice, to constitute a pledge of the documents of title, whatever may be the value and effect of the right so constituted. In my opinion, the right so created, whether in England or in Scotland, will give the pledgee a right to retain the ipsa corpora of the documents of title until his advance is repaid. The crucial question in this case is whether the right goes further, and vests in the pledgee of the documents, not a jus ad rem merely, but a real interest in the goods to which these documents relate. That is a question which I have no hesitation in holding must, in the circumstances of this case, be solved by reference to the law of Scotland. The whisky was in Scotland, and was there held in actual possession by a custodian for Goldsmith as the true owner. The state of the title could not, so far as Scotland was concerned, be altered or overcome by a foreign transaction of pledge which had not, according to the rules of Scotch law, the effect of vesting the property of the whisky, or, in other words, a jus in re, in the pledgee. It was not disputed by the appellant's counsel, and it is hardly necessary to repeat that, by the common law of Scotland, the indorsement and hypothecation of delivery orders, although it may give the pledgee a right to retain the documents, does not give him any real right in the goods which they represent. He can only attain to that right by presenting the delivery orders to the custodian by whom they were granted, and obtaining delivery of the goods from him, or by making such intimation of his right to the custodian as will make it the legal duty of the latter to hold the goods for him. His right, which, in so far as it relates to the goods, is in the nature of a jus ad rem, will be defeated if, before he has either obtained delivery or given such intimation, the goods are validly attached in the hands of the custodian by a creditor of the person for whom the custodian holds them. It was argued, however, that the common law of Scotland has been materially altered by the provisions of the Factors Act, 1889, their effect being that a pledge of the documents of title is by itself sufficient to carry a real right to the goods; and that the pledgee of the documents, from the moment when his right is completed by indorsation and delivery, is in the same position as if he had been pledgee of the goods and had obtained possession of them. The statute of 1889 is an English Act, which consolidates and repeals the previous Factors Acts, from 4 Geo. IV., cap. 83 to 40, and 41 Vict., cap. 39. But, by the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890, the whole provisions of the English statute of 1889 are extended to Scotland, and must, therefore, be construed as if they had originally been made applicable to that country. Two clauses of the Act of 1889 were founded on by the appellant. The first of these is section 3, which enacts that "a pledge of the documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods." So far as it applies the language of that clause is unambiguous. It provides that, to that extent, a pledge of the documents of title shall, although in point of fact it is not so, be nevertheless regarded in law as equivalent to a pledge of the goods." If the enactment had been embodied in a statute, which contemplated an alteration of the general law with regard to contracts of pledge in Scotland, I should have had little difficulty in holding that its effect would have been to make a pledge of the documents of title, in all cases, equivalent to a completed pledge of the goods themselves. But I am unable to come to the conclusion that the clause was meant to be, or is, of general application. It is one of a group of clauses which are collected under the statutory heading "Dispositions by Mercantile Agents"; and an examination of the context of these clauses shows, conclusively in my opinion, that the enactments of section 3 were merely intended to define the full effect of a pledge of the documents of title, made by a mercantile agent, under and by virtue of one or other of the subsections of the preceding clause (section 2). Accordingly, section 3 has, in my apprehension, no application to the case of a pledge of documents of title by one who was in the position of Goldsmith, or by any other person who is not a mercantile agent within the meaning of the Act of 1889. The other clause founded upon by the appellant was section 9, one of a group of clauses which occur under the statutory heading "Dispositions by Sellers or Buyers of Goods." The main, if not, the sole object of these clauses appears to be this—to protect the purchaser or pledgee of documents of title deriving right from one who is lawfully in possession of them against a claim of retention for unpaid price, or a right of stoppage in transitu, by the original seller, in cases where the purchaser or pledgee has had no notice of such claim or right. Goldsmith, from whom the appellant derived his right as pledgee to the documents of title representing the whisky in question, was not a pledgor within the meaning of section 9, who must be a person who has obtained the documents of title either from his seller or with consent of his seller. Goldsmith did not obtain the documents of title which he pledged to the appellant from the respondents, who were his sellers, or with their consent. He got the documents in his own right, and in his own name, as owner of the whisky directly from the warehousemen, after the goods had been transferred to his name in the warehouse books. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed, with costs.

LORD HERSCHELL, after stating the facts, said,—I think that in the present case there was a pledge of documents of title to goods. They were endorsed and handed to the appellant as security for an advance, and he was clearly entitled to hold them until the advance had been repaid. This appears to me to have constituted a pledge of the documents, and I fail to see how it was any the less a pledge because the agreement of December 18 was at the same time executed by Goldsmith. But it is not necessary in the view I take to express an opinion upon the point so much discussed in the judgments in the Court of Session, whether the effect of the enactment is to put the pledgee of the documents of title in the same position as if he had received possession of the goods to which the documents relate. I think the enactment has no application to the present case, inasmuch as the pledge was not a disposition by a mercantile agent, and in my opinion it is to such dispositions only that the section applies. It is true that it is general in its terms, but it is one of a group of sections headed, "Dispositions by mercantile agents." The Act is divided into parts. The first, headed "Preliminary," consists of a definition clause. The last part, headed "Supplemental," contains provisions as to the mode of transfer "for the purposes of this Act," and certain savings. The other two parts are headed respectively "Dispositions by mercantile agents" and "Dispositions by buyers and sellers of goods." These headings are not, in my opinion, mere marginal notes, but the sections in the group to which they belong must be read in connexion with them and interpreted by the light of them. It appears to me that the Legislature has clearly indicated the intention that the provisions of section 3 should not be treated as an enactment relating to all pledges of documents of title, but only to those effected by mercantile agents. The only other section relied on by the appellant is the ninth. I think this section also is inapplicable to the case before your Lordships. I am not satisfied, as at present advised, that the section applies in any case where no right to the goods or the documents of title remains in the seller who has parted with possession of them. But I do not decide this point. The possession of the documents of title which were pledged was obtained from the warehouse-keeper by the appellant by virtue of his ownership of the goods. They had already been transferred into his name by the warehouse-keeper, and were held for him before the warrants were delivered. I think in these circumstances it cannot properly be said that he obtained possession of them "with the consent of the seller." For these reasons I think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 86, and [1897] 1 Q.B., 231) reversed.

Their Lordships gave judgment in this important revenue appeal under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, on which the arguments were heard on November 18, 22, 23, and 25 last. The case is reported below, 13 The Times Law Reports, 86; [1897] 1 Q.B., 231; 66 L.J., Q.B., 202. The facts are fully stated in their Lordships' judgments, which reverse the decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, Lord Justice Lopes, and Lord Justice Rigby).

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts were for the appellant; the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins for the respondent.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—George Grenfell, second Baron Wolverton, died on November 6, 1887. Under the provisions of his will, and in the events which happened, five nieces (described as the "co-heiresses") became entitled to his residuary estate upon the death of Lady Wolverton. That lady died on January 4, 1894, and upon her death legacy duty at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum was paid upon the whole residue of the testator's estate. On December 31, 1888, a deed was executed by, among others, the five nieces, the late Lady Wolverton, and the present Lord Wolverton. By that deed the present Lord Wolverton, the appellant here, became entitled to an annuity of £15,000, and the question here is whether he is liable to pay succession duty upon this annuity. The claim of the Crown is based upon the annuity being liable as upon a succession coming to the appellant from the late Lady Wolverton, or the five nieces, or from both, and the sum of money in question is said to come within the express language of section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. The words of the section are as follows:—
 "Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person, in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a succession; and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disposer, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived." Before dealing with the particular question now before your Lordships it will not be inappropriate to say a word or two upon the apparent scope and object of the section I have quoted. What it points to is the disposition of property by reason whereof a person becomes beneficially entitled upon the death of any person. The disposition may be past or future; it may take effect immediately or after an interval; it may be either certainly or contingently; it may be either originally or by way of substitutive limitation; but with all these safeguards against evasion it must be a disposition by reason whereof a person has become beneficially entitled upon the death of some person. If a person were to confer by a deed of gift inter vivos his own existing property it would seem impossible to contend that this is a new succession. It is simply a transfer inter vivos of one person's property to another, and is not within the scope of the Act at all. Whether the succession be operated by disposition or devolution it must be a succession upon death. Now, I am unable to understand how the annuity created under the deed to which I have referred is a succession at all. If it is a gift inter vivos deriving no force from the death of any one I do not find any words in the section which make it chargeable with duty. If so, a voluntary gift by him, or any part of it during his own life, would equally make such gift chargeable with duty, and the whole nature of the legislation aimed at—succession upon death—would be altered into taxation upon transfer of any property by gifts inter vivos, and this to any extent of remoteness, so that each donee, though inter vivos, would become in turn the predecessor within the meaning of the section to each subsequent donee of the same property, although no new death had intervened at all, but simply a change of proprietorship. It is obvious to ask in this case whence it is that Lord Wolverton's interest in the annuity is derived. The Crown contends that it is derived from the nieces, or from Lady Wolverton, or from both. Let us take them separately. Suppose these ladies had waited to make the deed in question till the death of Lady Wolverton and had thus become entitled in possession to the whole of the late Lord Wolverton's residuary estate, would they then have been entitled to hand over all or a part of what had become absolutely their own? The element of succession upon death would be entirely wanting, and though the word "succession" has a technical definition in the Act the whole scope and meaning of the Act points to a distinction between alienation between living persons and a succession which death has opened to a successor. It seems to me that if this case can be maintained then if A inherits and pays his succession duty every donee from A. down to Z. must pay it also. Such a tax would be both unreasonable in itself and impossible of collection. The succession to property upon a death is one thing; the free gift inter vivos is a totally different thing. I am aware that the Crown repudiates this view, but it is not permissible to repudiate the logical conclusion of a contention by saying that the Crown would not insist upon such a right. It will not do to throw over consequences which may reduce the argument to an absurdity. The question here is the true construction of the Act. I am unable to deal with it because I am afraid I do not understand the suggestion of one succession being substituted for another, or how in this case it would arise. The present Lord Wolverton got nothing upon the death either of the second Lord Wolverton or by the death of Lady Wolverton. The utmost that can be said is that upon the occurrence of the death of Lady Wolverton the present Lord Wolverton's donors obtained the power to render effectual a gift which they had inter vivos agreed to give him before the death took place. "Succession" in the Act means not the act of succeeding, but property chargeable with duty under the Act, and, as Baron Bramwell pointed out in "Re Peyton" (7 H. and N., 296), property may escape the tax for all time by always passing inter vivos. I am of opinion that the annuity given by the deed of December 31, 1888, is not within section 2 of the Act at all. Lord Wolverton certainly obtained nothing by Lady Wolverton's death. She dealt with her own life interest in the property during her life. I am not, of course, suggesting that the transfer inter vivos of property the right to which arises upon the death can escape the duty by its being transferred to a person other than the original successor. The succession once created the duty must be paid for it, but I can find no warrant in the statute for a new succession duty being leviable upon the same property or money where no new death has created the right to such succession. I have hitherto dealt, and only dealt, with the second section itself. It is that section which imposes the tax. But the 15th section, which is supplementary to it, to my mind places the matter beyond all possibility of doubt. The framers of the Act contemplated the case of the original person intended to succeed under the disposition or devolution spoken of in section 2 transferring the interest to some other person, and I think the short effect of that part of section 15 with which we are dealing is that the person to whom such an interest has been transferred shall stand in the shoes of the person originally entitled and shall be chargeable with duty at the same time and at the same rate as the person originally entitled would have been chargeable if the interest had not been so transferred. The succession to the sum of money which created the annuity of £15,000 was a succession rendering the successor liable to the tax, but the "successor" were the five nieces, and undoubtedly they would be liable to the tax if they had not already paid it in a different form. But they had paid it in the form of legacy duty, and the Succession Duty Act enacts that any one who is charged with the duties on legacies shall not also be charged in respect of the same acquisition of property under the Succession Duty Act. I do not think it would be proper to rely upon the fact that the legacy duty was charged if it were charged erroneously—that could not estop the Crown in arguing what was the true construction of the Act. But I think it was charged—properly—rightly. Looking at the scheme of the Act and the application of the second, 15th, and 18th sections as applied to the facts in the present case, I confess I am unable to appreciate the difficulties which have been supposed to surround it. It is not very intelligible to me what is intended by the argument relied on, apparently, so much in the Court below as to whether the annuity granted to Lord Wolverton was one annuity or two annuities. If (what is the only intelligible meaning that I can attribute to these phrases) it is meant that the sources from which the annuity given to Lord Wolverton are two different sources that is quite true, but what relevancy has it to the question under debate? Lady Wolverton could and did only affect her own life estate. On her death nothing was left to succeed to. The co-heiresses by the annuity to Lord Wolverton gave nothing to which a title accrued by any one's death, and I am unable to see, therefore, what other source from which the annuity is derived has to do with this question. Nor do I see what relation the mode in which people dispose inter vivos of what they have got already can affect the question of what is only payable upon a succession—which by the hypothesis is not a new succession, but a disposition of property obtained under an old succession upon which duty has been paid already. It seems to be assumed without explanation—at least so far as I can understand—that there is a new succession, and, if there were a new succession, no doubt the consequence would follow. But the only point being whether there is a new succession or not that appears in the argument to be assumed, and then an elaborate explanation is given of the consequences that must follow from that succession. For the reasons, however, I have given I think there is no new succession; and, if there is not, it is to my mind perfectly immaterial what, in fact, is done with the property to which a donee had already succeeded. As to the point upon the 17th section, I quite concur with the Court of Appeal that the argument founded upon that section is untenable. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed with the usual result as to costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD HERSCHELL, after stating the facts, said in the course of his judgment:—I am unable to find in the Act any warrant for the view that a succession once created can by the act of the successor cease to exist, and another succession be substituted for it. The words of section 10 are precise, "There shall be levied and paid to her Majesty in respect of every such succession as aforesaid" the following duties; and these are made dependent on the relationship of the predecessor and successor. This provision operates, in my opinion, as soon as the disposition is made by which a "succession" is conferred. Moreover, "succession" denotes by Clause 1 any property chargeable with duty under the Act. No doubt the time of payment is fixed by section 20, but this is quite a different thing from the obligation to pay. The time of payment is to be when the successor "or any person in his right or on his behalf" shall become entitled in possession to his succession. This contemplates that at the time the succession falls in some person in right of the successor, and not the successor himself, may be entitled to the possession. The original successor is none the less called the successor. I have not forgotten the argument of the Solicitor-General that an alienee for value does not become a new successor although a gratuitous alienee does, and that the language I have alluded to is thus sufficiently satisfied. I shall deal with this argument when I come to consider the 15th section of the Act. It does not touch the point I am now concerned with, that section 20, to say the least, affords no support to the argument that one on whom a succession has been conferred can destroy it and the obligation to pay the duty which was attached to it by alienating it. And when we come to section 44, which provides who are to be "personally accountable" to her Majesty "besides the successor," amongst those named are "every person in whom" any property subject to such duty "shall be vested by alienation or other derivative title at the time of the succession becoming an interest in possession." Here again there is nothing to suggest that a person who has once been a successor has ceased to be so if prior to the time of the succession becoming an interest in possession he has alienated it. It was argued that the provisions of section 21, relating to the mode of assessment of the duty, in the case of real estate, would hardly be workable if in those provisions the word "successor" were held to refer to the original successor and not to his alienee. I think the application of this section may give rise to difficulty in certain cases. But it is to be observed that it does not determine either what is to be charged with the duty, when it attaches or becomes payable, or what is to be its rate. It is merely a rule for ascertaining the amount. And the difficulty is not got rid of by adopting the argument of the Crown, for it is just as great in the case of an alienation for a money consideration, which it is admitted does not make the alienee a new successor, as in the case of a gratuitous alienation. I am not surprised that the notion that the gratuitous alienation of a succession before the time for payment of the duty arrives creates a new succession ousting the original one and becoming substituted for it finds no countenance in the provisions of the Act. In the present case the contention of the Crown operates in favour of the revenue and increases the amount of the tax, but in many, and perhaps the majority of cases, it would have precisely the contrary effect. It would be strange if a person in whom a succession had been created by a stranger in blood, and in respect of which therefore a duty of 10 per cent. would be payable, should be able by a gratuitous alienation to his son before the death occurred to reduce the duty payable to 1 per cent. It seems to me inconsistent with the entire scheme of the Act that, when once a succession has been created and the liability to duty has attached, a mere voluntary assignment of the right vested in the successor by the disposition, or any part of it, should alter the succession duty and make another, and it may be a lower, duty payable at the time when the succession falls into possession. Having arrived then at the conclusion that duty was payable at the same rate and time as if the co-heiresses had made no alienation, the only question which remains is whether the payment of legacy duty at 3 per cent. on the entire residuary estate of the testator renders the duty of 3 per cent., which would otherwise have been payable on the succession in question, no longer payable. This depends on the concluding provision of section 18. It enacts that "no person charged with the duties on legacies and shares of personal estate under the Legacy Duty Acts shall be charged also with the duty granted by this Act in respect of the same acquisition of the same property." It is clear that the co-heiresses could not have been called on to pay any further duty on the property which they assigned to the appellant. Having paid the legacy duty, no succession duty would have been payable by them at the time of Lady Wolverton's death or any other time. If I am right in the view which I have expressed that the alienation did not create a new succession, it seems to me to follow that the Crown cannot be entitled both to legacy and succession duty in respect of the acquisition of the same property, on the same death, whether by the successor or his assignee. I think any other conclusion would be unreasonable, and contrary to the manifest intention of the enactment. For the reasons I have given I think the judgment ought to be reversed and judgment entered for the defendants, with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—"The Act," it has been observed, "is a difficult Act, and the dicta are not less difficult to consider than the Act itself." So said a distinguished Judge speaking of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. I cannot help thinking that there is a good deal of truth in that saying and just a touch of warning, which the author of the observation himself might sometimes perhaps, if I may venture to say so, have kept in view without impropriety. Happily the provisions of the Act bearing upon the question now before the House do not present any very great difficulty, and even the dicta are less embarrassing than usual. His Lordship then stated the facts, and proceeded:—"The question depends simply on the effect of two sections of the Succession Duty Act, the 15th and the 18th. Section 15 enacts that 'where . . . any succession shall before the successor shall have become entitled thereto, or to the income thereof in possession have become vested by alienation or by any title not conferring a new succession in any other person then the duty payable in respect thereof shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created.' It seems to me that the case which your Lordships have before you is precisely the case contemplated in the 15th section of the Act. I do not think that the transaction in respect of which the Commissioners are now claiming succession duty could be described more accurately than in the very words of that section. The succession of the co-heiresses, that is to say, the residuary estate of the testator to which, at the date of the deed of arrangement, the co-heiresses were contingently entitled, and which was chargeable with duty on the death of the widow, became to the extent of £15,000 per annum vested by alienation in the appellant as the holder of the barony before the co-heiresses became entitled thereto in possession; and, therefore, if the 15th section had stood alone, the duty payable in respect thereof to the extent of the annuity would have had to be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if the deed of arrangement had not been executed, and no such alienation had been made. But then the provision at the end of the 15th section comes in, which enacts that no person charged with the duties on legacies and shares of personal estate under the Legacy Duty Acts, in respect of any property subject to such duties, shall be charged also with the duty granted by the Succession Duty Act in respect of the same acquisition of the same property. Now, if the alienation in question had not been made, and if the whole of the testator's residuary estate had come to the co-heiresses, they could not have been charged with succession duty on any part of their succession. The charge for succession duty would have been cleared by the payment of legacy duty. It follows, therefore, from the combined operation of the 15th and 18th sections, that no succession duty can now be claimed in respect of the annuity of £15,000 payable to the appellant as from the widow's death out of the income of the testator's residuary estate. Speaking for myself, I hardly think it necessary to say anything more. And, indeed, I should not have supposed the question open to argument if it had not been argued so strenuously on the part of the Crown. However, as the claim for duty has been made, and made with success in both the Courts below, it would scarcely be respectful to omit all reference to the judgments under review. In the Queen's Bench the ground of decision, which I believe commends itself to your Lordships, though argued, was not even noticed in the judgment of the Court. It was supposed by the Court, I do not know why, that the defence rested on two grounds, and two grounds only. One was that the annuity, which became payable after the widow's death out of the succession of the co-heiresses, was the same annuity which was payable during her lifetime out of the income of the bank shares, and that in fact there was only one annuity. The other was that the annuity payable after the widow's death was payable under a contract for valuable consideration in money, or money's worth, within the meaning of section 17. Both those grounds were plainly untenable, and both were properly rejected by the Court of Queen's Bench. In the Court of Appeal the same arguments were repeated. They met with much the same fate. And the real ground of defence fared little better there than it did in the Queen's Bench. It suffered I think from being found in bad company. All the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal say that Lord Wolverton's annuity was "a new succession," because it was not a continuation of the old annuity, but came into existence for the first time at the widow's death. That, however, was not the point. The point was that the annuity to which Lord Wolverton became entitled after the widow's death was carved out of the succession of the co-heiresses, and was merely an alienation of part of their succession. I think the appeal should be allowed with costs both here and below.

THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP GLENGYLE V. NEPTUNE SALVAGE COMPANY AND OTHERS.
THE GLENGYLE.*

Ship—Salvage—Award—Vessels specially built and equipped for salvage services—Award confirmed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 231 and [1898] P. 97) affirmed.

The question in this case was as to the amount of salvage award decreed to the respondents, which the appellants contended was largely in excess of adequate remuneration for the services rendered. The case is reported ante, p. 231; 67 L.J., P. D., and A., 48; 1898, P., 37. The facts were briefly as follows:—The Hermes is a screw steamer of 394 tons register, fitted with engines of 84-horse power nominal, working up to 750 indicated, with a pumping capacity of 2,750 tons per hour, and manned by a crew of 23 hands all told. Her value was £22,000. The Newa is a screw steamer of 459 tons register, fitted with engines of 144-horse power nominal, working up to 750 indicated, with a pumping capacity of 5,000 tons per hour, and manned by a crew of 21 hands all told. Her value was £20,000. Both the said steamships were specially built for and solely employed in rendering salvage services, and are equipped with divers and diving apparatus and powerful engines and pumps and other salving appliances. They are kept at Gibraltar with steam up day and night. The Hercules is a steam tug of 145 tons register, fitted with engines of 80-horse power nominal, and manned by a crew of ten hands all told. Her value was £5,000. The Nellie was a steam tug of 21 tons register, fitted with engines of 40-horse power nominal, and manned by a crew of six hands all told. Her value was £1,500. The Glengyle, it was admitted or proved, was a steamship of 3,455 tons gross register, and at the time of the said salvage services she was manned by a crew of 56 hands all told, and was on a voyage from London to China and Japan with passengers and cargo. The value of the Glengyle, her cargo, and freight was £76,596. Services were rendered by these vessels to the Glengyle which required great skill and promptitude and considerable risk, both to the salving vessels and their crews, and but for their assistance the Glengyle must have become a total wreck. Mr. Justice Barnes, who was assisted by Trinity Masters, awarded £19,000 to the respondents the owners of the Hermes and Newa, and £500 to the respondents the owners of the Hercules and Nellie.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. Butler Aspinall appeared for the appellants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., Mr. F. W. Raikes, Q.C., and Mr. Dawson Miller for the respondents.

LORD HERSCHELL, in moving that the appeal be dismissed with costs, said there was no contest in this case with regard to the facts, and it was admitted that the services rendered were meritorious. The Court of Appeal had come to the conclusion that the award of the learned Judge of the Admiralty Court was not so exorbitant or so manifestly excessive that it would be just to disturb it. In these circumstances it would certainly need an exceptional and extraordinary case to induce their Lordships' House to interfere with the award made by the Admiralty Judge and affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The appellants in such a case would have to prove that some elements had been overlooked which ought to be taken into account, or that exaggerated importance had been given to some considerations in the matter, or that principles had not been satisfactorily or properly applied. No case of the kind had been made out by the appellants. All that could be done with respect to claims for salvage was to proceed upon a more or less rough estimate. It might be that the amount awarded was larger than their Lordships individually would have given. But it was not so exorbitant as to justify their interference. It was clear that the vessel would have gone to the bottom but for the help rendered by the respondents. She was in fact saved at great risk to the salving steamers, and lives might have been lost if these steamers had not been ready at hand with steam up to assist ships in distress. It was impossible to exaggerate the importance at such a place as Gibraltar of having vessels always ready for such purposes. The crews were not ordinary crews, but men of exceptional skill, including divers. All these were elements which were properly taken into account in estimating the reward to be assigned.

LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD MORRIS concurred.

LORD SHAND also agreed that the appeal should be dismissed. He attached great importance to the circumstance that the captains and crews of the salving vessels possessed unusual qualifications, and had always ready special appliances for saving vessels in distress. The only profits which they made by their skill was the return for services such as were rendered to the Glengyle. The Judges in the Court of Appeal gave indications that they might not themselves have awarded so much as had been allowed by the Admiralty Judge, and he might not himself, if he had been the Judge of first instance, have granted so large a sum. But the amount was not so exorbitant as to justify their Lordships' interference.

THE SALT UNION (LIMITED) V. THE NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railway—Carriage of goods—Rates—Rebates—
Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, sec. 4—Construction—Onus of proof.

This was an appeal by the Salt Union from a judgment of the Railway and Canal Commission (Mr. Justice Wright, Sir Frederick Peel, and Viscount Cobham). The Salt Union claimed an allowance or rebate under section 4 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, from the rates charged to them by the North Staffordshire Railway Company, and they applied to the Railway and Canal Commission to determine what would be a reasonable and just allowance or rebate. Section 4 is as follows:—"Whenever merchandise is received or delivered by a railway company at any siding or branch railway not belonging to the company, and a dispute arises between the railway company and the consignor or consignee of such merchandise as to any allowance or rebate to be made from the rates charged to such consignor or consignee in respect that the railway company does not provide station accommodation or perform terminal services, the Railway and Canal Commissioners shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such dispute, and to determine what, if any, is a reasonable and just allowance or rebate." The applicants delivered their goods to the railway company at their own siding, and the goods were there placed upon the company's trucks by the 'applicants' servants, so that the company did not provide the applicants with any station accommodation or perform any terminal services for them. Mr. Justice Wright, in delivering the judgment of the Commissioners, held that the applicants had not given sufficient evidence to show that they came within the terms of the section.

Mr. C. A. CRIPPS, Q.C. (Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., and Mr. R. Whitehead with him), appeared for the Salt Union in support of the appeal, and contended that the learned Judge had practically nonsuited them, although they had clearly brought themselves within the section. The applicants had to show that the company carried their goods and charged them rates, but did not provide station accommodation or perform terminal services. It was not necessary for them to go further, and show that the charges which were made included charges for station accommodation and terminal services. The applicants had made out a prima facie case, and the railway company ought to have been called upon to answer it.

Mr. Littler, Q.C., and Mr. Ernest Moon appeared for the railway company.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, what was contemplated by section 4 of the Railway and

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Canal Traffic Act, 1894, was this—an application by a trader to the Commissioners asking them to allow him a rebate from rates charged to him by a railway company by reason of his being overcharged for station accommodation which had never been provided and terminal services which had never been rendered, in consequence of his not requiring such accommodation or services, inasmuch as he delivered his goods to the company at his own private siding. The applicants sought to construe this section as meaning that, though the trader did not show that he had been charged one penny for station accommodation or terminal services, yet he was entitled to carry in his case and prove the fact that no station accommodation had been provided and no terminal services had been rendered, and on proof of that only he was entitled to call on the railway company to prove that he had not been charged anything for station accommodation or terminal services. The contention was that the company was bound to prove a negative where no affirmative allegation had been made by the applicants. He could not agree with that argument. In his judgment it was necessary for the applicants to give some presumptive proof that they had been wrongfully overcharged. He was prepared to decide the case against the applicants on the question of the true construction of the section. He quite agreed with what was said by Mr. Justice Collins in the case of "Corporation of Birmingham v. Midland Railway Company" (9 Railway and Canal Traffic Cases, 165)—viz., that the onus was on the applicants to prove every part of their case.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY said that the applicants, in his opinion, were bound to make out a prima-facie case somehow; they must raise a presumption that they had been overcharged. In this case they failed to give any evidence that they had been charged for accommodation not provided or for services not rendered. He quite agreed with what had been said by Mr. Justice Collins in the case which had been cited.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed in thinking that the appeal should be dismissed. He could not, however, take the same view of the section in question as had been taken by Mr. Justice Wright, though, inasmuch as that view was shared by his brother Collins and had now been approved by Lord Justice A. L. Smith, he felt great diffidence in differing. He thought that, looking at the facts of the case and the documents which had been produced, it was clear that the rates which had been charged by the company did not include any charges for station accommodation or terminal services, and the judgment appealed against ought to be affirmed on that ground. But he was not prepared to say that in his judgment it was necessary under this section for the applicant to prove more than that his merchandise had been delivered to the railway company at a siding not belonging to the railway company, and that a dispute had arisen as to what was a reasonable and just allowance or rebate. There seemed to him to be nothing which threw on the applicants the duty of showing more than that the amount of the charge made seemed to be unreasonable as a total charge.

insurance policies—Moneys becoming payable under policies.

Decision of Bigham, J. (ante, p. 94), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham at the trial of the action without a jury (reported ante, p. 94). The action was brought for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled, as against the defendant bank, which carried on business at Amsterdam, to £3 2s. 6d. of each £10 payable by the underwriters in respect of each donkey lost under policies of insurance on donkeys shipped by the steamships Maori and Mount Sirion, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from receiving the insurance moneys under the policies. Two persons named Vorster and Maltzam had entered into a contract with the Transvaal Government to supply 4,000 draught donkeys at the price of £12 per head delivered at Pretoria. In order to obtain donkeys Vorster and Maltzam entered into negotiations with the plaintiffs, who carried on business in London and Antwerp, and the plaintiffs agreed to supply the donkeys, part at £10 and part at £10 10s. a head, delivered at Durban. This arrangement was made by the plaintiffs on condition (as appeared by a letter of May 29, 1897, from the plaintiffs to the defendant bank) that Vorster and Maltzam should obtain an advance from the defendant bank. Accordingly on May 29, 1897, an agreement was entered into by Koehorst, the representative of Vorster and Maltzam, and the bank, which recited the agreements with the Transvaal Government and with the plaintiffs; and provided that the bank should lend to Vorster and Maltzam £25,000 upon certain conditions—namely, that, after the donkeys had been shipped, the bills of lading were to be handed over to the bank, together with the policies of insurance and the contract with the Transvaal Government; that against delivery and upon the security of these documents the bank should lend the sum of £6 5s. per animal shipped, this sum to be paid by the bank to the plaintiffs. If the whole of the 4,000 animals were shipped the £6 5s. per donkey would amount to £25,000. In addition to the £25,000, a commission of 10 per cent., making together £6 17s. 6d. per donkey, or £27,500 in all, was payable to the bank. The policies were effected by the plaintiffs on the 4,000 donkeys, valued at £10 each. The donkeys were purchased and shipped in Ireland, and on the voyage a loss of 1,208 out of the 4,000 donkeys occurred within the meaning of the policies. The plaintiffs claimed that, out of the £12,080 payable under the policies, they were entitled to £3 2s. 6d. per donkey, amounting to £3,775, and contended that the bank's interest in the policies only amounted to £6 17s. 6d. per donkey shipped, being the sum advanced per donkey and commission. The plaintiffs alleged that the donkeys were insured at £10 a head in order to cover the amount of their interest, and that the policies must be looked upon as two sets of policies, one set insuring the plaintiffs' interest for £3 2s. 6d. per donkey, and the other set insuring the bank's interest for £6 17s. 6d. per donkey. The bank contended that they held all the documents, including the policies, as a security for the repayment of their advance of £25,000 and commission, and that they were entitled to retain the £3,775 in order to secure the total advance which they had made. This contention was put forward by the bank because it appeared that the Transvaal Government had rejected a large number of the donkeys. The question as to the terms upon which the policies had been delivered to and received by the defendant bank turned upon the construction of the agreement and a voluminous correspondence between the parties. Mr. Justice Bigham held that the bank's contention was correct, and gave judgment for them.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. Leck appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Mr. R. M. Bray, Q.C., appeared for the defendants.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment in the course of which he said that the question was whether the defendant bank were entitled to collect and retain the insurance moneys payable by the underwriters until the sum of £25,000 advanced by the bank had been repaid together with a commission of £2,500. What was the meaning of a person making an advance against bills of lading and policies of insurance upon a shipment of goods? There could be no doubt that, apart from special circumstances, such an advance would be made upon the terms that the person making the advance was to hold as security, until his advance was repaid, the bills of lading and the policies in order that he might be secure as to placing himself in funds to satisfy his advance. It was said that the defendants were only entitled to hold the policies effected upon the donkeys to the amount of £6 5s. per donkey plus a commission of 12s. 6d. per donkey, and that therefore the £40,000 worth of policies effected by the plaintiffs were only endorsed to the defendants as security for £6 5s. per donkey plus the commission. There was this answer to that contention—if the policies taken out and endorsed by the plaintiffs to the defendants were only to cover £6 5s. per donkey, as far as the defendants were concerned, why did they cover the commission of £2,500 payable to them? And, again, as the defendants had an insurable interest in what the donkeys would fetch on their safe arrival at Durban, if not at Pretoria, how could it be said that the policies were not effected by the plaintiffs to cover the interest which the defendants had at risk? His Lordship could find neither in the business of the matter nor in the arrangement of May 29, 1897, any ground for saying that when the plaintiffs undertook to and did cover by insurance the 4,000 donkeys, or as many as might be shipped, at £10 per head, they only insured for and on behalf of the defendants up to the amount of £6 5s. per donkey plus 12s. 6d. commission, and that the £2 2s. 6d. was effected in their own behalf. He could find no such limitation in the agreement and letter of May 29, 1897, and in his opinion the plaintiffs' contention was wholly untenable, because they endorsed the policies for £40,000 to the defendants as additional security to that of the bills of lading by way of securing to them their advance and commission. But it was argued that there was that in the letters subsequent to the tripartite arrangement of May 29, 1897, which showed that the above was not the true view of the arrangement. Assuming that the letters were admissible in evidence by reason of the plaintiffs not having signed the agreement of May 29, 1897, in his opinion, if the whole correspondence was read, it did not bear out the plaintiffs' contention. Nor did the letters form any new contract. The letters did not show that the defendants ever said, much less agreed with the plaintiffs, that they would give up the policies without being paid the full sum of £27,500. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read a judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed in the result arrived at by the other members of the Court.

LORD REVELSTOKE V. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Bond, whether issued in United Kingdom—Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 82 (1) (b) (i.).

Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 19) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal of November 4 last affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division of May 27, 1897. The question was whether a bond for $1,000 of which the appellant was the holder, and which bound the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railway Company, a company incorporated under the laws of Kansas, United States, to pay that sum to the bearer, or, if the bond were registered, to the registered holder, was liable to stamp duty under section 82 (1) (b) and first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891, as a marketable security of a foreign company made or issued in the United Kingdom. These bonds of the company were expressed on the face of them not to be valid for any purpose unless authenticated by the certificate thereon endorsed of the trustee or trustee company under a certain mortgage or deed of trust. According to the original plan these bonds should have been countersigned by the trustee company before being sent to the persons entitled, but as the expense of insurance would have amounted to a large sum it was arranged that the vice-president of the trust company should bring to London the bonds destined for English bondholders and countersign them there. The arrangement was carried out, and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were of opinion that the bonds were liable to the statutory stamp duty applicable to marketable securities transferable by delivery of 1s. for every £10 or fraction of £10 thereby secured. This view was sustained by the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal. The case is reported below; ante, p. 19; [1898] 1 Q.B., 78; 67 L.J., Q.B., 44.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Willes Chitty were heard for the appellant.

The Solicitor-General and Mr. Danckwerts, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said,—I confess that it appears to me there is not much difficulty in determining this case. In my opinion this marketable security was both made and issued in London. It is to my mind immaterial to consider the origin of this document, or the place in which it was written, or where the process of its manufacture originally commenced. The document is a document which when completed became undoubtedly, within the meaning of the statute, a marketable security, and the marketable security, when thus completed, is for the first time delivered to a person who is entitled to receive it in London. I think that was an issue of that marketable security to that person in London. It was therefore, I think, issued in London. It was also, however, in my opinion, made in London. The earlier history of the transaction is immaterial. We are dealing now with a Taxing Act which imposes the necessity of placing a stamp upon particular instruments of the character designated and described by the statute itself. The statute has given a test of what is a marketable security, and any document which has that character and is issued in London or made in London is liable to that tax. I think this document was issued in London. Was it made in London? Its commencement was in another country, but it cannot be denied that at the time it first reached this country it did not fill the character of an instrument to which the Act has affixed the necessity of a stamp's being applied. It is admitted that when it got to London it for the first time fell into the category to which the statute applies. It required a particular signature; and be it observed that we are here not dealing with those wider questions of the contractual relations between the parties. I am wholly unable to understand why, when for the first time it assumes that character and falls into the definition which the Act of Parliament gives, and which renders it liable to stamp duty, one should do more than look into the instrument itself and see whether it has first assumed that character of a marketable security in this country. For my own part I think the case is extremely plain, and that the instrument was both made and issued in this country, and I decline to go into the earlier history of the transaction. Though I cannot agree with all the reasons given by the Judges below, I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal was substantially right and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

IN RE THE NEW ENGLISH BANK OF THE RIVER PLATE (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Scheme of arrangement—Construction—Postponement of certain payments—Interest accruing subsequent to the winding up.

In 1892, the then existing English Bank of the River Plate being in liquidation, the above company was formed to take over the business, assets, and liabilities of the old company, in accordance with a scheme of arrangement sanctioned by order of the High Court. The scheme provided that the new company should issue, for the benefit of the creditors of the old company who should come in, promissory notes for the amounts of their claims as at the commencement of the winding up, payable as to one quarter at six months' date, another quarter at 15 months', and as to the remaining half at ten years' date from March 31, 1892, the notes to bear interest at 4 per cent. per annum. It was provided that, "if upon the winding up of the company the assets and uncalled capital thereof shall be insufficient for payment of all creditors in full, then all claims for principal or interest upon promissory notes issued under the said scheme, or any renewals thereof, shall be postponed to all other claims proved in the winding up of the said company." The new company was now in course of winding up, and the assets were not sufficient to discharge in full all the liabilities of the company. A question consequently arose, on the construction of the above proviso, between the depositors in the new company and the holders of promissory notes issued under the scheme as to the extent to which the latter were postponed; whether the preferred creditors were entitled not only to be paid in full the amount of their debts with such interest as they carried down to the commencement of the winding up only, or whether they were also entitled to subsequent interest in preference to the claims of the holders of the promissory notes. The matter came before Mr. Justice Wright on summons for directions, and he decided on April 21 that the holders of promissory notes were not postponed as to interest subsequent to the date of the winding up. From this decision an appeal was lodged by a representative ordinary creditor, which was now heard.

Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. Martelli were for the appellant; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney, for a representative holder of promissory notes, were not called on; Mr. Kirby appeared for the liquidator.

The LORDS JUSTICES were unanimously of opinion that the bargain the parties entered into by the scheme of arrangement, expressed in language very similar to a well-known provision of bankruptcy law, was that the postponement of the promissory notes did not extend to interest subsequent to the commencement of the winding up; that the expression "claims proved" in the winding up had the same meaning as in the Bankruptcy Acts, and did not include interest subsequent to the commencement of a winding up.

The appeal was dismissed.

REG. V. JUDGE OF THE NORTHALLERTON COUNTY COURT.*

County Court—Jurisdiction—Proceedings in bankruptcy—Warrant of arrest—Certiorari refused.

This was the argument on a rule for a certiorari to the Northallerton County Court Judge to quash a warrant of arrest issued by the County Court Judge under section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared to show cause against the rule; Mr. Horridge and Mr. W. R. D. Adkins appeared to support it.

The question raised was whether a certiorari would go to quash an order of a County Court Judge sitting in bankruptcy. The facts and dates were these. On April 25 a petition alleging an act of bankruptcy in departing from his dwelling house to avoid an examination was presented against Frederick Herbert Skinner, solicitor at Howgrave, near Ripon; on May 9 a receiving order was made against him in the County Court of Northallerton; on May 10 one of the officers from the office of the receiving officer attended at the debtor's residence, and found that he had gone; on May 11 the debtor failed to attend the meeting of creditors; on May 17 application was made under section 24 for a warrant of arrest; on May 19 the order for the issue of a warrant was made. The warrant recited that, "Whereas by evidence taken upon oath it hath been made to appear to the satisfaction of the Court that there is probable reason to suspect and believe that the said Frederick Herbert Skinner is avoiding examination in respect of his affairs and is otherwise delaying or embarrassing the proceedings in bankruptcy against him," and directed his arrest. On May 20 the statutory meeting of creditors was held. At this the debtor did not attend. On May 23 the debtor wrote to the Official Receiver to say that he had returned. On May 31 the debtor was arrested. He was in custody three days. On June 3 an application for the release of the debtor was made and an affidavit of apology from him was put in. In it the debtor undertook to give all information required. Debtor was thereupon released. Application for the rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the warrant was subsequently made and granted. The warrant did not state that the debtor had absconded. Section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides for the grant of a warrant of arrest of a debtor if after presentation of a bankruptcy petition against a debtor it appears to the Court that there is probable reason for believing that "he is about to abscond," with a view of avoiding examination in respect of his affairs.

*Reported by D. FITZGERALD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. MUIR MACKENZIE, showing cause against the rule, referred to sections 25, 92, and 102 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. By section 100 the County Court in its bankruptcy jurisdiction was to have the powers of the High Court. A certiorari could not therefore go. He cited "Reg. v. Surrey Justices" (13 Q.B.D., 963), "Colonial Bank of Australasia v. Whelan" (5 L.R., P.C., 417), and "New Par Consols (Limited) (No. 2)" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 669). The matter was one for application to review under section 104 and not for certiorari to quash the warrant.

Mr. HORRIDGE contended that the County Court Judge had made an order quite outside his jurisdiction, as the words about the debtor absconding were not contained in the warrant. The County Court was an inferior Court, except in actions within the Bankruptcy Act. Directly it went beyond the powers there given, it ceased to be equal to a superior Court. If the order showed that the Court had exceeded its authority then it was an inferior Court and subject to certiorari. "James v. South-Western Railway (L.R. 7, Ex., 187)," "Reg. v. Justices of Surrey" (L.R. 5, Q.B.), "Ex parte Austin" (50 L.J., M.C., 8).

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT said he only knew one case in which a certiorari had gone to the Central Criminal Court.

Mr. HORRIDGE submitted that the Court could not inquire into the evidence on which the warrant issued. "Reg. v. Liston" (5 T.R., 133).

Mr. ADKINS, on the same side, said the order was not made within the powers of that Act.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the 100th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vic., c. 52), provided that a County Court should for the purposes of its bankruptcy jurisdiction, in addition to the ordinary powers of the Court, have all the powers and jurisdiction of the High Court. There was no statute passed to take away the certiorari in regard to those powers. The case of the "New Par Consols (Limited) (No. 2)" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 669) showed that a prohibition would not be granted against a County Court Judge invested with the powers of the High Court if he was acting within his jurisdiction. The contention in support of the rule was that here the County Court Judge was not acting within his bankruptcy powers and was, therefore, only an inferior Court. The fact of his so acting was to be gathered from the warrant, which disclosed no offence. The learned Judge agreed that the warrant disclosed no offence within the Act, but he declined to give any opinion as to whether a certiorari would or would not issue if there had been actually no facts on which to found jurisdiction of the County Court Judge. In this case, however, the affidavits showed that there was ample evidence of facts which would have given jurisdiction to the Court to make an order of committal. That being so, the County Court had jurisdiction to make such an order and it had all the powers of a High Court. If so, the case came back to this—Did the fact that the order was wrongly drawn up, the Court having jurisdiction to make a proper order, justify the grant of a certiorari? He thought not. The order was within the powers given in section 100. The error ought to have been set right by application to the County Court Judge or on appeal. Further, a certiorari should not go unless it would serve some useful purpose. It would not be of any service in such a case as this, when the debtor had been released.

Mr. JUSTICE DARLING concurred.

EASTMAN PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS COMPANY V. COMPTROLLER-GENERAL OF PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.*

Trade Mark—Registration—Capacity for—Invented word—"Solio"—Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883, sec. 10.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 373) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal dated April 29, 1897, affirming an order of Mr. Justice Kekewich of November 6, 1896. The decision of the Court of Appeal is reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 373, and 14 Patent Cases, 487, and the only question—one of great commercial importance and likely, from the principles laid down in the judgments, to influence the practice of the Board of Trade which had been used by the appellants since March, 1892—was whether the word "Solio" was a trade mark capable of registration. The Courts below held that the word ought not to be registered, inasmuch as it suggested the Latin word "sol," and was therefore descriptive and had reference to the processes of photography. From the evidence it appeared that the word originally chosen was "Soho," as the company had formerly done business in Soho-square. It happened, however, to be printed so as to look like "Solio," and Mr. George Eastman said he chose the latter word in preference as being purely arbitrary. The arguments were heard on June 24 and 28, and their Lordships on the 28th intimated their intention of reversing the decision below, but took time to consider the form in which their judgments should be expressed. The illustrations given in the course of the discussion of the choice by traders of their distinctive marks were in some cases rather amusing. Some names chosen are so incorrectly formed or barbarous as to suggest the desirability of appointing a literary adviser or committee to the Board of Trade to protect in this respect the purity of the English tongue.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. Kerly were counsel for the appellants; the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Mr. Ingle Joyce for the Comptroller-General.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be allowed, said:—This is an appeal from the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks, who has refused to the appellants to permit the word "Solio" to be registered as applicable to their photographic paper. Before dealing with the decision itself, I think it desirable, from what occurred in the course of the argument, to say something of the sources of construction to which we are entitled to appeal in order to construe a statute. Among the things which have passed into canons of construction recorded in Heydon's case we are to see what was the law before the Act was passed and what was the mischief or defect for which the law had not provided; what remedy Parliament appointed and the reason of the remedy. Now the law before the Act now in question was passed was one which had given rise to considerable litigation, and is contained in section 64 of the Act of 1883, which provided that a trade mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars:—Subsection (c) “A distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, ticket, or fancy word or words not in common use.” That was the law passed in 1883, and on February 24, 1887, a Commission was appointed to inquire into the duties, organization, and arrangement under the Trade Marks Act so far as related to trade marks and designs. It appeared by the report of the Commission that complaints had been made as to the working of the Act of 1883, and in that part of the report relevant to the present controversy it is stated that “The most difficult question which has arisen upon the enactment under consideration is to determine what may be properly regarded as ‘fancy-words.’ Words are undoubtedly a most popular form of trade mark, but some limit must obviously be put upon the words which an individual may be permitted to register and claim the exclusive use of. The expression ‘fancy word’ is certainly not a happy one, and has naturally given rise to considerable differences of opinion as to its meaning. It is manifest that no one ought to be granted the exclusive use of a word descriptive of the quality or character of any goods. Such words of description are the property of all mankind, and it would not be right to allow any individual to monopolize them and exclude others from their use. Again, geographical words which can be regarded as descriptive of the place of manufacture or sale of the goods are open to obvious objections. One manufacturer or merchant cannot properly be allowed to prevent all his competitors from attaching to their goods the name of the place of their manufacture or sale. The mischief would not be the same where the person seeking to register was the first who had manufactured or sold the goods in the place the name of which he seeks to appropriate as a trade mark. But there are objections to giving a monopoly even in that case, and to attempt to draw any such distinction would be likely to lead to difficulty and litigation. We think, therefore, that geographical names ought only to be permitted when they clearly could not be regarded as indicative of the place of manufacture or sale. We would add upon this point that we think that, where any English word would be rejected as not entitled to registration, no person ought to be permitted to register its translation into any other language. The question has been raised whether a word having the same sound as one entered on the register, though differently spelt and with a different meaning, should be registered. The question in such a case would seem to be whether the resemblance between the old mark and that applied for was such as to be calculated to deceive; if it was, it ought, of course, to be rejected.” I think no more accurate source of information as to what was the evil or defect which the Act of Parliament now under consideration was intended to remedy could be imagined than the report of that Commission. Lord Justice Turner, in “Hawkins v. Gathercole” (6 De G.M. and G., 1), after enforcing the proposition that the intention of the Legislature must be regarded, says:—“We have, therefore, to consider, not merely the words of this Act of Parliament, but the intent of the Legislature, to be collected from the cause and necessity of the Act being made, from a comparison of its several parts, and from foreign (meaning extraneous) circumstances, so far as they can justly be considered to throw light upon the subject.” After quoting a passage from Lord Black-burn’s judgment in “River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson” (2 A.C., 743), his Lordship continued. It appears to me that to construe the statute now in question it is not only legitimate, but highly convenient, to refer both to the former Act and to the ascertained evils to which the former Act had given rise, and to the later Act, which provided the remedy. These three things being compared, I cannot doubt the conclusion. Now the objection pointed out by the Commissioners was that a particular individual could not be permitted to take exclusive possession of any part of our language, and this objection appears to have been in the mind of the framers of the earlier statute when they made the phrase “fancy word” part of the definition of what might be registered as a trade mark. It was the use of that phrase and its accompanying qualification which gave rise to much litigation; and I am certainly not disposed to hold that cases decided under that Act can have any bearing upon the construction of that part of the Act now under consideration, which was obviously intended as an alteration and amendment of the former Act. The present Act provided, among other things, by section 10 that a trade mark must consist of or contain at least certain particulars, the first of which is “an invented word or invented words.” This word “Solio” is claimed to be an invented word, and it has been adjudged not to be an invented word, and apparently (though I think the association of the two things involves an incorrect construction of the statute) because it is a word which has reference to the character or quality of the goods. I think it is an invented word within the meaning of this statute. I know of no such word as “Solio” in any sense which would make it intelligible here, although it is an Italian word meaning a throne, and although it is a Latin word in the ablative case with the same meaning. Not much reliance, however, is placed upon the word having some meaning in a foreign tongue; but what is put is that it may have extracted from it some meaning in relation to the character or quality of the goods, because the letters s-o-l may be understood to mean the sun. And it is true that Shakespeare in Troilus and Cressida speaks of our planet “Sol,” and that, inasmuch as the goods in question are photographic papers and sunlight is operative in producing impressions on photographic paper, it comes within the prohibition against using words which are distinctive of the character and quality of the goods in respect of which the word is sought to be registered. My answer is that “Solio” is not “sol” and “sol” is not “Solio.” It certainly is a very strange thing that you should take three letters out of a word, and by the somewhat circuitous process that has been adopted here arrive at the conclusion that it is not an invented word, and that it does describe the character and quality of the goods. I desire to give my opinion with reference to the particular word and not to go behind it. I can quite understand suggesting other words—compound words, or foreign words, as to which it would be impossible to say that they were invented words—although perhaps never seen before, or that they did not indicate the character or quality of the goods, although as words of the English tongue they had never been seen before. Suppose a person were to attempt to register as a single English word “cheap-and-good,” or even without taking so gross an example, using a word so slightly differing from an ordinary and recognized word as to be neither an invented word nor, avoiding the prohibited choice of a word, indicating character or quality. The line must be sometimes difficult to draw, but to my mind the substance of the enactment is intelligible enough, and the Comptroller has to make up his mind whether in substance there has been an infringement of the rule. Of course, also, words which are merely misspelt, but which are nevertheless in sound ordinary English words, and the use of which may tend to deceive, ought not to be permitted. I am satisfied in this case to say that the word "Solio" is an invented word, that it does not indicate the character or quality of the goods, and that the decision of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks having refused to register "Solio" as a trade mark in respect of photographic paper, the applicants, who are the appellants at your Lordships' bar, appealed to the Board of Trade, who referred the appeal to the Court. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the application had been rightly refused, and his judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal. The ground upon which the Courts proceeded was that the word "Solio" had reference to the character or quality of the goods, and was therefore incapable of registration. The Court of Appeal held itself bound by a previous decision of the same Court in the case of "In re Farbenfabriken application" (1 Ch., [1894] 645; 63 L.J. Ch., 257) to hold that an invented word could not be registered if it had any reference to the character or quality of the goods. The question turns upon the construction of the section which by section 10 of the Act of 1888 is substituted for section 64 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act of 1883. The section to be construed provides that a trade mark "must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars." Then follow seven particulars distinguished by the letters (a) to (e). The last two of these are as follows:—"(d) An invented word or invented words; or (e) a word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods and not being a geographical name." Before considering the effect of this legislation, I think it well to refer to the fact that these two particulars of which a trade mark may consist were not to be found in the Act of 1883. On the other hand, "fancy word or words not in common use," which were amongst the essential particulars in section 64 of the Act of 1883, are not to be found in the substituted section. It had been held that they did not cover words that were descriptive, and the section had given rise to much litigation and some divergence of judicial opinion. I cannot doubt that this was the origin of the legislation by which the words appearing in the principal Act were omitted, and the provision found in the later Act substituted. In the Farbenfabriken case, Mr. Justice North said that he did not see how he could hold "Somatose" to be an invented word within subsection (d), having regard to the decisions with respect to such words as "Herbalin," "Washerine," and "Valvoline." All these decisions had reference to the provisions of section 64 of the Act of 1883 with regard to fancy words. In my opinion none of the decisions upon that part of the original section have any bearing on the new provisions to be found in the substituted section, the purpose of which was, I think, to get rid of expressions which had occasioned much embarrassment, and of all the distinctions and decisions which had been founded upon them. Those decisions, so far from affording any guide to the true interpretation of the particulars designated (d) and (e), are likely to lead to error if applied to these new provisions. Addressing myself, then, to the terms of the substituted section, I am unable to find any justification for qualifying the provision "(d) an invented word, or words," by the condition that they shall have no reference to the character or quality of the goods. By the words which introduce the section the particulars designated under the headings (a) to (e) are treated as separate and distinct. "A trade mark must consist of at least one of the following essential particulars." What warrant is there, then, for transferring words found in any one of these particulars to any other of them? With all deference to the learned Judges who have thought otherwise, I can see none. It seems to me to involve an interpretation of the language used which is not its natural grammatical construction. In the Farbenfabriken case Lord Justice A. L. Smith said:—"It is impossible, I think, to hold that the Legislature intended that an invented word might be a word having reference to the character or quality of the goods, whereas a non-invented word might not. There would be no sense in so holding." I am unable to agree with this view. There seems to me to be the broadest distinction between the two cases. Under (e) any word in the English language may serve as a trade mark, the commonest word in the language might be employed. In these circumstances it would obviously have been out of the question to permit a person by registering a trade mark in respect of a particular class of goods to obtain a monopoly of the use of a word having reference to the character or quality of those goods. The vocabulary of the English language is common property; it belongs alike to all; and no one ought to be permitted to prevent the other members of the community from using for purposes of description a word which has reference to the character or quality of goods. If, then, the use of every word in the language was to be permitted as a trade mark, it was surely essential to prevent its use as a trade mark where such use would deprive the rest of the community of the right which they possessed to employ that word for the purpose of describing the character or quality of goods. But with regard to words which are truly invented words, words newly coined, which have never therefore been used, the case is, as it seems to me, altogether different; and the reasons which required the insertion of the condition are altogether wanting. If a man has really invented a word to serve as his trade mark, what harm is done, what wrong is inflicted, if others be prevented from employing it, and its use is limited in relation to any class or classes of goods to the inventor? So far, then, from seeing no reason for a distinction between the particular designated in (d) and (e) there seems to me abundant reason for not interpolating in (d) words which the Legislature has used only in relation to (e). In a later part of the judgment to which I have already referred, Lord Justice A. L. Smith says that to constitute an invented word, within the meaning of the section, it must be a word coined for the first time. "Such a word," he says, "is of necessity incapable of having reference to the character or quality of goods, because, ex hypothesi, it is an entirely new unknown word incapable of conveying anything." With this—subject to a qualification to which I will refer in a moment—I entirely agree. An invented word has of itself no meaning until one has been attached to it. But this circumstance does not seem to me to be any ground for qualifying with a condition not applied to them the terms "an invented word or words." In considering the case of an application to register a trade mark under (d) the only question which, in my opinion, has to be determined is whether the word sought to be registered is an invented word. In one of the cases on this subject Lord Justice Kay said:—"There is extremely little invention in the matter." It may be that the word "satine," which was there in question, was objectionable on other grounds, but if the word be an "invented" one I do not think the quantum of invention is at all material. An invented word is allowed to be registered as a trade mark, not as a reward of merit, but because its registration deprives no member of the community of the rights which he possesses to use the existing vocabulary as he pleases. It may no doubt sometimes be difficult to determine whether a word is an invented word or not. I do not think the combination of two English words is an invented word, even although the combination may not have been in use before, nor do I think that a mere variation of the orthography or termination of a word would be sufficient to constitute an invented word, if to the eye or ear the same idea would be conveyed as by the word in its ordinary form. Again, I do not think that a foreign word is an invented word simply because it has not been current in our language. At the same time, I am not prepared to go so far as to say that a combination of words from foreign languages so little known in this country that it would suggest no meaning except to a few scholars might not be regarded as an invented word. It is in this respect that I desire to qualify my assent to Lord Justice A. L. Smith's proposition, that an invented word can never have a meaning. Coming now to the particular case under discussion, I cannot doubt that the word "Solio" is an invented word, unless it is to be regarded as the Italian word solio, which means a throne, in which case it has certainly no reference to the character or quality of photographic paper. If it is not to be so regarded, it has of itself no meaning. As I have said, I think it unimportant if it be an invented word, whether it has reference to the character or quality of the goods or not; but if this were the test of the validity of the word as a trade mark I must say that I think there is no such reference. I daresay that it might occur to some minds given to etymology that sol, the Latin for sun, was a component part of it when they found it connected with photographic paper, but the same minds would equally find other root bases for the word if they found it connected with boots or agricultural implements. It seems to me to have no reference to the character or quality of the goods in the sense in which those words must have been used by the Legislature. I think the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. In 1883 the Legislature for the first time allowed persons to register as trade marks words not used as trade marks before August, 1875. The privilege was conferred by adding to the words "a distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, or ticket," which were substantially taken from the Act of 1875, the words "or fancy word, or words not in common use." To be capable of registration as a new trade mark it was therefore required by the Act of 1883 that the word proposed to be registered should be a "fancy word," "distinctive," and "not in common use." Everybody knows the trouble which that enactment gave. In trying to construe it the Courts were almost driven to despair, until at last in the Court of Appeal the learned Judges declared that to be a fancy word a word must be "obviously meaningless," though one of those two learned Judges seems to have retracted or qualified his opinion before the next case was called on. For these very troublesome words in the Act of 1883 the Act of 1888 substituted the expression "an invented word or words." It made the substituted expression a separate, independent, and sufficient condition of registration. And now if a proposed trade mark consists of or contains an invented word, or invented words, it is capable of registration. But the word must be really an invented word. Nothing short of invention will do. On the other hand, nothing more seems to be required. If it is an invented word, if it is "new and freshly coined," to adapt an old and familiar quotation, it seems to me that it is no objection that it may be traced to a foreign source, or that it may contain a covert and skilful allusion to the character or quality of the goods. I do not think that it is necessary that it should be wholly meaningless. To give an illustration. Everybody will remember that in a book of striking humour and fancy which was in everybody's hands when it was first published there is a collection of strange words where there are (to use the language of the author) "two meanings packed up into one word." No one would say that those were not invented words. Still, they contain a meaning—a meaning is wrapped up in them if you can only find it out. The object of putting a restriction on words capable of being registered as trade marks was of course to prevent persons appropriating to themselves that which ought to be open to all. There is a "perpetual struggle" going on, as Lord Justice Fry has observed, "to enclose and appropriate as private property certain little strips of the great open common of the English language." "That," he added, "is a kind of trespass against which, I think, the Courts ought to set their faces." And I think the Legislature has set its face against it both in the Act of 1883 and in the Act of 1888. There is little danger of the apprehended mischief if invention is required as a condition of registration. After all, invention is not so very common. Turning to the present case, I think the word "Solio" may pass for an invented word, and not the less so because it was hit upon by a lucky accident. I should think so even if I thought that it contained in itself an obscure reference to the great source of light, and the goods were intended to be used for photographic purposes. But, speaking for myself, I must confess that without explanation from others, better scholars it may be or worse, it never would have occurred to me to connect "Solio" with the Latin word for the sun. I therefore agree in the motion proposed.

LORD MORRIS and LORD SHAND concurred.

HANNAFORD V. SYMS.*

Principal and Agent—Sub-agent—Liability—
Privilege of contract—Money had and received.

This was an action to recover £55 0s. 8d., money received by the defendant for and on behalf of the plaintiff. The plaintiff is an auctioneer and the defendant is a London solicitor. In 1894 a Mr. Robert Cuddeford, as mortgagee, obtained an order for the sale of an estate called Kelland Barton. Cuddeford was given the conduct of the sale on condition of his paying £250, which he did. Messrs. Dun and Baker were the country solicitors of Mr. Cuddeford, and they proposed the plaintiff to act as auctioneer. The sale took place in August, 1895, and in January, 1896, the purchaser paid the balance of his purchase-money into Court. The defendant acted as Dun and Baker's London agent, and took in the bill of costs to be taxed. The bill of costs included an item of £55 0s. 8d. auctioneer's fee, for which the defendant held no receipt. He accordingly wrote Messrs. Dun and Baker to procure from the plaintiff a receipt for his fees in order to get the amount allowed upon taxation. The plaintiff signed the receipt without having received the money. thinking, as he said, that it was the usual thing to do. Two sums of £183 3s. 9d. and £56 9s. 9d. were paid out for costs to the defendant, which he retained in his hands to satisfy the costs due to him from Messrs. Dun and Baker. The plaintiff not having received his fees sued the defendant, the London agent, alleging that he had received £55 0s. 8d. out of Court on his account. The defendant admitted that before he received the money out of Court he knew the plaintiff's fees had not been paid.

Mr. SCARLETT, for the plaintiff, contended under the whole circumstances of the case there was an employment of defendant by the plaintiff to receive the money for him. An action would lie at the suit of a country client against a London agent for money improperly had and received, although there was no privity of contract ("Robbins v. Heath," 11 Q.B., at p. 257). A privity of contract was created between principal and sub-agent where the exigencies of the business required it ("De Bussche v. Alt," 8 Ch.D., 286). In this case it was necessary that a London solicitor should get the plaintiff's money out of Court, and that brought the case within the authority of "De Bussche v. Alt" (supra).

Mr. CRUMP, Q.C. (Mr. J. Samuel Green with him), for the defendant, argued there must be privity of contract between the plaintiff and defendant to render the defendant liable. There was no contract between the parties in this case. The London agent had a lien upon any sum received by him for his costs against the country solicitor, and was entitled to retain the money to satisfy those costs ("Lawrence v. Fletcher," 12 Ch.D., 858).

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL, in giving judgment, said the case was not free from difficulty. The original employment of plaintiff was by Messrs. Dun and Baker, certainly not by the defendant. The defendant acted simply as agent for country solicitors. The account was delivered to Messrs. Dun and Baker, and no objection was taken, so that at that time the plaintiff had to look to them, and there was an understanding that he should be paid when the money was got out of Court. If Messrs. Dun and Baker had meant to say to plaintiff, "If you will sign the receipt the defendant will pay you," then there would have been a contract by defendant to pay the plaintiff; but if Messrs. Dun and Baker's meaning was that their agent would get the money out and would pay the plaintiff, then the contract would have been with Messrs. Dun and Baker. The letters in the case were consistent with the latter meaning. Down to that time the defendant received the money for Messrs. Dun and Baker, who would have been liable to the plaintiff. The difficulty arose by defendant knowing that the plaintiff had not been paid before he received the money. By receiving the money, which he knew ought to go to the plaintiff, did he enter into an implied contract to pay it over to the plaintiff? He had doubt about it. On the whole he thought there was no such implied contract. One had to act strictly in the matter; one reason was on account of the rights of set off. Suppose the plaintiff owed Messrs. Dun and Baker money, Messrs. Dun and Baker could have asked the defendant to pay them, and would have set that amount off against what was due from plaintiff to them. Upon the whole, he must go by privity of contract. The proper persons to have brought the action were Messrs. Dun and Baker, and the plaintiff should have brought his action against them. There were no circumstances from which to imply a contract to pay the plaintiff, and therefore the action failed, and there must be judgment for defendant with costs.

PLYMOUTH, STONEHOUSE, AND DEVONPORT TRAMWAYS COMPANY V. GENERAL TOLLS COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Tolls—Bridge—7 Geo. III., c. lxxiii.—"Coach," what is—Tramcar.

Tramcar held to be a coach within the meaning of 7 Geo. III., c. lxxiii.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal dated November 28, 1896, varying a judgment of Mr. Justice Day dated June 22, 1896. The case is reported 18 The Times Law Reports, 74. The only point involved in the appeal was whether the respondents were entitled to charge the appellants in respect of their tramcars passing over Stonehouse-bridge when drawn by three horses the toll of 6d. (as the Court of Appeal found in their favour), or whether they are only entitled to charge the lower toll of 4d. (as Mr. Justice Day held at the trial). By an Act of 7 George III., c. lxxiii., Lord Edgecumbe and Sir John Saint Aubin were authorized to build a bridge across Stonehouse Creek in the county of Devon. In pursuance of the powers conferred by the Act, a bridge known as Stonehouse-bridge was built, and all the powers and authorities created and conferred by the Act upon Lord Edgecumbe and Sir John Saint Aubin were now vested in the respondents. The question was under which of the following provisions with respect to tolls, of section 12 of the said Act, the appellants' tramcars came:— "For every coach, chariot, Berlin chaise, chair, or calash drawn by two horses the sum of 3d.; for every coach, chariot, Berlin chaise, chair, or calash drawn by more than two horses the sum of 6d.; for every waggon, wain, dray, car, cart, sledge, or other carriage drawn by two horses or oxen the sum of 3d.; for every wagon, wain, dray, car, cart, or sledge, or other carriage drawn by three or four horses or oxen, the sum of 4d." Under the Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport Tramways Act, 1870, the appellants constructed and maintained certain tramways, among them the tramway which passed over Stonehouse-bridge. The tramcars all start from Plymouth, and, passing through Stonehouse, proceed to Devonport, returning from Devonport the same day to Plymouth. On the journey from Plymouth each tramcar is drawn by two horses until it reaches a certain point, where a third horse is attached for the purpose of surmounting the steep gradient up to the bridge, and the tramcar, drawn by three horses, then enters upon and proceeds along the bridge. Until June, 1894, an arrangement subsisted for some time for payment by the appellants to the respondents of lump sums in respect of tolls, but had been determined by the respondents, and the question thus arose to which category the tramcars were to be assigned. Upon this point, at the trial before Mr. Justice Day at Exeter, it was decided that the appellants' tramcars came within the class referred to by the words "other carriage" and were not "a coach, chariot, berlin, chaise, or calash." The Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Esher, M.R., Lord Justice Lopes, and Lord Justice Rigby, held that the appellants' tramcars were "coaches" within the meaning of the statute.

The case was argued on May 20 and 23 last and their Lordships reserved judgment. Mr. Bousfield, Q.C., and Mr. E. U. Bullen were for the appellants; Mr. Carson,

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.C., and Mr. Alderson Foote, Q.C., for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said,—In this case we have to consider the language of a list of tolls which was enacted in the beginning of the reign of Geo. III., and to ascertain, if we can, how far a modern tramcar comes within the description or descriptions which that list of tolls enacted as applicable to the vehicles known at that period of our history. One or two propositions are beyond doubt, and the first is that the particular kind of vehicle now to be made liable to a tax was undoubtedly not in the contemplation of the Legislature at the time—at least that the Legislature had not before its mind that particular form of vehicle with which we are now dealing. Another proposition is that no vehicle of any kind was intended to pass toll free over the road and bridge in respect of which these tolls are to be charged. Another proposition is that for some reason or another the Legislature did undoubtedly intend that vehicles should be divided into different categories, and the conundrum your Lordships are called upon to solve is, Which category is to be selected as the one within which the modern tramcar comes? [His Lordship then read the list of tolls.] So far as the statute itself is concerned, there is nothing except that part of it which enumerated the list of tolls to throw any light upon the question your Lordships have to determine. But for some reason or another the Legislature has divided into different categories the different tolls applicable to the different forms of conveyances into which at the period of the passing of the Act vehicles were divided. The question has been argued here, and apparently justly, upon the alternatives whether the tramcar now in question is a "coach" or whether it is "other carriage." It cannot be denied that the division which the Legislature has sanctioned was even in its then form, and as applicable to the vehicles then in use, somewhat wanting in precision, and during the argument somewhat ludicrous consequences were pointed out as possibly arguable from the want of precision with which the list of tolls was contrived. But the first thing, looking at the statute itself, one has to do is to see whether there is any word in the list which would within its generality include the vehicle under debate, and I have myself come to the conclusion that the word "coach" is the only one which is so applicable as to justify the toll applied to that species of vehicle. I think that at the period when this statute was passed, and, indeed, long before it, the word "coach" was a general word applicable to various kinds of vehicles varying both in shape and capacity of carriage. So Shakespeare says:—

"Thou shin'st in every tear that I do weep;
"No drop but as a coach doth carry thee."

And also:—

"But come, I'll tell thee all my whole device
"When I am in my coach, which stays for us
"At the park gate."

And in Carey's play, Crononhotontologos, published not many years before the date in question—viz., in 1734—occurs this passage:—

"Go call a coach, and let a coach be called,
"And let the man who calleth it be the caller;
"And in his calling let him nothing call,
"But Coach! Coach! Coach! O for a coach, ye gods!"

The use of the words "coach-house," "coachman," and "coachbuilder," which, of course, are not appropriated to any particular classes of vehicle, leads to the same conclusion that "coach" is a general name which certainly would comprehend a tramcar, and, therefore, make it primarily the subject of some toll.

But the question still remains, What is the particular toll, where the Legislature has divided into different classes both the tolls and the vehicles? I cannot say that I can regard with complete confidence the conclusion at which I have arrived; but I think that, for the reasons I have given, a tramcar is a coach. I think a category which begins with "coach" and apparently excludes the heavier vehicles appropriated to the carrying of goods rather than passengers is the one in which I must include the tramcar. I think that a category which begins with "wagon" and ends with "sledge," the intermediate words being "wain," "dray," "car," "cart," does appear to suggest the carriage of goods, and not of passengers, as being the genus of vehicle to which that particular toll is applicable. In these circumstances, I think the decision of the Court below was right, and that, therefore, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD WATSON said that he had the advantage of reading his noble and learned friend Lord Herschell's judgment, with which he entirely concurred.

LORD HERSCHELL, after stating the facts, continued:—It is to be observed that the same division into classes is to be found in the section, even where the toll which may be charged is identical, as it is in the case where "two horses" only, or "two horses or oxen" only, are employed. It is evident, therefore, that some common character or quality must have been regarded as attaching in each class to the vehicles which are comprised within it, and as thus creating a distinction between the two classes. It is further to be observed that the words "other carriage," with which the definition of the second class concludes, must, according to well-settled principles, be confined to vehicles ejusdem generis with those specifically enumerated. I admit that it is not easy to say with confidence what is the characteristic which was regarded as distinguishing the two classes, but on consideration I have come to the conclusion that, whilst the one class was intended to comprise vehicles employed for the carriage of passengers, the second class had relation to a class of vehicles whose primary use, at all events, was the conveyance of goods. All the vehicles mentioned in the first class are such as were in use for the conveyance of passengers at rapid speed; on the other hand, those enumerated in the second class are all vehicles which were used for the transit of goods. This view is fortified by the consideration that the first class is throughout treated as one in which the beasts of draught will always be horses, whilst the vehicles in the second class are regarded as of a kind drawn either by horses or oxen. If the distinction which I have pointed out be that contemplated by the statute, it is clear that a tramway car cannot fall within the words "other carriage." It is not ejusdem generis with those already enumerated. It is contended that it cannot be treated as comprised in the first class, because the vehicles enumerated were all of a well-known form, and that none of the words employed can properly be applied to a tramway car. It is quite true that the word "coach," as distinguished from the other vehicles named, was apt to describe a particular form of vehicle; but, on the other hand, it is impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended to exempt from toll any new form of vehicle which might thereafter be employed, even though it possessed the characteristics shared in common by the vehicles specified in the first class, or that it intended to comprise such a vehicle within the words "other carriage" in the second class, although it did not possess the characteristic by virtue of which the vehicles named in it fell within one class, and were distinguished from the class previously enumerated. I do not think any violence is done to the language used by holding, as the Court of Appeal have done, that a tramway car is a "coach" within the meaning of the section. That word was, I think, at the time when the Act was passed not confined exclusively to the particular form of vehicle which it undoubtedly described, but was employed in a more general sense. "Chariot, berlin," &c., would, I think, have been properly described as different forms of coaches, and it seems certain that the words coach-box, coachman, and coach-house were employed in relation to all such vehicles. Although the case is not free from difficulty, I am not prepared to differ from the conclusion at which the Court of Appeal have arrived.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, LORD MORRIS, and LORD SHAND concurred, and the appeal was dismissed with costs.

THE QUEEN (ON THE PROSECUTION OF T. C. DORLING AND T. C. SWIFT) V. SHEERNESS URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Dramatic performances—Licence for—Conditions imposed by district council—Validity—Application for a mandamus dismissed.

The district council appeared to show cause against a rule nisi for a mandamus directing them to hear and determine an application for a licence for the performance of stage plays at the Victoria-hall, Sheerness. The applicants, T. C. Dorling and T. C. Swift, applied to the Sheerness Urban District Council, who were now the licensing authority for the performance of stage plays within their district, for a licence as above. Certain rules of the district council (which had been in force in the county of Kent before the urban district councils were formed) were made under section 9 of 6 and 7 Vict., c. 68, which statute gave the justices (now the district council) power to make rules for (inter alia) ensuring order and decency at the theatres licensed by them within their jurisdiction. One of the rules provided that "no spirituous liquors, wine, ale, beer, porter, cider, perry, or tobacco shall be sold or disposed of in the building." A subsequent rule provided that for every breach of the above rules the managers should pay a penalty not exceeding £5. According to the affidavit of the clerk to the urban district council, upon the application for the licence coming on before the urban district council the applicants applied for a licence free of all restrictions as to the sale of intoxicating liquors, and called evidence in support thereof. Certain objectors were then heard, and it was pointed out that there was a fully-licensed house directly opposite and that there were two large clubs not far off, and that there was no necessity for the sale of intoxicating liquors in the hall. The affidavit went on to state that it was not true that the council refused to consider whether or not a licence should be granted without the imposition of any condition respecting the sale of intoxicating liquors, and that the council heard all parties and all the evidence which was tendered, the only point in dispute being whether the application should be granted free from all restriction as to the sale of intoxicating liquors or subject to the restriction. The council refused to grant the licence except upon the condition that the applicants undertook not to apply for an Excise licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The applicants thereupon applied for a rule nisi for a mandamus to the district council directing them to hear and determine the application for a licence, contending that the district council had acted upon the general rule above set out, and that this rule was ultra vires on the ground that such a rule could not be "for ensuring order and decency" at the theatre within section 9 of 6 and 7 Vict., c. 68, and also on the ground that the district council were by that rule assuming the functions of the Excise authorities, and that the district council, feeling themselves bound by the general rule, had not exercised their discretion in the matter, and had not heard and determined the application according to law. He also contended that the case of "Reg. v. County Council of West Riding of Yorkshire" (1896, 2 Q.B., 386) was wrongly decided. The Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Phillimore) refused to grant a rule nisi. The Court of Appeal having granted a rule nisi, the district council appeared to show cause against it.

Mr. Herbert Smith appeared for the district council; Mr. R. G. Glenn appeared for the applicants in support of the rule.

The Court discharged the rule.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that upon the facts appearing on the affidavits, and especially on the affidavit of the clerk to the district council, it was clear that the district council did not consider themselves bound by any hard-and-fast rule. They heard the evidence on both sides, and, according to the affidavit of the clerk to the council, they did not refuse to consider whether the licence should be granted without the condition respecting the sale of intoxicating liquors, the only point in dispute being whether the application should be granted free from all restrictions. The district council did not consider their discretion fettered by any hard-and-fast rule. No doubt they attached great weight to the rule, but they considered all the circumstances and came to the conclusion that they would not grant the licence unless the applicants undertook not to apply for an Excise licence. As regards the case of "Reg. v. County Council of West Riding of Yorkshire," he was inclined to think that that decision was right, but it was not necessary to express any opinion upon it. Whether that decision was right or not, the district council here had heard and determined the application for a licence, and this rule must be discharged.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred.

THE GUARDIANS OF PLYMOUTH V. THE GUARDIANS OF AXMINSTER UNION.*

Poor Law—Settlement—Child—Birth settlement—Divided Parishes Act, 1876, sec. 35—Construction.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 185) affirmed.

Judgment was given in this appeal, which was from an order of the Court of Appeal, reported 13 The Times L.R., 185. The arguments were heard on June 16 and 17 last, when their Lordships reserved judgment. The facts are given in the judgment of Lord Herschell.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Corrie Grant were for the appellants; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. H. E. Duke for the respondents.

LORD HERSCHELL, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said:—This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division affirming an order of the Recorder of Plymouth on a case stated by him. The question in dispute is whether Matilda Small, or Manley, a pauper lunatic, was settled in the appellants' union. She was born at Plymouth, in that union, and had never gained a settlement of her own. Her mother, Eliza Manley, a single woman, who also had gained no settlement of her own, was born within the respondents' union. It appeared at the hearing before the Recorder that Eliza Manley was the legitimate daughter of Henry and Matilda Manley, and that Henry Manley was born of English parents, and that he had lived with his father from boyhood at Bridport. The learned Recorder states that he held, "if I could rightly do so, and if it is material," that Henry Manley had a settlement, though he did not make the necessary inquiries to ascertain what that settlement was, and that his daughter Eliza derived that settlement from him. And he adjudged and ordered that the pauper was settled in the appellants' union, that being the place where she was born, as he was of opinion that it could not be ascertained what settlement the pauper derived from Eliza Manley, her mother, without inquiring into Eliza Manley's derivative settlement. The question in controversy turns upon the construction of the 35th section of the 39 and 40 Vict., c. 61. That section, after enacting that no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of 16, which child shall take the settlement of its father or widowed mother up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken till it shall acquire another; and, further, that an illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until it acquires another settlement, provides as follows:—"If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or, being a female, shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born." It is contended for the appellants that the provision I have just quoted is inapplicable to the present case, and that the pauper is not to be deemed settled in the parish in which she was born, but in the place of the birth settlement of her mother. It was conceded that the birth settlement of the mother was only her prima facie settlement, or, as it was put, that it would be displaced if she had a higher settlement such as one derived from her father; but it was argued that until it was shown what the settlement of the father was, and therefore what the settlement she derived from him was, the enactment did not apply. I concur with the Courts below in thinking that this argument is not well founded; in my opinion it would defeat the very object which the enactment had in view. This plainly was to prevent the expense which was often incurred by parishes and unions through prolonged and elaborate inquiries into derivative settlements. It was thought that it would, on the whole, prove more beneficial to Poor Law authorities to lay down the artificial rule that where an inquiry into a derivative settlement would otherwise be involved the place of birth of the pauper should be taken to be the place of settlement. If, in order to bring the clause into operation, it is necessary to proceed with the inquiry to the extent of ascertaining what the derivative settlement is, I cannot conceive why the place so ascertained should not have been treated as the place of settlement, and why another and wholly artificial place of settlement should have been substituted for it. I think the very purpose of the enactment was to preclude any such inquiry, and the language employed seems to me conclusive against the interpretation sought to be put upon it. The words are not without "ascertaining," but without "inquiring into" the derivative settlement of such a parent. As soon, then, as it appeared that the pauper's mother was the legitimate offspring of an English father I think the case was brought within the enactment I am considering, and the learned Recorder was right in declining to proceed with the inquiry into the settlement of the father, and in adjudging the pauper settled in the parish in which she was born. It may well be that where nothing is known of the circumstance beyond the birth settlement of the pauper's parent, this is to be adjudged the place of the child's settlement; but that is a different case from the one with which your Lordships have now to deal. Although there may be dicta in some of the authorities cited not altogether consistent with the conclusion at which I have arrived, I do not think it conflicts with any decision.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—It seems to me that the learned Recorder was right. I see no reason to alter or modify the opinion I expressed, perhaps unnecessarily, in the case of the Guardians of Reigate Union (14 A.C., 465; 59 L.J., M.C., 29). It appears to me that, where there is an independent inquiry into the settlement of a child, if you find that the settlement of the parent of the child was a derivative settlement, you are not to pursue the inquiry any further. The child is to be deemed to be settled in the place of its birth. The Act prohibits all derivative settlements except in two specified cases. It could hardly have meant that in a case not falling within either of those exceptions the expense of an inquiry into a derivative settlement has to be incurred for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion which must be set aside as soon as it is reached. What the Act, I think, means is this—you must open the door wide enough to see where the path beyond is leading to. If you find that it leads in the forbidden direction, you are to shut the door at once and apply the rule prescribed by the Act. I agree in the motion proposed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, LORD MORRIS, and LORD SHAND concurred.

HILLIAR V. DADE AND WIFE.*

Malicious Prosecution—Reasonable and probable cause—Facts in dispute—Question for jury.

This was an application by the plaintiff for a new trial of an action tried before Mr. Justice Ridley and a jury, reported in The Times of May 16. The action was brought to recover damages for malicious prosecution. The plaintiff, Alice Hilliar, who had been in the defendants' service for five years up to June, 1896, was called as a witness in November, 1897, at the trial of a divorce action brought by a Mrs. Bailey against her husband, Dr. Bailey, in which it was alleged that Dr. Bailey had committed adultery with the defendant Mrs. Dade. The plaintiff gave evidence on that occasion to the effect that in July, 1895, while the defendant Mr. Dade was spending a week away from home, Mrs. Dade went on a river excursion with 'Dr. Bailey and remained out from 8 o'clock in the morning till midnight, and that Dr. Bailey did not leave the house till about 2 o'clock. The jury at the trial of the divorce action found that Dr. Bailey had not committed adultery with Mrs. Dade, but they added a rider to the effect that Mr. and Mrs. Dade had acted indiscreetly. The plaintiff was subsequently arrested at the instance of the defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Dade, and charged with perjury at Bow-street; but after several remands on bail the charge was dismissed at the request of the prosecuting counsel. This action was then brought for malicious prosecution. On the trial of the action, the learned Judge held that the plaintiff failed to show an absence of reasonable and probable cause, and directed that judgment should be entered for the defendants. It was now contended on behalf of the plaintiff that there was plenty of evidence of an absence of reasonable and probable cause, and that the case ought to have been left to the jury.

Mr. Lewis Thomas appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Rutter for the defendants.

The Court ordered a new trial.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH, after going through the facts of the case, said that, in his opinion, where in an action for malicious prosecution there was a dispute as to facts which raised the question whether there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause, the evidence as to those facts ought to be left to the jury, not for them to say whether there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause, but for them to find the facts on which the Judge might determine whether there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause. The withdrawing from the prosecution was not in itself conclusive proof of an absence of reasonable and probable cause, but it was certainly an element which ought to have been taken into consideration. He thought that in this case either all the evidence was in the plaintiff's favour, or at least there was a dispute as to facts which ought to have been left to the jury. Mrs. Dade must have known whether what the plaintiff said in the Divorce Court was true or untrue. If she knew it to be true, there was clearly on her part an absence of reasonable and probable cause. If she knew it to be untrue, then she ought to have been called as a witness before the jury. In his opinion the learned Judge had been too quick in ruling the plaintiff out of Court, and therefore they ought to order a new trial.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

IN RE MOORE BROTHERS AND CO. (LIMITED).
Company — Winding up — Contributories — Directors.

In the winding up of a company the directors were held liable as contributories in respect of the ordinary shares, the prospectus having stated that the whole of the ordinary shares would be taken by the directors, though in fact no shares were ever allotted to them.

In the winding up of this company an interesting question was raised touching the liability of directors who authorize the issue of a prospectus and therein state that they are going to take a proportion of the shares. The company was registered under the Companies Acts about the end of September, 1893, Clauses 77 and 78 of its articles of association being as follows:—"77. Until otherwise determined by a general meeting the number of the directors shall not be less than three nor more than six. The following gentlemen shall be the first directors of the company—viz., Alfred Watson, James Moore, William Moore, Henry Blatch Wells, Milton Bartholomew, Robert Colman. 78. The qualification of every director shall be the holding of shares or stock of the company of the nominal value of £500." On October 28, 1893, the directors held what was apparently their first meeting, and it was attended by all the six directors, including Mr. Bartholomew. The minutes of that meeting contained the following statement:—"The draft prospectus was approved and settled, and the secretary was instructed to place same in the printer's hands." As printed the prospectus stated that the capital was "1,500 ordinary shares of £20 each (the whole of which will be taken by the directors), 750 £6 per cent. preference shares of £20 each, and 300 £5 per cent. debentures of £50 each." The prospectus also stated the names and addresses of the six directors, and stated (inter alia) as follows:—"The vendors, after discharging every liability up to the date of purchase, will reinvest the whole of the purchase money in the company, principally in the ordinary stock, on which they will receive no dividend until the £5 per cent. interest on the debentures and the £5 per cent. dividend on the preference shares have been paid. Seeing that—with the other directors—they take the whole of the ordinary shares, investors have the best possible assurance that every effort will be made to ensure the prosperity of the company's business." The prospectus invited application for the preference and debenture capital. After a discussion which took place some time ago before Mr. Justice Romer, three of the directors, Mr. Watson, Mr. Wells, and Mr. Colman, were retained on the list of contributories in respect of ordinary shares, and the question was now raised, on an application for a balance-order against Mr. Bartholomew, whether that gentleman, by reason of the statements in the prospectus, was liable as an ordinary shareholder. None of the four directors was ever placed on the register of members of the company, and the ordinary shares were never allotted to them.

Mr. Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., Mr. Sheldon, Mr. Whinney, Mr. T. L. Wilkinson, Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Gore Browne were counsel for the parties.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, after stating the facts of the case, delivered judgment to the following effect:—"If the question had arisen between the directors and those who applied for preference shares and debentures on the faith of the prospectus, there would be little doubt as to the liability of the directors and of the company. But the question is between Mr. Bartholomew and the company, and what I have to decide is whether there are in the prospectus representations of a contract to take ordinary shares on which he can be held liable. I am unable to follow some of the arguments of those who represent the liquidator. I do not say those arguments are not based on law or facts; I only say that I fail to understand them. I cannot see that by the statements any estoppel arises as between the directors and the company. But it is also contended that the directors became liable, on account of the statements in the prospectus, on the same principle as that on which it has been held that, although articles of association are not a contract in themselves, directors by acting on them show that they have entered into a contract on the terms of the articles. So it may be in the case of a prospectus. And when these directors on October 28 put the document forward as the prospectus of the company they must be taken to have agreed to act as directors on the terms mentioned in the prospectus, one of which was that as a matter of contract they would take all the ordinary shares. It is not necessary to say whether the directors could have made the company allot them all the ordinary shares, but probably the company could have made them take such of the shares as they called upon them to take. There is evidence on which I can find that there is such a contract as I have mentioned. Moore and De La Torre's case (L.R., 18 Eq., 661), although not exactly in point, assists me in arriving at that conclusion. It is said that Mr. Justice Romer in the case of three other directors who applied to be taken off the list of contributories came to the same conclusion, but I have been unable to find out on what grounds. I must hold that the directors, including Mr. Bartholomew, became jointly and severally liable in respect of the ordinary shares, and the order must be made against that gentleman, and he must pay the liquidator's costs. There is no doubt that Mr. Bartholomew knew for some time before its issue what was to be stated in the prospectus. His Lordship stayed execution pending an expected appeal.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,) 1898.
Chitty and Collins, L.J.J.) July 20.

IN RE DIXON—TOUSEY V. SHEFFIELD.*

Practice—Costs—Evidence on affidavit—Attendance of country solicitor on hearing of summons—Discretion.
Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 498), affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne (reported ante, p. 498). The application was made to his Lordship as the Judge of the Chancery Division, to whom Chancery proceedings commenced in the Manchester and Liverpool District Registries of the High Court of Justice are assigned. In these cases a London agent is not usually employed by the country solicitor, and the latter often comes up to town to attend proceedings in Court or Chambers which are heard by the Judge personally. A summons was taken out to review a taxation as between party and party in respect of allowances by the District Registrar for the attendance of Liverpool solicitors in London on the hearing of an originating summons, all the evidence having been by affidavit. The case was initiated by summons under the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, which was equivalent to a hostile action to remove trustees on the ground of misconduct. What his Lordship described as "unjustifiable charges (including charges of gross personal misconduct, unsupported by evidence)" were made, and his Lordship dismissed the summons with costs. On taxation of these costs the District Registrar allowed for the attendance in London of Liverpool solicitors at the hearing upon two occasions—viz., when the case was part heard and on the adjourned hearing. Mr. Justice Byrne was of opinion that the taxing officer had a discretion in the matter, and that, though as a general rule the costs of the attendance of the country solicitor would not be allowed, they might be allowed in rare and exceptional cases in the exercise of the taxing officer's discretion. The present case was a very exceptional one. The discretion of the Registrar had been exercised with care, and his Lordship was not prepared to interfere.

Mr. A'BECKETT TERRELL, for the appellant, argued that this was not the case of a country solicitor attending in London, but the solicitor was attending in the Court in which he practised, though it happened that he had to come to London to do so, and that, consequently, he could not be allowed any additional costs because he had come a long distance. The costs could not be increased because the solicitor chose to live a long distance from the Court in which he practised. But, even if the rule as to allowing a country solicitor in exceptional cases the costs of his coming to London to attend proceedings applied, that rule had never been extended to a case in which the evidence was taken by affidavit. By not employing a London agent the local solicitor obtained the benefit of the whole of the profit costs, instead of sharing them with the London agent.

Mr. PRESTON (with whom was Mr. Eve, Q.C.), for one respondent, urged that the learned Judge had exercised his discretion, and that this Court would not interfere, and also that proceedings in the Liverpool and Manchester District Registries stood in a different position from those in other district registries.

On the second point he was stopped by the COURT.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that in this particular case he was satisfied that the Court ought not to differ from Mr. Justice Byrne. Bearing in mind the nature of the case and the very serious attack made upon these trustees, though it was made only by affidavits, the country solicitor was better able than a London agent to give information which might be required, and it was not unreasonable that he should attend at the hearing. Upon the general question which had been raised by the respondent's counsel, but upon which he had not been heard, it was not necessary to express any opinion, and his Lordship would not do so.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said that Mr. Justice Byrne, after taking great care and consulting one of the London taxing masters, had come to the conclusion that the circumstances of the present case were very exceptional, and, though it was more difficult to establish that when the evidence was given by affidavit, there was no inflexible rule that the cost of the attendance of the country solicitor should not be allowed in such a case. The learned Judge had held that the present case was a very exceptional one, and on that ground this Court could not differ from his decision. On the more general question raised by the respondent's counsel the Court would express no opinion now.

their debt until they had paid up all calls in the winding up of A.

The African Gold Properties (Limited) hold shares in the Auriferous Properties (Limited), and before either company went into liquidation calls were made on the shares and the Auriferous Company became indebted to the Gold Company for money lent. The Auriferous Company in this state of things was ordered to be wound up, and the Gold Company went into voluntary liquidation. Mr. Justice Wright held, on May 4 last, that the liquidator of the Gold Company could not set off the debt against the calls (ante, p. 390; [1898] 1 Ch., 691). Before the order embodying this decision was drawn up the liquidator of the Auriferous Company sought to have inserted in the order a declaration that in the winding up of that company the Gold Company could not take any dividend upon their debt owing from the Auriferous Company until the Gold Company had paid up all calls in the winding up of the Auriferous Company on the shares in it held by the Gold Company.

Mr. Howard Wright was for the liquidator of the Auriferous Company; and Mr. George R. Northcote for the liquidator of the Gold Company.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered the following judgment:—I have already considered this case in one of its aspects, with the result that, in my judgment, the liquidator of the Gold Company could not set off, against calls made by the liquidator of the Auriferous Company, the debt owed by the latter to the former company. A further question was not discussed on the first argument, and remains to be considered. The liquidator of the Auriferous Company is paying a dividend to its creditors, and he asks for a declaration to the effect that he is entitled to hold the dividend due to the Gold Company against the liability of the latter company for calls in arrear on its shares in the Auriferous Company. Prima facie the Gold Company is entitled to take its dividend. Its claim as a creditor has been duly ascertained in the appropriate proceeding, and it is prima facie immaterial that the creditor happens to be also a debtor to the Auriferous Company. There is no contract for a set-off, nor do the articles of association of either company appear to contain any provision for it, nor do the general statutes of set-off apply. Nor, as it seems, is the doctrine of set-off in bankruptcy, which under section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, is extended to the liquidation of companies ("Mersey Steel and Iron Company v. Naylor," L.R., 9 App. Cas., 434), applicable to this case. That doctrine has been held to apply only to cross rights existing at the commencement of the winding up ("In re Milan Tramways Company," 25 Ch.D., 587); but here the call has been made in the liquidation, and until it was made there was only a contingent liability which might never become enforceable and could not be set off, unless, perhaps, after some process of valuation. But in my opinion this case is governed by the principle established in Grissell's case ([1866] L.R., 1 Ch., 523) and is within the express terms of the Lord Chancellor's judgment in that case. If the creditor contributory were allowed to take the dividend without paying the call he would be receiving payment of a part of the debt which the company owes to him without making his contribution to the fund out of which that debt, with the other debts of the company, was to be paid. "If," Lord Chelmsford says at pp. 536-537, "the amount of an unpaid call cannot be satisfied by a set-off of an equivalent portion of a debt due to the member of a company upon whom it is made, it necessarily follows, in the last place, that the amount of such call must be paid before there can be any right to receive a dividend with the other creditors. The amount of the call being paid, the member of the company stands exactly on the footing of the other creditors with respect to a dividend upon the debt due to him from the company. The dividend will be, of course, upon the whole debt, and the member of the company will from time to time, when dividends are declared, receive them in like manner when either no call has been made, or, having been made, when he has paid the amount of it." This passage is cited as authoritative by Fry, J., in "In re West of England Bank" (12 Ch. D., 823). There must be an order as asked by the liquidator.

ARNOLD AND ANOTHER V. STRATTON.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Music-hall engagement—"Re-engagement," what is—Question for jury.

This was an application by the plaintiffs for judgment or for a new trial of an action tried before Mr. Justice Kennedy and a common jury, reported in The Times of June 10. The action was brought to recover commission on certain music-hall engagements. On October 31, 1892, the defendant, Eugene Stratton, entered into an agreement of agency with Messrs. Diddcott and Co., a firm of theatrical agents, whereby he agreed to pay them a commission of 10 per cent. on all engagements obtained by him through them, and the same on all his re-engagements with the same halls. Diddcott and Co. carried through contracts for the defendant's appearance at three music-halls—viz., the London Pavilion, the Tivoli, and the Oxford, during a period of ten weeks in the first half of the year 1893, and another period of ten weeks in the second half of the year; and a similar arrangement was made with regard to the year 1894 and the year 1895. On November 19, 1894, while those contracts were existing, the defendant, without an agent, entered into agreements to appear at the same three music-halls during 1896. The plaintiffs, who had been appointed receivers of the estate of Diddcott and Co., contended that these were re-engagements, and claimed commission. A verdict and judgment were entered for the defendant.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiffs in support of the application; Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the defendant.

THE COURT, without calling upon counsel for the defendant, dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the case turned on the construction of the contract of October 31, 1892, the dispute being as to the meaning of the word "re-engagements" in that contract. He agreed that the construction of the contract was for the Judge. But the question here was whether another contract—viz., that of November 19, 1894, came within the terms of the former contract. That was a question which was rightly left to the jury. By the earlier contract the defendant agreed to accept engagements through the firm of Diddcott and Co. at three music-halls for certain periods during 1893 and the two following years, at a certain salary and on certain conditions, and he agreed to pay 10 per cent. commission on those engagements and on all his re-engagements at those establishments. On November 19, 1894, the defendant, without the instrumentality of Diddcott and Co., entered into contracts to appear at the same music-halls in 1896. But in these contracts the salary was different, and there were differences in the other terms. The plaintiffs claimed that these were re-engagements. In his opinion it was impossible to say as a matter of law that they were re-engagements as distinguished from fresh engagements. Where there were differences in the terms of engagement, the Judge could not lay it down that the case in question was a re-engagement; but it was right to leave the matter to the jury. Neither did he think that the learned Judge had misdirected the jury in this case. It was, he thought, impossible to give an exact definition of "re-engagement." In his opinion the proper thing to do was that which the learned Judge had done here—viz., to give the jury instances of what would be a re-engagement and of what would be a fresh engagement, and ask them under which category they thought the present case came. The learned Judge pointed out to the jury the differences in the agreements, and they came to the conclusion that this was a fresh engagement, and not a re-engagement. He thought that they could not interfere with the verdict.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY was of the same opinion. He thought that the word "re-engagement" was a word which had no definite legal meaning, and that it could only be explained by illustrations.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS also agreed that the application should be dismissed, though he would not have come to the same conclusion as the jury arrived at in the present case, and he doubted whether the learned Judge had sufficiently directed the jury by the illustrations which he gave them. It was, however, a question of degree, and not of law.

IN RE J. BATT AND CO.*

Trade Mark—Registration—Validity.

A man may not properly register a trade mark for goods in which he does not deal or intend to deal.

This appeal raised a question of considerable importance under the Patents and Trade Marks Acts—viz., as to the right of a dealer in goods of various descriptions to register a trade mark for goods in which he does not deal and has no definite intention of dealing. The appeal was brought by Mr. Kottgen, trading as J. Batt and Co., in the name of the firm, from an order of Mr. Justice Romer expunging two trade marks from the register (see The Times of April 23). One trade mark, No. 27,850, was registered in July, 1882, in the name of J. Batt and Co., for several classes of goods, including class 42. The other trade mark, No. 72,790, was registered in August, 1888, in the same name, for class 42 alone. Both trade marks consisted of a butterfly with open wings. Class 42 was as follows:—"Substances used as food or as ingredients in food." Messrs. James Carter and Co., the well-known seed merchants, applied to register a butterfly with closed wings for oats, which were comprised in class 42. The Comptroller refused the application on the ground that there were already on the register the butterflies of J. Batt and Co. for class 42. Thereupon Messrs. Carter and Co. applied to expunge these marks.

The main ground for expunging them was that J. Batt and Co. never dealt in goods in class 42, and were not justified in registering any trade mark for goods in that class, and the learned Judge, in ordering the marks to be removed, proceeded upon that ground.

Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian were for the appellant; Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. Austen-Cartmell were for Messrs. Carter and Co.; and Mr. Ingle Joyce appeared for the Comptroller.

The appeal was heard on July 13.

The MASTER of the ROLLS delivered the judgment of the Court dismissing the appeal. After stating the facts as above and observing that the appeal was based on two grounds—(1) that the evidence did not warrant the conclusion of fact arrived at by the learned Judge, and (2) that, assuming the fact to be as he stated, such fact was not sufficient to entitle the Court to remove the marks from the register—his Lordship discussed the evidence as to the fact of user and agreed with the finding of the learned Judge. He then proceeded as follows:—"This brings us to the question of law. We will assume that Mr. Kottgen, when he obtained registration of his marks, was a general exporter and dealer, exporting and dealing in goods of various descriptions, but not, in fact, exporting or dealing in goods in class 42, although ready to do so if opportunity offered. We will assume, further, that he has always been and is still ready to do so, but that he has not even yet exported or dealt in any goods in that class except confectionery, biscuits, and butter, which exception we will assume in his favour. A question of law then arises which may be stated shortly as follows. Can a man properly register a trade mark for goods in which he does not deal or intend to deal? meaning by intending to deal having at the time of registration some definite and present intention to deal in certain goods, or descriptions of goods, and not a mere general intention of extending his business at some future time to anything which he may think desirable. This question we answer in the negative. To answer it otherwise will be unduly to strain the language of the Acts relating to trade marks and to render those Acts extremely mischievous instead of beneficial to trade and commerce. The Trade Mark Registration Acts presuppose some business or trade in some kind of goods made, sold, or otherwise dealt with in the way of business. Although section 75 of the Act of 1883 said that "registration of a trade mark shall be equivalent to public use of the trade mark," this language, even when in force, did not and could not mean that continued registration was equivalent to continued user. So to construe the language would lead to the irrational conclusion that a man might properly register a trade mark for any goods he chose, although he carried on no trade or business in them at all. Such a person if properly on the registry might then object to anybody else registering that mark (see section 72) without buying him off. Section 75 was addressed to the time of registration; it substituted registration for previous user and reputation gained by it. The corresponding section of the prior Act of 1875 (viz., section 2) was discussed in Edwards v. Dennis (30 Ch. Div., 454), and the contention that the language of that section meant more than we have stated was emphatically repudiated by the Court of Appeal, although it had found favour in the Court below. That decision fairly looked at really governs this case in principle. It is true that in Edwards v. Dennis the Court had to deal with the assignee of a trade mark; but the rights acquired by his assignor on registration were very carefully examined, and Vice-Chancellor Bacon, at

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

p. 465, and also Lord Justice Cotton, on p. 474, and another Lord Justice, on pp. 476, 477, all expressed clear opinions that the assignor had no right to register his trade mark for goods with which he had no concern. Lord Justice Fry went less fully into this question, but it is plain that his view was the same (see p. 479). The Act of 1883 must of course be looked at to see whether its language has rendered it necessary to come to a different conclusion on this point, and we have looked at it carefully, but we cannot find that it has. Section 75 of the Act of 1883, on which Mr. Levett based his argument, was repealed by section 17 of the Act of 1888, and that section, which is retrospective, makes "application for registration" instead of "registration" equivalent to public use. This alteration makes it still plainer than before that the public use referred to is not use since registration, but use and reputation at the time of application. Section 65 of the Act of 1883 says that "a trade mark must be registered for particular goods or classes of goods." This leaves open the question what goods or classes of goods are referred to. Does the section refer to goods or classes of goods which the applicant for a registered mark makes or deals in or intends to make or deal in in the sense above explained, or does it refer to goods or classes of goods which he does not make or deal in and which he has no definite intention of making or dealing in? Common sense and "Edwards v. Dennis" concur in confining the goods or classes of goods to those which a man makes or deals in or intends to make or deal in when he applies for registration. It remains only to consider whether section 90 of the Act of 1883 (the rectification section) is applicable to this case. We are of opinion that it is. The applicants are parties aggrieved; for the trade mark they desire to have registered is kept off the register by reason of the presence on it of the marks of J. Bat and Co. The entry of these marks is "an entry made without sufficient cause in the register." We are not disposed to put a narrow construction on this expression; nor to read it as if the word "made" were the all-important word and as if the words "made without sufficient cause" were "made without sufficient cause at the time of registration," so as to be confined to that precise time. If any entry is at any time on the register without sufficient cause however it got there, it ought in our opinion to be treated as covered by the words of the section. The continuance there can answer no legitimate purpose; its existence is purely baneful to trade, and in our opinion in the case supposed the Court has power to expunge or vary it. But, however this section is construed, the present case falls well within it. It may be said that this decision may impose undue restrictions on the acquisition of trade marks by general dealers in goods of many sorts. We do not, however, believe it will fetter legitimate trade. A man can always apply to register a mark or marks as he really wants them. But if a man procures a mark to be registered for goods in which he does not deal, either when he applies for registration or within a reasonable time afterwards, he does so at his peril (to use Lord Justice Fry's expression) and he exposes himself to the risk of having his mark expunged or varied, and of having the monopoly conferred by registration restricted to his legitimate requirements. The trade mark 72,790 is confined to goods in class 42 and the learned Judge was right in expunging that entry. The trade mark 27,850 ought to be expunged as to goods in class 42, but on the evidence before us there is no reason for expunging it from the register as regards other goods. The order ought to be cancelled in this respect. But this variation, which rectifies what is probably a slip made in drawing up the order, will not affect the appeal, which must be dismissed with costs.

MOORE V. RANSOME'S DOCK COMMITTEE.*

Negligence—Personal injuries—Bargeman—Dangerous condition of dock—Evidence of negligence—New trial ordered.

This was an application by the plaintiff for a new trial, in an action tried before Mr. Justice Wills and a special jury. The action was brought by the widow of a bargeman, under Lord Campbell's Act, to recover damages for the death of her husband, owing to the alleged negligence of the defendants. The deceased man was on the night of August 7, 1897, navigating two laden barges fastened together into Ransome's Dock, Battersea, and it was his duty to moor the barges in the dock. According to the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff the deceased man did not come home that night and next morning his son went to look for him, when he found the head of the first barge moored to the quay of the dock, but the other barge was not moored. Upon the next day after that the deceased man's body was found in the dock. There was no evidence as to how the deceased man got into the water. At the time when the barges were brought into the dock there was a space of 14ft. between the surface of the water and the top of the dock wall. There were 4ft. of water in the dock and a considerable amount of mud at the bottom. There were no facilities, such as chains or ladders, at the dock walls for persons who fell into the water, to get out again. There was also evidence that a lighterman, a coachman, and three children had been previously drowned in the dock and that complaints had been made to the defendants as to the dangerous condition of the dock. There was evidence that the deceased man could swim. At the end of the plaintiff's case Mr. Justice Wills held that there was no evidence of negligence causing the death of the deceased, and directed judgment for the defendants.

Mr. Griffith Jones appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. J. E. Bankes appeared for the defendants.

The COURT allowed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the defendants knew that there were no means, if a man fell into the water, of escape. They knew that the dock was in a dangerous condition to persons using it. There had been some persons, including a lighterman, drowned there before, and the defendants had received complaints from lightermen using the dock as to its dangerous condition. It was said that there was no case made out of negligence occasioning the death, and that "Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Company" (12 App. Cas., 41) governed the present case. That was a case of a man killed at a level crossing, and his body was found upon the line near the crossing. There was no proof in that case of negligence causing the death. In the present case there was ample evidence of knowledge on the part of the defendants of the dangerous condition of the dock, and, in his opinion, there was evidence to go to the jury of negligence causing the death of the deceased man. There must, therefore, be a new trial.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

ADAM V. BRITISH AND FOREIGN STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED)—STEWART, YSEBOOT, AND MICHELS V.
SAME.*

Alien—Lord Campbell's Act—Collision—Negligence.

Lord Campbell's Act (9 and 10 Vict., c. 93) does not apply for the benefit of aliens.

These four actions were tried before his Lordship and a common jury on the 19th inst., and a report of the trials appeared in The Times of the 20th inst. The jury found verdicts for the plaintiffs in all four cases, but his Lordship reserved judgment after argument upon the question whether the actions (which were brought under similar circumstances) would lie.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING gave judgment for the defendants in all the actions. The facts and arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment in Adam's case, which was read by Mr. Justice Darling, and was as follows:—This is an action brought by the mother of one Adam, a Belgian subject, a sailor on board a Belgian ship, the Concha. He was drowned owing to a collision between that ship and the Saint Fillans, a ship of the defendants' (English subjects). The collision took place on the high seas, outside the jurisdiction of this Court, and, it is admitted, was caused by the negligence of the defendants. The jury awarded the plaintiff £200 damages. The questions to be determined are of no ordinary difficulty, and of much more than ordinary interest and importance. On behalf of the defendants it was argued by Mr. Horridge that the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act, 9 and 10 Vict., c. 93, and 27 and 28 Vict., c. 95, do not apply for the benefit of aliens. By section 1 of Lord Campbell's Act it is enacted "That whosoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony." No point was raised as to whether the plaintiff was a person having the necessary status within section 2 of Lord Campbell's Act; and I therefore in this action, and in the others arising out of the same circumstances, proceed on the assumption that the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain the actions respectively, provided any representatives of aliens may sue in the circumstances of this case. There can, I think, be no doubt that had the deceased been an English subject this action would have lain, notwithstanding that the negligence and death both occurred upon the high seas, and therefore outside the territorial limit and jurisdiction. It is unnecessary for this proposition to do more than refer to the cases of "Mostyn v. Fabrigas" (1 Cowper, 161) and to the "British South Africa Company v. Companhia do Moçambique" (L.R., App. Cas. [1893], page 602), and to the various authorities there cited. Mr. Kemp, Q.C., on behalf of the plaintiffs, relied upon the case of the Explorer (L.R., 3 A. and E., 289) as an authority for saying that such an action as this would lie. And no doubt the judgment in that case assumes that it would do so; but this question was not argued, and the judgment there given is, upon the points there in issue, reversed by the case of "Seward v. Vera Cruz" (L.R., 10 App. Cas., 67), as is also the case of the Guldfaxe, upon which judgment in the Explorer case proceeded. This case of the Guldfaxe had already been sufficiently discredited in "Simpson v. Blues" (L.R., 7 C.P., 290). Independently of Lord Campbell's Act it was conceded that the representative of an alien killed by the negligence of a British subject on the high seas cannot maintain an action in this Court. Now Lord Campbell's Act gives a new cause of action. That is decided by Lord Selborne in the case of the Vera Cruz; but it is a principle of our law that Acts of Parliament do not apply to aliens, at least if they be not even temporarily resident in this country, and unless the language of the statute expressly refers to them. In the case of the Zollverein (2 Jur., N.S., 429) Dr. Lushington says:—"In looking to an Act of Parliament, and in considering whether it applies to foreigners or not, we are always to bear in mind the power of the British Legislature; for it is never to be presumed, unless the words are so clear that there can be no possibility be a mistake, that the British Legislature exceeded that power, which, according to the law of the whole world, properly belongs to it. The power of this country is to legislate for its own subjects all over the world and as to foreigners within its jurisdiction, but no further." And Lord Esher, in "Colquhoun v. Heddon" (25 Q.B.D., 125), expresses himself as follows:—"The proper construction to be put on general words used in an English Act of Parliament is that Parliament was dealing only with such persons or things as are within the general words and also within its proper jurisdiction, and that we ought to assume that Parliament (unless it expressly declares otherwise) when it uses general words is only dealing with persons or things over which it has properly jurisdiction. It has been argued that that is so only when Parliament is regulating the person or thing which is mentioned in the general words. But it seems to me that our Parliament ought not to deal in any way, either by regulation or otherwise, directly or indirectly, with any foreign person or thing which is outside its jurisdiction, and unless it does so in express terms so clear that their meaning is beyond doubt the Courts ought always to construe general words as applying only to persons or things which will answer the description, and which are also within the jurisdiction of Parliament." Further, Lord Chief Justice Jervis, in "Jefferys v. Boosey" (4 H. of L. Cases, 946), lays down the law in these words:—"Statutes must be understood in general to apply to those only who owe obedience to the laws, and whose interests it is the duty of the Legislature to protect. Natural born subjects, and persons domiciled or resident within the kingdom, owe obedience to the laws of the kingdom and are within the benefits conferred by the Legislature, but no duty can be imposed upon aliens resident abroad, and with them the Legislature of this country has no concern either to protect their interests or to control their rights." Now, I ask, Is there anything in Lord Campbell's Act to show that it was intended to apply for the benefit of foreigners not resident in this kingdom? I do not think that there is. The intention of the Legislature is to be collected from the statute, and I see no implied, and certainly no express, intention to give to foreigners out of the jurisdiction a right of action which even British subjects had not until the passing of 9 and 10 Vict., c. 93. Moreover, that statute provides in section 2 for the division of the damages recovered amongst the various persons to be benefited in proportions to be assessed by the jury. It appears to me impossible that it was intended, there being no expression to that effect, to cast upon juries such a duty as this in regard to the distant family of a deceased, and possibly polygamous,

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Rigby, } 1898.

MAYOR, &C., OF THETFORD V. COUNTY COUNCIL OF NORFOLK.*

Local Government—County Council—Expenses of quarter sessions—Liability for—Local Government Act, 1888, sec. 84.

Sec. 84 of the Local Government Act, 1888, does not impose on a County Council the obligation to pay the expenses of quarter and petty sessions in the case of a borough having a separate Court of quarter and petty sessions and a population of less than 10,000.

"Ex parte Kent County Council" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 389) and "In re County Council of Herefordshire" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 43) over-ruled.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wills. The question was whether, in the case of a borough with a population of less than 10,000 and having separate Courts of quarter and petty sessions, the salaries of the Recorder, of the clerk of the peace, and of the clerk to the borough justices in petty sessions in such borough, and also certain other expenses connected with the quarter and petty sessions, were transferred from the borough fund to the county fund. The borough of Thetford was a borough containing a population less than 10,000, and was situate for administrative purposes within the county of Norfolk. It had a separate Court of quarter sessions presided over by a Recorder who was paid a salary of £40 per annum, and there was a clerk of the peace who was paid by fees. Before and since the Local Government Act, 1888, the salary of the Recorder and the fees (with certain exceptions) of the clerk of the peace were paid out of the borough fund. The borough had also a separate Court of petty sessions, and the clerk to the borough justices in petty sessions was paid a salary out of the borough fund. The Courts of quarter and petty sessions were held at the Guildhall, and the plaintiffs had paid the expenses incurred in connexion therewith. The plaintiffs contended that by the Act of 1888 the liability for the above expenses was transferred to the defendants, and they claimed a declaration to that effect; and they also claimed to be reimbursed the expenses so paid by them. Mr. Justice Wills, refusing to follow the decision of a Divisional Court (consisting of Mr. Justice Stephen and Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams) in "Ex parte Kent County Council and Borough of Sandwich" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 389), held that the obligation of paying the above expenses had not been transferred to the county councils except in the case of the clerk to the borough justices in petty sessions, which was transferred to the county council, but that the arrears of his salary recoverable must be limited to six months, having regard to the power of making county rates. The plaintiffs appealed, and the defendants gave cross-notice of appeal. By section 35 of the Local Government Act, 1888, in the case of the quarter sessions of a borough, not being one of certain specified boroughs, but containing a population of 10,000 or upwards, the following provisions were to apply:—Subsection 5.—"The payment of the costs of assizes and sessions shall be a general county purpose for which the parishes in the borough may be assessed to county contributions, and all costs of prosecutions mentioned in section 169 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, shall be paid out of the county fund." Section 38 applied to boroughs having a separate Court of quarter sessions and containing a population of less than 10,000, but there was no subsection similar to subsection 5 of section 35.

Mr. Crump, Q.C., and Mr. Le Riche (Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., with them) appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Mr. W. Wills appeared for the defendants.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal and allowing the cross-appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The main question to be determined in this case is whether the Corporation of the Borough of Thetford or the County Council of the County of Norfolk are liable to pay the salaries of the Recorder of Thetford and of the clerk of the peace of that borough. There is also a question raised by cross-appeal as to the payment of the salary of the clerk to the petty sessions holden in and for that borough, which I will deal with separately. There is no doubt that prior to the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, the Corporation of Thetford, which was a quarter sessions borough, was liable to pay the salaries of its Recorder and clerk of the peace, and for that purpose might have recourse to the borough fund. The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, section 140, and schedule 5, part 1, is clear as to this, and it is wholly unnecessary to go back to the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, or prior thereto, as we were invited to do by counsel. The sole point we have to determine as to the salary of the Recorder and clerk of the peace is this—Has the Local Government Act, 1888, taken off the shoulders of Thetford the obligation of paying its Recorder and clerk of the peace and transferred the obligation on to the shoulders of the County Council of the County of Norfolk? This entirely depends upon what is to be found in the Local Government Act, 1888, and, without travelling into what I conceive to be matters irrelevant to what I have to decide, I will point out as concisely as I can how the matter stands. By the Local Government Act, 1888, the boroughs of England and Wales were divided into three classes. The first class consists of boroughs which contained a population of not less than 50,000 on June 1, 1888, or were counties in themselves. These are called "county boroughs." The second class consists of quarter sessions boroughs, not being county boroughs, which contained a population of 10,000 and upwards according to the census of 1881. These I will call the larger boroughs. And the third class consists of quarter sessions boroughs which contained a population of less than 10,000 according to the census of 1881. These I will call the smaller boroughs. The borough of Thetford falls within this last class of boroughs. It is clear that the Legislature had a reason for splitting up the boroughs of England and Wales into these three classes, but why it did so is not for me to speculate upon or determine; it is sufficient to say that upon reading sections 31, 35, and 38 of the Act of 1888 it is manifest that the Legislature has done so. Now, as regards this first class of boroughs—i.e., the county boroughs—sections 31-34 of the Act are made to apply to them, and to them alone. I have not to consider the why and the wherefore the special provisions of these four sections are made applicable to this class of boroughs and not to the other two classes of boroughs, but that they are so applied is clear, and I have nothing more to say upon this matter, especially as the borough of Thetford does not fall within this class. I now come to the second class of boroughs, to which, and to which alone, section 35 with all its subsections applies. This section commences:—"In the case of a quarter sessions borough, not being a county borough, containing a population of 10,000 or upwards, the following provisions shall . . . apply." Then come special and specific provisions applicable to this class of borough, and in my opinion to this class alone. By subsection 5 of this 35th section it is enacted:—"The payment of the costs of assizes and sessions shall be a general county purpose for which the parishes in the borough"—obviously, in my opinion, meaning the larger boroughs—"may be assessed to county contributions, and all costs of prosecutions mentioned in section 169 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, shall be paid out of the county fund." So far as this subsection 5 of section 35 is inconsistent with section 169 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, it repeals it; see especially section 126 of the Local Government Act, 1888. It is said that this subsection relieves the larger boroughs from payment of their Recorders and clerks of the peace. It may or may not do so. I have not to decide the point, for I have only to deal with the Corporation of Thetford, which is not a larger but a smaller borough. I now come to what I have to decide—viz., whether, by reason of section 38 of the Act of 1888, the Corporation of Thetford is relieved from paying its Recorder and clerk of the peace, and whether this burden is cast upon the County Council of the county of Norfolk. Section 38, which has application to the smaller boroughs alone, is wholly dissimilar in its provisions from section 35 of the Act which has application to the larger boroughs alone. Why the Legislature has determined to deal differently with the three classes of boroughs, as I have before said, it is not for me to speculate upon; it has done so. This section 38 enacts that "Where a borough having a separate Court of quarter sessions contained according to the census of 1881 a population of less than 10,000"—which is the case of Thetford—" (1) there shall be transferred to the county council the powers, duties, and liabilities of the council and justices of the borough " relating to pauper lunatic asylums, to coroners, to analysts, to reformatory and industrial schools, to fish conservancy, to explosives, and also to the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878. Power is given by this section for the council of the borough to apply to the county council to declare certain roads in the borough to be main roads. By subsection 5 of section 38 it is enacted that "the area of the borough shall for the purposes of the above-mentioned Acts and all other administrative purposes of the county council be included in the county as if the borough had not a separate quarter sessions, and accordingly shall be subject to the authority of the county council and the county coroners, and may be annexed by the county council to a coroner's district of the county, and the parishes in the borough shall be liable to be assessed to all county contributions." The administrative purposes mentioned in the section have nothing to do with judicial functions of the borough. Administrative purposes are not judicial functions. It will be noticed that the salaries of recorders and clerks of the peace in section 38, which deals with the smaller boroughs, are in no way touched or dealt with; they are left to be paid as they were before the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888—i.e., by the corporations of the smaller boroughs. By subsections 7 and 8 of section 38 power is given to the council of any borough of less than 10,000 inhabitants according to the census of 1881, whether a quarter sessions borough or not, to petition her Majesty to revoke the grant of a Court of quarter sessions to the borough, and also to revoke the grant of a commission of the peace for the borough. It was argued on behalf of the borough that the Legislature must have meant to place the payment of salaries of the recorder and clerk of the peace of the smaller boroughs upon the county, because it had done so in the case of the larger boroughs (whether it has or not I do not decide), and because by subsection 5 of section 38 Thetford, a smaller borough, is made liable to be assessed to all county contributions, and therefore it should be held that, if the transfer of the burden of paying the recorder and clerk of the peace to the county council cannot be found in section 38 of the Act, which it clearly cannot be, subsection 5 of section 35 must be pressed into the service and construed as a general provision not limited to the larger boroughs, as in my opinion it unquestionably is, and made applicable to the smaller boroughs as well. It is said, if this be not done, the Act would work injustice, and therefore this subsection 5 of section 35 should be so read. With all submission to the late Mr. Justice Stephen and to my brother Vaughan Williams, who, in the case of "Ex parte Kent County Council," held that subsection 5 of section 35 was to be read as a general provision applicable to both the larger and smaller class of boroughs, I cannot agree. To hold so would, in my opinion, be doing such violence to the provisions and framework of the Act as no Court would be justified in doing, even if the suggested imputations upon the legislation be well-founded, which I am by no means convinced of. The special provisions of subsection 5 of section 35 applicable to the larger boroughs are in my judgment purposely omitted from section 38, which is applicable to the smaller boroughs. The special provisions of subsection 5 of section 38 are, as was pointed out by Sir Robert Reid, such as to tax the borough for the expenses of the county, and not the county for the expenses of the borough; and yet it is now said by the borough that the true reading of the Act is that the county should pay these expenses (salaries of Recorder and clerk of the peace) of the borough. It is, too, significant that the Legislature in this section 38 has given to the smaller boroughs an easy way out of these difficulties, if they do not desire to continue to pay their Recorder and clerk of the peace when made liable to county contributions; for they may, under subsection 7 of section 38, petition her Majesty to revoke their grant of a Court of quarter sessions and also their grant of a commission of the peace. This right is not given, it will be seen, to the larger boroughs. As to the suggestion that the borough of Thetford is unable by reason of the Act of 1888 to pay out of its borough fund the salary of its Recorder and clerk of the peace, I cannot find that it is well-founded, and do not agree with it. The construction of section 38 of the Act of 1888 appears to me to be clear, and, in my judgment, nowhere in that section nor anywhere else in the Act of 1888 can it be found that the obligation of the borough of Thetford to pay its Recorder and clerk of the peace has been taken from the borough and transferred to the County Council of Norfolk. Section 36 in no way deals with the liability of a corporation and has no bearing on this case. I agree with my brother Wills that the liability of the corporation to pay its Recorder and clerk of the peace has not been transferred by the Act of 1888 to the county council, and I am of opinion that the appeal of the Corporation of Thetford from his judgment should be dismissed. I now come to the cross-appeal of the county council as to whether the borough of Thetford or the County Council of the County of Norfolk is liable to pay the salary of the clerk of the borough justices in petty sessions holden in and for the borough of Thetford. My brother Wills has followed and agreed with the case of "In re County Council of Herefordshire" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 43), where a Divisional Court held, following the case of "County Council of Cornwall v. Town Council of Truro" (63 L.J., M.C., 60), which was a borough with a population of over 10,000, that the salary of the clerk to borough petty sessions had since the Act of 1888 to be paid by the county council, and not by the borough. The correctness of this decision is now challenged in this Court, and we have to say if it be rightly decided. The way in which it is said that the county council and not the borough is liable to pay the salary of the clerk to petty sessions of the borough is this. First of all, the Act of 1849 is referred to, which is "An Act for holding petty sessions of the peace in boroughs," not in counties. This Act, after reciting that "petty sessions of the peace are holden in and for certain divisions of the several counties of England and Wales, called petty sessional divisions, . . . and that important duties have lately been assigned to justices and their clerks attending such sessions by certain Acts of Parliament, and that it is desirable to . . . enact that the sittings of justices of the peace . . . in and for every borough . . . having a separate commission of the peace should be deemed a petty sessions of the peace within the meaning of such Acts," enacts that "every sitting and acting of justices of the peace . . . in and for any borough . . . having a separate commission of the peace within England and Wales . . . shall be deemed a petty sessions of the peace, and the district for which the same shall be holden shall be deemed a petty sessional division within the meaning of any Acts of Parliament already made or hereafter to be made, having relation to such petty sessions or to any business to be transacted thereat." It is not suggested that any Act prior to the Act of 1849 (12 and 13 Vict., c. 18) places the appointment and payment of a salaried clerk to a borough petty sessions in the county council, and it is not denied that prior to the passing of the Act of 1888 the borough appointed and paid the salaried clerk to its own petty sessions. It is, however, said that the Local Government Act of 1888 changes all this, and that section 84 is the section which effects this. Section 84, subsection 1 of the Act of 1888 runs thus:—"(1) The salaried clerk of every petty sessional division shall be from time to time appointed and removed as heretofore. (2) The county council shall pay to the salaried clerks of petty sessional divisions such salaries" as by this subsection are enacted, and the standing joint committee are substituted for quarter sessions justices and the local authority respectively. It is true that by the Act of 1849 the borough bench is made a petty sessional division—that is, so far as this is concerned, they are placed on a par with county petty sessions; but with what salaried clerks is section 84 of the Act of 1888 dealing? Now it will be seen that section 3, subsection X. of the Act of 1888, which is the transfer section to the county council, deals, amongst other things, with salaried clerks of county justices, but not with salaried clerks of borough justices. Section 84 of the Act of 1888 also in my opinion deals with the salaried clerks of county petty sessional divisions, and not with the salaried clerks of a borough petty sessional division, and for these reasons. Section 84 is part of a group of sections commencing with section 83, which group is headed "officers." Section 83 refers to county and not to borough officers; this is clear. The joint committee (appointed under section 30) mentioned in this section, as also in section 84, is composed of an equal number of county justices and county councilmen. This committee cannot interfere with the judicial functions of a larger or smaller borough. Section 84, which follows section 83, deals in my judgment with exactly the same class of salaried clerks as section 83—i.e., salaried clerks of county petty sessional divisions, and not with salaried clerks of borough petty sessional divisions. The words "Every petty sessional division" in section 84, according to the context and whole scope of the Act, mean in my opinion a county and not a borough petty sessional division. It will be seen that by section 84 (2) the appointment as well as the removal of the salaried clerk mentioned in the section is expressly left where this had been prior to the passing of the Act—that is, the appointment and removal of a county petty sessional salaried clerk is left with the county authority. If this subsection applied to a borough petty sessions salaried clerk, which, I think, it does not, then the appointment and removal of a borough petty sessional salaried clerk is left with the borough authority. Subsection 2 of section 84 also appears to throw light upon this, for by it the joint committee, composed as above-mentioned of county men, is introduced to deal with the "officers" mentioned in sections 83 and 84. What has such a committee to do with a borough officer, to whose selection, appointment, and removal they are strangers, and advisedly kept strangers, by the Act, though it is now said they are by reason of the Act to pay his salary? I do not see the object or sense of this, and, in my opinion, it is not the true construction of the Act. In my judgment section 84 of the Act of 1888 does not apply to borough petty sessions salaried clerks at all, and, therefore, does not shift the payment of such salaried clerks on to the county council. In my judgment, the Corporation of Thetford is liable to pay the salary of its own clerk to its own borough petty sessions, as it was before the passing of the Act of 1888, and this obligation is not by the Act cast upon the county of Norfolk; and the case of the County Council of Herefordshire was not rightly decided; and, consequently, this appeal by the county council must be allowed. I have heard nothing about a point apparently taken in the Court below, but not taken here, as to the salary of the clerk of the justices acting as visitors of licensed houses for lunatics in the borough of Thetford, and I therefore say nothing about it. As the county council has succeeded in this appeal and cross-appeal, first as respondents, and secondly as appellants, they must have their costs of each appeal both here and below.

CONTRACT—AGREEMENT—CONSTRUCTION—CLAIM FOR

question was whether on the true construction of an agreement made between the parties the plaintiff was entitled to certain commission after the determination of the agreement. By the agreement in question, which was dated March 1, 1892, it was agreed that the plaintiff should be appointed sole London agent for the sale of all goods that were then manufactured or that might be manufactured by the defendants. The plaintiff agreed to give the defendants the benefit of any existing connexion he might have with merchants and buyers while he held their agency and to assist in every way he could in developing their business. The defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff a commission of 2½ per cent. upon the invoice value of all goods sold by them to London houses or to his customers. The agreement was to be determinable by the mutual consent of the parties, six months' notice to be given on either side. The agreement was duly determined on September 1, 1894. Since that date the defendants had received and executed orders from houses and firms introduced by the plaintiff to them prior to that date. The said orders were not sent through the plaintiff, but were sent to the defendants by the houses or firms ordering. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to commission upon the said orders. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. Samuel Green appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Herbert Chitty for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

ADIE AND SONS V. THE INSURANCES CORPORATION (LIMITED).*

Contract—Offer and acceptance—Fire insurance—Binding contract.

The claim in this action was for £275 for a loss under a policy of fire insurance. The plaintiffs were the owners of certain business premises at Voe, Shetland, which they had insured with the Yorkshire Fire Company, and also with two other companies, each company being liable for a rateable proportion of any loss. The Yorkshire Company's policy expired in November, 1896. On February 15, 1897, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants enclosing a copy of the Yorkshire policy:—"Kindly advise us if your office will take up the Yorkshire portion." This letter was received by the defendants on February 18, on which day they answered:—"Proposal £1,972 10s. We are prepared to accept the above amount. We have sent the papers to our Glasgow branch to be dealt with there." On February 19 the Glasgow branch wrote to the plaintiffs:—"The head office have forwarded to us your favour of the 15th inst. for attention, and have intimated their acceptance of the proposal. . . . We will let you have our policy as early as possible." On February 20 the plaintiffs' premises were burnt down, and on February 24 they wrote to the defendants informing them of this, saying:—"It is, therefore, needless to draw your policy at present." This letter was not received by the defendants until March 1. Meanwhile on February 26 they had executed the policy and sent it to the plaintiffs. The policy was dated as from February 18. On receipt of the policy the plaintiffs sent a cheque for the first year's premium. The defendants refused to accept it, and demanded the return of the policy. The defence raised in this action was that at the date of the fire there was no binding contract to issue a policy of insurance, and that on February 24 the plaintiffs had withdrawn their proposal.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Lacy Smith appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. Arthur Powell for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, said that in his opinion the defendants ought to pay this claim and were bound in law to do so. The plaintiffs' letter of February 15 was a proposal to the defendants to effect the insurance which had previously been effected with the Yorkshire Company, and on the same terms. It was clear that the defendants read that letter in the sense of a proposal. There having been a proposal, the only thing necessary to make a binding contract was that the proposal should be accepted, and on February 18 the defendants wrote their letter of that date, which was an acceptance. The position then was that the plaintiffs were bound to pay the premium and the defendants were bound to issue a policy in the ordinary form employed in their office, and it was immaterial that the parties had not discussed and expressly agreed to every individual term of the policy. The fire occurred on February 20, and under those circumstances the defendants were clearly liable. It was suggested that the plaintiffs' letter of February 24 somehow affected the matter. That letter seemed to have been written under the mistaken notion that there was no contract binding on the defendants, but when it was ascertained that there was a binding contract the legal position of the parties could not be affected by any subsequent letters. There would be judgment for the plaintiffs.

BEAUCHAMP V. FABER.*

Contract—Policy of insurance—Construction—
"To pay the same . . . as may be settled by the Sun Insurance Company on their policy."

In this case the plaintiff sought to recover a loss under a policy of fire insurance effected with the defendant and others, underwriters at Lloyd's, by which the profits and goodwill of a grocery and provision business carried on by the plaintiff in partnership with his brother were insured for one year for £8,000. The stock-in-trade of the business had been insured with the Sun Insurance Company for £12,600. The Lloyd's policy contained the following clause:—"In the event of fire to pay the same percentage on this policy as may be settled by the Sun on their policy." A fire occurred at the plaintiff's premises, and a claim for £12,000 was made against the Sun Company, which was referred to arbitration. The arbitrator made an award in which he found that the value of the stock on the premises at the time of the fire was £4,656, but that the claim was so grossly exaggerated as to be fraudulent, and, as the Sun policy contained a clause that if a fraudulent claim was put forward all benefits under the policy should be forfeited, the arbitrator awarded that nothing was due under the Sun policy.

Mr. J. A. HAMILTON, for the plaintiff, contended that in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover under the Lloyd's policy it was not necessary that anything should have been paid under the Sun policy. The parties to the Lloyd's policy intended to avail themselves of the machinery of the Sun company to ascertain the amount of the loss, and that had been done in this case, but the conditions in the Sun policy, which prevented the claim from being sustained against the Sun company, did not apply to the Lloyd's policy. Secondly, he contended that if there had, in fact, been no settlement by the Sun company the defendant was nevertheless still liable on his policy, and the amount of the loss could be proved by evidence.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Wood Hill appeared for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that he had no doubt as to what was meant by the policy subscribed by the defendant. The meaning was that when the Sun company had accepted liability for a loss and had agreed the amount and nothing more to be done beyond paying the money, then the defendant and the other underwriters would pay the same percentage of the sum insured by them as the sum agreed to by the Sun company bore to the entire sum insured by the company. In this case there never had been any settlement by the Sun company, because of the fraudulent claim which had been made. The plaintiff, therefore, was not entitled to recover under the defendant's policy, because it was a condition precedent that there should be a settlement with the Sun company, and that condition precedent had never been performed. There would be judgment for the defendant.

SLEY V. TILLOTSON AND SON.

Practice—Costs—Libel—Newspaper—Payment into Court and apology under 6 and 7 Vict., c. 96.

The Judge refused to deprive the plaintiff of his costs in an action of libel where he recovered less than a sum paid into Court with an apology under 6 and 7 Vict., c. 96, the apology being admittedly insufficient.

At Manchester, before Mr. Justice Bruce and a jury, the action "Sley v. Tillotson and Son" was heard. It was an action to recover damages for a libel, and an important question of procedure was raised. Mr. Shee, Q.C., and Mr. Bradbury were for the plaintiff; and Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., Mr. Jordan, and Mr. Gibbons for the defendants. The plaintiff, William Sley, was the proprietor of a pantomime called "Aladdin," which he was exhibiting with a travelling company in various towns in Lancashire and elsewhere. On March 7 "Aladdin" was produced at the Bolton Theatre, and on the following day the defendants, who are the publishers and proprietors of the Bolton Evening News, which has a large circulation in Blackpool, where the plaintiff's company afterwards went, and other towns in Lancashire, inserted an article which described "Aladdin" as a very tame production, and said that the scenery, acting, singing, and everything connected with the alleged pantomime were of the most mediocre description and that no one would go twice to see it. In consequence of this article the plaintiff alleged that he was prevented from making the profits he would otherwise have done at Bolton and Blackpool. The defence was that the article was published without malice and without gross negligence and that an apology was afterwards inserted in the defendants' newspaper. Evidence was given for the plaintiff, and his losses at Bolton and Blackpool, said to be caused by the insertion of the article complained of, were estimated between £250 and £300.

No. 33.—VOL. XIV.

His Lordship, in directing the jury, said that in writing of a matter of public interest, such as a public performance, a critic was entitled to express his honest judgment about the merits of the piece. It would never do if critics were always to pronounce favourable opinions, and so long as their honest opinions were founded upon facts it was not a libel. But in this case there was an admission that the words exceeded fair and honest criticism; therefore the only question for them to consider was how much the plaintiff was entitled to. The jury gave a verdict for £35, and judgment was given accordingly; but Mr. Russell asked the learned Judge to deprive the plaintiff of his costs, as the defendants had paid into Court with their plea of apology the sum of £50, and the plaintiff could have taken such sum out in satisfaction of his claim. During the hearing of the case Mr. Russell admitted that the apology was insufficient, and Mr. Bradbury, for the plaintiff, now contended that he could not be deprived of his costs as he never had an opportunity of taking the £50 without accepting the apology. His Lordship took time to consider, and subsequently decided the point in favour of the plaintiff. He referred to Lord Campbell's Act, 1843 (6 and 7 Vict., c. 96), and to 8 and 9 Vict., c. 75, sec. 2, which enacted that it should not be competent to a defendant, whether in England or Ireland, to file any such plea as is allowed by the Act of 1843 without making a payment into Court by way of amends "as provided by the said Act." In 1879 an Act called the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879, repealed the last-mentioned words in the last-mentioned Act, "as provided by the said Act," and the same Act of 1879 repealed so much of the first-mentioned Act (1843) as related to the payment of money into Court. The defence allowed by the 2nd section of the 1843 Act, continued his Lordship, cannot be filed without at the same time making a payment into Court by way of amends, but there is no existing provision of the Legislature stating whether the payment into Court is to be subject to any rules or regulations. The only provisions that I know of that can be held to apply are the provisions of Order XXII. of the Rules of the Supreme Court. But although it seems that that order may perhaps be held to apply to a case where liability is admitted and payment into Court is the only defence, yet it seems to be clear on the authority of "Oxley v. Wilkes" ([1898] 2 Q.B., 56) that when money is paid into Court as part of the defence under the Libel Act, 1843, the defendants cannot avail themselves of the payment into Court as being made under Order XXII. The defendants have raised amongst other defences, and as an alternative defence, a plea founded upon the provisions of the Libel Act of 1843. Pleading in such form, the payment into Court afforded no defence in itself; it was only a necessary part of a special defence in the material parts of which the defendants have failed, for they offer no evidence of an apology. I do not think that I ought to allow the plea on which the defendants have failed to influence my decision on the question of costs. The plaintiff never had an opportunity of taking the money out of Court without confessing a plea which contained averments which were not true. The defence must, therefore, be treated as one that has altogether failed.

port duties—Custom Tariff Acts and Customs Acts—Construction—Customs Tariff Act, 1894, sec. 4—"Imported," meaning of.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada of May 1, 1897, reversing a decree of the Court of Exchequer.

Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. J. J. Gormully, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), appeared for the appellants; the Hon. E. Blake, Q.C., the Hon. C. Fitzpatrick, Q.C. (Solicitor-General for Canada), Mr. E. L. Newcombe, Q.C. (all of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. H. W. Lochnis for the respondent.

LORD DAVEY, in giving their Lordships' considered judgment, said the action was commenced by the Attorney-General of Canada in the Exchequer Court to recover a large sum for duties on raw sugar imported by the appellants into Canada by the steamship Cynthiana. The decision of the Exchequer Court was in favour of the appellants, but their judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court—Justices King and Girouard dissenting. The principal question in the case was the date of the "importation" of the sugar, and that depended on the construction and effect to be given to the Custom Tariff Acts and certain sections of the Customs Acts. The Customs Tariff Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 28) enacted as follows:—"Section 4.—Subject to the provisions of this Act and to the requirements of the Customs Act, ch. 32 of Revised Statutes as amended, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all goods enumerated or referred to as not enumerated in Schedule A to this Act the several rates of duties of Customs set forth and described in the said schedule and set opposite to each class respectively or charged thereon as not enumerated when such goods are imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein." In accordance with Schedule A raw sugar of the same description as those which formed the cargo of the Cynthiana could be imported free. But by the Tariff Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 23), Schedule A to the previous Act was amended and a duty of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per lb. was imposed upon that description of sugar. By section 4 of the Act of 1895 it was enacted that the Act should be held to have come into force on May 3, 1895. Many sections of the Customs Act, 1886 (49 Vict., c. 32), and the subsequent amending Acts were referred to in the course of the argument. The more important for the present purpose were sections 25, 31, 34, and 156, which so far as material are as follows:—"Section 25.—The master of every vessel coming from any port or place out of Canada, or coastwise, and entering any port in Canada, whether laden or in ballast, shall go without delay, when such vessel is anchored or moored, to the Customs-house for the port or place of entry where he arrives, and there make a report in writing to the collector, or other proper officer, of the arrival and voyage of such vessel, stating her name, country, and tonnage, the port of registry, the name of the master, the country of the owners, the number and names of the passengers, if any, the number of the crew, and whether the vessel is laden or in ballast, and if laden, the marks and numbers of every package and parcel of goods on board, and where the same was laden, and the particulars of any goods stowed loose, and where and to whom consigned, and where any and what goods, if any, have been laden or unladed, or bulk has been broken during the voyage, what part of the cargo and the number and names of the passengers which are intended to be landed at that port, and what and whom at any other port in Canada, and what part of the cargo, if any, is intended to be exported in the same vessel, and what surplus stores remain on board—as far as any of such particulars are or can be known to him." "Section 31.—If any goods are brought in any decked vessel from any place out of Canada to any port of entry therein, and not landed, but it is intended to convey such goods to some other port in Canada in the same vessel there to be landed, the duty shall not be paid or the entry completed at the first port, but at the port where the goods are to be landed, and to which they shall be conveyed accordingly under such regulations and with such security or precautions for compliance with the requirements of this Act, as the Governor in Council from time to time directs." "Section 34.—Every importer of goods by sea or from any place out of Canada shall within three days after the arrival of the importing vessel make due entry inwards of such goods and land the same." "Section 156 (as amended by 52 Vic., c. 14, section 12).—Whenever, on the levying of any duty or for any other purpose, it becomes necessary to determine the precise time of the importation or exportation of any goods or of the arrival or departure of any vessel, such importation, if made by sea, coastwise, or by inland navigation in any decked vessel, shall be deemed to have been completed from the time the vessel in which such goods were imported came within the limits of the port at which they ought to be reported, and if made by land or by inland navigation in any undecked vessel, then from the time such goods were brought within the limits of Canada." There was no dispute as to the facts. The Cynthiana sailed from Antwerp with a general cargo, including the sugar in question consigned to Montreal. On April 29, 1895, the vessel put into the port of North Sydney in Cape Breton, Canada. It was stated that she put into that port to coal, but there was no evidence on that point or whether she was bound to call there. On her arrival at North Sydney the master made his report inwards of his ship and cargo in compliance with section 25 of the Customs Act, and on the same day made his report outwards, and obtained the Customs certificate of clearance for Montreal. The Cynthiana reached her wharf in the port of Montreal between 5 and 6 p.m. on May 4, 1895, and it was agreed that she did not come within the limits of that port until after May 3, 1895. It should be mentioned that on May 2, 1895, and therefore before the arrival of the vessel, the appellants, who were the importers of the sugar, made entry at the Montreal Customs-house of the goods, and a landing warrant was issued for the landing thereof as duty free. It was stated that this was done in accordance with a common practice at the port of Montreal. However, on May 14 the Collector of Customs cancelled the free entry, claiming that the goods were liable to duty, and detained such portions of the sugar as then remained in the possession of the appellants. On those facts it was contended for the appellants that the importation of the sugar was complete on the arrival of the vessel at North Sydney, and as that event took place before May 3 the sugar was free from the duty imposed by the Tariff Act, 1895. It was also contended, in the alternative, that the importation took place at the latest on May 2, when the appellants made entry at Montreal and such entry was accepted by the Customs authorities. The latter point, however, was not seriously pressed by the learned counsel for the appellants, and it is clear that the Crown was not estopped by the irregular act of the Customs officer from claiming the duty if it was payable. On the other hand, it was contended that the goods were not "imported" within the meaning of the Tariff Act until they were landed, or at any rate arrived within the limits of the port of Montreal, and that, having regard to the context and other sections of the Act, the words "the port at which they ought to be reported" in section 150 of the Customs Act mean the port at which the effective report is to be made for the purpose of the importation. The real question, of course, was whether the sugar was "imported" within the meaning of section 4 of the Tariff Act, 1894, before or after May 3, because it was by that section, as amended by the Act of 1895, that the duty was imposed. By the provisions of section 4 the duties are to be "levied, collected, and paid" (which means nothing more than paid) upon the enumerated goods, "when such goods are imported into Canada" or taken out of warehouse for "consumption therein." Their Lordships made the following observation upon that language. (1.) The imposition of the duties is contained only in the direction for their payment. There are no words which render the goods liable for the duty or make the duty (as it is said) attach at any date prior to the date of payment. (2.) The words "when such goods are imported into Canada" express the time at which the duties are to be paid. If, therefore, the goods are imported into Canada when the vessel enters a port of call on her way to her ultimate destination the duties would be payable at that date, which is highly improbable and contrary to the express provisions of section 31. (3.) The duties are payable at one of two dates—either the date of importation or the date when they are taken out of warehouse. There is no real contrast between the date of arrival at a port of call, and the date when the goods are taken out of warehouse, because, if the words mean in the first case that the duty attaches when the vessel arrives at a port of call, it must equally do so whether on arrival at the port of discharge they are delivered to the importer or warehoused in bond. The true contrast was that which their Lordships had just indicated, and the words appeared to them to mean—when the goods were landed and delivered to the importer or to his order or when they were taken out of warehouse if instead of being delivered they have been placed in bond. (4.) The result was that, in the opinion of their Lordships, the words "imported into Canada" must, in order to give any rational sense to the clause, mean imported at the port of discharge, and could not be used in the sense attributed to the word "imported" by the appellants in accordance with the construction placed by them on the definition in section 150 of the Customs Act. (5.) If the goods were "imported" within the meaning of the Tariff Act on or after May 3—in other words, if the duty became payable after that date the Crown was entitled to it. But their Lordships did not find it necessary to adopt the appellants' construction of section 150. Every clause of a statute should be construed with reference to the context and the other clauses of the Act so as, so far as possible, to make a consistent enactment of the whole statute or series of statutes relating to the subject-matter. Their Lordships thought that the "report" spoken of in section 150 might well mean the report to be made by the master under section 25 completed by the entry to be made by the importer under section 34. According to that construction the port spoken of in section 150 would be the port at which the goods were to be landed mentioned in section 31. And that construction appeared to their Lordships to place a consistent, rational, and probable meaning on the whole of the sections referred to when read together. The report made by the master at the port of call or at any port which he entered for any purpose other than that of discharging his cargo was no doubt useful for the purpose of checking what might be called the effective report to be made on arrival at the port of discharge. The object of the definition in section 150 was not to define the port of importation or the meaning of "imported," but the time when the goods were to be deemed to be first imported. The words in question applied equally to importation coastwise or by inland navigation in any decked vessel. If made by land or by inland navigation in any undecked vessel, then the time was when such goods were brought within the limits of Canada. That was probably because goods conveyed by land and goods conveyed by small undecked vessels would not be discharged at a port of entry within the meaning of the Act. The distinction between goods brought in decked and undecked vessels or vessels of small size ran through the whole Act. Their Lordships would, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1898.
Chitty and Collins, L.J.J.) } July 27.

WALL V. THE LONDON AND NORTHERN ASSETS CORPORATION.*

Company—Management—Interference of the Court—Majority and minority of shareholders—Injunction refused.

Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 496), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff against a decision of Mr. Justice Stirling (reported ante, p. 496). The plaintiff, suing on behalf of himself and all other shareholders in the defendant company, except those who voted for a certain special resolution which had been passed by the shareholders, moved for an injunction to restrain the company and the directors from carrying that resolution into effect. The London and Northern Assets Corporation was incorporated in 1888, its principal object being to carry on a financial and investment business. In 1889 another company, called the London and Northern Debenture Corporation, was incorporated, its objects being practically the same as those of the Assets Company, and the two companies had for some years past been working a joint business, and the board of directors of each company was the same. The capital of the Assets Corporation consisted of 100 founders' shares and 50,204 ordinary shares, all of £2 each, of which £1 10s. per share was paid up. The issued capital of the Debenture Corporation was 99 founders' shares and 34,600 ordinary shares of £2 each, fully-paid, but in March, 1893, these had been subdivided into £1 shares. In February, 1898, as the plaintiff alleged, the annual report of the Debenture Corporation stated a deficiency of assets to the extent of £5,165, and that only £1 17s. per £2 share was represented by assets. The market value of the shares at that date was £1 5s. per £2 share. In that month a scheme and agreement for the amalgamation of the two corporations was proposed by the directors. The scheme provided for the purchase of the whole undertaking of the Assets Corporation by the Debenture Corporation in consideration of shares in the Debenture Corporation, and the agreement further provided that out of the proceeds of sale each holder of a founder's share in the Assets Corporation should receive 13 ordinary fully-paid £1 shares in the Debenture Corporation, while each ordinary shareholder in the Assets Corporation was to receive 13 ordinary fully-paid £1 shares in the Debenture Corporation and 5s. in cash or shares for every ten ordinary shares held by him in the Assets Corporation. The plaintiff, who was the holder of three founders' shares and 1,800 ordinary shares in the Assets Corporation and one founders' £2 share and four ordinary £2 shares in the Debenture Corporation, objected to the scheme on the ground (inter alia) that the Debenture Corporation were making a profit out of the Assets Corporation, because the scheme provided for paying for the assets of the Assets Corporation on a cash basis in shares in the Debenture Corporation on the basis of their nominal value, whereas the fact was that the Debenture Corporation shares were much depreciated in value. An extraordinary general meeting of the Assets Corporation was held on March 22, 1898, to consider the requisite resolutions to carry out the proposed scheme. The plaintiff complained that at this meeting, while he and other shareholders were desirous of addressing the meeting, the chairman put a resolution that the discussion should be terminated. That resolution was carried, and then a resolution approving of the scheme was also passed. A meeting to confirm that resolution was held on April 6. On that occasion, the resolution having been proposed and seconded, an amendment was proposed, but ruled out of order by the chairman. The plaintiff alleged that a shareholder then moved the adjournment of the meeting, and upon his rising to second that resolution the chairman refused to allow him to speak, but at once put to the meeting a resolution that the original resolution "be now put." That resolution was carried. The plaintiff thereupon demanded a poll upon the question that "the resolution be now put," but the chairman refused to grant a poll thereon. The special resolution was then put and carried. The plaintiff thereupon demanded a poll, which was granted by the chairman, and it resulted in 25,593 votes in favour of the resolution, and 10,866 against it. The plaintiff then commenced this action, and moved for an injunction upon the grounds—(1) that the company had no power to sell its undertaking; (2) that the proposed distribution of assets was not in accordance with the rights of the shareholders; (3) that the minority had been unfairly treated; and (4) that the proceedings at the meetings were irregular. Mr. Justice Stirling held, upon the construction of the memorandum of association, that the scheme was intra vires of the company. In his opinion the distribution of the assets contemplated by the scheme was not in accordance with the rights of the parties interested, because it altered their relative rights. But he thought that the justice of the case would be met by accepting from the defendants an undertaking not to distribute the shares to be received under the agreement otherwise than in accordance with the rights of the shareholders under the memorandum and articles of association. His Lordship held that the minority had not been in any way unfairly treated, and that there had been no irregularity in the proceedings which would justify the Court in interfering. His Lordship accordingly, upon the defendants giving the undertaking above mentioned, made no order upon the motion, except that the costs should be costs in the action. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy was for the plaintiff; Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. W. F. Hamilton were for the company; Mr. Lailey was for the directors.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that he thought Mr. Justice Stirling's decision was correct, and that part of it which related to the distribution of the shares to be received from the Debenture Corporation among the shareholders of the Assets Corporation ought not to be disturbed. The Assets Corporation had nothing in the shape of an undertaking; it was a financial company, the object of which was to speculate in the shares and securities of other companies. Their assets consisted of the shares and securities which they held. Among others they held over 3,000 shares in the Debenture Corporation. The agreement in question was for the sale of all their assets, except the shares in the Debenture Corporation, to that corporation, which could not of course buy its own shares. It appeared to his Lordship that this agreement was distinctly authorized by the memorandum of association, either as a sale of assets or an amalgamation with another company. No very precise meaning could be given to the word "amalgamate" when the power given was to amalgamate with any person, company, or firm. His Lordship was not prepared to give a very sharp definition. No doubt the word would include the formation of a third new company, but it was not confined to that. And he did not see how there could be an amalgamation without a sale. The agreement and the resolution were, therefore, not ultra vires. Another point made by Mr. Cozens-Hardy, who argued the case with his usual ability, was that the consideration for the sale was illegal. That would be a serious objection if it were sustained. There was, however, nothing illegal, so far as the purchasers were concerned. The only objection was to the distribution of the shares among the shareholders of the Assets Corporation. Each holder of a founder's share was to have ten times as much as a holder of an ordinary share. It was said that this was inconsistent with the provisions of the memorandum of association of the Assets Corporation. His Lordship did not know whether it was or not. Mr. Justice Stirling had not decided this question; it would be decided at the trial of the action. This did not taint the consideration with illegality, and the undertaking which had been given by the defendants was sufficient for the purpose. As to the alleged irregularities in the proceedings, his Lordship would deal with them very shortly. They were not such as to induce the Court to interfere. He would only refer to the "closure" of the discussion by the chairman. After several persons had been heard the meeting thought that enough had been said. It would be a bad precedent if this Court were to interfere. The principle laid down by Lord Eldon in "Const v. Harris" (T. and R., 496, 525) as to the rights of a minority, was as important now as it ever was. But it did not mean that the minority were not to yield to the majority; it only meant that the majority must not be tyrannical. There had been nothing of that kind here.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY delivered a judgment to the same effect, in the course of which he said that, if the Court were to lay down that a chairman, supported by the large majority of the meeting, could never put a stop to the speeches of the minority, they would enable a small minority to tyrannize over the majority. There might be "all night sittings." There had been nothing oppressive here. He did not mean to say that the majority must not listen to the reasonable arguments of the minority. His Lordship also thought that the chairman was quite right in refusing to allow an amendment to be put at a meeting which was called only for the purpose of confirming or rejecting the resolution passed at the previous meeting.

FETHICK AND OTHERS V. COUNTY COUNCIL OF DORSET.*

Highway—Repair—Extraordinary Traffic—Contractor—Sub-contract—Person by whose order extraordinary traffic is conducted—Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, sec. 23.

This was an appeal by the County Council of Dorset from the decision of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence) upon a case stated by justices, raising the question whether certain traffic was extraordinary traffic, and certain expenses incurred in repairing certain main roads were extraordinary expenses within section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878. The respondents were the contractors for the erection of a lunatic asylum for the Dorset County Council under a contract between themselves and the visiting committee of the Dorset County Lunatic Asylum for a sum of £52,000, and by the contract the respondents agreed to keep harmless the visiting committee from all claims in respect of damage done to (inter alia) main roads by reason of extraordinary traffic in connexion with the erection of the asylum. The respondents entered into a contract with one John Trenchard for the hauling of the materials required for the erection of the asylum along the main roads from the railway station to the site of the new building. Trenchard was to supply carts and horses as and when required by the respondents, and to provide skilled workmen, and to unload the materials from the railway trucks and to haul them to such place on the works as should be pointed out to him by the respondents, receiving from the respondents such assistance as should be necessary, and was only to use such roads to the asylum premises as should be pointed out to him. Further, Trenchard was not to employ any person whom the respondents should require him not to employ, and no cart or traction engine was to be employed which the respondents or their foreman should certify to be improper for the service. Further, Trenchard was to indemnify the respondents against all claims made in respect of any damage done to (inter alia) any main road. Trenchard performed the hauling in accordance with the contract, and damage was thereby caused to the main roads. The damage done by the excessive weights and extraordinary traffic amounted to £231 ls. 3*d.* The respondents were summoned by the appellants, the county council, who were the authority liable to repair the main roads, before justices to recover the sum of £231 ls. 3*d.*, when the justices were of opinion that the respondents, although they had entered into a contract with Trenchard, were the persons by whose orders the said excessive weights and extraordinary traffic were conducted over the before-mentioned main roads, and they ordered the respondents to pay to the appellants the sum of £231 ls. 3*d.*, but stated this case for the opinion of the Court. The Divisional Court quashed the order of the justices. The Dorset County Council appealed.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Clavell Salter appeared for the Dorset County Council; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. H. E. Duke contra.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the Divisional Court had held that Pethick was not liable to pay to the County Council of Dorset the amount of the expenses incurred in repairing damage caused by extraordinary traffic on certain main roads. Pethick entered into a contract with the local authority to build a lunatic asylum, and he had to bring the necessary materials to the site of the asylum. He accordingly entered into a contract with Trenchard, a cartage contractor, to carry goods from two railway stations to the site. It was clear that Pethick gave no order to Trenchard other than was to be found in that contract. Therefore, if that contract did not constitute an order within the meaning of section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, Pethick could not be made liable under that section. Trenchard having cut up the road and damaged it in carrying out his cartage contract, the county authority sought to make him liable under the section, but he became bankrupt. The county council now turned round and sought to make Pethick liable under the section. The section provided that the expenses of repairing damage caused by extraordinary traffic might be recovered from the person by whose order such extraordinary traffic had been conducted. There had been a great amount of litigation on that section, and there were numerous authorities, which showed a considerable conflict of opinion; but the House of Lords had put a construction upon the section, which was binding on this Court, in the case of "Kent County Council v. Lord Gerard" ([1897] A.C., 633). It was there clearly pointed out that the person who was made liable by the section was not the person by whom or at whose instance the extraordinary traffic was conducted, but the person by whose order it was conducted. Unless it was shown that the traffic was conducted by the order of the person who was sought to be made liable, such person was not brought within the purview of the Act. Now, by whose order had this extraordinary traffic been conducted? He had no doubt that it had been conducted by the order of Trenchard and that he might have been made liable. But it was argued that even if that were so Pethick had ordered it to be conducted. There was no other order than the written contract between Pethick and Trenchard, and by that contract Trenchard undertook to supply the necessary vehicles and horses, and traction engines, if requisite, to haul the building materials along which roads he liked to the site of the asylum. It was said that power was reserved to Pethick under the contract to say what carts should be used. He was not satisfied that that was the meaning of the contract; but, even if it were so, if he merely had the power to give orders as to what carts should be used, but did not give such orders, he was not within the Act. Reliance was also laid on the clause providing that no cart or engine should be used which Pethick might think improper for the service. In his opinion those words referred to the fitness of any cart or engine for the work, and did not refer to the contingency of the roads being cut up. On the ground that no order had been shown to have been given within the meaning of the section, he thought that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE HIGBY was of the same opinion. It was necessary for the county authority to show that the extraordinary traffic had been conducted by the order of Pethick. The House of Lords had laid it down that it was not sufficient to show that the traffic had been conducted at the instance of the person sought to be made liable, or for his benefit. He thought that the control which the contract gave Pethick over the work to be done by Trenchard was much less than was suggested in argument. And the question was not whether orders might have been given by Pethick, but whether they were given.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed, but he desired to base his judgment on this—that the case did not state sufficient to fix Pethick with liability. There was nothing to indicate how much of the damage was caused by excessive weight of particular parcels, or what was the nature of the extraordinary traffic in question. If it had been shown that the damage had been caused entirely by the total amount of the traffic carried, as distinguished from excessive weight of particular parcels, he should unhesitatingly say that the extraordinary traffic had been conducted by the order of Pethick. He thought that that would clearly follow from the case of "Kent County Council v. Vidler" (1895] 1 Q.B., 448). But the facts of the case did not permit him to say that the extraordinary traffic which had caused the damage consisted solely and entirely of the total amount of the traffic. On this ground he thought that Pethick could not be held to be responsible.

SYER V. ALDER.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Sale of house.

Held, reversing the decision of Channell, J. (ante, p. 180), that the contract was conditional.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Channell (reported ante, p. 180). The action was brought to recover damages for breach of an agreement that the defendant would sell to the plaintiff Nos. 1 and 2, Milton-villas, Southend, for £1,500. The contract was as follows:—"I, Andrew Alder, agree to sell, and I, John Syer, agree to buy, Nos. 1 and 2, Milton-villas, South Church-road, Southend, at the price of £1,500. Contract to be delivered within 14 days or deposit to be returned. Contract to contain the usual covenants." The plaintiff paid to the defendant a deposit of £20, which the defendant returned to him within the 14 days, saying that he had decided not to sell the houses. The plaintiff refused to accept the deposit and brought this action. The defendant contended that under the contract he had an option of declaring the bargain off within the 14 days. The learned Judge held that the contract was not conditional, but absolute, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for £100 damages.

Mr. Chester Jones appeared for the defendant; Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. P. T. Blackwell appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT allowed the appeal and entered judgment for the defendant.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, under the contract the vendor had 14 days within which to deliver the contract or to return the deposit. It seemed to him that he might do one of those two things. The vendor here chose to return the deposit. His Lordship could not think that the contract was an absolute one, but it gave the vendor the option to return the deposit within 14 days, and if he did so the contract was to be at an end.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

CARDIGAN V. CURZON-HOWE.*

Tenant for life—Compensation under Railway Clauses Act—Apportionment between tenant for life and remainderman.

In this case, a sum of money having been paid by a railway company to the trustees of settled land under section 78 of the Railway Clauses Act as compensation for not working coal mines so as to injure the railway line, the question arose as to the mode of apportioning the sum between the tenant for life and remaindermen. It appeared that the coal was comprised in a lease, under which the tenant for life was entitled to dead rent and royalties. The lessee had received separate compensation, and the evidence showed that the coal under the railway could be worked out in the remaining two years of the lease.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. Fossett Lock; Mr. Lovett, Q.C., and Mr. Dighton Pollock; and Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Stallard were counsel for the parties.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER said that the compensation money should not be treated as payable to the tenant for life as a lump sum. On the other hand, he was entitled to more than the mere interest on the money. The principle of apportionment was to treat the money as rent accruing de die in diem to the tenant for life for the unexpired residue of the lease or for a less period if the coal would have been worked out in a less period. The money would accordingly be payable as income over that period.

An agreed order was made upon this footing.

BOLTON V. LONDON EXHIBITIONS (LIMITED) AND WINNERS (LIMITED).*

Copyright—Infringement—Photograph—Reproduction on posters.

In this action Mr. Crump, Q.C., and Mr. G. W. Ricketts appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. T. E. Scrutton for the defendants.

The plaintiff is a photographic artist, and brought his action for an injunction, penalties, and damages on account of the reproduction on the posters of the Earl's-court Exhibition of a photograph of a lion called "Prince," of which he possessed the copyright. He alleged that, with the exception of the tail, the lion was reproduced line for line. "Prince" had certain peculiarities, especially up-standing hair on his forehead. The attitude in which he was photographed also was unusual, and plaintiff had to watch for three days before catching him in it. The sale of the photograph fell off greatly after the poster had been published.

For the defence the artist who drew the original sketch denied that he had used plaintiff's photograph in doing so. The details were left out, and, in order that the lithographer might supply them, the artist sent him a book published by George Newnes, and entitled, "All About Animals," belonging to his wife, and bought for the children. From this the details of the lion were filled in. The lion in the book was the plaintiff's lion, but it was shown that these photographs were partly published for the use of artists who required details of animals. On complaint being made, the portion of the poster was withdrawn.

MR. SCRUTTON contended that the posters were not copies within the meaning of 25 and 26 Vict., c. 68, section 6, as interpreted by the cases of "Dicka v. Brooks" (15 Ch. Div., 22), and "Hanfstaengl v. Newnes" ([1894] 3 Ch., 100). Moreover, as regards the London Exhibitions (Limited) they had simply ordered the poster, and told the lithographer to do his best, but not asked that this particular lion should be copied; and he contended that this could not be called "causing or procuring" a copy to be made within the meaning of the section. At any rate, the £5 paid into Court was sufficient. There was no evidence of the numbers sold before the poster appeared, and two years before the photograph had been permitted to be produced and scattered broadcast by George Newnes in a sixpenny publication. The posters were only exhibited for ten days.

Mr. CRUMP, in reply, cited "Turner v. Robinson" (10 Ir. Ch., 510).

His LORDSHIP held that there had been a reproduction of the photograph within the meaning of the Act. A work of art had been "vulgarized" unlawfully, and he awarded as penalty the sum of £50 with costs against Weiners (Limited), but judgment, without costs, for the London Exhibitions (Limited), on the ground that they did not authorize the reproduction, though they should have been more careful in the matter.

REYNOLDS V. HOLLOWAY.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant
—Employers' Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1, subs. 3, Negligence of person in superintendence—Conformity to orders.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence). The action was brought by the widow of a deceased workman under Lord Campbell's Act and the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, to recover damages for the death of her husband. The defendant was a builder, and the deceased man was a ganger, and at the time of the accident was in the defendant's employment and was acting under the orders of a working foreman named Cropley. Cropley told the deceased man to pull down a small house with his men. The house consisted of two floors, there being a passage and a room on each floor, and the partition between the passages and the rooms being a matchboard partition. The deceased man began first to take down the partition, when the joists supporting the ceiling came down with the roof and killed him. The action was founded on section 1, subsection 3, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, the allegation being that the injury was caused by the negligence of a person (Cropley) in the service of the employer, to whose orders or directions the deceased man was bound to and did conform, and the injury resulted from his having so conformed. The negligence alleged on the part of Cropley was that he ought to have examined the house before ordering the deceased man to pull it down, especially as the deceased man had no experience in pulling down houses. There was some evidence that Cropley told the deceased man to preserve the partition. The action was tried at the Greenwich County Court, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £120 damages. The Divisional Court held that there was no evidence to go to the jury and entered judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff, by leave, appealed.

Mr. Rentoul, Q.C., and Mr. F. Watt appeared for the plaintiff.

Mr. JELF, Q.C., and Mr. H. LYNN, for the defendant, contended that under section 1, subsection 3, of the Employers' Act, 1880, there must be an order to do a certain thing in a particular way, and that in obeying that order the accident happened. There was no evidence that Cropley told the deceased man to pull down the house by first pulling down the partition, and there was no evidence that the deceased man met with his death by conforming to the order which Cropley gave him. He referred to "Hooper v. Holme and King" (13 The Times L.R., 6).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that had it not been for the judgment of the Divisional Court he would have thought this a very clear case. Mr. Justice Day seemed to have approached the case from a wrong point of view, because he began his judgment by saying that in his opinion the verdict was wrong. The Court had nothing to say to the question whether the verdict was right or wrong. The only question for the Court was whether there was any evidence to support the cause of action alleged. The cause of action relied upon here was under section 1, subsection 3 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. There was evidence that Cropley was a person to whose orders or directions the deceased man was bound to conform. There was also evidence that Cropley gave the deceased man a negligent order, because evidence was given that before giving the order to pull down the house Cropley should have examined the house and seen how the joists were fixed in the walls and supported, and that Cropley had not examined the house. The plaintiff must, however, go further and show that the deceased man did conform to the negligent order, and that his death was caused by his having so conformed. The evidence was that the deceased man was only a ganger who knew nothing about pulling down houses. Therefore the order was given to the deceased man to pull down a house when the deceased man did not know how to do it. His death was, in his opinion, caused by his conforming to the order. In his opinion, though it was not necessary to go so far as this, there was some evidence that Cropley told the deceased man to save the partition, and that was the reason why the deceased man went into the house first in order to get out the partition. The verdict and judgment must therefore be restored.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred. In "Hooper v. Holme and King" there was no order at all given to the deceased man to go into the dangerous place where he was killed, and so he might have chosen a safe place for mixing the cement. It was sought in that case to show an implied order from the fact that the foreman of the gang, named Cross, was mixing cement in a dangerous place, but that inference was rejected. That case raised no question of law at all, but turned upon its own special facts, which would probably never occur again in any other case, and the same might be said of the present case.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

Stock Exchange—Purchase of shares—Participation in a "pool"—Liability.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 568) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher and Lord Justice Rigby, from whom Lord Justice A. L. Smith dissented), dated August 5, 1897 (13 The Times L.R., 568), which reversed a decision of Mr. Justice Day of May 12, 1897. The appeal involved the effect to be given to complicated transactions of what are described as "pooling" and "sub-pooling" in Klerksdorp Proproprietary shares. The appellants are stockbrokers and members of the Stock Exchange, and the respondent a merchant carrying on business in the City of London. The appellants on October 20, 1896, brought an action against Mr. Angeli to recover £12,430, of which £11,924 was for moneys which they alleged they had become liable to pay on the respondent's behalf and at his request in respect of 5,000 of these shares. The Klerksdorp Proprietary Mines had been formed before November, 1895, with a capital of £600,000 in as many shares for the purchase, acquisition, and development of certain mining and other properties in South Africa. About November, 1895, an association or partnership known as the K. Syndicate was formed for the purchase of 100,000 of the shares at £2 a share from Messrs. Symons and Moses, the original vendors to the company. These shares were to be dealt with under a pooling arrangement. The appellants had acted as brokers in the sale to the syndicate; but did not, as they said, subsequently act as brokers to the syndicate or to the pool. Out of this pool, another of 50,000, subsequently increased to 60,000, was formed. On June 13, according to the appellants' way of putting it, the respondent came to Mr. Henry Benjamin Hart, one of the appellants, to obtain for himself a participation in the pool. Mr. Hart then saw Mr. Symons and said he wanted 5,000 shares in the pool for a friend, and was referred by Mr. Symons to Messrs. Pollak and Co. Mr. Hart then made an arrangement with the latter firm to take 15,000 shares—5,000 for a friend (that was the respondent) and 10,000 for himself and other clients. On June 16 the appellants sent to the respondent a duplicate or copy of a contract note in the following form:—

"MAY AND HART, Brokers.

"For account end July, 1896.

"Subject to the rules and customs of the London Stock Exchange."

In September, 1896, the appellants were called upon by Pollak and Co. to take up the balance of the 15,000 shares and pay for them; but the respondent refused to take the remainder of the 5,000—of which 303 had been sold—and repudiated the contract. He contended that the appellants had not, as a fact, entered into any such contract on his behalf, but instead of buying 5,000 shares for him as his brokers had bought for themselves either 15,000 shares out of the 60,000 posted or a fourth share in the pooling combination. The Master of the Rolls held that all that the appellants were authorized to do was to procure a seller of the 5,000 shares to the respondent—such seller and the respondent being the contracting parties—and that they were not entitled to buy for themselves a larger number of shares and out of that number to become themselves sellers to the respondent of 5,000 shares. The appellants had, therefore, not carried out the instructions of Mr. Angeli, and were not entitled to recover. The arguments were heard on July 5, 7, and 8 last, when their Lordships reserved judgment.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., appeared for the appellants; Mr. Carson, Q.C., and Mr. G. Spencer Bower for the respondent.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the decision appealed from be reversed and that of Mr. Justice Day restored, said,—When once the facts of this case are properly understood I think there can be no doubt of the legal result. The plaintiffs were authorized by the defendant to act for him in a transaction the real nature of which seems to me to be absolutely different from the ordinary case of a buying of shares through a broker, and I think the only difficulty that has arisen in this case has been due to the fact that the speculation consisted in the buying and selling of shares. The profits to be obtained from the speculation were by the buying of shares at a low price and selling them at a higher one; or if the speculation was a losing one by the selling price of the shares falling below that at which they were bought. And it appears to have been assumed that because the transaction was one in which the buying and selling of shares formed part of what was to be done, therefore the persons engaged in it were necessarily customer and broker, and the legal relations of the parties regarded as if the whole nature of the contract between them consisted in procuring shares to be vested in the vendor through the medium of an ordinary broker transaction. It appears to me that this is an entire mistake. I have no doubt, and do not think it is susceptible of doubt, that when there is only the relation of broker and customer the broker cannot satisfy the terms of his employment by selling his own goods to the customer who is employing him as broker; and apart from the special circumstances of the case "Robinson v. Mollet" (L.R., 7 H.L., 802; 44 L.J., C.P., 362) establishes no more. The special circumstances of that case had relation, so far as the contention in it was concerned, to the peculiarities of a particular business and which was supposed to take the case out of the ordinary rule. But no one doubted, as I think no one can doubt, the ordinary rule to be what I have stated, and, if Angeli's employment of the plaintiffs was simply to purchase shares for him, I should entertain no doubt that the plaintiffs would fail. But I am of opinion that there was no such employment at all. The mere purchase of shares would not have procured for Angeli what he wanted, and indeed Angeli never contemplated getting shares at all. What he did want he has explained both in his oral evidence and in his letters. [His Lordship then quoted from the correspondence and dealt with the facts, and concluded as follows.] The truth is that, if the real nature of the transaction had been distinctly proved at the trial, I do not think any doubt could have arisen. But I think the facts were somewhat too compendiously proved before the learned Judge. It is, however, only just to say that this probably partly arose from the understanding which all were under at the trial, that the transaction was perfectly well understood, and that the controversy seemed really to resolve itself into a determination of the absolutely untenable defences which the defendant set up in his pleadings, all of which were disproved. Mr. Angeli certainly did not pretend that he did not know what a pool was nor what were the arrangements by which the syndicate was to act for the co-adventurers forming it, and if he had done so he certainly would have been as little believed in that as he was in respect of the defences that he did set up. In the result it appears to me that the plaintiffs have established their case and that they are entitled to the verdict which they obtained before Mr. Justice Day. I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, that judgment be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, and that the respondent do pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The question in this case to my mind is a question of fact and not a question of law at all. It seems that in 1895, or perhaps earlier, a company called the Klerksdorp Proprietary Mines (Limited) was formed with limited liability under the laws of the South African Republic. Ostensibly its object was to develop some mining property existing or supposed to exist somewhere within the territories of that State. Its operations in fact, so far as appears, were confined to the London Stock Exchange. The nominal capital of the company was either £500,000 or £800,000—it is not clear which—divided into shares of £1 each. The whole issue was controlled by a syndicate whose agents and plenipotentiaries in London were Messrs. Symons and Moses, diamond merchants, in Warnford-court, Throgmorton-street, acting in concert with other persons in the background. In November, 1895, Symons and Moses formed a “pool,” as it is called, of 100,000 shares placed at £2 per share. Pools, it seems, have their managers and their brokers. The managers of this pool, which may be called Pool No. 1, are stated in the evidence to have been Symons and Moses, and “Palmer and Brooks,” or more probably Palmer and Bruch, who seem to have been for some purposes London agents of the company. The brokers of Pool No. 1 were the appellants, May and Hart. It seems to have been a successful venture, at least on paper, for apparently before June, 1896, Messrs. May and Hart, in conjunction with Messrs. Hollibone, had sold, or rather contracted to sell, all the shares in Pool No. 1 at an average price of £2 9s. per share. The pool, however, remained open till November, 1896, because Messrs. May and Hart “had not got all their money in.” The shares were not payable, said Mr. Hart, until August, 1896. In the meantime, early in June, 1896, a second pool was formed to deal with 50,000 shares, part of the 100,000 shares comprised in Pool No. 1. These 50,000 shares had been bought or taken by Pollak and Co. at £2 10s. per share. Pollak and Co. were the managers of Pool No. 2, and interested in it on behalf of a number of people, clients or customers of theirs. These 50,000 shares and other shares of the company, amounting at least to 10,000 more, were then in the hands of Symons and Moses, and apparently as yet unissued. Messrs. May and Hart were not in the secret of Pool No. 2. They knew nothing about it at the time. That was the position of affairs when the first scene of the drama, which has ended in this litigation, opened in June, 1896. On Saturday, June 13, 1896, at about half-past 1 in the afternoon, Angeli, the respondent, called upon Hart at his office in Warnford-court. Angeli was an Italian gentleman who seems to have dabbled on the Stock Exchange pretty extensively through Messrs. May and Hart, and to have been not unversed in the practices and jargon of the stock market. Angeli wanted Hart to get him a participation in the pool for 50,000 shares, which he said Pollak was managing. Hart told him he knew nothing about it. After some further conversation, Hart said to Angeli, “If you tell me how many shares you want from Symons and Moses, if I can get you shares, I will ascertain all about it. How many shares do you want?” Angeli said, “I want you to buy for me 5,000, but you must understand I want them at the same price at which Pollak and Co. have placed them,” that is, as Hart goes on to explain, at the price Pollak had taken them. Hart went at once to Symons—whose offices were upstairs in the same buildings. Symons said he could not do anything; Pollak and Co. had bought 50,000; he had promised he would not sell any more without their consent; he must first see Pollak and Co. Later in the same afternoon Symons saw Marsden, who was “Pollak and Co.” Symons was anxious to oblige Hart in consequence of his connexion with Pool No. 1 and so it was arranged that Pollak and Co. should give up 5,000 shares, and that Symons should bring in 10,000 more so as to increase the pool to 60,000 shares, and thus make room for Hart and his friends. By this time Angeli had gone away for the day, saying he would call on Monday to see what Hart had done. Then Symons saw Hart again and told him what he had done, and Hart agreed to take 5,000 shares for his “friend downstairs”—that was Angeli, who had, it seems, an office, or the use of a room, below—5,000 for himself, and 5,000 for other friends of his. That completed the pool, bringing it up to 60,000. Up to that time, of course, there was nothing to bind Angeli. Angeli had commissioned Hart to get for him 5,000 shares in a pool of 50,000. Hart had agreed with Symons to take for Angeli 5,000 shares in a pool of 60,000, which was a very different thing. Angeli saw Hart again on Monday, the 15th. Hart, in his examination, was not very clear whether the meeting took place on the Monday or the Tuesday, nor was his recollection very distinct as to what passed at the interview. It is, however, quite plain, from a letter written by Angeli to Hart on Tuesday, the 16th, that the final arrangement between Angeli and Hart was made on the Monday, and it is also plain from a letter which Angeli wrote on June 17 to one Manlio, a friend of his, to whom he gave part of his interest in the pool, that Hart must have told him that the pool was increased to 60,000 shares. Angeli, in his evidence, in giving an account of the interview at which the final arrangement was made, says that Hart told him it was very difficult to get shares, but that “he would give him an interest in 5,000 shares.” Angeli repeated the statement in cross-examination. The first question put to him in cross-examination was this:—“As I understand, you tell me that on a day which may be Monday or Tuesday (never mind the day for the moment) Mr. Hart told you he would give you an interest in 5,000 shares. I took down the language you used; is that correct?” The answer was “Yes.” And, again, in writing to Manlio on September 28, 1896, Angeli refers to Hart as “the broker who gave me the participation in the Klerksdorp Proprietary.” Now, it seems to me that this language, which Angeli advisedly used in his examination, and repeated in his correspondence, describes accurately enough what took place. Hart had secured from Symons 5,000 shares in the pool for Angeli. Angeli was not bound to take them, for the pool was not the same pool as that in which he had commissioned Hart to obtain a participation for him. Hart told him of the alteration in the pool and offered him the shares; and he accepted them. The next thing that took place was that on June 16 Pollak and Co. wrote to May and Hart a letter headed “Klerksdorp Proprietary Syndicate,” in which they said, “We beg to confirm that you have an interest of 15,000 shares in the syndicate formed by us to buy 60,000 of the above shares at 2½ for the end of July.” And on the same day May and Hart sent Angeli a contract note which bound them to fulfil their contract with him. So far as material, the contract note was as follows:—“Bought by order of A. Angeli, Esq., London, 5,000 Klerksdorp Proprietary shares at 2½=12,500.0.0.” Pool No. 2 turned out a disastrous speculation. The duration of the pool was extended more than once, but Pollak and Co. could only get rid of a very few shares. There was no hope of any improvement, so the pool was closed, and Pollak and Co. called upon May and Hart to take up the shares for which they were liable, and May and Hart in turn called upon Angeli to take up the shares for which he was liable to them. Thereupon Angeli promptly repudiated the whole transaction on the ground that he had been induced to enter into it by misrepresentation. By the rules of the Stock Exchange May and Hart were compelled to take up the shares purchased for Angeli. After giving credit for Angeli's proportion of the shares sold on account of the pool the balance came to 4,697 shares; and with that quantity May and Hart were accordingly fixed. May and Hart then brought this action against Angeli for money paid on his behalf. Angeli in his pleadings set up four distinct grounds of defence. He alleged that he had been induced to enter into the transaction by misrepresentation. That defence was proved to be untrue. He alleged that the contract note was not stamped. That too was untrue. He alleged that May and Hart had not paid or become liable to pay anything in respect of the shares in question. That was also untrue. His other ground of defence was that he, May, and Hart were parties to an illegal and indictable conspiracy to rig the market. That defence was disproved and abandoned. And so all the grounds of defence that were set up in the pleadings failed completely. But the learned counsel for Angeli in cross-examining Hart laid the foundation for yet another ground of defence. Out of some expressions which fell from Hart in the course of a skilful cross-examination taken in connexion with Pollak and Co.'s letter of June 16, 1896, and the contract note of the same date, the learned counsel for Angeli constructed the theory that Hart was employed by Angeli as his broker in the ordinary way to buy 5,000 shares in the company, that in fact he bought 15,000 shares from Pollak and Co., and then sold 5,000 of those shares to Angeli. On this it was argued that he failed in his duty as broker, in that he sold his own shares to his principal, and omitted to establish privity of contract between his principal and Pollak and Co. In the Court of Appeal Lord Esher and Lord Justice Rigby accepted this version of the story and dismissed the action, treating the case as governed by "Robinson v. Mollett." "Pollak," says Lord Justice Rigby, "was the real man who had the dealings in the shares." "As far as I can make out," he adds, "Symons had nothing to do with it, only so far as he might influence Pollak. But Pollak was the man to sell. . . . Pollak's evidence shows plainly that he knew nothing about Angeli in the transaction at all, and, therefore, what may have been said to Symons does not appear to me in any way to vary the contract that was actually made between the manager of the syndicate and plaintiff, professing to act, as he now says, on behalf of the defendant," and then the Lord Justice comes to the conclusion that the plaintiff altogether misunderstood his position as broker, and did not perform the mandate of his principal. Now, I must say that that appears to me to be a complete misapprehension of the facts. Pollak and Co. had no shares to sell to persons wanting admission to the pool. The 15,000 shares, if and when they came to be taken up, would come out of Symons's hands, and Symons certainly was made aware of Angeli's interest in them. If they were passed to Pollak or through Pollak 5,000 would come ear-marked as Angeli's shares. And therefore, if it was necessary to establish privity of contract between Angeli, the purchaser, and the seller, that privity of contract was established at the outset. In my opinion it was wholly immaterial that Pollak and Co. were not made acquainted at the inception of the transaction with the respective rights and interests of the persons interested in the 15,000 shares. I think Hart did the best he could. He could not execute the original mandate. Angeli was told what Symons and Pollak had arranged, and accepted the position Hart obtained for him. The reconstructed pool—the pool that was completed on June 16—was, in fact, a combination of two interests. Pollak kept 45,000 shares. The other 15,000 shares, which represented May and Hart's interest, came from Symons. As regards those shares Symons, to use the Lord Justice's expression, was "the real man." Pollak had nothing to do with any of those shares after he had given up 5,000 of his 50,000, beyond acting as manager of the pool into which all the 60,000 shares were thrown. Mr. Justice Day said that he "believed implicitly every word that had been stated by Mr. Hart with reference to this transaction." And I agree with him in thinking that Mr. Hart carried out the transaction, at least so far as his principal was concerned, with the utmost propriety in every detail, and, therefore, I think that the judgment under appeal should be reversed, and the judgment of Mr. Justice Day restored, with costs both here and below.

VYNER V. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

River—Maintenance and repair of banks—Liability for—Railway company—Construction of Act.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 368) reversed.

Their Lordships gave judgment in this appeal, the arguments in which were heard on June 28 and 30 and July 1 last. It was from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lords Justices Lindley, Rigby, and A. L. Smith), dated April 14, 1897, made in an action commenced in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice on December 6, 1893, in which the appellant was plaintiff and the respondents were defendants, discharging a judgment of Mr. Justice Romer, dated February 2, 1897. The appellant is the owner of an estate known as the Newby-hall Estate, in the county of York, and in the action he sued the respondents for not having maintained and kept in repair about eight miles of the banks of the River Ure, which flows through the estate. The questions mainly turned upon the effect of certain private Acts of Parliament which are referred to in the judgments. The case is reported in 13 The Times L.R., 368.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. T. T. Methold were counsel for the appellant; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. William Baker for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the proprietor of an estate through which the River Ure runs complains that the defendant company have neglected the obligation which it is alleged they are under to keep and maintain the banks of the River Ure in good and sufficient repair and from time to time to strengthen and support them, and that the respondents have by their neglect allowed the appellant's lands to be damaged thereby. It will be clearer to treat the case as though the action had been brought against the body originally authorized to deal with the water of the River Ure, inasmuch as there is a separate point insisted upon—that the present respondents have not inherited the obligation of that original body—a point therefore which must be separately dealt with. The obligation is said to arise under an Act of Parliament of the year 1767 (as amended and altered by an Act of 1820), which was an Act for making the River Ure navigable for a certain portion of its course, within which portion the appellant's lands are situated. A considerable amount of argument has been devoted to a consideration of the earlier Act, and I do not say that a consideration of the earlier Act is irrelevant, because it undoubtedly points the meaning of the later Act of 1920 from which the obligation, if it exists at all, must be derived. But it certainly cannot be used for the purpose of qualifying or cutting down the obligation created by the statute which repeals the earlier one. Now, the cause of action in this case is alleged to be the neglect of the commissioners incorporated by the Act to maintain the banks of the river Ure so far as it passes through the plaintiff's lands in such a state as to avoid damage to the lands. And I observe that in the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by Lord Justice A. L. Smith, his Lordship says that "no complaint is made as to there having been any overflowing of the river over its banks and its overflowing and damaging the adjacent lands." If by the words overflowing its banks is meant to imply that the banks are assumed to be in their natural condition, and that the water has not come over what in that condition of things might be described as the top of the banks, his Lordship is probably right. But if he meant that the adjacent lands are not injured by water escaping from the River Ure into the adjacent lands, it would be manifestly contrary to the evidence in this case. The allegation which seems to have been proved is that a considerable quantity of the land which was dry land is now submerged and that the evil appears to be increasing as time goes on. It appears to be thought unreasonable that the Legislature should impose upon the Navigation Corporation the obligation to keep and maintain the banks which the Lord Justice seems to assume ought to remain the obligation of the riparian proprietor. But I think the learned Judge overlooks the fact that the river has not been allowed to remain in its natural condition. Where a corporation or any authority is empowered so far to take the dominion of the river side as to make towing paths over it, cuts into it, drains from it, and the like, there appears to me to be nothing unreasonable in the Legislature casting upon the new body an obligation to maintain the banks in such a condition as to inflict no damage on the adjacent land. But, in truth, the question is not what it is reasonable for the Legislature to do, but what it has actually done, and that must be ascertained from the language of the Legislature itself. Now the section upon which the obligation in question is said to rest is in these words:—"And be it further enacted that the said company shall, and they are hereby required from time to time, and at all times, to maintain and keep the banks of the said River Ure and cuts or canals in good and sufficient repair; and from time to time to strengthen and support the same, when necessary, for containing all the waters of the said River Ure, so that the adjacent lands and grounds may not be subjected to be overflowed or damaged by water except in cases of flood and during the continuance thereof." However this section may be read I think it does create an obligation sufficient for the plaintiff's case here. The banks have not been maintained or repaired so as to prevent the waters of the River Ure from overflowing and damaging by water the lands adjacent to the bank. I cannot limit or qualify the language used so as to make the obligation less because the cause of the decay of the banks has been what has been called the "erosion" of them by the natural course of the river. The Legislature was not dealing with a river in its natural channel, and apart altogether from the injurious action of the cloughs, or the injurious use of them, the section enforces the obligation to maintain the banks, at all events, so that "the adjacent lands and grounds may not be subjected to be overflowed or damaged by water." And besides this there is an absolute obligation on the undertakers "to support and strengthen the banks when necessary for containing all the waters of the said River Ure." Why am I to insert into this section, which, according to its plain grammatical meaning, is an absolute obligation, some words which shall make it only an obligation to manage their navigation works without negligence? It seems to me that when the Legislature gave the extensive powers which they did give over the banks of this river—a river no longer in its natural state—they did intend to make an absolute obligation to keep the adjoining land from injury as far as they might be made subject to be overflowed by water. If that is the correct view of the section, then it is immaterial to consider whether the banks were undermined or prostrated by the water gradually overtopping the highest point to which the banks reached. If it were otherwise I certainly should regard as unsatisfactory that the evidence does not, at all events, sufficiently discriminate between the different rivers in respect of which evidence was given in relation to the soil through which the rivers pass. Rivers might pass through clay soil for centuries without doing any damage; while through soil of a different character a very short time might affect the banks very seriously. But, as I have said, this consideration appears to me immaterial in view of the obligation which, I think, is made imperative on the Navigation Corporation. The construction of the section is really the whole difference between Mr. Justice Romer and Lord Justice A. L. Smith; and I am unable to agree with the Lord Justice. He appears to me to introduce words into the section which are not there, and to place upon the words that are there a meaning which they cannot bear unless some words are introduced. I therefore think that the view of Mr. Justice Romer is to be preferred. Upon the question which, as I have said, I would treat separately, I do not think it can be gravely argued that the Legislature, in allowing the Navigation Corporation to sell its undertaking talum qualem, would have allowed the right to be purchased without the corresponding duties, and the rights purchased were undoubtedly purchased as they were, and burdened accordingly with those duties which were inseparably incident to their duties. I ought to add that, in continuing the section upon which that case turns, I have diligently omitted to consider the words except in times of flood, and I have done so because no one has suggested that the injuries here complained of were done by a flood. The progress of the injury has been actually witnessed, and therefore I have not thought it right to confuse the question by introducing a discussion of an exception to the obligation which is irrelevant to the matter in hand. I am satisfied that Mr. Justice Romer's judgment is right, and I therefore move that it be restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellant the costs both here and below.

portance to trustees—viz., as to the circumstances which will justify the Court in acting under the powers conferred by sect. 3 (1) of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, in relieving an honest trustee against the consequences of a breach of trust. Clause 1, sec. 3, provides as follows:—"If it appears to the Court that a trustee, whether appointed under this Act or not, is, or may be, personally liable for any breach of trust, whether the transaction alleged to be a breach of trust occurred before or after the passing of this Act, but has acted honestly and reasonably and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust and for omitting to obtain the directions of the Court in the matter in which he committed such breach, then the Court may relieve the trustee either wholly or partly from past liability for the same." The action was brought by beneficiaries under the will of Sampson Grindey for a declaration that the defendants, the trustees and executors of the will, were guilty of a breach of trust in neglecting to call in a sum of £166 due to the testator's estate upon a promissory note, and for an order compelling them to make good the amount to the estate. The testator made his will on April 9, 1892, and thereby gave to the defendants all his real and personal estate upon trust to maintain the same and every part thereof in the like mode of investment as the same should be at his decease until his son, the defendant Sampson Grindey, should attain the age of 24. The testator died on September 23, 1892, and the defendant Sampson Grindey attained the age of 24 in the year 1895. Part of the testator's estate consisted of the sum of £166 due from T. Fernihough upon a promissory note payable on demand. The promissory note was dated May 15, 1890, and bore interest at 5 per cent. The interest was paid to the testator until the date of his death, and at that time Fernihough was supposed to be a person in good credit. The defendants took no steps to call in the promissory note until nearly two years after the testator's death, and in the meantime, in May, 1894, Fernihough died insolvent, and a dividend of only 2s. 6d. in the pound was recovered against his estate. The plaintiffs claimed to make the defendants liable for the loss, and contended that the defendants had been guilty of a breach of trust in not calling in the debt within a year from the testator's death. The action was tried before Mr. Justice Kekewich in January last. The learned Judge held that according to the true construction of the will and in the events which had happened, and having regard to the provisions of section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, the defendants ought not to be liable for leaving outstanding the sum due on the promissory note. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. J. M. Stone were for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Ingle Joyce were for the defendants.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the plaintiffs' case was that the defendants were liable to make good the loss which had occurred by reason of their omission to call in the promissory note. That might be so apart from the Act of 1896; but in this case the defendants were embarrassed by having for their guide a very curiously formed will. Looking at the terms of that will, his Lordship did not think that a business man would be to blame in supposing that it was not the intention of the testator that this debt should be called in; and if that was a reasonable view to take of the construction, then, whether it was absolutely right or absolutely wrong, the defendants would not be liable, having regard to the terms of the Act. Considering the smallness of the amount at stake, it could not be said that the trustees acted unreasonably in not asking the Court for directions, as the cost of applying to the Court would exhaust a considerable proportion of the whole sum. The will contained no specific direction to get in the debts, but it contained a trust to maintain the estate and every part thereof in the like mode of investment as the same should be at the testator's decease. How was that to be applied to a part of the assets which was not invested in any proper sense of the term? It was clear that the testator was using the word investment in a very loose sense, and his Lordship was not prepared to say that the testator did not intend this promissory note to be included as an "investment." It was not a proper conclusion to hold, in the face of that will, that the trustees were bound as reasonable men to get in the promissory note. By the combined effect of the will and the Act of Parliament he thought that the learned Judge was right in saying that the defendants ought to be relieved from the loss of this money.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. In his opinion, although section 3 was not very easy to construe, its general object was to relieve honest trustees who had acted reasonably, which meant "reasonably as trustees," and in construing this section regard ought to be had to the nature of the will itself and the difficulty in which the trustees might be placed by it. Upon the terms of this will ordinary business men might reasonably come to the conclusion, having regard to the course pursued by the testator himself in leaving the money outstanding for two years before his death, that this asset was intended to be maintained in the same position in which it was at his death until the period arrived when it was necessary to have the money in hand for distribution.

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Refusal—Special reasons for granting—Bankruptcy Act, 1890, sec. 8.

This was an appeal by the Board of Trade from the decision of the learned Judge of the County Court at Birmingham, and raised an important question under section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. That section provides that on an application by the bankrupt to the Court for his discharge the report of the Official Receiver as to the bankrupt's conduct and affairs shall be prima facie evidence of the statements therein contained, and that the Court shall refuse the discharge in all cases where the bankrupt has committed any misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869, "unless for special reasons the Court otherwise determines, and shall, on proof of any of the facts hereinafter mentioned," either (inter alia) refuse the discharge or suspend the discharge for a period of not less than two years. In the present case the bankrupt's application for his discharge came before the County Court in April last, and it appeared from the report of the Official Receiver that the bankrupt had been prosecuted for offences under the Debtors Act, 1869, and had been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment, and that he had also committed certain of the offences mentioned in the subsections to section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. The learned County Court Judge held that there were special reasons (without stating them) for granting the bankrupt his discharge, but suspended it for two years. The Board of Trade appealed on the ground that no special reasons were shown for granting the discharge.

Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the Board of Trade; Mr. F. Cooper Willis appeared for the bankrupt.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said,—The learned Judge refers in his judgment to the report of the Official Receiver, which states that the bankrupt had been convicted of misdemeanours under the Debtors Act, 1869, and had committed certain offences mentioned in section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890; and prima facie, having regard to the language of section 8, the Court had no power to grant the bankrupt his discharge. That enactment, however, is qualified by the words “unless for special reasons the Court otherwise determines.” I think that in working out that section the Court should specify the special reasons on which the discharge, which otherwise could not be obtained, is granted. The learned Judge seems to have been influenced by the recommendation to mercy made by the jury at the trial of the bankrupt for the offences under the Debtors Act, 1869. It seems to me, however, that that is not a special reason for granting the bankrupt's discharge. It is not for the jury in such a case to determine what is a special reason for the purposes of a discharge in bankruptcy. In my judgment the learned Judge has not specified in his judgment any special reason for granting the bankrupt's discharge. I therefore come to the conclusion that the learned Judge, in exercising his discretion under the section, has gone beyond what the Act empowered him to do, and that, in strictness, the discharge should be refused. But we have power to vary the order of the Court below and to make such order as we think right if the parties consent, and we understand that the Board of Trade do not object, and that the bankrupt is willing we should do so. We cannot overlook the gravity of the case, and therefore we think the right order will be to vary the order of the Court below by granting the discharge on the bankrupt's consenting to judgment being entered against him for £2,000, and to suspend the discharge for two years.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred.

THE PERPETUAL EXECUTORS' AND TRUSTEES' ASSOCIATION OF AUSTRALIA (LIMITED) V. MARGARET ELIZABETH SWAN AND OTHERS.*

Privy Council Appeals—Victoria—Trustee—Unauthorized investments—Deposit at interest with bank—Liability.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria of July 30, 1897, and from a judgment of Mr. Justice Holroyd of August 31, 1897.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. C. H. Sargent were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts for the respondents.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said in their Lordships' opinion this was a very plain case and a very bold appeal. The appellants were “a trustee company”—that was to say, a company incorporated by statute and authorized by its special Act to undertake the duties of executors, administrators, and trustees for pecuniary reward. The powers and obligations of trustee companies depended in each case on the special Act and on certain provisions of the Trustee Act, 1890. The sole question for adjudication on this appeal was whether, according to the law in force in the colony of Victoria, the placing of trust moneys on deposit at interest with banks fulfilling certain conditions was or was not an authorized investment in the case of trustee companies. At the time when the events occurred which gave rise to that litigation investments in real or Government securities were the only authorized investments for trust moneys in the hands of ordinary trustees. In December, 1890, the appellants were employed to administer the estate of one George Swan, who had died intestate in the previous October, leaving a widow and six children, some of whom were infants. The personal estate to be got in was under £5,000. The debts amounted to a trifle under £100. Within four months the appellants had completed their labours all but the distribution of the net assets, and on April 14, 1891, they credited themselves with a commission of over £200 by way of remuneration for their services. Instead of paying the widow and the adult next-of-kin and paying into Court or setting apart and investing the shares of the infants, as it was their duty to do, the appellants kept in their own hands undivided and uninvested the clear balance of the estate. The widow, who did not seem to have been fully aware of her rights, begged the appellants to invest at their earliest convenience and to the best advantage the moneys they had in hand, and to get them securely placed. After four applications she received a reply from the manager that the directors were exceedingly anxious to get the money invested in suitable securities as early as possible, but that “securities of the character acceptable to the directors were very difficult to obtain at present.” From that letter it might perhaps be inferred either that the directors of the company—two of whom were also on the board of the City of Melbourne Bank—considered investments on deposit receipts unsuitable or else that they had not then discovered the extent of the powers of trustee companies for which they were now contending. The manager stated at the trial that Mrs. Swan told him that as the company could not find securities on mortgage she wished the money placed on deposit in the English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered Bank, and that subsequently they placed £2,100 in that bank and £2,000 in the City of Melbourne Bank at 5 per cent. for 12 months. The deposits were renewed for further periods. Ultimately both banks failed. The children of the intestate now called upon the appellants to make good the loss. At the instance of the appellants the widow was made a co-defendant. Besides urging that if they had done anything amiss they ought to be indemnified by the widow, who had so led them astray, the appellants contended that their action was justified by section 384 of the Companies Act, 1890, under which the deposits complained of were authorized investments. Mr. Justice Holroyd reserved that point for the full Court, who decided it adversely to the appellants, and thereupon the learned Judge declared that the deposits were breaches of trust on the part of the appellants which they were liable to make good. But he held that the widow could not complain of the deposit to the English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered Bank, which she had herself recommended, and that she must look to the reconstructed bank for the share of the moneys. The appellants now appealed from those judgments. The argument on their behalf was rested on the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1890. Section 383 imposed on trustee companies the same duties and obligations as those to which any individual acting in a similar capacity would be subject. Section 384, after requiring a trustee company to keep separate accounts of the estates under its control, enacted that any director, member, or officer of a trustee company who knowingly and wilfully appropriated or dealt with any property of which such company had control, or knowingly and wilfully lent or otherwise dealt with any moneys received by such company otherwise than in accordance with that part of the Act of 1890, should be guilty of a misdemeanour. Then followed a proviso that, notwithstanding anything in that section contained, any trustee company might deposit any moneys of which it had control with any banking company or corporation fulfilling certain conditions (which admittedly were fulfilled in the case of these banks), but no deposit was to be made of more than £20,000 on behalf of any one estate of which it had control. What was it that the proviso authorized? There was not a word about investment or interest from beginning to end. The section, in their Lordships' opinion, did not enlarge the powers of investment possessed by trustee companies in common with trustees. It did not authorize them to deposit trust moneys with a bank in any case in which an individual acting in a similar capacity would not be justified in employing a banker. It was a restrictive as well as an enabling clause. While it relieved the directors and officers of a trustee company from the apprehension of criminal liability if the deposit was properly made, it required that deposits should only be made with banks of a certain class, and that no deposit in the case of any one estate should exceed a certain limit. The framers of the Act knew perfectly well the difference between depositing money with a bank and investing moneys on security. The very next section drew the distinction, for it authorized trustee companies to deposit their own funds with a bank of deposit or to invest them on certain specified securities. The learned counsel for the appellants were asked why trustee companies should have conferred upon them larger powers of investment than ordinary trustees. The answer was that it was the policy of the Legislature to favour trustee companies. No doubt if those companies had wider powers of investment than other trustees the privilege might serve to attract custom, but it would be a singular way of showing them special favour to allow them to do with impunity that which would be a breach of trust if done by ordinary trustees. If such had been the intention of the Legislature one would certainly have expected to find the intention declared in plain and unambiguous language. Section 384 was certainly not happily expressed, but in their Lordships' opinion it did not afford any grounds for the contention of the appellants. In ordinary circumstances it would not be necessary or proper to say anything more. But, inasmuch as a judgment unsuccessfully challenged on appeal might possibly be taken as a precedent in other cases, their Lordships thought it right to add that in their opinion the judgment under review fell short of what the justice of the case required. Their Lordships were unable to see what jurisdiction the learned Judge had under the circumstances to make a decree between the appellants and the widow, who were co-defendants. Assuming the jurisdiction to exist, their Lordships were unable to discover any ground for depriving the widow of her full rights. Their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal must be dismissed. The appellants would pay the costs of the appeal.

ENGLAND V. WEBB.*

Privy Council Appeals—Victoria—Revenue—Income-tax—Exemptions—Money lent by Scottish Institution on security of land in Victoria.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria of September 20, 1897, confirming a decision of his Honour Judge Casey in the Melbourne County Court.

Mr. Crackanthorpe, Q.C., Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. R. L. Blackburn (of the Scotch Bar) appeared for the appellant; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Rowlatt for the respondent.

LORD HOBHOUSE, in delivering their Lordships' considered judgment, said the appellant was the officer and representative of the Scottish Provident Institution, which claimed to be exempt from income-tax. The respondent was the Commissioner of Taxes. The income in respect of which tax was claimed proceeded from money lent on the security of land in Victoria. The appellant company had no other property in the colony nor did it carry on business there. Its head office is in Edinburgh. The question turned entirely on the construction of the Income Tax Act, 1895, and its application to the business of the company. The tax was imposed by section 5 on all income derived by any person from the produce of property within Victoria. Section 7 enacted that there should be exempt from income-tax all income derived or received by persons distributed under 12 heads. The appellant claimed to fall under head (e)—“All trusts, societies, associations, institutions, and public bodies not carrying on any trade or not being engaged in any trade for the purposes of gain to be divided among the shareholders or members thereof.” By the definition clause “trade” included every profession, vocation, trade, business, calling, employment, and occupation. The Supreme Court held that the company carried on business for the purpose of gain within head (e) so far as its operations outside Victoria were concerned, though it merely lent money on mortgage in Victoria, and that it was not exempted. The appeal was from that decision. The company was started under a deed of constitution registered in the Books of Council and Session on June 8, 1837. Its objects as there laid down were:—“(1) To form a common fund on which provisions by way of capital sums and annuities should be chargeable upon the failure of lives and upon survivorships by means of contributions corresponding to the value of such provisions to be paid by or on behalf of the persons becoming entitled thereto; (2) that whatever surplus might eventually arise upon such contributions should be reserved for the benefit of and be equitably apportioned among the persons, or the representatives or nominees of the persons, from whose contributions such surplus shall have arisen.” Article 27 of the deed provided that septennial accounts should be taken and that the surpluses which were then found to have arisen on the common fund should be available to the members by additions to the sums payable on their policies. From that benefit, however, certain classes of policies were excluded. In terms of the deed no person could effect any form of assurance with the company without becoming ipso facto a member. That was an ordinary type of mutual insurance company, on which footing it appeared that the business was conducted for several years. In 1848 the company was incorporated by Act of Parliament, and its business was put on a new footing. It became “entitled to carry on the business of effecting assurances on lives and survivorships, purchase and sale of annuities and reversions, granting endowments, receiving money for investment and accommodation, and in general for carrying on all the business which now is or may come to be connected with a life assurance society in all the various branches thereof." From that time to this the business of the company had been that which was indicated in the Act of 1848. It was the ordinary business of a life assurance society, and in addition that of a society for the purchase and sale of annuities and reversions. In 1848 the company became one of those which carried on business with strangers for gain to the company as a whole. It had granted assurances to persons who were not its members, and though it was urged that that kind of business had only been done with other insurance companies, and by way of guarantee, it was done, and on terms calculated for profit. It had also trafficked to some extent in reversions. That was carrying on business for gain, and the gain was to be divided among the members of the company. It was urged that the additional business of a general kind was very small; and compared with the magnitude of the other transactions it was so; but it was not unsubstantial, and it was enough to prevent the company from bringing itself within the terms of head (e). It should also be noticed that the next head of exemption (f) was expressed as follows:—"Any mutual life assurance company whose head or principal office or principal place of business is in Australia." Certainly the inference to be drawn from that exemption was that a mutual insurance company which, like the present appellant, had not any place of business in Australia was not to be exempt. It was right to be cautious in laying stress on an inference of that sort. But it was at least not improbable that the framers of the Income-tax Act might have looked upon all companies whose business it was to make money bargains for the benefit of their members as being companies which carried on business for gain to their members; and the way which they had dealt with mutual insurance companies under head (f) lent countenance to the supposition that they did so think. Another point of much more importance was raised in the course of the argument and discussed at the Bar, though it did not seem to have been raised in the Court below; and that was whether the trusts, &c., mentioned in head (e) could mean trusts, &c., not operating in Victoria. It seemed very strange that the Victorian Parliament should desire to forgo income-tax in favour of a Scotch institution which had no connexion with Victoria except in its character of a property owner there. If a party of friends in England employed a common agent in Victoria to put out the money of each on mortgage, each would be taxed. If then they associated themselves for the purpose of doing so, was it intended that they should escape tax? And yet they would be an association simply for investment, and not trading for gain. Moreover, there were other heads of exemption framed without regard to locality. Head (c) exempted "All bodies formed solely for the purposes of religion." Head (d) "All registered friendly societies, provident societies, building societies, and trade unions." Head (h) "Any mining company." It could hardly be that the Parliament of Victoria had such great regard for social and industrial combinations and efforts all over the world that it should offer to the Jesuits' Society in Rome, to the Amalgamated Engineers, and the Athenæum Club in England, and to a Witwatersrand company in Africa exemption from income-tax if they chose to invest their funds in Victorian land, or in mortgages upon it, or, it would seem, in the purchase of Government stock. It would require a much clearer expression than could be found in the general words of those heads of exemption to induce their Lordships to infer any such intentions on the part of the Victorian Legislature. It seemed to them much more reasonable to suppose that in framing heads (c), (d), and (h) the Legislature was speaking of bodies acting in or for Victoria, and the same reason applied to head (e). Their Lordships, therefore, came to the same conclusion as the Court below. They would humbly advise her Majesty to dismiss the appeal, and the appellant must pay the costs.

SMYTH V. THE QUEEN.*

Privy Council Appeals—Victoria—Civil servant—
Superannuation allowance—Crown prosecutor.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria of October 25, 1897.

Mr. Herbert Cowell appeared for the appellant; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Rowlatt for the respondent.

The case was recently argued before a Board consisting of Lord Hobhouse, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris, and Sir Henry Strong, when judgment was reserved.

LORD MORRIS, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the appellant, Mr. C. A. Smyth, appealed from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria, which answered against him the question reserved at the trial of the action. The suit was by petition of right. The appellant claimed to be entitled to superannuation allowance as the holder of an office in the public service from which he was superannuated, he having passed the age of 65. He had been appointed "Crown Prosecutor" on April 7, 1861, for certain district Courts of the colony. The appointment was as follows:—"Whereas all treasons, felonies, misdemeanours, and offences compoundable in any circuit Court in the colony of Victoria must be prosecuted in the name of her Majesty's Attorney-General or Solicitor-General in the said colony or of such other person as the Governor of the said colony may appoint. Know ye, therefore, that I, the Governor aforesaid, do by these presents appoint that at the circuit Courts to be holden at Sandhurst, Maryborough, and Castlemaine all such treasons, felonies, misdemeanours, and offences as aforesaid shall be prosecuted in the name of Charles Alexander Smyth, Esquire, barrister-at-law." The appellant was subsequently appointed to an additional circuit. The salary given to the office was £600 a year. The appellant having declined to accept certain new conditions and duties proposed to be attached to his office, his tenure was, by letter of the Attorney-General of January 17, 1895, terminated, and an Order of Council was made formally terminating his appointment. It appeared that in 1890 the appellant had proposed to resign in consequence of ill-health on a retiring allowance, which was acceded to by the then Attorney-General, and £386 13s. 6d. was placed on the Estimates for such retiring allowance; but the appellant's health became restored and he continued in his office. On his removal in 1895 the appellant again applied for his superannuation allowance, but the application was refused, the Attorney-General having given an opinion that appellant was not entitled to any pension. The appellant consequently instituted the present proceedings. At the trial Sir H. Wrixon, a former

Attorney-General, was examined, and gave evidence as to the duties of the appellant's office of "Crown prosecutor." It was found as a fact by the learned Judge that the statements of the duties of appellant's office were correctly stated in the petition of right. It was proved and was conceded that there was a separate and distinct class of officer known as "prosecuting barristers," whose duties were simply to prosecute as advocates in the particular cases in which they might be employed. The case entirely turned on the construction of the Public Service Act, 1890—viz., whether the appellant came within Clause 107, and if he did, was he excepted by the excluding Clause 3? Section 107 said all persons classified or unclassified holding offices in any department of the public service at the time of the Public Service Act, 1883, should still be entitled to superannuation or retiring allowance, compensation or gratuity to be computed under the provisions of Act No. 160. Section 3 said except where otherwise expressly provided nothing in the Act should apply to any prosecuting barrister, and in the interpretation clause it was provided that the expression "officer" "shall mean and include all persons employed in any capacity in the public service." Their Lordships were of opinion that the Crown prosecutors, such as the appellant, paid yearly would come within and be included in the terms of section 107—an opinion which was entertained by the Supreme Court also. The question therefore was reduced to the construction of Clause 3—viz., were Crown prosecutors excluded by the terms of that clause? They were not named in it, but it was contended that the words "prosecuting barristers" included and was meant to refer to "Crown prosecutors." Their Lordships could not accede to such a construction. The learned Judge who gave the judgment of the Supreme Court intimated that there were two well-recognized classes of functionaries whose titles were not used in common, but on the contrary were described in official Acts and documents with separate references, and whose duties were dissimilar except in one respect, the duties of the Crown prosecutor being of a much higher nature and employed at a salary, the point of similarity being that while the whole duty of a prosecuting barrister was to act as an advocate on getting a brief, it was one of the duties of a Crown prosecutor to appear in a case in which he had prosecuted. Why, then, should an exclusion by name of a well-known class be held to be an exclusion of an equally well-known and distinct class whose duties were so dissimilar? The learned Judge in the Supreme Court seemed to have substantially decided on the ground that it could not be reasonably supposed the Legislature intended by the use of the words "prosecuting barristers" to refer to the class "prosecuting barristers" because they could not come within the other provisions of the Act. There might be some difficulty in assigning a reason why the class "prosecuting barristers" under such circumstances were excluded by name—whether ex majore cautela or otherwise. That difficulty, however, appeared to their Lordships to afford no ground for holding that the words were to be applied to another and distinct class of officers—viz., "Crown prosecutors." The learned Judge was of opinion it was the class of Crown prosecutors that was aimed at in Clause 3, and not the class named. If such surmise was to be entertained it was sufficient to say the aim had not been attained—quod voluit quod dixit. Their Lordships could not adopt such a rule of construction as the Supreme Court had adopted in the present case. One distinct well-known class of official was stated to be excluded in plain unmistakable language. Why should such exclusion—in consequence of its inapplicability to the class named —be transferred to another class not named? Their Lordships were of opinion that the fact that the appellant held his office during pleasure could not affect the question of superannuation. His term of office was determined by the will of the Crown. That did not affect his right to superannuation allowance for the term he held office. Their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty that the judgment of the Supreme Court ought to be reversed and that in lieu thereof the appellant be declared entitled to superannuation allowance. The appellant would also be entitled to his costs in the Court of the colony and of this appeal.

THE RHYMNEY STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V. THE IBERIAN IRON ORE COMPANY (LIMITED)—THE FOREST STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V. SAME.*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—Demurrage—
"Working day of 24 hours"—Meaning of.

Decision of Bigham, J. (ante, p. 473), affirmed (Rigby, L.J., dissenting).

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, reported ante, p. 473. The question in each of the two cases, which were tried together, was as to the construction of a certain clause in a charterparty. In each case the action was brought to recover demurrage. The charterparty was one by which the plaintiffs undertook with the defendants to provide ships for the carriage of 50,000 tons of iron ore from Seville, in Spain, to ports in the United Kingdom and elsewhere over a period of 12 months. It was drawn on an ordinary printed charterparty form used for single voyages, alterations being introduced in writing for the purpose of adapting the form to the particular contract in question. Disputes arose as to the meaning of the provisions as to demurrage. Those provisions were as follows:—"Charterers or their agents to be allowed 350 tons per working day of 24 hours, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), for loading and discharging, same to be reversible and to be averaged voyage by voyage to avoid demurrage, and to count from 6 a.m. of the day following the day when steamer is reported at the Custom-house, unless she be reported before noon, in which case time to count from notice of readiness and in every respect ready to load or discharge respectively and in free pratique. Steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used." The plaintiffs contended that these words meant that the defendants were to perform the loading or discharging at the rate of 350 tons per working day, such days to be made up of periods of 24 hours reckoned from the hour when the vessel commenced to load or discharge. The defendants, on the other hand, said that the words meant that 24 working hours were to be allowed for loading or discharging each 350 tons. Mr. Justice Bigham gave judgment in favour of the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the plaintiffs in the second case; Mr. J. E. Banks for the plaintiffs in the first case; and Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., for the defendants.

The Court, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal, Lord Justice Rigby dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—These are actions by shipowners against charterers for demurrage, and raise a short point as to the construction of a clause in a charterparty though it is of considerable importance to the parties, as it involves in one case alone the question of what time charterers are to have for loading and unloading 50,000 tons of iron ore in and out of certain steamships of the plaintiffs, and it is said there are other charterparties couched in similar terms. The clause which gives rise to the dispute is as follows:—“Charterers or their agents to be allowed 350 tons per working day of 24 hours, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), for loading and discharging . . . and to count from 6 a.m. of the day following the day when the steamer is reported, unless she be reported before noon, in which case time to count from notice of readiness . . . Steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used.” Lay days mean the time for loading or unloading as the case may be. The question is, do the words, “Charterers to be allowed 350 tons per working day of 24 hours,” mean that the charterers are to have 24 working hours for loading or discharging each 350 tons of ore, or do they mean, as the plaintiffs, the shipowners, contend, that the charterers are only to have a working day for each 350 tons, no matter of what number of hours such working day may happen to consist, at the port of loading and at the various ports of discharge. The number of hours which constitute a working day vary at the different ports. Now, in the first place, the plaintiffs’ contention appears to me to give the go-by to the words which presumably were inserted for some purpose in the charter—viz., “of 24 hours”—and reads the charterparty as if those words were not there. Why were those words inserted? It seems to me for the express purpose of giving to the charterers a fixed period of 24 working hours wherein to load or unload each 350 tons of ore, no matter what number of hours might constitute a working day at the port of loading or the ports of discharge. What is the sense of inserting “of 24 hours” if not for this? If the plaintiffs’ reading of the charterparty be correct, the words should simply have been “350 tons per working day,” which, as Lord Esher pointed out in “The Katy” ([1895] P.D., 63), in which case the phrase was “running days,” meant days in their ordinary sense. But a “working day of 24 hours” is not the same as “a working day,” and in this charterparty it seems to me that the parties have agreed to a conventional day of 24 hours in which the work is to be done. The real question is whether in this clause the word “day” is to give way to the words “of 24 hours” or the words “of 24 hours” are to be discarded. It is suggested by the plaintiffs’ counsel that the words “of 24 hours” were inserted because of the decision in “The Katy,” which, as before stated, was that running days meant whole days, days in their ordinary sense, and that the 12th clause in the charterparty in that case, stipulating that in certain events lay days were to count from 48 hours after the ship’s arrival at a safe anchorage, did not alter the meaning of running days. Why this decision should have prompted the insertion of the words “of 24 hours” after the words “working days” I do not apprehend, and I do not attribute any weight to the suggestion, and it is the only one the learned counsel for the plaintiffs have made for the insertion of the words “of 24 hours.” The plaintiffs’ contention is that the working days mentioned in the charter mean periods of 24 hours reckoned from the time when the ship commences to load or unload, as the case may be—i.e., of continuous periods of 24 hours, no matter how many hours of the 24 can, in fact, be worked in. The clause in question, as before stated, is “350 tons per working day of 24 hours, weather permitting, steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used.” These last words, “unless used,” are in writing and not in print, and, in my judgment, refer to the time if used during night, Sundays, and holidays, and are to me very significant. As to the effect to be given to written words over printed words in a charterparty, see what was said by Mr. Justice Crompton in “Gumm v. Tyrie” (4 B. and S., 707). By this clause, if the steamer does not use time at night or on Sundays or holidays, though she might be required to do so, this time is not to be counted in the 24 hours for each 350 tons of ore, but if she is so required and does use time accordingly this time is to be counted in the 24 hours. What, then, becomes of the plaintiffs’ contention that the true construction of the charterparty is that a working day of 24 hours means continuous periods of consecutive hours from the commencement of the loading or discharge of the ship, as the case may be? Moreover, the words “weather permitting” are inserted for the benefit of the charterers, not of the shipowners. Suppose during half of the second or any other working day for unloading, say, at Cardiff (where the working day is a day of eight hours and 40 minutes, we are told), weather did not permit unloading, or did not permit unloading for the whole of the day, what then? Is the true construction of this charter that the charterers are only to have four hours in the 24 hours or no hours at all to unload 350 tons of ore and not the 24 hours expressly mentioned in the charter? This, I think, cannot be and is not the meaning of the charter, and I agree with what my brother Bigham has held, and I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read the following judgment:—I have the misfortune of differing from my learned brethren. In my opinion strong prima facie presumption arises against the construction of the charterparty contended for by the defendants and adopted by Mr. Justice Bigham when we observe that in reckoning the time allowed to the charterers for loading or discharging, which is one working day of 24 hours for every 350 tons of cargo, that construction entirely sets aside, as in my judgment it does, the “working day” as there used, and converts what I may for convenience call the conventional unit for the measure of time into 24 working hours, just as if working days had not been mentioned. This may be supported by a necessary implication arising from the rest of the contract, but nothing less than a necessary implication can, in my judgment, justify such violence being done to the language. I quite agree that you may from the terms of a contract show that the parties to it have dealt with a word or phrase like “day” or “working,” or any word or phrase that has in ordinary language one or more significations, in such a way as to show that some other meaning ought to be attached to it, but in doing so and attaching a conventional meaning care should be taken not to depart more from the ordinary meaning, or one of the ordinary meanings, of the word or phrase than is necessary. Now, I do not think that I am doing injustice to the defendants’ contention when I say that it logically involves this proposition—that you are, when loading or discharging has been going on, only to take the actual number of hours during which work has been done, add them together until the total number amounts to 24, and you have then the time allowed for the loading or discharging of the first 350 tons, and so on with reference to each succeeding 350 tons. I am, of course, aware that the contention is qualified by reading the charterparty as if it contained by implication a proviso that a working day means a day of the usual number of hours for which men work at the port of loading or discharging, as the case may be. But I can see no possible ground for such a contention. What, then, would be the effect of such a proviso in the passage "per working day of 24 hours, &c." ? Whatever the meaning may be of working day, it cannot have two distinct meanings in one and the same passage. This passage would, however, run "per working day of 12 hours or eight hours, as the case may be, which is also to be of 24 hours." The result is to me quite unintelligible. When I address myself to the construction of the document, I must in the first place say that I cannot accept the statement of Mr. Justice Bigham, that all days in an ordinary or commercial as distinguished from an astronomical sense are days of 24 hours. Notoriously the 24 hours are commonly spoken and thought of as made up of day and night, and day does not usually import day and night. I cannot therefore agree with his conclusion that the words "of 24 hours" are not introduced to explain the word "day"; it seems to me that that is their obvious and only function. I do not myself find much difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of a working day of 24 hours. I can best explain my meaning by taking a concrete case. Suppose a vessel, whose cargo is five times 350 tons, to be reported after 12 o'clock on Monday. The time for loading is to count from 6 a.m. on Tuesday, and prima facie the first day of 24 hours will expire at 6 a.m. on Wednesday, and the whole time for loading or discharging the entire cargo will expire on Saturday at 6 p.m. If the vessel is reported before noon on the Monday the time will begin to count from the giving of notice of readiness, say, 12 o'clock noon, and will run in like manner until 12 noon on the Saturday. So far no notice has been taken of exceptions, but if the weather is such as to hinder loading or discharging during, say, six hours of the time, that six hours must be excluded, and the expiration of the time will be postponed by the six hours. So, if one or more of the days counted in the time be a holiday or a Sunday, the effect is to exclude that or those days and so postpone the expiration of the time by an additional day or days. So far not the slightest difficulty arises in carrying out literally the directions of the charterparty. This construction does not involve the assumption that the working time is to be made up of consecutive hours, but only that any breach of continuity must be rested on plain words. Unquestionably a difficulty, and, so far as I can see, the only difficulty, is introduced by the words "steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used." But so far from this being a perfectly clear sentence of so plainly obligatory a meaning as to entitle it to dominate and control other passages not in themselves open to doubt, it appears to me to be the most obscure passage in the whole document. Further, I would at the outset point out that the largest possible construction that can be given to this clause will not lead to the interpretation of working day contended for by the defendants. Let it be granted that the prima facie grammatical construction of that sentence is that the words "such time" refer to the more remote antecedent "night" as well as to the proximate antecedent "Sundays and holidays." I should hesitate still to admit that there is a logical necessity for so applying it when the result would be to produce such an absurdity as "nights not to count as lay days." To make tolerable sense of this we must change the words into something like "nights shall not be counted in the computation of lay days." But, unless under compulsion of necessity, we have no authority for this alteration. If the sentence stood alone I should prefer to do a little violence to the formal grammar by confirming the words "such time" to the proximate antecedent in order to make good sense, rather than by a blind obedience to grammar to make nonsense out of the sentence. But not only is the objection to a formal grammatical construction an obvious one on the sentence itself, but it becomes, I think, much stronger when considered in reference to other parts of the document. The adoption of it involves greater difficulties than the rejection. First of all, how would this construction stand with reference to the interpretation of working day as equivalent to the day during which men usually work at the port? It cannot be suggested, I should think, that at any port men work as a usual thing during the night, so that the exclusion of night from the computation of the working day would be altogether meaningless. Then comes the difficulty of determining the meaning of night, if any other meaning can be suggested than the most ordinary one of the time between sunset and sunrise. If that be adopted the word "night" would in our own latitudes vary from somewhere about 7½ hours at the summer solstice to about 17 hours at the winter solstice. If the meaning be that the night hours alone are to be deducted, there would have to be kept a record of the length of the nights throughout the whole time when the vessel may be loading or unloading. I suppose that by no straining of the language can "night" be made in this document to mean all the 24 hours except what is the usual working time at the port. If it could, then at Cardiff, where we are told work generally begins at 6 a.m. and terminates between 2 and 3 p.m., all the hours in summer between, say, 3 p.m. and 6 a.m. the next morning must be counted as night. And yet no other construction would give a satisfactory measure conforming to the supposed usual "working day," for there would be no provision as to not counting the hours of daylight outside the "usual" working day. Another difficulty seems to me to arise on the defendants' construction with reference to the case already stated of a ship whose time for loading begins at 12 o'clock noon, say, at Cardiff, on a Monday in midwinter. What is the first day which gives only about four hours of daylight to be counted as? There is no difficulty on the plaintiffs' contention; the first working day of 24 hours would expire at 12 noon on the next day, Tuesday. On the defendants' contention it need not expire until somewhere about 10 o'clock on the Thursday, although the weather might be fine throughout and no holiday might intervene. The defendants' hypothesis results in a great complication depending upon seasons and places. The plaintiffs give a simple rule applicable to all cases alike. The one depends, as it seems to me, upon a doubtful construction of a most difficult clause; the other upon what, I venture to think, is the plain meaning of the whole contract outside that clause, and consistent with what I think the preferable construction of the clause itself. For myself I think that the plaintiffs' contention should be accepted, and the appeal allowed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read a judgment in which he arrived at the same conclusion as Lord Justice A. L. Smith.

VICKERY V. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*
Master and Servant—Railway company—Insurance fund—Accident resulting in death of employé while committing a breach of duty.

*Reported by B. HARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action, in the nature of a test case, which raised an interesting point upon the construction to be placed upon the rules regulating a scheme under the defendant company's General Powers Act, 1878, for the establishment of an accident allowance fund for the officers and servants of the company. The plaintiff is the widow of a spring smith, who for 36 years previous to the accident which caused his death had been employed in the workshops of the defendant company at Norwich Thorpe Station. The deceased was insured in the accident allowance fund. Section 46 of the Act of 1878 (supra) provided that the fund was established for the payment of allowances on account of accidents happening to officers and servants of the company in the discharge of their duty; and that a committee nominated by the directors should prepare a scheme for regulating the fund. The scheme provided as follows:—“(1.) The fund is established for the purpose of enabling the company's servants of all grades, who are exposed to the risk of accidents in the discharge of their duties, to insure their lives against such accidents, and to obtain a temporary weekly allowance while incapacitated from employment in consequence of any injury received in the discharge of their duties. (2.) The allowances to be paid out of the fund shall be as follows:—(a) In case of the death of an insurer from any accident in the discharge of duties in the company's service. . . there shall be paid to the representative of the insurer, if such insurer was, at the time of the accident, of the first class, the sum of £130.” The deceased met with his death on December 23, 1896, at 5 45 a.m., in the following circumstances:—It was the duty of every workman in the defendant company's shops at Norwich Thorpe Station before commencing work to obtain a check or ticket, which had to be obtained before 6 a.m. The check office was near the “loco” shops and engine works and was approached by two footpaths provided by the company—one along the towing path and another commenced by a gate opening from the Carron-road. By either of those accesses the check office could be reached by any workman desiring to reach it from his home outside the premises without any risk or danger from having to cross the numerous lines of railways in and about the station yard. At the entrance to the towing path and at each of the gates leading to the footways, and in a conspicuous place, were posted up notices in legible words, with a hand pointing to the footpath as follows:—“Entrance to ‘loco’ shops by path across the meadow, any person crossing the lines of rails will do so at their own risk.” Notwithstanding the notices, many of the workmen, including the deceased, disregarded the notices, and for their own convenience, to avoid longer routes, crossed the company's lines in the goods and shunting yards. The deceased, while crossing the lines to get to the check office, was knocked down by an engine and died from the effects of his injuries. A claim was made upon the company by his widow for £130, being the amount she would be entitled to out of the accident allowance fund. The company resisted the action upon the ground that the accident which caused the death of the deceased did not occur in the discharge of his duty in the company's service; that he was crossing the company's lines of railway before his work had commenced at a dangerous and forbidden spot in disobedience to the company's orders and in breach of his duty. The case was tried before the learned Judge without a jury at the last Norwich Assizes, when judgment was reserved.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS, in delivering a considered judgment, after reviewing the facts of the case, said he was of opinion that the defence of the company must prevail. The deceased had no duty to discharge in the company's service before he had obtained his ticket, which he had not done when the accident occurred. He was simply on his way to the office to procure it as a condition precedent to his being employed. He should be very sorry to decide the case solely upon that ground, and he felt sure that if the deceased had been on his journey to the office along one of the ways pointed out by the notice boards, and while so journeying had met with his death, the directors and all interested in the fund would have been very unwilling to insist upon such a defence. The deceased was trespassing on the lines he was forbidden to traverse. He was not discharging any duty imposed upon him by the company; on the contrary, he was acting in disregard of his duty and in wilful disobedience to the orders and injunctions of the company which he was bound to observe. It signified nothing to his mind that many other workmen had acted in the like way. It was suggested that such disregard of the notices had been sanctioned by the company, but he found no evidence to lead him to such a conclusion. It would give rise to great confusion in the relations which ought to exist between masters and servants if the latter were allowed to be under an impression that frequent disobedience to the orders of their employers could alone operate as nullification of them. It was immaterial that no mention was made in the scheme that disobedience to the orders would have any effect upon the insurance. The company had a right to regulate and did regulate for themselves the duties of those employed to serve them, independently altogether of the scheme. Upon full consideration of the case he was of opinion that the defendants were entitled to his judgment.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

Defendants' counsel stated that he would not ask for costs.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS said perhaps the railway company might consider as a matter of good nature whether they would make any contribution to the widow out of the fund. He only suggested that as a matter of good feeling and not by way of compulsion.

Defendants' counsel said that no doubt his Lordship's suggestion would be considered by his clients.

Mr. Ernest Wild appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. F. H. Coller for the defendants.

PARR'S BANK (LIMITED) V. THOMAS ASHBY AND CO.*
Bank—Country cheque—Failure to return—Rules of Bankers' Clearing-house—Liability.

This case, raised a question of considerable importance with regard to the liability of country banks for failure to return by return of post, in accordance with the Clearing-house rules, a cheque which they did not intend to pay. The action was brought to recover £307 for money had and received by the defendants for the use of the plaintiffs. The facts were as follows:—The plaintiff bank has a head office in the City of London and many branches, amongst others a branch in Kensington, which is treated for the purpose of the question raised in this action as a “country bank.” The defendants are bankers at Staines, their London agents being Williams, Deacon, and Co. One Tom Frost, in September, 1897, formed his business into a limited liability company under the name of Tom Frost and Co. (Limited). In October, 1897, the defendants took two debentures over the whole assets of the company, to secure an overdraft. On October 30, 1897, Tom Frost paid into the Kensington branch of the plaintiff bank, where he had an account, a cheque for £307 drawn by Tom Frost and Co. (Limited) upon the defendant bank and payable to the order of Tom Frost and Co. (Limited). This cheque was then, in accordance with the usual practice, stamped with the name of the plaintiff bank and sent by them to their head office in London. On Monday, November 1, 1897, in accordance with the usual practice, this cheque was handed by the plaintiffs' clerk at the Clearing-house at noon (which is the time for clearing country cheques) to the clerk of Williams, Deacon, and Co., and was by them sent on along with other cheques to the defendants, with a form to the effect that Williams, Deacon, and Co. enclosed country clearing cheques value £2,825 13s. 11d. for favour of payment, and requesting them to return by first post the slip at foot after inserting the amount to be debited in account. The slip mentioned was filled up by the defendants and returned on November 2. By the slip the defendants requested Williams, Deacon, and Co. to debit their account with an amount which included the cheque for £307. By the rules made by the Bankers' Clearing-house, published in June, 1893, it is provided as follows:—(1) A clearing to be held in the middle of each day for the interchange among the London bankers of cheques on their correspondents in the country placed in their hands for collection. . . . (3) Country bankers wishing to avail themselves of this clearing to remit their country cheques to their own London agent, to stamp across them their own name and address, and that of their London agent. (4) Any country bank not intending to pay a cheque sent to it for collection to return it direct to the country or branch bank, if any, whose name and address is across it. The defendants did not send back the cheque for £307 to the plaintiffs' Kensington branch on November 2, 1897, but held it during that day for reasons of their own. On November 3, 1897, at 10 50 a.m., before the country clearing, Williams, Deacon, and Co. received a telegram from the defendants asking them to "pay yesterday's country clearing £307 less than advised; cheque returned to Parr's, Kensington." The cheque, as above stated, was not in fact returned to Parr's Kensington branch. At 3 30 p.m. the defendants, after certain negotiations, made up their minds not to pay the cheque, and at 4 5 p.m. on the same day it was returned to Parr's Bank at Kensington with a notice that it would not be paid. At the country clearing at noon on November 3, 1897, the plaintiffs' clerk, having received the defendants' telegram, handed to the clerk to Williams, Deacon, and Co. a note requesting them to debit the plaintiffs for cheque returned to Kensington by the Staines bank and to credit Williams, Deacon, and Co. with the sum of £307. On November 3, 1897, the plaintiffs' Kensington branch honoured an acceptance of Tom Frost payable at that branch for £65. The Kensington manager stated in evidence that he would not have honoured the draft if the cheque had been returned on that morning.

A number of witnesses were called by the defendants with the object of proving that country managers did not in practice act upon the non-return of a country cheque, and would not, on the faith of such cheques not having been returned, allow their customers to draw upon their accounts. They stated that country managers would assume in the circumstances that such a cheque had been paid.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C. (Mr. Marshall Hall, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiffs, contended that there had been a payment by the defendants of the cheque for £307; secondly, that as to the £65 paid to Frost on November 3, 1897, the defendants were estopped.

Mr. BRAY, Q.C. (Mr. J. E. Banks with him), for the defendants, argued that there was no payment as to £307, and no estoppel as to £65.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that although the cheque for £307 was placed to the credit of Frost on October 30, 1897, at the plaintiffs' Kensington branch, it was not so placed to his credit as to entitle him to draw against it. When the cheque for £307 was sent to the defendants it was their duty to fill up the slip and inform Williams, Deacon, and Co. whether they intended to honour that cheque. On November 2, 1897, they filled up a slip intimating that they intended to pay the cheque, and returned it to Williams, Deacon, and Co. On the morning of November 3, 1897, the defendants changed their minds and sent a telegram informing Williams, Deacon, and Co. that they did not intend to pay the cheque. That telegram was an intimation to Williams, Deacon, and Co. that they were to inform the plaintiffs' clerk at the Clearing-house at noon on that day that the cheque for £307 would not be paid and was not to be passed to the defendants' debit. That telegram added that the cheque for the £307 had been or, perhaps, would be returned to the plaintiffs' Kensington branch. If the defendants did not intend to pay that cheque they ought to have returned it in the ordinary course of business, and under rule 3 of the Clearing-house rules, to Parr's Bank at Kensington. In the opinion of the learned Judge it was the duty of the defendants to have sent that cheque back to the plaintiffs' Kensington branch by return of post—that is to say, on November 2, 1897—with an intimation that it would not be paid. The defendants had a printed form at their bank for the very purpose. The defendants did not fulfil that duty. They spent November 2 with Mr. Frost trying to see if they could get from him sufficient funds to meet the cheque. Meantime, they allowed the cheque to be dishonoured at the country Clearing-house, but took no steps to inform Parr's Bank at Kensington. The consequence was that on the morning when the cheque should have come back the Kensington branch treated it as though it were paid, and in his (the learned Judge's) opinion they were justified in so doing, and met an acceptance of Frost's for £65, which, in his opinion, they would not have done if they had known that the cheque had been dishonoured. The learned Judge found, as a fact, that the practice was for one country bank which received a cheque from another country bank which it did not intend to pay to return the cheque by return of post to the bank into which it had been paid. The defendants had not observed that practice, and they must have known what the result would be. The plaintiffs had acted on the faith of the representation made by the defendants when they met Frost's draft for £65. There was a representation that the cheque for £307 was a paid cheque and a representation that would lead the plaintiffs to act upon it. They had acted upon it. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs for £65, the defendants to have the benefit of any proof which the plaintiffs might have against the estate of Frost's.

STUART AND STEAMSHIP ALLEGHANY OF LONDON (LIMITED) v. THE MERCHANTS' MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Insurance—Marine—Total loss—Notice of abandonment—Liability of underwriters for damage by collision owing to improper buoying and lighting of the wreck.

Judgment was delivered in this case, which was heard before his Lordship on July 29 and August 1. The case raised an important question as to the liability of underwriters upon the hull of a sunken vessel after notice of abandonment for damage done by reason of the improper lighting and buoying of the vessel. The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment of the learned Judge.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. Lewis Noad appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Butler Aspinall for the defendants.

HIS LORDSHIP read the following judgment:—This is an action brought to recover damages for the breach of an alleged contract of indemnity. The question is whether in the circumstances of the case the contract to indemnify exists. The plaintiffs were the owners of a steamer called the Alleghany, and the defendants were the underwriters of the steamer against total loss. The policy, which is dated March 4, 1894, contained a collision clause, by which defendants undertook to hold the plaintiffs harmless (to the extent of three-fourths) against any damages which the plaintiffs might have to pay by reason of their vessel coming into collision with any other vessel. It contained also the ordinary sue and labour clause. The circumstances, shortly stated, are as follows:—On October 1, 1894, the Alleghany came into collision with a vessel called the Caucase in the Delaware river, and sank in a position which rendered her dangerous to craft navigating that river. The plaintiffs at once gave to the defendants a notice of abandonment, which the defendants in the usual course refused to accept. Thereupon the plaintiffs and defendants agreed, without prejudice to their respective rights, whatever they might be, to take joint action to salvo the property; and the captain engaged the services of a tug to watch the wreck for the double purpose of protecting it from further damage and of warning passing ships of the danger which it presented. This tug did its work so badly that on October 29, 1894, a steamer called the Siberian, belonging to the Allan Line, fouled the wreck, causing damage to the wreck and herself sustaining very serious injury. Thereupon an action was brought at the instance of the defendants, but in the name of the plaintiffs, against the owners of the Siberian, in which the allegation was that the fault lay entirely with the Siberian. In that action the Siberian counterclaimed, alleging that the casualty was due entirely to the negligence of the tug which had been employed to watch and to warn passing shipping. The action found its way to the House of Lords, where it was finally decided that the fault lay entirely with the tug, and judgment was given against the plaintiffs (who are the plaintiffs in the present action) on the Siberian's counterclaim for £7,963 15s. 3d. damages and £2,053 19s. 3d. costs. The defendants and the other underwriters on the Alleghany have paid three-fourths of this sum, by way of satisfaction of their liability under the collision clause. They have further paid a total loss on the Alleghany and all suing and labelling expenses, and they have thus undoubtedly paid all claims directly arising on the policy of insurance. The plaintiffs, however, contend that at the time when the cause of action arose on which the Siberian's counterclaim was based, the tug was in the service of the underwriters, and not of the plaintiffs, and that, therefore, the underwriters ought to indemnify them against the whole of the damages and costs incurred by the plaintiffs on the Siberian's counterclaim, and not merely against three-fourths of the amount. It is now admitted by the defendants, though it was for a long time denied, that on October 1, 1894, when she sank in the Delaware river, the Alleghany became at once a constructive total loss. I think the defendants' liability depends on the question whether, as between themselves and the owners of the Alleghany, the underwriters had or must be taken to have made themselves responsible for the proper watching of the wreck. When the Alleghany went down on October 1, 1894, it was impossible to ascertain whether she had become a total loss or not, and as the underwriters' liability depends on that question (for as I have said the policy was against total loss only), no one could say who was interested in the wreck. If the vessel was a total loss the plaintiffs had ceased to be interested in her, and the salvage, if it did not become the property of the underwriters, could at all events be claimed by no one else; whereas, on the other hand, if the vessel was not a total loss, the underwriters were in no way concerned with her. Thereupon, a correspondence began between the parties and their representatives. I do not propose to examine it in detail; it is sufficient for me to say that in my opinion it resulted in an agreement by which both parties undertook to work in salving and watching the submerged vessel on the terms that the work should be done on account of whom it might eventually turn out to concern. The policy itself contained a provision that no acts of the insurer or insured in recovering, saving, or preserving the property insured should be considered as a waiver or acceptance of abandonment, and both shipowner and underwriters were anxious to do nothing which might alter their position. A contract, dated October 6, 1894, was made with an American salvage company for raising the wreck and a tug was engaged to watch it. This was done in the name of the master, but really on account of whom it might ultimately turn out to concern. The plaintiffs and the defendants at the same time sent out their respective marine surveyors to look after their interests, and these gentlemen acted together throughout. Matters were in this position when the collision with the Siberian took place, a collision admittedly due entirely to the careless way in which the wreck had been watched and marked, in my opinion, solely in the interest of the underwriters. It was not known at the time whether the Alleghany was a total loss or not, but it is now admitted that she was then a total loss, so that no one had any interest in the wreck except the underwriters. It is said that the captain in engaging the tug was acting under the suing and labelling clause in the policy, and that, if he was unfortunate enough to engage careless men that is his lookout and not the underwriters'. But, even if he was so acting, in my opinion he was the agent of the underwriters and not of the shipowners. It was for the former that he was trying to salvo the property and not for the latter, who in fact had no interest in it. But the truth is that the whole work was being done on terms, as between shipowner and underwriters, that it should be on account of whom it might turn out to concern, and subsequent events—viz., the subsequent ascertainment of the fact that at the time in question the vessel was a total loss, have shown that the only persons concerned were the underwriters. This, I think, is conclusive of the case and fixes the liability on the defendants. What subsequently took place was this. The underwriters determined to sue the Siberian for the damage done to their wreck and they applied for and obtained the consent of the plaintiffs to use the plaintiffs' name for that purpose. They then commenced an action, in the plaintiffs' name, in the English Courts. The plaintiffs had nothing at all to do with that action. It was conducted throughout by the underwriters' solicitors and at the underwriters' cost, and it was brought for their sole benefit. Very soon the underwriters discovered that it was not worth prosecuting, but by the time they had made this discovery the Siberian's counter-claim had got upon the record, and that the underwriters could only get rid of by dropping all further proceedings and paying their own costs. This course, unfortunately, they refused to adopt and the counterclaim was consequently tried with the result already stated. The defendants contend that, in any event, each underwriter is liable only for a proportion of the claim, to be measured according to the amount underwritten by him. But this is not an action on the policy; this is an action for an indemnity arising out of the fact that the plaintiffs have been called upon and compelled to pay damages and costs for which the underwriters were in truth, though not in form, jointly liable to the owners of the Siberian. The underwriters are jointly liable to make good the loss which the plaintiffs have sustained, and there must be judgment accordingly.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1898.
Chitty and Collins, L.J.J.) } Aug. 4.
FIELDEN V. MAYOR, &C., OF MORLEY.*

Local Government—Water supply—Local authority—Statutory powers—Outfalls—Construction of Acts.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne's dismissing the action with costs. This related to the rights and duties of the defendant corporation as the water authority of their district under the Morley Corporation Water Act, 1890. The defendant corporation, in pursuance of the Act, have constructed a catch-water conduit over moorland belonging to the plaintiff, and at one point on the plaintiff's land have made a weir or by-wash, which allows water rising in time of storm above a certain level in the conduit to overflow and pass down a natural gully over the plaintiff's land, which in time of storm forms the channel of a hillside torrent. The plaintiff asserted that, inasmuch as this by-wash was not indicated in the plans deposited by the corporation when they applied for their Act, it is not a work authorized by it, and further that, inasmuch as by section 18 of their Act they are bound to keep the catchwaters, conduits, and lines of pipes for conveying water through the plaintiff's estate "water-tight," by having a by-wash they are contravening the enactment. The plaintiff claimed an injunction and damages. The defendants asserted, on the other hand, that the by-wash was an incidental work authorized in general words by the 8th section of their Act of Parliament, which defines the authorized works belonging to the class of incidental works to be constructed at the points found desirable in the course of construction of the works specifically authorized and described in deposited plans, and further that the total amount of water sent down the gully in time of storm did not exceed what would have passed had the waterworks not been made, and therefore no damage was caused to the plaintiff. Mr. Justice Byrne dismissed the action, with costs, giving costs as between solicitor and client, considering himself bound to do so under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and the recent decision of Mr. Justice Romer in "The North Metropolitan Tramways Company v. London County Council" ([1894] 2 Ch. 145; 14 The Times L.R., 414).

Mr. Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh Clare were for the plaintiff in support of the appeal; Mr.

Eve, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker for the respondent corporation.

The MASTER of the ROLLS gave the judgment of the Court dismissing the appeal, confirming the finding of the Court below on the facts and finding that no more water ever passed down the gully than would have passed had the conduit and works not been made. His Lordship continued:—Now comes the question of law—Was the corporation entitled to make the outfall in question? This question involves two others, viz. (1) Was the corporation entitled to make the outfall under their general powers? (2) If they were, are they deprived of that power by section 18, which specially protects the plaintiff? The general power to make outfalls is conferred by section 6 of the special Act and by section 12 of the Waterworks Consolidation Act, 1847, which is incorporated by section 2 of the special Act. Section 6 of the special Act states that, subject to the provisions of this Act—i.e., subject to section 18 and also to the incorporated provisions of the general Acts mentioned in section 2—the defendants may construct the aqueduct in question and all necessary and proper outfalls connected with it. But there is a limit put to this power by section 6 and section 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847. Section 6 requires that land and streams taken under the compulsory powers must be purchased and paid for, and that compensation must be made for such lands and for lands injuriously affected by the construction and maintenance of the authorized works, and section 12 requires that in the exercise of their statutory powers the corporation shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full compensation to all parties interested for all damage sustained by them through the exercise of such powers. Then section 2 incorporates the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and also section 140 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, which provide the machinery for ascertaining and obtaining such compensation. It was contended by Mr. Clare that apart from section 18, to which we will refer presently, the outfall or by-wash was not authorized by section 6 because it was not necessary and proper within the meaning of that section. He contended that the storm water poured by the gully into the aqueduct could be got rid of without injury to the plaintiff by means of the culvert communicating with the stream at the bottom of the hills. This contention is based not only on section 6 of the special Act, but on section 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which we have already referred to. If the contention were correct in fact there might have been ground for interference, as in "Coats v. Clarence Railway Company" (1 R. and M., 181) and other cases of that class. But, in our opinion, the evidence as to this does not show that the culvert without the by-wash would be nearly so efficacious or proper in an engineering sense as the culvert with the by-wash, and we are unable to adopt the view contended for. In other words, we are of opinion that the outfall or by-wash is authorized by section 6 if not prohibited by section 18. It follows that it is not the province of the Court to interfere with the outfall or by-wash on the ground that it should have been differently constructed or have been in some other place. It has been long settled that it is not the province of the Court to dictate how works authorized by Parliament shall be carried out, although it is the duty of the Court to see that Parliamentary powers are not exceeded. The two classes of cases are not always easy to distinguish, as may be seen from "Herrou v. Rathmines, &c., Commissioners" (1892, A.C., 498), which related to the construction of a reservoir. But the principle on which the Court acts is well settled. Provided the defendants have not exceeded their powers, the particular mode of exercising them is left to those to whom the powers are entrusted (see per Lord Macnaghten, "Herron v. Rathmines, &c., Commissioners," 1892, A.C., 527-530, and "A. G. v. Metropolitan Railway Company," 1884, 1 Q.B., 384, supp. 390-391). It was urged that the defendants could not under their general powers make an outfall where necessary and proper from their point of view, and flood, say, a street or house or garden, making compensation for the injury done. We are not prepared to say they could do so. The principle of "Coats v. Clarence Railway Company" might apply to such a case. It is sufficient, however, to say we have no such case to deal with. It may well be that if there had been danger of such injury as suggested the language of the special Act would have guarded against it. The special Act before us must be taken to have been framed with reference to the works to be constructed and to the nature of the land on which they were to be made (see, per Lord Halsbury, 1892, A.C., 502, "Herron v. Rathmines Commissioners"). Having regard to the character of the land and to the existence upon it of a natural channel for storm water, the use which the defendants have made of that channel is, in our opinion, authorized by the general powers conferred upon the defendants. The fact that water from the east of the outfall passes down as well as water from the gully does not render it improper to have the outfall. What water passes down is of no consequence provided no damage is done to the plaintiff, and if damage is done his remedy is for compensation and not by injunction unless the outfall itself is an unauthorized work. This brings us to the second question—viz., What is the effect of section 18 upon section 6? The plaintiff's counsel strongly contended that section 18 prohibited any outfall being made upon the plaintiff's land. This would be a strange result considering that the aqueduct crosses no land but his. The plaintiff's contention on this part of his case is based entirely on the use of the word "watertight" in section 18 (b). But this word has to be applied to what the corporation is empowered to make—i.e., aqueducts or conduits with all necessary and proper outfalls and conveniences; and to hold that the power to make proper outfalls on the plaintiff's lands is excluded by the use of the word watertight in section 18 (b) is to put a strained construction on that word for which we can find no sufficient justification. Full effect is given to the word watertight by confining its application to those parts of the works which, from an engineering point of view, ought to be watertight. Section 18 cannot reasonably be interpreted as prohibiting what section 6 authorizes. But section 18 has a very important operation favourable to the plaintiff. It imposes conditions on the construction and continued use of the works authorized by section 6. One condition is that if any damage is done at any time by the flow of water from the defendants' works on to the plaintiff's land such damage shall be made good from time to time as it arises. This gives the plaintiff more extensive rights than he would otherwise have had. If, when the plaintiff was bargaining for the insertion of section 18, he intended to stipulate that there should be no outfall on his land he should have expressed his intention in different language. The language used is inappropriate for such a purpose, and in our judgment conveys no such meaning. It appears to us, as it did to Mr. Justice Byrne, that authority to make proper outfalls at suitable places anywhere within the lines of deviation is given by section 6; and that section 18 does not prohibit what is there permitted. After mentioning a temporary obstruction complained of, his Lordship continued:—The truth, however, is that the plaintiff has never suffered, and is not likely to suffer, any damage whatever by the defendants' works. They have done him no injury whatever. They send no more water on to his land than came on it before their works existed. He has taken and insisted on an erroneous view of his rights based upon an extravagant interpretation of the word watertight in section 18 (b) of the Act which governs the case. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Mr. O. LEIGH CLARE asked that the order of Mr. Justice Byrne might be varied by reducing the costs from solicitor and client costs to party and party costs. He contended that the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne was wrong on this point for three reasons—in the first place, because the Act on which the decision was based did not apply, as was contended, to proceedings for an injunction; secondly, that the defendants were sued as a water authority and were not sued as a public authority within the meaning of the Act; and lastly, that Mr. Justice Romer, whose decision Mr. Justice Byrne followed, was not right in holding that the Court had no discretion under the Act.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that this was an exceedingly important question, which till this stage of the appeal they had not fully appreciated. They would give their decision, after having consulted with their brethren, at a future date.

JORDISON V. THE SUTTON, SOUTHCOATES, AND DRY POOL GAS CO.*

Nuisance—What amounts to—Exercise of statutory powers—Gas company—Interference with light and air—Injunction.

Judgment was delivered in this action, which was tried before his Lordship in February last. The nature of the case was stated in The Times of February 14 and 16 last. His Lordship then decided some issues of fact and reserved his decision upon some important points of law relating to the liability of a corporation in respect of acts done by them in the exercise of their statutory powers. Mr. Jordison, the plaintiff, is the owner of some 24 cottages in Hull adjoining the premises of the defendant gas company. In July, 1896, the gas company began by their contractors, Messrs. Holmes and King, who are also defendants, to excavate for the purpose of constructing a sunk gasholder tank in which to receive and seal with water a very large telescopic gasholder, intended to rise when fully inflated to over 100ft. above the ground level. The circular trench which the contractors made to build the enclosing well of the tank was only a few feet from the back wall of the nearest cottage. The trench was carried down to a depth of about 37ft., and the work had to be carried through a variety of strata, one of which, designated "running silt," was particularly difficult to deal with. This stratum was about 6ft. thick, and was immediately followed by a thin layer of soft clay, below that being a firm basis of impermeable gault clay. The plaintiff alleged that cracks on his land and in his cottages had occurred in consequence of subsidence caused by the withdrawal of water and sand in suspension from the running silt bed; and he further alleged that the contractors had not adopted the best known methods of damming back the water and silt during the operation of constructing the tank; in other words that there had been negligence. One question between the parties was whether, on the construction of the company's special Acts, coupled with the incorporated gas clauses Acts, the case was within the decision of "The Metropolitan Asylums Board v. Hill" (6 Ap. Ca., 193), in which it was held by the House of Lords that the Asylums Board could be restrained from erecting a smallpox hospital on land bought for the purpose in a residential neighbourhood, or the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in "The London and Brighton Railway Company v. Truman" (11 Ap. Ca., 45), in which it was held that the railway company were entitled to use land, bought under power to purchase additional land by voluntary agreement, for cattle sidings and yards, to the annoyance of the inhabitants of a residential district at Croydon. As to the removal of water and silt, the defendant company contended that they had a common law right to remove water, even if in doing so they abstracted matter in solution; and that any damage caused to their neighbours' property thereby was not actionable. It was also contended, as a matter of fact, that the subsidence which took place was due entirely to the abstraction of water alone and no appreciable subsoil had been abstracted. The defendant company also contended that they had statutory powers for public purposes coupled with a duty to supply gas which could only be fulfilled by the construction of the gasholder, and that, apart from the question of negligence in doing the work, they were entitled to interfere, to the extent to which they had interfered and proposed to interfere, with the rights which the plaintiff would otherwise have had. On February 15 his Lordship delivered judgment on the issues of fact, reserving for consideration the points of law necessary to be decided on those findings. He held that the gasholder, when erected and inflated to the proposed height of over 100ft., must interfere with access of light to the cottages, but that he could not say that the method of doing the work was improper. He held that the plan adopted had been skillfully carried into execution, and that the subsidence was due not merely to the abstraction of underground water, but also to the abstraction of silt held in suspension in the water abstracted.

Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Dighton Pollock were for the plaintiff; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., the Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Boome were for the gas company; Mr. Rawlins, Q.C., and Mr. Bardswell were for the contractors.

Mr. JUSTICE NORTH said that he had already held that the defendants, the contractors, had not been negligent, though the means which they employed to prevent the escape of the "running silt" turned out to be insufficient, and the plaintiff's buildings were seriously damaged. His Lordship was clearly of opinion that there had been considerable damage to the plaintiff's property by reason of the withdrawal of support from his houses by the acts of the defendants; and that, if the completion of the gasholder as proposed were permitted, the light would also be materially diminished. The right of the plaintiff to have his land and buildings supported by the adjoining land was clear, and his right to access of light was equally clear, unless those rights could be displaced by some equally clear right on the part of the defendants. The question was whether the defendants had any legal justification for what they had done and were doing. The defendants' first proposition was that the construction of the trench and the erection of the gasholder were acts for which the company had statutory powers, with a statutory duty to exercise them, and that those powers could not be released, and no easement could be acquired in derogation of them. His Lordship thought that there was one conclusive answer to the principal argument of the defendants, that their Acts conferred on them an absolute right and duty to do the acts complained of upon this very site. This proposition was, in his Lordship's opinion, wholly unfounded. The company's Acts did, indeed, authorize the erection of a gasholder at this place, but there was no obligation upon the company to place it upon this exact site, or to make it of such a height or size as they had chosen to do. While the Act defined the land upon which the works might be done, if the company could buy it, it did not anywhere prescribe what the works were to be, nor require anything to be done which must necessarily injure the plaintiff. To make out their case the company must show that they could not, without interference with the plaintiff's rights, do something which they were bound to do. In that they had wholly failed. If the gasholder had been somewhat smaller, or somewhat further from the plaintiff's land, there was no reason for supposing that it would have interfered with his right to light or to support. And, beyond all this, it was a mistake to say that an absolute power to do such things as were complained of could be found in the Acts. Such rights or powers as were conferred upon the defendant company, so far from being absolute or unqualified, as asserted by counsel, were very strictly limited and guarded. Section 29 of the Gas Works Clauses Act, 1845, provided that nothing therein, or in the special Act contained, should prevent the undertakers from being liable to an indictment for a nuisance, or to any other legal proceeding to which they might be liable in consequence of making or supplying gas. And section 9 of the Gas Works Clauses Act, 1871, enacted that "nothing in this or the special Act shall exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance, in the event of any nuisance being caused by them." And in his Lordship's opinion the interference with the plaintiff's support and light was a nuisance. In the "Smallpox Hospital case" Mr. Baron Pollock said (at p. 443), "A statute which justified the defendants in creating a nuisance to neighbours would seem by parity of reasoning to justify the diminution of light or air; and this though the statute contained no provisions for compensating those who might be injured by its operation"; and, paraphrasing that so as to apply it to the present case, his Lordship held that the Acts which forbade the gas company to create a nuisance to a neighbour also forbade the taking away of his light or of the support to his land, especially when the Acts contained no provision for compensating those injured by their operation. His Lordship accordingly held that the case was governed by the class of decisions of which "The Metropolitan Asylums Board v. Hill" is an example, and not by the class of decisions as to railway companies of which "The London and Brighton Railway Company v. Truman" is an instance. His Lordship then dealt with some other arguments which had been presented on behalf of the defendant company. He then dealt with the case of the contractors, as to whom it had been contended that they could only be liable for negligence, and that there could be no negligence without neglect of duty, and that they owed no duty to the plaintiff. His Lordship failed to follow this argument. They were the persons who by their workmen made the excavation upon the company's land, the result of which was wrongfully to remove part of the plaintiff's soil, and thereby to cause the land above it to slip and subside, and so damage the buildings thereon. If this did not give a cause of action his Lordship did not know what did. Nor did it matter how much care they took in what they did, if that care did not suffice to prevent the injury. If no amount of care could have prevented it, the act ought not to have been done at all. His Lordship accordingly granted an injunction, but it was not to prevent the company from raising their gasholder on its north side to the height of 68ft. from the surface of the ground. As to the interference with the support of the plaintiff's land no injunction was now required, for there had been no further subsidence. The plaintiff was entitled to damages for the injury which had been done, and his Lordship assessed the amount himself (as he had been requested to do) at £340. This did not include any damage for interference with light, nor any sum in respect of damages which might arise hereafter in consequence of any future subsidence which would give a new and separate cause of action. The injunction would issue against the company, and the damages would be awarded against all the defendants. There would be judgment against the company for the plaintiff's costs of the action, and against the other defendants for so much of the plaintiff's costs as related to interference with support, and its consequences.

IN RE A DEBTOR—EX PARTE THE PETITIONING CREDITORS.*

Bankruptcy—Petition—Right to present—Domicil of debtor—"Ordinarily resided . . . in England"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 6 (1) (d).

This was an appeal against the dismissal by Mr. Registrar Giffard of a bankruptcy petition on the ground that the debtor had not within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition ordinarily resided in England as required by section 6 (1) (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The petition was presented on May 20, 1898, by judgment creditors for £1,500, and the act of bankruptcy alleged was non-compliance with the bankruptcy notice founded on that judgment. It appeared that in the early part of the present year the debtor had brought an action in this country against a company in which he was interested, and that an application had been made against him by the defendants for security for costs on the ground that he was not resident within the jurisdiction. In answer to that application the debtor, on March 15, swore an affidavit in which he deposed that for the last six years he had carried on an English business in London at various addresses, which he had every intention of continuing, and had for the greater part of that time resided in England, only visiting Paris periodically; and that he was then residing at 16, Upper Bedford-place, Russell-square, where he intended to remain permanently. The petitioning creditors relied strongly upon this affidavit, and they adduced evidence showing that the debtor stayed at the Charing-cross Hotel for a fortnight in August, 1897; that he came again on October 19, and stayed till December 18; that he came again on January 11, 1898, and stayed till March 4; that, though he was not much there during the latter part of the time, he paid for his bed room whether he was there or not; that on January 19, 1898, he took a bed room at a boarding house, No. 16, Upper Bedford-place, and stayed there till the date of the bankruptcy petition, with occasional absences abroad amounting to about a third of the whole time. The debtor on his cross-examination before the Registrar stated that for the last six years he was more in Paris than in London and that he did not read the affidavit of March 15 before swearing it. He deposed further that his wife and family were living in Pau on his property; that he carried on business at Paris at an office, part of which he retained for his own use; and that his presence in London was in consequence of the action which he had brought in this country. Upon this evidence the Registrar came to the conclusion that there had been no sufficient residence in England during the prescribed period to give the Court jurisdiction to entertain the petition, which he dismissed accordingly. The petitioning creditors appealed.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. E. F. Spence were for the petitioning creditors; Mr. Mattinson, Q.C., and Mr. G. F. Hart were for the debtor.

The following cases were cited:—"In re Hequard" (24 Q.B.D., 71), "In re Norris" (5 Morrell Bkcy. Cas., III.), "In re Erskine" (10 The Times L.R., 32), and "In re Nordenfelt" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 151).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS was of opinion that any doubt which might exist upon the evidence apart from the affidavit of March 15 was removed by the affidavit itself. The question to be determined under section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act was whether the debtor had "within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition ordinarily resided in England." The year to be considered began in May, 1897, and ended in May, 1898. All that the section required was that within that period this debtor should have ordinarily resided in England. It said nothing as to how long, nor as to what period in the year, nor as to the residence being in one place. The evidence showed that the debtor was very much in England from October, 1897, till May, 1898, and in his Lordship's opinion he might properly be said to be residing in London during that time, sometimes at an hotel and sometimes at a boarding-house, though he was away at times in Paris and elsewhere. Still, if that were all, he was not prepared to say that the case would not be rather near the line, but all doubt was removed by the affidavit. He could not accept the debtor's statement that he never read the affidavit. To allow a man to swear an affidavit and then say that he never read it would be to throw serious aspersions upon the character of the solicitor who prepared the affidavit, and also upon the commissioner who administered the oath. The appeal should be allowed and the petition referred back to the Registrar to be heard upon the merits; costs of the appeal to be the petitioning creditors' in any event.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. The debtor's explanation as to the affidavit involved a very serious charge against the solicitor, who was not called as a witness. A solicitor would commit a most grievous breach of duty if he framed an affidavit in such a matter as this and told his client to swear it without reading it. That was one of the grounds upon which a solicitor had been struck off the rolls some time ago. The practice of not reading affidavits would be most effectively stopped by holding the deponents bound by the statements contained in them.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

WEST LONDON SYNDICATE (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Ad valorem duty—Amount payable—Conveyance on sale—Agreement for sale—Leasehold interest in licensed house—Goodwill—Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 59 (1).

Decision of Divisional Court (ante, p. 145, and [1898] 1 Q.B., 226) reversed (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting).

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Channell), reported ante, p. 145; (1898) 1 Q.B., 226, upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., cap. 30). On January 4, 1897, an instrument was presented on behalf of the West London Syndicate (Limited) to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The instrument was dated March 19, 1895, and was an agreement under seal for the sale by Percy Thorne to the syndicate of, first, the goodwill of the business of an hotel proprietor and licensed victualler carried on by the vendor at Fischer's Hotel, 11, Clifford-street, New Bond-street, and the benefit of the licences and contracts and privileges of the vendor; secondly, the lease of the hotel, subject to the yearly rent of £964; thirdly, the household furniture, fixtures, and fittings; fourthly, the stock-in-trade and also cash in hand and book-debts. The consideration for the sale was the payment by the syndicate of the business debts of the vendor, amounting to £1,335 8s. 4d., and the sum of £4,250, of which sum £1,462 16s. 3d. was for furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash. Clause 6 of the agreement was this:—"The leasehold premises hereby agreed to be sold being only assignable with the consent of the landlords from whom the same are held, the vendor shall use his best endeavours to obtain the requisite consent for the assignment thereof to the syndicate or their assigns, and in the event of such consent not being obtained the vendor shall at the option of the syndicate execute a declaration of trust of the said leasehold premises in its favour." The Commissioners were informed by the solicitor to the syndicate that the debts were £1,335 8s. 4d., and that, therefore, the purchase consideration was £5,585 8s. 4d., including for lease and goodwill £4,085 8s. 4d., and that it was quite impossible to sever the goodwill from the lease itself because the goodwill was considered to be of no value, as it could not exist apart from the lease, but that without a covenant restricting the vendor from carrying on business the lease would be of less value by £400. The Commissioners called for the production of any assignment of the leasehold premises which might have been executed, and a declaration of trust, bearing date March 21, 1895, by which the equitable interest in the leasehold premises became vested in the syndicate, was produced. The Commissioners invited the solicitor for the syndicate to present the declaration of trust for adjudication, so that the question of the proper stamp duty payable upon that deed might be considered and assessed by them in conjunction with any assessment to be made upon the instrument, but he declined to accede to this invitation, and stated that the amount of duty to be paid upon the declaration of trust was not then in question. The Commissioners, having regard to the provisions in sections 5 and 15 of the Stamp Act, 1891, were of opinion that, inasmuch as neither the sum of £4,085 8s. 4d. nor any other part of the consideration had been expressed by the declaration of trust to be apportioned to the leasehold premises so as to make that instrument chargeable according to its terms with ad valorem duty as a conveyance on sale, the whole consideration, except the sum of £1,462 16s. 3d. apportioned by clause 2 of the agreement as the consideration for the furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash, was to be regarded as applicable to the other property sold under the agreement. The Commissioners were, therefore, of opinion that the agreement was chargeable under section 59 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891, with ad valorem conveyance duty on the said sum of £5,585 8s. 4d., less the sum of £1,462 16s. 3d. apportioned as aforesaid, making the net sum of £4,122 12s. 1d. The Commissioners accordingly assessed the ad valorem stamp duty of £20 15s. upon the agreement, being the ad valorem duty of 5s. for every £50 of the sum of £4,122 12s. 1d., payable under the head "Conveyance or transfer on sale" in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and they also assessed the fixed duty of 10s. in respect of the agreement for the sale of the said leasehold premises, furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash. The instrument has since been stamped in accordance with the assessment. The syndicate, being dissatisfied with the assessment so far as it related to the amount of the ad valorem duty, required the Commissioners to state a case. The questions for the opinion of the Court were—(1) Whether the instrument was chargeable with the ad valorem duty of £20 15s., in accordance with the assessment of the Commissioners; (2) if not, with what amount of ad valorem duty the instrument was chargeable. By section 59 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891, "Any contract or agreement made in England or Ireland under seal or under hand only . . . for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever, or for the sale of any estate or interest in any property, excepting lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, or property locally situate out of the United Kingdom, or goods, wares or merchandise, or stock or marketable securities, or any ship or vessel . . . shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty to be paid by the purchaser as if it were an actual conveyance on sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold." The Divisional Court held—(1) that the agreement was not an agreement for the sale of an equitable interest in property within the meaning of section 59 (1); (2) that it was not an agreement for the sale of any estate or interest in any property except lands, as regards the goodwill, within the meaning of section 59 (1), inasmuch as the goodwill of a publichouse could not be severed from the enjoyment of the land; and (3) that the ad valorem duty was payable in respect of the book debts only. The Commissioners appealed.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., Mr. Spearman, and Mr. W. R. Smith appeared for the syndicate; the Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. Danckwerts for the Commissioners.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment allowing the appeal, Lord Justice Vaughan Williams dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment in the course of which he said that it was common ground that section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, was passed to saddle with stamp duty at the earliest possible moment contracts and agreements which came within the section, so that the Crown should not have to wait for its duty until a more formal document might be executed, and if not executed be deprived of the duty altogether, which was found to be the case under the provisions of the older Stamp Act, 1870. Taking the instrument of March 19, 1895, by itself, did the option given by clause 6 to the purchasers (the syndicate) to take a declaration of trust, if so minded, instead of a conveyance of a legal interest constitute a contract or agreement for the sale of an equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever? It would be seen that, apart from this option, the document was a contract to convey a legal and not an equitable interest. The purchasers were under no obligation to take a declaration of trust. They had not contracted that they would do so, and to constitute a contract or agreement within the meaning of section 59 there must, in his opinion, be correlative obligations on each side—on the one to sell, and on the other to purchase; and as there was in this case no obligation upon the side of the purchasers to take a declaration of trust, for they might or might not do so, just as they pleased, in his judgment the instrument of March 19, 1895, was not a contract or agreement for the sale of any equitable interest whatever within the section. It was argued for the Crown that, as at the time the instrument was taken to the Commissioners the purchasers had taken a declaration of trust, this fact converted the instrument into a contract or agreement for the sale of an equitable interest; but in his opinion that was not so, for the question was what the instrument was when it was signed. He agreed with Mr. Justice Channell upon this, and this point taken by the Crown could not be maintained. Lord Justice Rigby drew the inference outside the document, that the intention of the parties was to merely take an equitable interest, but he (Lord Justice A. L. Smith) would rather not found his judgment upon this. The second question was whether the goodwill which was agreed to be sold and purchased by the instrument was a sale of property other than land. That goodwill was property within the meaning of the Stamp Act was clear (see “Potter v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue,” 10 Ex., 147). It was also clear that goodwill was not land. Goodwill, therefore, prima facie came within the express terms of section 59 as being property other than land. But it was argued for the syndicate that Sir George Jessel, M.R., in “In re Kitchen, ex parte Punnett” (16 Ch.D., 226) held that upon the sale of a publichouse the goodwill of the publichouse passed with the house, for the goodwill was the mere habit of the customers resorting to the house. It was said that goodwill in the present case was therefore nothing but the enhancement of the value of the premises agreed to be sold, and could not be, and was not, property apart from such premises. He did not agree with this, for, in his opinion, goodwill was as capable of being sold as a separate entity for what it was worth as was the tenant's interest in the lease. It might be that by the terms of a lease each must be sold, if at all, to the same person, but that did not prevent them from being sold as separate and distinct entities, and if so sold goodwill was property and not land. In the present case, by the instrument of March 19, 1895, the parties had expressly, as he thought, sold the goodwill, licences, and contracts relating thereto separate and apart from the lease and other entities contracted to be sold. If the intention of the parties was the governing factor, the parties had declared their intention to that effect upon the face of the instrument. The goodwill was contracted to be sold separately by the vendor, and if so it clearly was not land. It could not be truly said that the goodwill in this case was merely an enhancement of the value of the land and nothing more, and was sold as part and parcel of the lease so as to be land. In his opinion the Crown was right in saying that in this case the goodwill was property other than land, and he saw no reason to think that the value assessed by the Commissioners thereon was not correct. In his judgment the Crown succeeded upon the appeal, which must be allowed, and the Crown must have the costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS dissented. He read a judgment in which he said that he agreed with the judgment of the Divisional Court, and he adopted entirely the reasons given by Mr. Justice Channell. In his opinion the instrument in question was not a contract or agreement for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever. It was a contract for the sale of a legal interest, and the option given to the purchasers, which they were not bound to exercise, to call for a declaration of trust in the event of the landlord's consent to a legal assignment not being obtained, did not convert the instrument into a contract for the sale of an equitable estate or interest. The purchasers, in the event of the vendor failing to obtain the landlord's assent, could have treated the contract to purchase as at an end. It was, in his opinion, impossible to draw the inference that the intention between the parties was that the vendor could have compelled the purchasers to accept a declaration of trust as a performance of the contract contained in the instrument. As regards the next question, whether the instrument was a contract or agreement for the sale of any estate or interest in any property excepting lands, tenements, or hereditaments, this depended upon whether the goodwill, which was by a separate clause included in that which was agreed to be sold and purchased by this instrument, was sold and purchased as land, that was, as something enhancing the value of the land and inseparable from it, or whether it was sold and purchased as property other than land. There could be no doubt that goodwill might be so inseparably connected with land—e.g., with a particular house, as to pass under a conveyance of land (see “Lindley on Partnership,” sixth edition, p. 441). In the present case the goodwill of the hotel was included in the lease, and by the terms of the lease the business could not be removed from the house demised without the landlord's consent. The goodwill was made inseparable by the terms of the lease. The goodwill did not belong to the vendor so that he could sell it apart from the lease. It was part of the reversion of the landlord. Moreover, the goodwill of a leasehold publichouse had generally been treated as part of the demised premises “In re Kitchen, ex parte Punnett.” That case showed that goodwill might, for the purpose of conveyance, be separated from realty, and if so separated it would be liable to duty as property; yet if it was not so separated it would be treated, on a sale of the premises where the business was carried on, as something enhancing the value of the realty, and, pro tanto, augmenting the duty on a conveyance of the place where the business was carried on. His Lordship then referred to “Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Angus” (23 Q.B.D., 579); “Potter v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue”; “Cooper v. Metropolitan Board of Works” (25 Ch.D., 472). In his opinion one ought not to treat a contract for the sale of the goodwill of a business carried on in a leasehold hotel under a lease which made the business inseparable from the demised premises, where the sale included an assignment of the lease, as a contract for the sale of the goodwill separate from the leasehold premises, unless one could find in the contract a clear intention to separate the goodwill from the leasehold premises and to treat it otherwise than as something attached to the leasehold hotel enhancing its value. In the present case, in his opinion, it was not the intention of the parties to sell the goodwill as something separate from the hotel. The purchasers could not deal with or enjoy the goodwill separately from the hotel. The vendor had no power to sever the business from the hotel. There were no separate prices in the contract for the hotel and the goodwill. He could find no fact in the present case from which one could infer an intention to deal with the goodwill separately from the hotel.

KEMP V. CHRISTMAS AND ANOTHER.*

Pound Breach—2 Will. and Mary, c. 5, sec. 4—Treble damages—Non-suit—New trial ordered.

An action for treble damages under 2 Will. and Mary, c. 5, sec. 4, is maintainable without proof of special damage.

This was an application by the plaintiff for a new trial of an action tried before Mr. Justice Ridley and a common jury, reported in The Times of June 21. The action was brought to recover damages from the defendants, Christmas and Bray, for wrongfully entering the plaintiff's land and premises and removing therefrom certain horses, carriages, and other property, upon which the plaintiff had distrained in respect of arrears of rent due to him from the tenant of part of the premises. The plaintiff claimed treble damages under the Act of 2 Will. and Mary, c. 5, section 4, which enacts that, in the case of "any pound breach or rescous of goods or chattels distrained for rent," the person grieved thereby may bring a special action upon the case to recover treble damages from the offender. The defendant Christmas alone appeared. By his defence he denied that he had broken or entered the plaintiff's premises, and pleaded that the distress had been abandoned by the plaintiff, and, further, that, if a pound breach or rescous had been committed, the plaintiff was not a person grieved by the same. The plaintiff's case was that he was the lessee and landlord of the Essex Arms Hotel at Watford, and as he did not require the stabling connected with the hotel he sublet it for £80 a year to a Mr. Hutton, a livery stable keeper, by an agreement made on September 22, 1897. It was a term of this agreement that the rent was to be paid in advance—£40 on September 29 and £40 on March 25. The rent was not paid, and on October 11 the plaintiff put in a distress. There were at the time two horses in the stable and a landau and some other carriages in the coachhouse. Mr. Hutton was served with a notice of the distress. On October 13 the defendants removed the horses, and they were subsequently found at Pinner in the possession of the defendant Bray. The carriages were also taken away. The rent distrained for being £40, the plaintiff claimed to be entitled, under 2 Will. and Mary, c. 5, section 4, to recover three times that amount and damages for the actual trespass. The plaintiff had brought an action in the Mayor's Court against the bailiffs for negligence in removing their man from possession and allowing the things to be taken, and in that action he had recovered the sum of £40 as damages. Mr. Justice Ridley was of opinion that the plaintiff had failed in the present case to show that he had suffered any damage, and he directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants. The plaintiff now applied for a new trial on the ground that the learned Judge had practically nonsuited him, and that the case ought to have been left to the jury. An offence had been committed against the statute, and the plaintiff thereupon became entitled immediately to the benefit of the remedy provided by the statute ; and that right was not affected by the fact that he subsequently recovered a sum of money in another action. Whenever a tort was committed, the person against whom it was committed was entitled to some damages, even though they might be small. Here the jury ought to have been asked what amount of damages they thought the plaintiff had suffered, and told that they might award him treble those damages. It was also pointed out that in "Jones v. Jones" (22 Q.B.D., 425) it was held that an action for pound breach under this section was a penal action ; and it was argued that on that ground the treble damages were enforceable, notwithstanding the fact of the plaintiff having received a sum of money from some other quarter by way of compensation.

Mr. G. M. Cohen appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. W. Tudor Howell for the defendant Christmas.

On the conclusion of the arguments, which were heard a fortnight ago, Lord Justice A. L. Smith said the Court would take time to consider their judgment. Mr. Cohen then said that the plaintiff, being merely willing to establish his right, would be content to accept any small sum which the Court might name to be trebled. Mr. Tudor Howell said that, in his client's absence, he was not in a position to agree to this offer. Lord Justice A. L. Smith said the defendant would do well to consider the offer.

The Court delivered judgment directing a new trial.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment :—This is an application by the plaintiff to set aside a verdict and judgment entered for the defendants, and for a new trial, upon the ground that the learned Judge misdirected the jury in telling them, as he did, to find a verdict for the defendants. From what was stated at the Bar we had hoped that the parties would have been able to come to a settlement in this case, but as they have not we must now give judgment. The action is brought against the defendants under 2 Will. and Mary, c. 5, sec. 4, for pound breach. This section enacts that on any pound breach or rescous of goods distrained for rent, the person grieved thereby shall in a special action upon the case recover treble damages and costs against the offender. By 5 and 6 Vict., c. 97, that part of this section which relates to treble costs is repealed, but that relating to treble damages is still left in force. It was proved that upon October 11, 1897, the plaintiff by his bailiffs distrained upon his tenant, Hutton, for £40 rent then due and in arrear, and certain horses and carriages were thereupon taken and impounded by the plaintiff's bailiffs as a distress for this rent. Evidence was given that upon October 13, 1897, whilst this distress was impounded, the defendants broke and entered the pound and rescued the goods distrained. The learned Judge has held that by reason of what the plaintiff did after this pound breach by the defendants, he had no cause of action when he issued his writ upon January 8, 1898, and the learned Judge directed a verdict and judgment for the defendants, the result of which is that the plaintiff has had to pay the costs of the defendants, which alone come, we are told, to some £90 in amount. Now, what the plaintiff did after this pound breach by the defendants was to sue his bailiffs in the Mayor's Court for negligence in allowing the horses and carriages distrained and impounded to be taken away by the defendants, and in that action he recovered damages against his bailiffs to the amount of £40, which I have no doubt were estimated upon the footing of the rent lost to the plaintiff by reason of the horses and carriages distrained, which were of at least that value, having been negligently allowed by the bailiffs to be taken away by the defendants. Having recovered this £40, the plaintiff then sued the defendants under section 4 of 2 Will. and Mary, c. 5, and for pound breach. Although the plaintiff gave evidence before the Judge and jury of a pound breach by the defendants without justification, the learned Judge nevertheless stopped the case, and directed a verdict for the defendants, because the plaintiff, in his action in the Mayor's Court, had recovered £40 against his bailiffs, which was one of the items he was seeking to treble and recover in the present action. In my judgment the plaintiff had a clear right not to have his pound invaded by the defendants and could sue them for having invaded that right, even although he proved no special damage, for he was entitled at any rate to nominal damages, and I cannot see upon what ground judgment could be entered for the defendants. It may be that the learned Judge in the view he took of the plaintiff's damages, assuming such view to be correct, might have directed a verdict for the plaintiff for nominal damages; but he has directed a verdict for the defendants, which is a very different thing, and which, in my judgment, in the circumstances of the case, he could not do. I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to have the verdict and judgment entered for the defendants set aside and a new trial granted, for this Court is not in a position to say for what amount the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, and the plaintiff's motion is only for a new trial. It may be—though I do not decide it—that when the case is tried again, it will appear that the plaintiff had a vested cause of action in him for treble damages against the defendants upon their being guilty of pound breach, and that the loss then occasioned to the plaintiff by reason of the rescue of the goods is the penalty the defendants must pay for unjustifiably breaking the pound and rescuing the goods therein, and that this is the act which constitutes the party grieved within the meaning of the statute, and that this is the date at which for this cause of action the damages are to be assessed, and not the date of the writ, as argued by the defendants. Moreover, what took place at the Mayor's Court is clearly no defence at all to this cause of action, though the £40 recovered therein may go in mitigation of the damages accruing to the plaintiff by reason of the pound breach and rescue of the goods. It seems to me, too, that the plaintiff was cut short by the direction of the learned Judge from showing if he could, as he was seeking to do, that he had sustained damages ultra the loss of the goods distrained, which represented his rent, for I see that Mr. Hammond Chambers, for the plaintiff, protested against a verdict and judgment being entered for the defendants before he had called his witnesses. There must be a new trial, and the costs of the first trial will abide the result of the second trial, but the costs of this appeal must be the plaintiff's in any event.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY delivered judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

REG. V. HOBBS.*

Gaming—Lottery—Sweepstake—16 and 17 Vict., c. 119.

The occupier of a licensed publichouse got up and managed a Derby sweepstake among his customers. Held, that he could not be indicted for an offence under the Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 119).

This was a case stated for the Court of Crown Cases Reserved by Mr. Justice Hawkins at the Lewes Summer Assizes. The trial was reported in The Times of July 18.

Mr. R. D. Muir appeared for the defendant; Mr.
H. Ivory for the Crown.

The defendant, Lewis I. Hobbs, was indicted for that he, being the occupier of a certain house known by the sign of the Yorkshire Grey, in the London-road, Hastings, unlawfully did use the said house for the purpose of money being received by him as and for the consideration for promises and agreements to pay thereafter money—namely, sums of £45, £20, and £10, and 100 other sums of 5s. each on certain events and of relating to a horse-race called the Derby Stakes.
Another count charged him with using the bar of the licensed premises known as the Yorkshire Grey for the purpose above mentioned. The case stated the facts thus:—The question raised upon this indictment is whether the sale of and receipt of the purchase money for tickets in an ordinary Derby sweepstake by a licensed victualler in the bar of the licensed house occupied by him amounts to an offence created by Statute 16 and 17 Vic., c. 119. The material facts are few and simple. The defendant, Lewis Irvin Hobbs, was from April 18 to May 11, both days inclusive, the licensed occupier of the Yorkshire Grey at St.
Leonards-on-Sea. He had been such occupier for eight or nine years previously, and during each of those years a sweepstake similar in all respects to that now in question had been promoted by him on the approach of the Derby day. It was a sweepstake to consist of 1,000 subscriptions of 2s. 6d. each, which, assuming all the subscriptions were made, would raise a sum of £125, of which 10 per cent., amounting to £12 10s., was to be deducted for expenses, leaving a balance of £112 10s. for distribution among the subscribers in the following manner:—To the drawer of the first prize—that is, the winner of the race—£45; second prize—that is, the second horse—£20; third prize—that is, the third horse—£10; to the drawers of 100 non-starters, 5s. each, which would take up £25; and the remainder was to be divided amongst the runners, £12 10s., which would make up a total of £112 10s.
A ticket similar to that annexed to the case was, on payment of 2s. 6d., issued to each subscriber for each ticket subscribed for by him. These tickets were before issue bound up in books (similar in form to bank cheque-books) of 25 tickets each, with counterfoils attached on which to write the name of the purchaser.
As each ticket was paid for it was detached from its counterfoil and handed to the purchaser, whose name and address were written on the counterfoil. The tickets were distributed, some in the Yorkshire Grey by the defendant himself, and by his wife and barmaid, who assisted him in the conduct of the house, and some by other persons to whom they were entrusted, away from the premises, one of such books for this year's sweepstake, from which six tickets had been sold, having been found on the person of one Talbot as hereafter mentioned, the names of other recipients of the books containing 475 tickets being found entered in a memorandum-book of the defendant's. A man named Mawle, a porter, formerly in the service of the defendant, on April 18 last (having been employed by the police so to do) went to the Yorkshire Grey and there purchased a ticket (No. 101) from the defendant's wife. On April 23 a similar ticket was sold in the house to a customer. On Sunday, April 24, two tickets were sold by the barmaid in the presence of the defendant, who, in reply to some observations, said, "You can spot (or find) the winner on Sunday as well as any other day." On April 26 five more tickets were sold to customers in the bar, and on April 29 defendant himself sold Mawle another ticket (No. 231), who paid 2s. 6d. for it. The whole of these sales were openly made. There was no drawing for the prizes this present year, because before the time had arrived the Yorkshire Grey was raided by the police, which, of course, stopped further proceedings with the sweepstake. But the drawings for each of the years 1896 and 1897 had been held at Saxon-chambers, a house adjoining but forming no part of the Yorkshire Grey. At such drawing about 20 persons were present. The witness Mawle had been doorkeeper on those occasions, and for his services he was paid by the defendant, who, in fact, paid all the other expenses connected with the sweepstake, including those of this year, and, if the fact be important, I have no reason to think that the 10 per cent. deducted for expenses was an unreasonable amount for that purpose. No other evidence was given or offered of any matter connected with the sweepstake than that I have mentioned. It was not even suggested that the defendant, who took no ticket, was either to receive any part of the money subscribed, except as already mentioned—or to supply or make good any deficiency in the event of all the tickets not being sold, and he gave no guarantee or promise to pay anything to anybody, except to distribute the money actually subscribed among the subscribers according to the terms of the tickets. On May 11 the inspector of police, under a search warrant issued under the Betting House Act, searched the Yorkshire Grey, but in the house found nothing beyond some books of tickets, some of which had been issued and torn from the counterfoils, and a book with names and addresses obviously of persons to whom similar books had been entrusted. A person named George Talbot was in the bar, where he was a daily visitor. It was said by the inspector that he was a betting man, and on search there were found upon him some papers and telegrams (one addressed to him at the Yorkshire Grey), which went strongly to prove that the inspector's description of him was correct. But there was nothing to indicate either that the defendant was concerned in betting or that any bets were ever made in his house. On this state of things Mr. Muir, for the defendant, objected that there was no evidence which could properly be submitted to the jury in support of this indictment, Mr. Horace Avory, for the prosecution, contending to the contrary. For the purpose of this case it was conceded by Mr. Muir that the sweepstake in question was a lottery, and I am strongly inclined to the opinion that it was so, although, as this indictment was only preferred under the Betting House Act, 1853, it is not necessary to pronounce any judgment upon that point. The case then set out the views of the learned Judge, who, with some doubt, left the matter to the jury. The jury convicted, and the learned Judge reserved the point, reserving judgment and allowing the defendant out on bail till the next assizes or till the decision of this Court.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. MUIR referred to the following cases:—"Sagar v. Stoddart" (18 Cox, 165), "Cartill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Company" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 490), "Caminada v. Hulton" (64 L.T., 572).

Mr. AVORY cited "Allport v. Nutt" ([1845] 1 C.B., 974).

The COURT set aside the conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that Mr. Justice Hawkins, the learned Judge before whom the case had been tried, had expressed grave doubt whether in law there ought to be a conviction. That doubt was well founded. Here there was no evidence proper to be left to the jury in support of the two material counts. In order to clear the ground it was well to say that the fact of the defendant being a publican made no difference, and for the purposes of this present decision it was quite irrelevant. The sweepstake was in precisely the same position as if it had taken place at a club or any other society of men. What took place was, in his opinion, a lottery, or if not a lottery it was at any rate not a betting transaction at all. His Lordship then referred to the Betting House Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vic., c. 119). At the time of the passing of that Act there existed legislation about lotteries, and betting was treated as a different and distinct subject of legislation from lotteries. The first part of the first section of the Betting House Act prohibited a house from being kept or used for the purpose of betting by persons resorting thereto; the second part of that section applied to cases where persons did not resort to a house, but where a house was kept or used for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of the owner as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement to pay money, &c., on any event or contingency of or relating to horse-racing, &c. Was there any evidence on the facts here that this house was used for either of those purposes? Both the first and second part of the section pointed to a contractual relation between the occupier and owner of the house and the client—an engagement in fact that the occupier or owner would pay money to the client in certain contingencies. He thought that that relation did not exist here. The landlord, for the purpose of adding to his popularity and that of his house, had said that he would manage the sweepstake, and after deducting the expenses would distribute the proceeds to the winners. He himself was to receive no profit and took no tickets. The subscription created a common fund, and the defendant only undertook to distribute the money received. He did not undertake to pay money. Further, this was not an undertaking to pay on an event or contingency of a horse race. It was not on that, but on the contingency of the drawing. The drawing might equally well take place after the race as before it. That made it clear it was dependent on the contingency of the drawing. That was sufficient as to the first section. A reference to the other sections of the Act made the impression all the stronger that the Act was applicable only to persons keeping a house for purposes of betting. He referred particularly to section 7, which prohibited any advertisement whereby it should be made to appear that any "house, office, room, or place is opened, kept, or used for the purpose of making bets or wagers in manner aforesaid." That being so, the case did not fall within the words of the Act, nor, in his opinion, within the category of the evils dealt with by the Act. He would not say, and he wished that to be clearly understood, that no criminal offence had been committed. He thought there had been a lottery, but that was not before the Court on this prosecution.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, and MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM concurred.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS in no way dissented from the decision, and wished to add that, in his opinion, the matter ought not to operate in the slightest degree to the prejudice of the defendant with the licensing authorities.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that no doubt the authorities concerned would give weight to this expression of opinion from the learned Judge who had heard all the facts.

MARTIN V. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Highway—Obstruction by County Council—New streets—Delay—Injury to individual.

When a local authority in carrying out public works under its statutory powers has been guilty of unreasonable delay or obstruction, a person injured thereby can maintain an action only when he can show an injury special to himself as distinct from the public generally.

This case, the trial of which was reported in The Times of July 7 last, now came on upon a motion by the defendants for judgment. The motion was heard on July 30 and August 5, and on August 6 his Lordship gave judgment. The action was brought against the County Council for unnecessarily and negligently blocking and obstructing Wellington-street, Deptford, and other thoroughfares leading to that street, in which the plaintiff resided as a leaseholder. It was alleged that in 1897, whilst making a new road cutting Wellington-street diagonally under their statutory powers, the County Council were guilty of unreasonable delay and of obstructing the approaches to the street at more points, in greater degree, and for a longer time than was useful—namely, over six months—with the result that the receipts of the plaintiff in his business fell off to such an extent that he had to give up the premises, and lost his interest therein and the goodwill of his business as a greengrocer after incurring extra expense and labour in getting his goods to his shop and from his shop to his customers. It was asserted that for some months the High-street ends of Watergate-street and Wellington-street were blocked up entirely (save for a narrow gangway), and a board put up marked "No thoroughfare"; that at the other end Wellington-street was blocked up as far as Armada-street and a similar board placed there; that the gangway which had been left for foot passengers was almost impassable owing to piles of sand and rubbish which had been heaped up close to it; and that the whole roadway was needlessly blocked by road-making material. The blocking of the High-street end continued from July, 1897, to January, 1898. The plaintiff's shop did not overlook the blocked part of the roadway, being beyond Armada-street, but he complained that he had been damaged by the blocking of the access from High-street. The workmen on the job were only half the number plaintiff would have expected to see on such work. In March, 1898, he surrendered his lease, which was for 21 years from 1892 and for which he had paid more than £200 by way of premium. In the course of the evidence it was admitted by the plaintiff that before the work was begun he had written complaining of the falling off in his receipts in consequence of the pulling down of houses in his neighbourhood by the County Council, and that his receipts in some weeks in October were higher than they were in July before the road-making was commenced. The learned Judge left to the jury the questions whether there had been unnecessary delay and obstruction, and the amount of the damage to the plaintiff, if any. The jury, being unable to agree, were discharged. The defendants moved that judgment might be entered for them.

Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. Daldy appeared for the defendants in support of the motion; Mr. Atherley-Jones, Q.C., and Mr. W. M. Thompson for the plaintiff. Mr. ATHERLEY-JONES, Q.C., submitted that the application would not lie. It was in the nature of an application for a nonsuit which his Lordship refused at the trial.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY overruled the objection.

Mr. DICKENS, Q.C., then proceeded to argue that the defendants were entitled to judgment. He submitted that, (1) even assuming the defendants had been guilty of unreasonable delay or obstruction, and damage had resulted to the plaintiff, no action would lie; (2) the plaintiff had not shown any substantial damage attributable solely to these acts; (3) if there were any evidence of such special damage, it was not so particular to the plaintiff as to give him a cause of action. He referred to the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1891, 54 and 55 Vict., c. cxxv., secs. 4, 12, 22, 23; and the London County Council (Improvements) Act, 1894, 57 and 58 Vict., c. cxxxv., sec. 43. Under those sections the defendants were entitled temporarily to stop up any carriage way or footway which they should think necessary to be stopped up. It was not a question as to whether the defendants had acted reasonably or unreasonably. The question was whether they had acted bona fide for the purposes of the Acts, and there was no suggestion that they had acted to the contrary. The highest the case for the plaintiff could be put was that it was a claim for nonfeasance, and that would not lie—Saunders v. Holborn District Board of Works ([1895] 1 Q.B., 64), Winterbottom v. Lord Derby (L.R., 2 Ex., 816). There was no evidence of damage suffered by the plaintiff different in kind from that of the rest of the public. Wilkes v. Hangerford Market (2 Bing. N.C., 281) had been overruled. Ricket v. Metropolitan Railway Company (5 B. and S., 156; L.R., 2 E. and I. App., 175) [MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY referred to Beckett v. Midland Railway Company (L.R., 3 C.P., 97)], Fritz v. Hobson (14 Ch. D., 542), and Benjamin v. Storr (L.R., 9 C.P., 400) were distinguishable.

Mr. DALDY submitted that in order to support an action of this kind the damages must be substantial, and there was no such evidence here.

Mr. ATHERLEY-JONES, Q.C., for the plaintiff, submitted that the undertakers of any public works authorized by statute were responsible for injuries peculiar to the person or limited section of persons aggrieved, which injuries had been inflicted by an improper or unreasonable exercise of the powers conferred upon them. In the cases cited for the defendants there was no peculiar injury to the plaintiffs. The test of remoteness of damage in cases like the present was—Was the injury common to the public at large? If a public body exercising statutory powers did work in a careless and improper manner, it was liable to a person who had premises contiguous to the works and who was injured by the improper and careless execution of the works. Ricket v. Metropolitan Railway Company was only binding upon the particular facts of that case. Lyon v. Fishmongers' Company (1 A.C., 662) was not consistent with the former case. [MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY said that the question was whether the fact that the street was rendered less comfortable to passengers, and that the plaintiff's business had thereby suffered, was sufficiently direct damage.] It was not necessary to allege or prove damage in the present case—Roe v. Groves (5 M. and G., 613); Mayne on Damages, 1894, 446; Owners of No. 7 Steam Sand Pump Dredger v. Owners of Steamship Grete Holme ([1897] A.C., 596).

MR. DALDY replied.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in giving judgment, said that the question he had to decide was whether any case had been made out by the plaintiff. The defendants were a public authority authorized by Act of Parliament to carry out improvement works in the district. They were bound to enter on a portion of Wellington-street. By section 12 of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1891, a number of powers and duties were prescribed to the defendants, and it was clear that under that section very large powers were given to them. They were a public body who had to carry out important works for the public good, and great discretion was entrusted to them with regard to stopping up particular streets and regulating and stopping traffic. It was at least arguable that, assuming that they did nothing in bad faith and that what was done was for the purposes of improvements, no action would lie for mere delay or for the extent to which the street was blocked. But there must always be the reservation that if they did certain classes of damage to the person or property through negligence or want of reasonable care they might in certain circumstances be held liable. For instance, if in the present case they had carelessly left heaps without lights they would be answerable. But in the present case the complaint was that at a street called Wellington-street, at the other end of the street to that in which the plaintiff's house was, they blocked up more of the road than they need have. It was also said they were two months longer over the work than they ought to have been. The plaintiff said he was prepared to prove that he had suffered damage by reason of the loss of customers through foot passengers being disheartened in going down the street, and that although there was a roundabout way by which they could go to his shop they would not do so. It was not contended that the obstruction continued after the making of, or for other purposes than, the improvements. It was not like the case of "Wilkes v. Hungerford Market," where the boarding was afterwards kept up unnecessarily. The plaintiff, who became the leaseholder of the shop after the passing of the Act of 1891, admitted that the most serious injury he suffered was from the destruction of certain premises for the purposes of improvement of a district from which he had previously drawn large custom. The fair result of the cases was that if a private person were injured by works of this description, if they were in the manner, or to the extent, unauthorized or unreasonable, the injured person would have a claim if, and only if, he proved that, by reason of that which was not authorized by the statute, he had been injured specially, directly, and substantially. By specially was meant an injury not merely common to any one living in that neighbourhood. That the injury must be direct was shown by the judgment of Mr. Justice Brett in the case of "Benjamin v. Storr." The plaintiff must show an injury special to himself as distinct from the public generally. Was the loss of some custom by the plaintiff a direct injury within the definition? In his opinion it was not. The house itself was in no way obstructed. There was always access to the shop, although by a roundabout way. The house in itself was not rendered less commodious for trading or less healthy for occupation. The injury was not direct in a sense in which the cases had treated it. The case of "Wilkes v. Hungerford Market" could no longer be treated as an authority, having regard to the observations of Lord Chelmsford in "Rickett v. The Metropolitan Railway Company" and Mr. Justice Willes in "Beckett v. Midland Railway Company." The present case was not one under such circumstances as gave a right of action, and there must be judgment for the defendants with costs, except the costs of the special jury.

Judgment accordingly. Execution stayed for three weeks, and if notice of appeal given within that time, then a stay until the hearing of the appeal.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1898.
Chitty and Collins, L.J.J.) } Aug. 8.

FIELDEN V. THE MAYOR, &C., OF MORLEY.*

Practice—Costs—Solicitor and client costs—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

In this case, after judgment had been delivered on the 4th inst. dismissing the plaintiff's appeal (reported ante, p. 566), the appellant's counsel applied that the order of Mr. Justice Byrne appealed from might be varied by reducing the costs from solicitor and client costs to party and party costs. It was submitted that the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne was wrong on this point for three reasons—first, because the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 61), on which his decision was based, did not apply, as was contended, to proceedings for an injunction; secondly, that the defendants were sued as a water authority, and were not sued as a public authority within the meaning of the Act; and, lastly, that Mr. Justice Romer, whose decision Mr. Justice Byrne had followed, was not right in holding that the Court had no discretion under the Act. The Act generalizes and amends certain statutory provisions for the protection of persons acting in the execution of statutory and other public duties, and enacts (inter alia) that wherever in any action comprised therein "a judgment is obtained by the defendant it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client." The question being an exceedingly important one, their Lordships reserved their decision until they had had an opportunity of consulting with their brethren.

The judgment of the Court on this point was delivered by

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—His Lordship said that the Act applied to all actions including what used to be suits in Chancery; it applied to actions for injunctions as well as to actions for damages. A dismissal of an action was equivalent to judgment for the defendant. The Act, however, did not apply to appeals nor to motions. Although the language was wide, the key to the enactment was its design to protect public bodies from expense when unsuccessfully sued in respect of acts done or omitted in the exercise of statutory powers or duties; and the present case, therefore, clearly fell within the enactment. The judgment of Mr. Justice Byrne as to costs would, therefore, stand, and the appeal would simply be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh Clare were for the appellant; Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker were for the respondents.

THE SOUTHWARK AND VAUXHALL WATER COMPANY V. THE WANDSWORTH DISTRICT BOARD OF WORKS.*

Metropolis—Streets—Water-pipes and mains—Repair of streets—Disturbance of pipes—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, sec. 98.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 508), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich dated the 8th of July last, and reported ante, p. 508. The plaintiffs moved before his Lordship for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from lowering their streets and footways wherever the plaintiffs' pipes and mains were laid in any manner which would leave such pipes or mains without a sufficient covering of soil or other material to protect them from injury, whether by the passing of traffic, the effect of frost, or otherwise, unless the defendants should first alter the position of the said pipes and mains by placing them at a depth below the proposed new surface of such streets or footway, not being less than the depth at which the same then were below the present surface of such streets or footways. It appeared that the defendants contemplated lowering some of their footpaths to such an extent as to leave only a few inches of surface above the plaintiffs' mains. This the defendants maintained they were entitled to do, and they contended that if the mains, for their protection from frost or otherwise, had to be lowered to a proportionate depth this should be done by the plaintiffs at their own expense. The case turned on the construction of section 98 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict., c. 120), which enacts that:—"It shall be lawful for every vestry and district board from time to time to cause all or any of the streets within their parish or district, or any part thereof respectively, to be paved or repaired when and as often and in such form and manner and with such materials as such vestry or board think fit, and to cause the ground or soil thereof to be raised or lowered, and the course of the channels running in, into, or through the same to be turned or altered, in such manner as they think proper, and to alter the position of any mains or pipes in or under such street, such alteration to be made subject to the approval of the engineer of the company to which such mains or pipes belong." Mr. Justice Kekewich was of opinion that this was the exact case in which the large power which the Court had in granting an injunction should be exercised, rather than that the Court should wait until the injury was done and leave the plaintiffs to damages. The plaintiffs were therefore, his Lordship considered, entitled to an injunction, though the form of interim injunction asked was too wide. The learned Judge decided that the proper form would be to restrain the defendants from altering the position of the plaintiffs' mains by placing them in a position in which they would be more liable to injury than they were at present. From that decision the defendants now appealed.

Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Lyttelton Chubb were for the appellants; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Gore Browne were for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments on the 28th ult. their Lordships reserved judgment, which was delivered, reversing the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich and allowing the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS delivered a written judgment, in which, after stating the facts of the case and reading the section above set forth, he said,—This section in terms simply confers a power; its language imposes no duty. The words are, "it shall be lawful," &c. These words may no doubt under certain circumstances impose a duty as well as confer a power, but it is for those who contend that they do both to make good their contention. Nothing can be clearer on this point than the judgment of Lord Cairns in "Julius v. Bishop of Oxford" (5 App. Cas., 214, see pp. 223, 224). The defendants have not touched or disturbed the plaintiffs' pipes. They have in no way injured them, and this circumstance distinguishes the case from "The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbots" (15 Q.B.D., 1), in which the steam-rollers used by the defendants broke the plaintiffs' gas pipes. The same circumstance—viz., the non-interference with the plaintiffs' property—distinguishes this case from "Geddis v. Proprietors of the Baun Reservoir" (3 App.

Cas., 430), where the defendants flooded the plaintiffs' land and said in effect that they could not help it. The answer was that they could help it if they kept a stream into which they poured water free from obstruction by mud, which they could do if they chose. Lord Blackburn's remarks on p. 456, on which the plaintiffs mainly relied, had reference to that state of things, and do not show what the plaintiffs must show—viz., that section 98 imposes a duty on the defendants to lower the plaintiffs' pipes, although the plaintiffs do not want to do so for their own purposes. Underlying the plaintiffs' contention is the assumption that they are entitled to have a certain amount of soil over their pipes. I can find no warrant for this assumption; and as the defendants are clearly empowered by section 98 to remove the soil above the pipes, I see no ground for saying that the additional power conferred upon them of lowering the plaintiffs' pipes imposes the duty of lowering them in order to protect them from injury. The plaintiffs pay nothing for the privilege of laying their pipes down in a public path or road, and they run the risk of having it made higher or lower by the road authorities under their statutory powers. This conclusion is strengthened by section 61 of the Towns Improvement Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 34), which is in pari materia, and which empowers the improvement commissioners to raise or lower pipes "if they deem it necessary so to do." No duty to do so is cast upon them. Section 98 of the Metropolitan Management Act, although not quite so clearly worded, has, in my opinion, the same meaning. The appeal motion having by consent been treated as an appeal from a final judgment in the action, the order appealed from must be discharged and judgment be entered for the defendants, with costs here and below, and the costs below must be taxed as between solicitor and client pursuant to 56 and 57 Vict., c. 61, sec. 1. (See "Fielden v. the Mayor, &c., of Morley," supra.)

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY, after observing that the case was of importance, as the decision would affect not only water companies, but gas and other like companies who had the like statutory privilege of laying pipes under the public streets in the metropolis, and after commenting on section 98 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and referring briefly to the facts of the case, continued as follows:—I am unable to find in the section any express or implied duty cast upon the road authority, when they exercise their power of altering the level of the road, whether by raising or lowering it, to exercise at their own expense their power of altering the position of the pipes for the benefit of the company owning the pipes, much less any duty to place the pipes at a depth below the new surface corresponding with the depth at which they stood below the old surface. I think that no such duty is imposed upon the appellants. The real question is on whom the expense of altering the position of the pipes is to fall. It appears to me that it falls on the company. They are under no statutory obligation as to the particular depth at which their pipes are to be placed from the surface of the road; it is for them to place them at such a depth as will protect the water from freezing. As between the road authority and the company I think that the road authority is paramount. They are entrusted with the powers over the street, not for their own profit as a statutory body, but for the benefit of the public using the street at a highway. The statutory undertaking of the water company is vested in them with a view to their own profit as a company, and for the purpose of affording a supply of water to the consumers of water within their district. Where the road authority alters the level of the street the 98th section does not afford any means of ascertaining the point at which the supposed duty of the road authority begins in reference to the distance from the surface at which the pipes are to be left, subject only to this qualification—that where the position of the pipes themselves is altered the approval of the company's engineer is required in relation to the position where the pipes are to be relaid. His Lordship, in conclusion, agreed with the Master of the Rolls in his view that the authorities cited were distinguishable.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read a judgment to the same effect.

REG. V. HOLE.*

Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881—Bail—Jurisdiction of the Court.

This was an application for bail in a case where an order had been made under the Fugitive Offenders Act for the return of the defendant to the Cape of Good Hope, and in the meantime for his confinement in prison.

Mr. Cooper Willis, Q.C., appeared for the defendant; Mr. Scrutton for the Cape Government and for the prosecutors, the Union Steam Ship Company; Mr. H. Sutton and Mr. Bodkin now represented the Crown.

The case came on on August 2, but was adjourned in order that the Crown might be represented upon the point whether under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vic., c. 69, section 5), there was any power in the Court to grant bail after an order committing the defendant to prison had been made by the magistrate. The matter had been again adjourned in order that the point might be determined at the same time as the following case—"Reg. v. Spilsbury," which raised a similar question. The section is as follows:—

"A fugitive when apprehended shall be brought before a magistrate, who . . . shall hear the case in the same manner and have the same jurisdiction and powers as near as may be (including the power to remand and admit to bail) as if the fugitive were charged with an offence committed within his jurisdiction. If . . . such evidence is produced . . . as raises a strong or probable presumption that the fugitive committed the offence mentioned in the warrant, and that the offence is one to which this part of this Act applies, the magistrate shall commit the fugitive to prison to await his return, and shall forthwith send a certificate of the committal and such report of the case as he may think fit . . . to a Secretary of State. When the magistrate commits the fugitive to prison he shall inform the fugitive that he will not be surrendered until after the expiration of 15 days, and that he has a right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus or other like process."

Section 6 provides that upon the expiration of 15 days after the committal or the decision of a Court on an application for habeas corpus the Secretary of State may order the fugitive to be returned in custody to the part of her Majesty's dominions from which he is a fugitive, to be there dealt with in due course of law. The facts were stated to be that the defendant was in the employ of the Union Steam Ship Company, and was accused of embezzling £160. He stated before he came over that there were sums which he owed which he would settle upon his return. With that knowledge the directors of the company allowed him to come over to England and paid his passage. He went to his mother's house, and the next day he was taken up. When before the magistrate he was admitted to bail to the extent of £100 on four occasions between June 27 and July 25, the date of the last hearing. The magistrate made an order to send him back to the Cape. The defendant was quite willing to go at once, but it was found that it was inconvenient to send him at once, and consequently he was to be detained in Holloway until next Saturday. Application for bail was, therefore, made.

Mr. COOPER WILLIS contended that the Court of Queen's Bench had a general jurisdiction to grant bail, and the statute had not taken it away in this case. The jurisdiction therefore existed. Appealing to the discretion of the Court, he urged as grounds for granting bail that the amount alleged to have been embezzled was small, and that the defendant had not attempted to hide himself; moreover, the magistrate had thought it was a proper case for bail no less than four times, and the only reason why he had not granted bail himself was because he thought that he had no power of granting bail when once he had made his order.

Mr. H. SUTTON argued for the Crown. As to the power of the Court to give bail, he did not dispute the general power to give bail when a person had committed a crime in this country, or in the case of any unlawful custody; but, when once a prisoner was committed to prison under section 5, he contended that the power had gone. He did not know of any authority for saying that there was a general power to grant bail in respect of a crime committed outside the jurisdiction. The words in the section, "to await his return," seemed to imply that then bail could not be granted, though up to the time of the magistrate making the order bail could be given. The power of this Court to grant bail was under consideration by the Legislature, as might be seen in section 10, which provided for bail when the case was trivial or the application not made in good faith, and if this Court in every case was to have the power of granting bail it surely would have been expressly provided. He also referred to section 7, which provided as a protection to the fugitive that if he were not conveyed from prison within one month after his committal, the Court, unless sufficient cause were shown to the contrary, might order him to be discharged out of custody. Instancing the difficulties that might arise, he said that if the fugitive refused to deliver himself up and broke his bail, staying at Liverpool or some other place in England, there was no authority to the effect that he could be arrested, though, of course, his recognizances and his sureties would be forfeited. It would not be likely that in ordinary cases the Legislature would be very favourable to absconders from justice. If it was true, as stated, that the defendant was willing to return to the Cape, it was an exceptional case. In such a case, as in a case of illness, some lesser form of custody than confinement in prison might probably be ordered.

Mr. SCRUTTON, on behalf of the Cape Government, which opposed the grant of bail, pointed out that it would be no satisfaction to the Government for the recognizances to be estreated. What they wanted was that the defendant himself should come and take his trial.

The COURT refused the application for bail.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that in this case, in which an order had been made committing the defendant to prison with a view to his being sent to the Cape to be tried on a charge of felony, it was not necessary to discuss the power of the Court to grant bail, inasmuch as that point was dealt with in their judgment in the next case, "Reg. v. Spilsbury" (infra), and, even if the Court had the power, they thought that they should not exercise it for two reasons—first, the period was very brief, inasmuch as the defendant would sail on Saturday, August 13; and, secondly, it was right to give weight to the views of the Cape Government, who had opposed the granting of bail. Even if the Court had the power, they would not, in this case, in their discretion, exercise it.

REG. V. SPILSBURY.*

Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881—Bail—Jurisdiction of the Court.

There is nothing in the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, which takes away the inherent power of the Court to grant bail in exercising the jurisdiction conferred by that Act.

This was an application for bail and also for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Major Spilsbury, against whom the police magistrate at Bow-street had made on August 1 an order directing him to be sent to Tangier to be tried at the Consular Court there on the charge that he, being a British subject, did, on or about January 13, 1898, on the Sus coast, within the territorial waters of the Empire of Morocco, in the steamship Tourmaline, with others to the number of three or four, unlawfully and riotously assemble, and riotously make an assault upon certain soldiers of the Sultan of Morocco by firing on the Sultan's ship Hassanie, and participating in an assault on the boats belonging thereto and at the time manned by such soldiers.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Ellis Griffith, appeared for the defendant; the Attorney-General, Mr. H. Sutton, and Mr. Bodkin for the Crown.

The same question arose in this case as in "Reg. v. Hole"—namely, whether the Court had power to grant bail after an order had been made under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881. Major Spilsbury, a resident of London, at the time of the committal of the alleged offence was engaged by the Globe Venture Syndicate, and went in charge of the Tourmaline to the coast of Sus. To this place the Sultan's warship Hassanie also went, with the object of preventing the Tourmaline carrying on communications with the natives. The Sultan's army also came on the scene and some fighting between the tribes and the soldiers took place. The evidence brought before the magistrate comprised some depositions by the captain of, and other persons on board, the Hassanie, a letter from Major Spilsbury to the syndicate of January 19, 1898, and one witness. A full account appeared in The Times of August 2, and the broad facts appear in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. COHEN, for the defendant, urged that the evidence did not support the charge of riot. The defendant was on the Sus coast for the purposes of trade. The hostilities took place between the natives and the Sultan's soldiers. What was feared was that when the defendant should reach Tangier there would be a prosecution against him for the offence of importing arms, in respect of which three of his companions had been convicted already, and not for riot. It seemed as if the charge of riot was laid against him simply for the purpose of getting the order. Major Spilsbury had made an affidavit that the feeling in Tangier was so strong against him that he was actually in danger of his life. A price had been set on his head and twice had attempts on his life taken place.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, interposing, said that there was no intention of trying Major Spilsbury on any other charge than that on which the order was based. The Chief Justice of Gibraltar would preside at the trial.

Mr. COHEN urged that the trial ought to take place at Gibraltar, where a jury might be called. That could not be the case at Tangier.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL contended that the facts were sufficient to raise a "probable presumption that the defendant had committed the offence." He stated that in March, 1897, Major Spilsbury was informed by her Majesty's Minister at Morocco that his proposed conduct was illegal, and he was warned in respect of the very locality where all this occurred. As to the proposal that the trial should take place at Gibraltar he would wish to put in some affidavits on the subject. It would be dangerous to lay down the principle that bail could be granted after the order had been made. Dealing with the assertion that the defendant would be in danger in Tangier, he pointed out that he would be in English custody all the time till the trial.

The arguments took place on Saturday, August 6, and it was stated by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL that since then communications by telegram had taken place with Sir Arthur Nicholson, her Majesty's Consul-General at Tangier, who had replied that he could not imagine that Major Spilsbury would be in any danger, and that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to secure the attendance of witnesses from Tangier at Gibraltar. For that and other reasons he thought the trial should take place in Tangier before the Chief Justice of Gibraltar.

In the result the COURT refused bail, but ordered that the trial should take place at Gibraltar.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that this case presented different features to that of "Reg. v. Hole." The charge now was one of riotous assembly and riotous assault on the Sultan of Morocco's soldiers. The Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, had been made applicable to the Sultan of Morocco's dominions by an Order in Council under section 36 of that Act. It was admitted that the offence charged was one in respect of which the Act authorized an order for the return of a fugitive offender. The main ground on which the application to the Court was based was that the evidence did not afford "a strong or probable presumption that the fugitive committed the offence." Now, it did not appear to him to be desirable, in the interest of the defendant, to enter minutely into the details of the case, but the broad facts were that the defendant was in charge of the Tourmaline, a vessel which was sent to the coast of Morocco by a trading syndicate. At Antwerp the defendant had purchased certain arms. He claimed to have treaties with certain independent tribes. Those tribes, however, were said to be within the jurisdiction of the Sultan. The Tourmaline appeared on the coast—not near any commercial port. Arms and tents of European manufacture were landed. The tribes met the defendant and three of his companions who had landed. The defendant returned to the vessel, leaving the others on shore. Presently there appeared a man-of-war belonging to the Sultan, which prevented access from the shore to the Tourmaline and from the Tourmaline to the shore. Fighting took place on the shore, and certain shots were fired from the Tourmaline. In the letter from the defendant, which was an important piece of evidence, he stated that he ordered his ship to be cleared for action. On these facts there was sufficient to justify the magistrate in making the order. They raised the "strong or probable presumption" mentioned in the section. The question of difficulty that then remained was this. Failing the success of the application to upset the order altogether, could the Court grant the defendant bail? This was apparently the first occasion on which the matter had come up for consideration. How was the matter to be viewed? Was it to be considered from the point of view which the counsel for the Crown put forward—namely, that the defendant had to show under what section of the statute the power was given to the Court. In other words, was the onus on the defendant to prove the existence of the power? He thought not. Apart from any statute the Court had a power to admit to bail. The matter should therefore be approached in this way—did the act expressly or impliedly do away with that power? He then cited a passage from Chitty's Criminal Law, p. 98, describing in wide terms the power of the Court to grant bail. Approaching the subject from the point of view that the power existed, was there anything in the statute to take it away? Nothing expressly did so. That was admitted. Did it do so by implication. If it did there would be the curious result that, though the magistrate might give bail during the whole of the possibly lengthened period of the inquiry and the Court of the country to whom the fugitive was sent might give bail also, yet the High Court could not grant bail when once the order of return was made. Applying the best judgment that he could to the point, he had come to the conclusion that unquestionably the Court had the power to grant bail. Some difficulties had been suggested if bail were granted. Suppose a man on bail refused to deliver himself up, it was said there was no power to arrest him. Even if that were the case, the answer to the objection was that proceedings might be recommenced against him, and a fresh warrant issued on which he might be arrested. This would cause delay, but the difficulty was not insuperable. The learned Chief Justice was of opinion that, though there might be difficulties in working the Act consistently with the power of the Court to grant bail, they were not of a very serious character. It was impossible to suppose that if the Legislature had intended to interfere with the ancient and well-known power of the Court to grant bail that it would have left it to implication only. The power, however, was one to be exercised with extreme care and caution and consideration of all the facts. The charge here was one of misdemeanour, but there was no right to demand bail. The order was a kind of intermediate order, and not like the committal by a magistrate of a prisoner to take his trial at assizes. It was an order preliminary to that. The inquiry before the magistrates only began when the fugitive was returned. Upon the question whether in the exercise of the Court's discretion bail should be granted or not, he had come to the conclusion, not without considerable doubt however, that in this case the Court ought not to grant bail. It would largely depend on the defendant himself how soon he should return. The Secretary of State had a month, it was true; but doubtless if the defendant applied for an early removal it would be granted to him. The only remaining point was whether the trial should take place at Gibraltar instead of Tangier. It was not only within the competence, but also within the duty of the Court, if they saw any reasons which should operate on them judicially for the trial taking place at Gibraltar, to give effect to them. Were there then any such reasons here? The affidavit of the defendant had not been contradicted. It was true that there had not been very much time to do it, but the distinct statement that there was no organized police force in Tangier had been telegraphed out there, and that was not contradicted. It would have been contradicted if wholly untrue. Then it was said that there would be a difficulty in getting the witnesses to Gibraltar; but the distance was not very great, and, though the Court of her Majesty at Gibraltar had no power to enforce the attendance of foreign witnesses, the Court could not doubt that the Sultan of Morocco, at whose instance the prosecution was, could find means to secure their attendance if he desired them to be present. There were, for instance, the captain of the Hassanie and others who could very well be ordered to appear. It was clear that no jury could be summoned at Tangier. The defendant should have his chance of securing one at Gibraltar. The result was that the application to quash the order failed and that for bail must be refused, but the trial should be held at Gibraltar.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT concurred. He would add this—the decision that the Court had power under the Fugitive Offenders Act to grant bail would not apply to the Extradition Acts. In the present case there was no treaty to be considered. The Extradition Act merely provided a mode of carrying out a treaty, and therefore under the Extradition Acts the words of the treaty in each case must be considered.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred, though he had had some considerable doubt as to the power to grant bail, owing to the difficulties pointed out. He agreed, however, that the statute had not taken it away.

JONES AND SONS V. SCULLARD.*

Master and servant—Liability of master to third persons—Hired coachman.

S., the owner of a horse and brougham, hired from a livery-stable keeper a coachman whom he supplied with livery. The coachman's wages were paid by the livery-stable keeper, who was paid by S. for his services. Held, that S. was liable for the negligence of the coachman in driving the horse and brougham.

Judgment was delivered in this case, which was tried before his Lordship and a special jury and reported in The Times of April 27. The action was brought to recover damages for injuries caused to the stock and premises of the plaintiff, a jeweller carrying on business under the name of Jones and Sons, at 368, Holloway-road, owing to the negligent driving of the defendant's servant. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £350. A legal defence was set up that the man who drove the defendant on the occasion in question was not his servant, having been supplied by a livery-stable keeper, and it was contended that, therefore, the defendant could not be held liable. The case was reserved for further consideration, and argued on April 30.

MR. HAMMOND CHAMBERS, Q.C. (Mr. Woodin with him), for the plaintiff, contended that the test was the ownership, or rather the legal possession, of the horse. If the defendant was in legal possession of the horse then the driver was his servant. He cited "Langher v. Pointer" (5 B. and C. 547) (judgment of Littledale, J., p. 556), "Brady v. Giles" (1 M. and R. 494), "Randleston v. Murray" (8 A. and E. 109), and "Quarman v. Burnett" (6 M. and W. 499). The rule of law was that where a man was in possession of property he had to take care that it was so managed as not to cause injury to other persons. The defendant was in possession of the horse and was consequently liable to see that it was so managed by the person who drove it as not to cause damage to other persons. He cited, further, "Rourke v. White Cross Colliery Co." (2 C.P.D., 205) and "Donovan v. Laing" (1893] 19 B., 629), and argued that if a servant was lent by one person to another for a particular employment he was, for the time being, the servant of the person to whom he was lent. The facts showed that in the present case the driver was under the direction and control of the defendant.

Mr. WITT, Q.C. (Mr. J. Watson Moyses and Mr. E. E. Humphrys with him), for the defendant, contended that the defendant was not responsible for the acts of the driver inasmuch as he did not select him. The driver was, in fact, selected by the livery-stable keeper.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—There was a selection and approval exercised in continuing to have the same man.

Mr. WITT, Q.C.—There was an absence of disapproval.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in delivering judgment, said that, although this was only a running-down case, it had caused him considerable trouble and anxiety, and it was to be desired that the case should ultimately go to the Court of Appeal. The facts were these:—The plaintiff was a jeweller. On Jubilee Day a brougham, in the shafts of which was a horse, ran into his shop, causing damage to the window and its contents. The plaintiff at once cast about to see whether he had any remedy. He himself was entirely blameless. He discovered that in the brougham was the defendant and a lady friend; that the brougham belonged to the defendant; that the horse belonged to the defendant; that the harness belonged to the defendant; and that the boots, breeches, waistcoat, and hat worn by the driver had been supplied to him by the defendant; but that the person who was enveloped in all this had been supplied to the defendant by a man with whom he had placed his horse and carriage at livery. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the defendant. To this action the defendant replied:—"I am not the person responsible, because the man did not represent me, nor was he my servant, but he was the servant of another." The plaintiff alleged generally that the occurrence was caused by the negligence of those responsible for the brougham, horse, harness, &c., and he gave as particulars of the alleged negligence that the reins were fastened to the cheek of the bit, and not to the bar, the horse being a hard-mouthed horse and a puller, as the defendant and his servant ought to have known by inspection of the horse's mouth, which showed unmistakable signs of hardness caused by pulling; that the curb chain was not sufficiently tightened; that there was no brake on the carriage; and that the horse had recently been brought out of the country, was unused to London streets, and ought not to have been driven in London on such a day as Jubilee Day. The only question left to the jury was whether there was negligence, and they found that there was. The other questions were left to be decided by his Lordship, who was to have liberty to draw such inferences of fact as a jury could do so far as was necessary. The defendant's horse and carriage were liveried with a man named Walker, who was his tenant. The defendant was a publican, and Walker's stables adjoined one of his publichouses. The arrangement between the defendant and Walker began on January 3, 1897. The accident took place on Jubilee Day. On May 10 Loveday began to drive for the defendant and continued to do so up to and including the day of the accident. Loveday was not selected by the defendant, but the proper inference was that the defendant told Walker that he required a man to drive and that Walker sent Loveday. Though it must be taken that there was no original choice by the defendant of Loveday, it was not unimportant to observe that there was evidence that the defendant showed satisfaction in, and approval of, Loveday. Though he had no power to dismiss Loveday from Walker's employment he could have said to Walker "You must not send me this man any more," and to Loveday, "I dismiss you from the occupation of driving my carriage." He did not, however, do so. About May 4 he ordered Loveday to be supplied at his own charge with a suit of clothes. It should be stated that the defendant paid Walker for Loveday's services, the latter's wages being paid by his employer, Walker. One other date was material. The horse which was driven in the brougham was brought to London from Yorkshire on June 16. Between that day and June 22 it was driven two or three times by Loveday. Those were all the material facts. In support of his particulars the plaintiff called a witness named Bowden, who described the pace at which the horse was going, suggesting that the driver had lost control, and then proceeded to describe the occurrence. Mr. Marcus Stevens, a veterinary surgeon, was called. He also described the pace of the horse and how the driver had lost control. He said, further, that the curb was loose and was not fastened on one side; that the reins were fastened to the cheek of the bit; and that, on examination, he found that the horse had a rank, hard mouth, with tumours growing. He also stated that the brougham had no brake, but then in London it was not always found necessary to have a brake upon a brougham. That was the plaintiff's case and it was met by the defendant by denials of all this evidence. The main contest was as to negligent driving by the driver, but it was impossible to say how far this evidence might, or might not, have affected the minds of the jury. The question now was, Were the circumstances such that it must be inferred that Loveday was the defendant's servant? It was impossible to say that there was not evidence of that to go to the jury. It was clear from the authorities that a man might be, in spite of the Scriptural proposition, in the position of serving two masters. While serving Walker generally, Loveday might still have been in the particular employment of the defendant. But for the leading authorities on the subject, his Lordship would not have felt the perplexity he had felt about this case. But not one of the cases cited was on all fours with it. In no one case did there occur the same conjunction of facts—namely, that the ownership of the horse, carriage, harness, and livery was in the defendant; nor did it come into the consideration of any one of these cases that the horse was one to which the driver had not been previously accustomed, nor that part of the negligence alleged was the manner in which the horse was bitted, looking to the hardness of its mouth. His Lordship then referred at considerable length to "Laugher v. Pointer," "Brady v. Giles," and "Quarman v. Burnett." The latter case, he said, presented great difficulty. Two old ladies hired a carriage and horses from a jobmaster. Whenever they went out in the carriage the same man drove them. This man was dependent for payment upon the tips which the old ladies bestowed on him, which were 5s. for each drive. The old ladies wishing him to present a respectable appearance supplied him with a coat and hat, and as they wished to guard against his using these garments elsewhere they directed him to come into the house and change before and after each drive. On one of these occasions, while the man was in the house changing his coat and hat, the horses ran away and did damage for which the ladies were sued. One would have thought that, considering the particular occupation in which the man was engaged at the time, the old ladies would have been responsible, but the Court held not. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, which was afterwards set aside on the ground that there was not even evidence to go to the jury. That was a strong authority in favour of the defendant. Yet the defendant's case differed from that in a marked degree. Here the horse was the defendant's horse, and it had only recently been acquired by him. Why was the fact that the horse belonged to the defendant material? Because so long as the hirer merely said to the livery-stable keeper "Supply me with an equipage complete for an hour, a day, or a week" he had no kind of control over the driver except in one particular—he could indicate to what point he wished to go. He could not order the man to go fast or slow, for the driver might say, "I am not your servant. I know my master's wishes with regard to the horse, and I will go accordingly." But the case was different where the horse belonged to the hirer. He could say "I am late; drive fast up hill or down." If the man refused to obey he could say to the livery-stable keeper, "I will not have that man any more." Again, in the present case, the horse had just been brought from Yorkshire. There were the peculiarities of the horse to be known and attended to. All those were elements showing what was the position of the driver with regard to the management of that horse and carriage and showing that he was in that particular servant of the defendant. His Lordship then referred to "Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Company," in which it was held that contractors who agreed to do the sinking of a shaft for a colliery company were responsible for the negligence of the engineer of the engine at the mouth of the shaft belonging to the colliery company, such engineer and engine having been placed under the control of the contractors for the purpose of the work only, and to "Donovan v. Laing," the facts in which were similar. His Lordship found it difficult to reconcile these two cases with the other cases referred to. Continuing, he said it was time that a comprehensive and intelligible principle was laid down. If the livery-stable keeper supplied a vehicle for a fixed time the hirer ought in no sense to be responsible, but where the carriage, horse, harness, and livery were the property of the hirer, especially where the horse had peculiarities and the driver had only driven it for a short time, and where the driver had been approved of by the hirer—in all this congregation of circumstances, if the question had been put to the jury, Whose servant was this man?—would they not have said, Not the servant of the livery-stable keeper, but of the hirer? In his Lordship's judgment the defendant was liable either singly or jointly with the driver. He would grant a stay of execution pending an appeal.

Admiralty—Practice—Writ—Service—Motion to set aside service—Foreign corporation carrying on business within the jurisdiction.

This was a motion on behalf of La Compagnie

Générale Transatlantique to set aside the service of a writ on M. Paul Fanet, their agent in England. The plaintiffs were the owners of the sailing ship Cromartyshire and had brought an action against La Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, the owners of the steamship Bourgogne, to recover damages arising out of a collision between their ship and La Bourgogne in the Atlantic on July 4 last. In the collision the Cromartyshire was seriously damaged and La Bourgogne was totally lost and a great many of the passengers and crew were drowned. The plaintiffs served the writ in the action on M. Paul Fanet, the agent of the company at the company's office in Leadenhall-street. The defendants now moved the Court to set aside the service of the writ on the ground that the defendant company was a foreign corporation having its seat in France, and did not carry on business within the jurisdiction of this Court. The motion was heard by the President on July 27, when judgment was reserved.

Mr. Pyke, Q.C., Mr. Walton, Q.C., and Mr. F. Laing appeared for the defendants; Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. A. E. Nelson appeared for the plaintiffs.

The PRESIDENT, in delivering the following considered judgment, said,—The question to be decided is whether a good service has been effected under Order 9, rule 8, and that turns on the point whether this company is carrying on business in England as well as in France and perhaps elsewhere. It was not disputed before me that Order 9, rule 8, is applicable in the case of a foreign company which carries on business in this country. The service of the writ was made on a M. Paul Fanet, and I do not think it can be denied that if the company carries on business in England he comes within the list of persons enumerated in the rule, especially having regard to the case of "Newby v. Von Oppen" (7 Q.B., L.R. 293) which was given with reference to identical words in section 16 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. Therefore all I have to decide is whether this French company carries on business in England. In a general and popular sense of the words I think it is unquestionable that it does. The office of the defendants at 36, Leadenhall-street is leasehold, the company being the lessees named in the lease and, as part of an arrangement which they have with M. Fanet, paying the rent. In their official guide the company describe this office as one of their "bureaux," and they advertise that applications for freight and passage may be made to the company's agent—Paul Fanet, 36 and 37, Leadenhall-street. I think this matter turns on rather broader considerations. The company sends its ships to trade between French and English ports, and it is clear that any person who wishes to send goods or take passages by them can go to 36, Leadenhall-street, make a contract for such freight or passage with M. Fanet on behalf of the company, and pay to M. Fanet for the company whatever is due in respect of such contract. In other words the company, in the only way in which it can by the hands of a representative, makes contracts and earns profits in England, and that, I think, presents the fact of a company carrying on business in England as a matter of law and a matter of common sense. His Lordship then discussed the following cases:—"Minor v. London and North-Western Railway Company" (1 C.B., N.S., 325); "Nutter and Co. v. Messageries Maritimes de France" (54 L.J., Q.B. 527); the "Princess Clémentine" ([1897] P. 18); and continuing said,—There were several facts upon which it was argued before me that M. Fanet was in the same position as Messrs. Barr, Moering, and Co. in the case of the "Princess Clémentine." It appears from correspondence between M. Fanet and the French company that before September, 1895, the company had had "direct agencies" in London and Liverpool, M. Fanet being their agent-general, but that after that date the agency became a "corresponding agency," and that, under new arrangements, while the company paid the rent of the offices, legal expenses, and income-tax chargeable to the company (a turn of the agreement which certainly pointed to the expectation of profits being made by the company in this country), and the cost of advertising and supplying the company's printed forms, M. Fanet provided the other expenses of the office, including the salaries of clerks, and received commission on freights and passages with the minimum yearly guarantee of 18,000 francs, which might be drawn monthly. At the office in Leadenhall-street M. Fanet not only acted as agent to the French company, but also for two other companies whose names appeared on brass plates at the office. But to my mind these facts are not sufficient to outweigh the broader considerations which arise in this case—viz., that the office is in law and in fact the office of the company, though M. Fanet may be permitted to carry on other business as well as theirs there, and that the business of the company was carried on there precisely in the same way as if some one undoubtedly an officer of the company and nothing else, was in possession. I am of opinion, therefore, that the business of the French company was carried on at 36 and 37, Leadenhall-street, and that service on M. Fanet was good service on the company under Order 9, rule 8. I do not think it necessary to refer further in detail to authorities as every case must depend upon its own facts, but I will say that the view I take with regard to the defendants is substantially the same view as was taken by Vice-Chancellor Bacon, with regard to the defendants in the case of "Lhoneaux, Limon, and Co. v. Hong-kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation" (33 Ch. D., 446). In that case the defendants had an "agency" in London and were, indeed, forbidden to establish a "branch," but the Vice-Chancellor said "they hire an office, write up their name, and beyond all question stamp upon themselves and their place of business here the assumption that here they are carrying on their business." I think that those words are applicable in the present case, and that, therefore, the motion to set aside the writ or the service of it must be dismissed with costs.

JOHN V. JOHN.*

Practice—Receiver—Ejectment action—"Just and convenient"—Judicature Act, 1873, sec. 25, subs. 8.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice North raised a question of importance as to the appointment of a receiver in an ejectment action. The plaintiff in this action claims to be entitled to some real estate in Cornwall, as tenant in tail male, by virtue of the will of George John, his great-grandfather, who died in 1847, and some other wills of later date. For the period from 1850 up to his death in January last one George Dennis Trevelyan John, another great-grandson of the testator, was in possession or receipt of the rents of the property. The plaintiff alleges that under the testator's will George Dennis Trevelyan John was only tenant for life of the property. The defendant, who is the mother of George Dennis Trevelyan John, upon his death entered into receipt of the rents of the property, and induced the tenants to attorn to her. She alleges that under the will of the testator her son was absolutely entitled to the property, and that by his will her son devised it to her. The plaintiff moved for the appointment of a receiver of the rents. Mr. Justice North held that a proper case had been shown for the appointment of a receiver, and made the appointment accordingly. The defendant appealed.

Mr. HALDANE, Q.C., the HON. E. C. MACNAGHTEN, Q.C., and Mr. T. H. CARSON, for the defendant, relied upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in "Foxwell v. Van Grutten" ([1897] 1 Ch., 64) as showing that in such a case a receiver ought not to be appointed.

Mr. Swinfin Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Stock were for the plaintiff.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that he did not think the Court would be introducing any revolutionary practice if they affirmed the decision of Mr. Justice North. The only difficulty arose out of the case of "Foxwell v. Van Grutten." The first thing to be done was to look at section 25, subsection 8, of the Judicature Act of 1873, which empowered the Court to appoint a receiver by interlocutory order "in all cases in which it shall appear to the Court to be just or convenient that such order should be made." The Court had therefore to consider in each case whether it was "just and convenient" to appoint a receiver. The Court must have regard to all the circumstances of the case. The position of the tenants should (among other things) be taken into account, and also the title of the defendant, if he chose to disclose it. His Lordship did not at present believe in the title of this defendant. He might be converted hereafter. And he did believe in the plaintiff's title. In his opinion it was right to appoint a receiver.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY thought it was "just and convenient" in the circumstances of the present case that a receiver should be appointed. This was the function which the Legislature had cast upon the Court. One element to be considered was the position of the tenants, who were exposed to a double claim. The plaintiff might have a right to distrain upon them for rent. At any rate, the tenants were in jeopardy. But his Lordship did not rest his decision upon that alone. The defendant had shown no title to the property. His Lordship was (as the Master of the Rolls had said) liable to be converted as to this. The defendant was not in actual possession of a mansion house from which she would be turned out by a receiver. She was a person of small means living in furnished rooms. The rents were in jeopardy; the tenants were exposed to risk; and the title of the defendant was very doubtful. On these grounds his Lordship thought that a receiver should be appointed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS gave judgment to the same effect.

Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, sec. 10—
"Workman," who is.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Kennedy) setting aside the verdict and judgment in the County Court and entering judgment for the defendant. The action was brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix of her late husband, under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and Lord Campbell's Act to recover damages for his death. The jury in the County Court found a verdict for the plaintiff for £234 damages, but the Divisional Court entered judgment for the defendants upon the ground that there was no evidence that at the time of the accident the deceased man was in the employment of the defendants, he being in the employment of an independent contractor. The plaintiff appealed. The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment hereunder.

Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., and Mr. Henry appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. F. A. Greer appeared for the defendants.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The question in this appeal is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury that the plaintiff's husband was a workman in the employment of the defendants within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, when he met with the injury which caused his death. The jury, under the directions of the learned County Court Judge, have found for the plaintiff, with damages £234; but my brothers Wills and Kennedy have set that verdict aside, and have held that there was no evidence to support it; and the plaintiff now appeals. The action was brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix of her late husband, in the County Court under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, coupled with Lord Campbell's Act, to recover damages for the death of her husband. There was added to the plaintiff a claim founded upon common law negligence. The learned County Court Judge informs us that this claim was not abandoned, and whatever rights the plaintiff may have at common law are left untouched by this judgment, and she is to be at liberty to proceed at common law, if so advised. It may be taken as a fact that the plaintiff has given evidence of all the requirements necessary to support an action for damages by a workman against his employer under the Employers' Liability Act with this one exception: it is said, and the Queen's Bench Division has held, that she has given no evidence that her deceased husband was at the time of the accident a workman in the employment of the defendants, and, what is more, that the facts of the case show that he was not such a workman at the time of the accident. By the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict., c. 42), which is an Act to extend and regulate the liability of employers to make compensation for personal injuries suffered by workmen in their service, it is enacted by section 8 that "the expression 'workman' means . . . any person to whom the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, applies"; and by section 10 of this latter Act (38 and 39 Vict., c. 30) "the expression 'workman' . . . means any person who, being a labourer, . . . miner, or otherwise engaged in manual labour, . . . has entered into or works under a contract with an employer, whether the contract . . . be express or implied, oral or in writing, and be a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour." It seems to me that the words "or works under a contract with an employer" were inserted into the section to meet the case of a workman who has not contracted directly with an employer, but has been engaged by an agent of the employer to work for the employer—videlicet, by a butty man or a ganger—or to meet the case of an apprentice or similar cases. Now the facts are these. In the month of November, 1896, the defendants were desirous of sinking a shaft at their colliery, and they sent out tenders for this work, and upon the 16th of the month they entered into a contract in writing with a man named Evans, who had tendered for the work, and who was what is called a pit-sinker. By this contract Evans undertook to sink No. 1 shaft at the defendants' colliery. He was, as therein is provided, in certain instances to execute some of the works under the orders and supervision of the manager of the mine. By this contract Evans (who throughout is designated as the contractor) was to provide such sinkers, banksmen, &c., as might be necessary, and he undertook to have not less than one chargeman and five others employed at the pit bottom on each shift. Evans had to pay the wages of the men he employed, and the defendants had to pay Evans for the shaft as it progressed the sum of £12 12s. per fathom sunk. Evans, after paying the wages of the men he employed upon this work and after paying for the other matters which he had contracted to supply, made his profit over the job out of what remained of the £12 12s. per fathom after making the payments above mentioned. The deceased man was employed by Evans upon this job as a sinker, and was paid by Evans the sum of 5s. per diem for so working. In these circumstances the question is whether there is any evidence that the deceased man was a workman in the employment of the defendants when he met with the accident he did whilst working as above stated at 5s. per diem for Evans. I do not go through the written contract between Evans and the defendants, clause by clause, for this has already been done by my brother Kennedy. All I would add is that the word "wages" used in clause 8 in no way appears to me to show that Evans was not a contractor with the defendants, as the written contract throughout shows that he was, for this word refers to the wages of the men employed by Evans and not to Evans's wages, as it was argued, for he, as I have said, had to look to his profit and not to wages for his remuneration. I have not the slightest doubt that this contract between Evans and the defendants is a contractor's contract; in other words, that under it Evans contracted as a contractor to sink the shaft for the defendants, and it is to me clear that the deceased man was the workman of the contractor, Evans, who employed him, and not the workman of the defendants, who in fact never employed him, nor was he employed by Evans on the defendants' behalf. I would ask upon the above facts, Who could the deceased man have sued for his wages, Evans or the defendants? There can be but one answer—viz., Evans, and not the defendants, for the simple reason that he was the workman in the employment of Evans, and not of the defendants. It is clear to me that, unless there be evidence ultra the written contract to show that the deceased man was a workman in the employment of the defendants, the learned County Court Judge, upon proof of this written contract, ought to have directed judgment for the defendants, for, unless the plaintiff gave evidence that her deceased husband was the workman of the defendants at the time of the accident, her action under the Employers' Liability Act obviously fails. Now what evidence is there outside this contract that Evans engaged the deceased man for and on behalf of the defendants so as to constitute him a "workman who has entered into or works under a contract with" the defendants as his employers? In my judgment there is no pretence for saying that Evans was in the position of a butty man or ganger, who are not obviously contractors, and I have not therefore to discuss such a case as that of "Brown v. Butterley Coal Company" (53 L.T., N.S., 964), nor the Scotch case of "Morrison v. Baird" (10 Rettie, 271), referred to therein, in which it was averred in the pleadings that the contractor was authorized to engage men for the colliery. But it was argued for the plaintiff that the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 58), coupled with the rules in the Act and the special rules which were applicable to the defendants' mine for the conduct and guidance of persons acting in the management of the mine, afforded evidence of the relationship of workman and employer, and not that of contractor and principal, between Evans and the defendants, and was thus evidence of the relationship of workman and employer between the deceased man and the defendants. It was argued thus:—It was said that by section 75 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, as also by the special rules, the word "mine" included every shaft in the course of being sunk; that the certificated manager, by rule 2 of the special rules, had to appoint such competent persons as might be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the Act; that by rule 174 and the following rules as regards sinkers there must be a chargeman in each shift who should have full charge of the sinking operations; that Evans filled this post of chargeman over the sinkers, and therefore it was said that Evans was placed under the control of the defendants when acting as chargeman. Suppose this to be so—and as regards the duties of chargeman which Evans had to perform I think it was so—how is this material unless the control of the defendants over Evans be such as to alter the contractual relations between Evans and them from that of contractor and principal to that of workman and employer? Of this, in my judgment, the Act and rules do not afford a scintilla of evidence. The statutory control given by the statute and rules over persons in the mine does not in any way alter the relationship of the contracting parties inter se; they simply give control by the mine-owner over persons in the mine so as to enforce the prescribed regulations for carrying on without danger the mining operations. It was at one time suggested in argument for the plaintiff that, by reason of the Coal Mines Regulation Act and rules, there could not exist in a mine the position of a contractor and mineowner, for every one therein was contemplated by the Act and rules to be in the position of workman towards the mineowner; but Mr. Greer, in his excellent argument, very soon pointed out that this was not so, and he referred to sections in the Act, and especially to section 8, subsection 2, which showed that the point is untenable. His Lordship then referred to another alleged piece of evidence in support of the plaintiff's case which he said the facts failed to support, and continued:—As there was no evidence, so far as the contract of November 16, 1896, is concerned, of the deceased man being a workman in the employment of the defendants when he met with the accident, and there was no evidence dehors the contract of his having been so, in my judgment there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiff's case, and I think that my brothers Wille and Kennedy came to a correct conclusion, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Rigby, } 1898.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. EARL GREY.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Gift inter vivos—Settlement—Reservation of interest to settlor—Duty payable on death of settlor—Finance Act, 1894, secs. 1 and 2 (1).

Decision of Divisional Court (ante, p. 123 and [1898] 1 Q.B., 318) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Channell) holding the defendant liable upon an information by the Attorney-General for estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894 (reported ante, p. 123; ([1898] 1 Q.B., 318). The information was to the following effect:—By a deed dated October 19, 1885, made between Henry (third) Earl Grey (since deceased) of the one part and the defendant, then Albert Henry George Grey, Esq., of the other part, reciting that the said Henry Earl Grey was absolutely seized of or entitled to considerable family estates and to other estates and real property purchased or acquired by him in the county of Northumberland, but that a portion of the said estates was subject to several life annuities amounting to £2,200 a year, and reciting that another portion of the said estates was subject to a mortgage of £200,000, and reciting that the said third Earl Grey was also possessed of personal estate, comprising arrears of rent, &c., and the furniture and effects in and about the mansion-house in which the earl then resided at Howick, and farming stock, crops, and other effects, and reciting that the defendant, Albert Grey, was a nephew of the said third Earl Grey and heir-presumptive to the peerage, and that the said Earl Grey was desirous of giving his real and personal estate to the said Albert Grey; it was witnessed that in consideration of the natural love and affection which the said earl bore to his nephew, and for other considerations therein appearing, the said earl did thereby convey to the defendant all the real estate of him, the third earl, and all leaseholds and terms of years (if any) belonging to him, to hold the same to the defendant in fee simple, subject nevertheless as to the parts of the property charged therewith to the payment of the said annuities and to the mortgages affecting the same, to the use that the third Earl Grey should thenceforth during his life receive an annual rent-charge of £4,000, to be issuing out of the said hereditaments (other than such parts as the third Earl Grey was to occupy and enjoy under the trusts thereafter declared), and subject to this rent-charge all the hereditaments thereby conveyed were to be held to the use of the defendant in fee simple, but as to the said mansion-house at Howick and the premises to be enjoyed therewith subject to the trusts thereafter contained, and as to the leaseholds, &c., for the whole term or interest of the said third earl therein. And it was also witnessed that the third Earl Grey did thereby assign unto the defendant all rents owing, and also all furniture and effects in or about the said mansion-house and premises at Howick, and all stock, crops, effects, and other the personal property of the third Earl Grey other than money at his bankers' or elsewhere, and private papers, his wardrobe, and effects in his own personal use, to hold the premises thereby assigned to the defendant subject to the trusts in the deed for his own use. And it was declared that the mansion-house at Howick, together with the gardens, &c., as then occupied by the third earl should be held upon trust to permit him to occupy and enjoy the same during his life. And the defendant covenanted with the third earl that he would (1) pay the annuities charged on the property; (2) pay the mortgage debt of £200,000 and other charges on the property; (3) pay to the said third Earl Grey the said annual rent-charge of £4,000; (4) at the cost of the defendant keep the mansion-house and buildings at Howick insured, and maintain it in repair and manage the garden; (5) supply to the third earl (free of cost to him) all such farm and garden produce as he might require for consumption at the mansion-house; (6) pay at the death of the third earl his funeral and testamentary expenses, and also all the debts of the third earl to the full exhaustion of all the property, real and personal, of the third earl; (7) retain unsold and farm certain lands at Howick. And it was provided that in the event of the defendant's dying in the life term of the third earl or of any breach by the defendant of any covenant therein contained it should be lawful for the said third Earl Grey to revoke the deed, either wholly or in part, but save in the event aforesaid the deed was to be irrevocable, but any revocation under that power was to be without prejudice to the title of any purchaser or mortgagee from the defendant under a sale or mortgage made previously to revocation. By an indenture, dated September 26, 1894, between the same parties the third Earl Grey, in consideration of £5,000, conveyed and released to the defendant the rent-charge of £4,000 per annum, and released the covenant to retain unsold and to farm the lands near Howick, to the intent that the lands charged with the payment of the £4,000 per annum might be released, and the deed also did away with the power of revocation. The third Earl Grey died on October 9, 1894. The average net annual income of the property comprised in the deed was very considerably in excess of £4,000. The Crown claimed estate duty on the principal value of the whole of the property comprised in the said deed, as being property passing on the death of the third earl within sections 1 and 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, which incorporates section 38 of 44 and 45 Vict., c. 12, as amended by section 11 (1) of 52 and 53 Vict., c. 7. The defendant contended that no such duty was payable, though he had paid duty in respect of the mansion-house and the effects therein. The Divisional Court held that estate duty became payable as claimed, and gave judgment for the Crown. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Bremner appeared for the defendant; the Attorney-General (Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.), and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the Crown.

The Court, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—In my opinion the Crown succeeds in this case, and the appeal by the present Earl Grey fails. By the Finance Act of 1894, not only property which passes upon death, but also property which shall be deemed within the meaning of the Act to pass upon death is made liable to estate duty; and the question is, whether the property upon which the Crown claims duty in this case is property which is deemed to pass within the meaning of the Act upon the death of the late Earl Grey, which took place on October 9, 1894. By deed bearing date October 19, 1885, the late earl, in consideration of the natural love and affection which he bore to his nephew, the present Earl Grey, conveyed to the present earl, the defendant in this information, all his manors, messuages, farms, lands, rent-charges, and other hereditaments, and all leaseholds belonging to the late earl, in fee simple, to the use that the late earl should during his life receive an annual rent-charge of £4,000 a year issuing out of the hereditaments thereby conveyed, and should be also entitled during his life to occupy and enjoy that part of the hereditaments which consisted of the mansion house at Howick and its appurtenances, together with the furniture, plate, books, pictures, and articles of household use or ornament, wines, stores, garden implements, horses, carriages, and other things whatsoever in or about the said mansion house and premises. By this deed the present earl covenanted with the late earl to pay certain annuities and mortgage and bond debts, and to indemnify the late earl and his estate from all loss and damage in respect thereof, and to pay the late earl the annual rent-charge of £4,000 per annum, and at the death of the late earl to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, including all stamp and other duties, and also the debts of the late earl to the full exhaustion of all the property, real and personal, of the late earl. By this deed it was provided that, in the event of the present earl dying in the lifetime of the late earl or of any breach by the present earl of any of the covenants on his part therein contained, it should be lawful for the late earl to revoke the said deed, either wholly or in part, but save as aforesaid the said deed was to be irrevocable, and it was stipulated that any revocation under the power was to be without prejudice to the title of any purchaser or mortgagee from the present earl under a sale or mortgage made previously to such revocation. The above is a sufficient statement of the deed to raise the point which I have in hand; it will be found set out at length in the information in this case. By an indenture made on September 26, 1894, between the late and present earl, the late earl, two weeks before his death, which occurred, as I have said, on October 9, 1894, in consideration of £5,000 paid to him by the present earl released unto the present earl the rent-charge of £4,000 a year, as also the power of revocation contained in the indenture of October 19, 1885; but, as I understand, the late earl remained in possession of the mansion house and its amenities, as by the deed of October 19, 1885, is provided, until his death. The question is whether the property contained in the indenture of October 19, 1885, was property which is deemed to pass upon the death of the late earl within the meaning of the Finance Act of 1894 so as to be liable to estate duty. That brings me to section 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894. By it "property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include . . . property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom." In "Attorney-General v. Beech" ([1898] 2 Q.B., 147) I commented upon this class of legislation, and I have nothing further to say thereon. Now, what is it that section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1889, as amended by the Finance Act of 1894, has enacted? Section 38 (2) of the Act of 1881 so amended must for the present purpose be read as follows:— "Any real, personal, or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions—viz., (a) any property taken under a disposition made by a person dying after August 1, 1894, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos . . . which shall not have been bona fide made 12 months before the death of the deceased—this clause does not apply to the present case—or property taken under any gift whenever made—this means whether made within or without 12 months before death—of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise.¹ In my judgment the meaning of this section is that, if there be a gift, no matter when made, of property inter vivos, then that property must be included in an account and therefore liable to estate duty, unless the donee has bona fide assumed possession and enjoyment of the property immediately upon the gift and has thenceforward retained the possession and enjoyment thereof to the entire exclusion of the donor, or, if he has taken and retained the possession to the entire exclusion of the donor, then that this possession and enjoyment has been without any benefit by contract or otherwise to the donor. To escape estate duty both these events must concur. This being my opinion as to the true construction of section 38 (2) (a) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881, as it now stands incorporated into section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act of 1894, how upon the facts of this case can it be said that the present earl, the donee, has either bona fide assumed possession immediately upon the gift, or has thenceforward retained the possession and enjoyment of the property contained in the deed of October 19, 1885, to the entire exclusion of the late earl, the donor, or that he has done so without any benefit by contract or otherwise accruing to the donor, the late earl? That the present earl, the donee, has contracted with the late earl, the donor, to pay him £4,000 a year as well as to bear the other liabilities of the late earl, as appears by the deed of October 19, 1885, for the benefit of the late earl cannot be disputed; and, whichever limb of the subsection be taken, in my judgment this case comes within it, and therefore falls within the description of property deemed to pass within section 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894, and consequently estate duty is payable. It was argued by the Crown that the case also falls within subsection (c) of section 38 (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881, and that under this subsection the property was chargeable with estate duty as being property which was deemed to pass within section 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894. This may well be so, but as in my opinion section 38 (2) (a) of the Act of 1881 is fatal to the appellant, the present earl, it is unnecessary in this case to give a judgment as to the meaning of subsection (c), and I therefore say nothing about it. In my judgment the Crown succeeds, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

THE BECHUANALAND EXPLORATION COMPANY (LIMITED)
V. THE LONDON TRADING BANK (LIMITED).*

Negotiable Instrument—Debentures—Transfer by delivery—Usage—Deposit to secure advances.

Judgment was delivered in this case. The action was brought to recover 20 debentures of the Beira Junction Railway (Limited) for £100 each. These debentures were stolen from the plaintiffs by their secretary, one Evans, since deceased, and deposited by him with the defendants in the ordinary course of business to secure advances made to him by the defendants. By their defence the defendants pleaded that the debentures were issued subject to the condition that they should be transferable by delivery if not registered, and that it is the custom of merchants, bankers, and others to buy and sell such debentures and to advance loans of money upon the security of them by mere delivery as negotiable instruments transferable by delivery; that the plaintiffs, having allowed the debentures to be in the power of Evans, were estopped from denying that the debentures were transferable by delivery.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the defendants; Mr. Douglas-Pemberton held a watching brief on behalf of Lord Gifford.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in the course of reading an elaborate written judgment, said,—The main issue, and in my view really the sole issue, in the case is whether these debentures ought or ought not to be treated as negotiable instruments so as to give the defendants, who became bona fide holders for valuable consideration, a good title to the extent of their advances to Evans upon the debentures as against the plaintiffs, who claim to recover the property of which Evans fraudulently deprived them. The debentures are, according to their tenor, payable to bearer or, when registered, to the registered holder for the time being on presentation of the debenture. Endorsed upon each of them are several printed conditions. The third, fourth, fifth, and sixth of the conditions are in substance as follows:—(3) Except when registered this debenture is transferable by delivery, but the company will at any time, upon the request of the bearer whilst unregistered, register him and his nominee in the register below mentioned as the holder of this debenture, and endorse a note of such registration thereon, and the company will also at any time, upon the request in writing of the registered holder, his executors or administrators, cancel the registration and the note thereof endorsed thereon, and thereupon this debenture will again become transferable by delivery. The fourth condition provides for the register, and the fifth for the registration of debenture-holders therein. Under the sixth condition every transfer of the debenture when registered is to be in writing under the hand of the registered holder or his legal personal representative, and before registration of the transfer proof must be given to the company of the title and identity of the transferee. The 11th condition provides that the principal moneys shall immediately become payable if a certain default is made in due payment of interest or a winding-up order is made or a resolution is passed otherwise than for purposes of reorganization, reconstruction, or amalgamation. Now, it is, I think, unquestionable, and it was not disputed at the Bar, that such a debenture as this, if viewed according to its tenor, merely and without regard to mercantile usage, does not belong to the class of negotiable instruments which the law has recognized as such, by virtue either of the ancient law merchant or by virtue of statute (such as bills of exchange, promissory notes, and Exchequer bills), and the delivery of which confers a good title to the person who acquires them in good faith and for value, notwithstanding a defect in the title of the transferor. It is most like a promissory note payable to bearer; but it is prevented from ranking as such by its conditions. Evidence was, however, adduced by the defendants of a usage of the mercantile world in recent times to treat "debentures to bearer" of this kind as negotiable instruments; and the defendants contend that if I am of opinion that the usage has been proved I ought to recognize and give effect to it by upholding their title to these debentures. The plaintiffs contend that the usage has not been proved; they further contend, as a matter of law, that evidence of it was not properly receivable; that, even if the custom was proved, it cannot, being of recent introduction, be treated as part of that law merchant which Courts of Justice are bound to know and recognize. There are therefore to be decided two distinct questions—the first of fact; the second of law. Is there a usage of the mercantile world to treat such debentures as negotiable instruments, passing like promissory notes or bank-notes by mere delivery from hand to hand accordingly? If there is such a usage, ought it in a Court of law to have the effect of attaching the quality or incident of negotiability to the contract contained in the debenture, so that the property in that chattel and all rights upon it may, upon delivery of it, be acquired by a person who is not the owner? His Lordship then reviewed the evidence and said:—Upon the question of fact, I am of opinion the defendants have sufficiently proved the usage of merchants which they sought to establish, both in point of extent and duration. Indeed, in respect of duration, I am led by what appears in the report of “Crouch v. Crédit Foncier of England” (L.R., 8 Q.B. 374)—a case upon which in regard to the point of law the plaintiffs mainly rely—to infer that the time during which it has been the mercantile practice to treat these debentures to bearer as negotiable instruments really exceeds the time which appears from the oral evidence adduced before me by the defendants. The debenture in the case referred to was issued by an English trading company in 1849. Assuming the usage or custom proved in the present case, I have to say whether, in my judgment, I ought to give effect to it. The plaintiffs contend that I ought not to do so, and that evidence to prove it was not admissible. As to the admission of evidence, if the grounds which I proceed to consider of the plaintiffs’ contention as to the absolute incapacity of modern mercantile usage to obtain legal ratification in respect to the negotiability of instruments issued in England by an English company, and not recognized as negotiable by the ancient mercantile law and not made such by statute, are good, it follows, I agree, that evidence of such a modern mercantile usage is irrelevant and, therefore, inadmissible. The contention of the plaintiffs rests upon the reasoning of the considered judgment of the Court of Queen’s Bench in “Crouch v. Crédit Foncier of England.” The defendants assert that the judgment has been authoritatively disapproved, although it may be that the decision may be justified upon the ground suggested in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in “Goodwin v. Roberts.” The matter is one of commercial importance and of considerable legal difficulty. The propositions of law which are involved in this judgment may be summarized thus:—1. The general rule of law is that a chose in action cannot be transferred at law at all, and parties cannot merely by their own act annex to a contract the incidents of negotiability, that is to say, a right of action thereon, in the holder for the time being in his own name and a title both to the document containing the contract and to all rights under the contract, irrespective of defect in title of the person from whom the holder acquired it. 2. Such incidents can be annexed to a contract only by virtue either of statute or of the ancient usage of merchants which has been adopted by and now forms part of the law. 3. The modern usage of merchants cannot annex such incidents to a contract if the instrument containing it be made by an English company in England, which does not come within the category of negotiable instruments created by statute or adopted by the common law from the “ancient law merchant.” 4. The modern usage of merchants may annex the character of negotiability to bonds and like instruments of a foreign or colonial Government. The correctness of the second and third propositions is, it appears to me, essential to the validity of the judgment and essential also to the success of the plaintiffs’ case in this action. So far as I am aware there was no appeal against the judgment, but in 1875 came the case of “Goodwin v. Roberts” (L.R., 10 Ex., 76, 337; 1 A.C., 47). It appears to me that upon the vital question of the effect of modern mercantile usage, such as, I think, has been sufficiently proved in the present case, it is impossible to treat the reasoning of the Court of Queen’s Bench in “Crouch v. Crédit Foncier of England” and the reasoning of the Exchequer Chamber in “Goodwin v. Roberts” as capable of reconciliation. I read the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in the later case as plainly disapproving of the reasoning of the judgment in the earlier case. It cannot, I think, be maintained that the reasoning of the judgment upon this question of the effect of modern mercantile usage in “Goodwin v. Roberts” was unnecessary to the decision; nor, I think, can it be maintained that the two judgments are capable of reconciliation upon the ground that the instrument in question in the earlier case was an English instrument, and the instrument in question in the latter case was, though issued by a London agent, to all intents and purposes the scrip of a foreign Government. Further, in “Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank” (2 Q.B.D., 194) a Divisional Court treated “Goodwin v. Roberts” as decisive in an action in which a similar question arose upon an English instrument—a scrip certificate to bearer issued by a joint stock company. It appears to me that having regard to the decisions of the Exchequer Chamber in “Goodwin v. Roberts” and “Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank,” coming, as I have, to the conclusion that there has been a sufficient proof of a mercantile usage to treat the debentures in question in this case as negotiable, I cannot refuse to follow these decisions, which appear to me to practically overrule the decision in “Crouch v. Crédit Foncier of England” and to govern this case. Further, I see no negligence or any conduct raising an estoppel in what the plaintiffs did, but for the reasons which I have given there will be judgment for the defendants with costs, but execution may be stayed.

*Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CLINK V. HICKIE, BORMAN, AND CO.*

Ship—Charterparty—Demurrage—Colliery guarantee—Construction.

Judgment was delivered in this case. The main question for decision turned on the construction of a document called a colliery guarantee, which is a contract, relating to the loading of coal, entered into by colliery proprietors in South Wales with shipowners. The case was one of considerable importance to shipowners, because it has become a matter of frequent occurrence for this colliery guarantee to be incorporated, by reference, into charterparties. The plaintiffs in the present action claimed £996 16s. damages for 32 days’ detention of their ship the Samoena at the port of loading by the defendants, who were the charterers of the ship. The defendants contended that the demurrage time must be computed by reference to the provisions of the colliery guarantee, and that the demurrage so computed amounted to not more than 20 days 12 hours, and the defendants brought £650 into Court, which sum, they said, was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim. The material parts of the charterparty and the colliery guarantee are set out in the judgment.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. Leck appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. F. Laing for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BIGEAM read the following judgment. This action is brought by the plaintiffs, who are the owners of a steamer called the Samoena, to recover damages for detention or demurrage of their vessel at Cardiff. On January 25, 1898, the plaintiffs by a charterparty of that date chartered the Samoena to the defendants to carry a cargo of coal from Cardiff to Japan. The charterparty provided that the vessel should load her cargo "in days to be arranged colliery working days, as her colliery guarantee form," which, put into intelligible English, means that the cargo was to be loaded in a certain number of days to be subsequently fixed by agreement between the shipowner and the charterer, such days to be colliery working days as defined by a document called a colliery guarantee. The charterparty was quite silent as to demurrage at the port of loading, but it provided that the discharge should be "at the average rate of not less than 100 tons a working day, or to pay demurrage at 4d. per ton register per working day." After this charterparty had been entered into the defendants in the ordinary course made their arrangements with the colliery proprietors for the supply of the coal with which the vessel was to be loaded, and they obtained from the colliery proprietors the undertaking which is called a "colliery guarantee." It is dated February 3, 1898, and by it the colliery proprietors, Davis and Son (Limited), undertake with the defendants to load the Samoena in 15 days, but in the computation of these 15 days it is stipulated that all public holidays and colliers' holidays shall be excluded, and also all time from 5 p.m. on Saturday to 7 a.m. on Monday. This means that in making up the 15 days (days of 24 hours each) holidays and the hours from 5 p.m. to 12 p.m. on Saturdays and from midnight on Sundays to 7 a.m. on Mondays are not to be reckoned. The contract then goes on to provide that "for the purpose of this guarantee all holidays shall be deemed to commence at 5 p.m. the working day preceding and to end at 7 a.m. the working day following such holiday." It is argued that this last provision relates only to the 15 loading days, and not to days on which the vessel may be kept on demurrage; but I do not agree with this contention. The words are "for the purpose of this guarantee." That means for all the purposes of this guarantee, and as will be seen the purposes of the guarantee include, not only the fixing of the lay days, but also the arrangement as to the demurrage, if any. Moreover, the sentence which follows the clause just quoted, and which begins, "In case the vessel, whether in demurrage or not," seems to me to show that this part of the guarantee is not confined to the matter of lay days, but is of general application. The contract then proceeds to deal with the subject of demurrage, and provides, first, as to what the rate shall be. In this case it was to be at £13 per day, and after fixing the rate the contract shows how the demurrage is to be computed—"demurrage is to be in accordance with the above scale, payable per colliery working day." Now, I have no doubt that this means that in computing the demurrage you are to exclude all holidays and all hours from 5 p.m. before a holiday and from midnight to 7 a.m. after a holiday. In this way you get at what is called a colliery working day within the meaning of the guarantee, and you give effect to the words "for the purpose of this guarantee all holidays shall be deemed to commence at 5 p.m. the working day preceding and to end at 7 a.m. the working day following such holiday." So I read the colliery guarantee. Now, when the defendants obtained this document they submitted it to the plaintiffs' broker, who had negotiated the charterparty. At first the number of lay days inserted in the guarantee was 16. To this the broker objected, saying that the ship must be loaded in a shorter time. The result of this remonstrance was that the number of lay days was reduced from 16 to 15. The broker, who had read the whole of the guarantee, then said that he objected on behalf of the shipowners to the rate of demurrage. He said £13 a day was too little, and that the shipowners—that is, the plaintiffs—ought to have 4d. a ton, which would amount to considerably more. The defendants urged that they probably could not get the colliery proprietors to agree to pay such a rate, to which the broker answered that that was the defendants' business, not his. The result was that the defendants agreed to pay the 4d., and to take their chance of getting it from the colliery if they could. This agreement supplemented the charterparty, which, as I have said, was silent on the question of demurrage at the port of loading. It was an agreement made after reading the colliery guarantee; it was made on the basis of that guarantee, and it amounted to this—that the shipowners—the plaintiffs—should be paid demurrage on the basis of the colliery guarantee, with this one exception—viz., that the rate, instead of being £13 a day, should be 4d. per ton per day. I have put my construction on the guarantee, and it is agreed that if my construction is right, and if the plaintiffs contracted to take 4d. a ton calculated on the basis of the guarantee, as I find they did, then the amount paid into Court is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim. I therefore give my judgment for the defendants, with costs. His Lordship added that he understood that there were a great many of these cases, and he thought that it would be in the interests of both shipowners and charterers, and of the colliery proprietors in their turn, if they would all do their best to come to terms. These disputes had unfortunately arisen out of circumstances over which none of these parties had any control, and his Lordship was sure that they would only aggravate their positions by bringing their cases into Court. If they could possibly settle the matters in dispute by agreement amongst themselves that would be the best, cheapest, and most satisfactory way of getting rid of the disputes.

IN RE THE STOCKPORT RAGGED INDUSTRIAL AND REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.*

Charity—Commissioners—Jurisdiction—Exemptions from—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, sec. 62—Consent of Charity Commissioners to mortgage.

Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 302 and [1898] 1 Ch., 610), reversed.

This was an appeal by the Charity Commissioners from a decision of Mr. Justice Stirling, reported ante, p. 302, and (1898) 1 Ch., 610. The matter came before the Court on a petition presented by the trustees of the above-named charity under the provisions of Sir S. Romilly's Act (52 Geo. III., c. 101), asking for the sanction of the Court to a proposed mortgage of part of the property vested in the trustees. The Stockport Industrial Schools were established by a trust deed in 1866, the school buildings being conveyed to trustees upon trust to permit them to be used as a ragged industrial and reformatory school under a committee of management. The trustees were empowered to sell the original buildings and apply the proceeds of sale in providing larger schools. The petition stated that the schools were now unsuitable, and the buildings, though new schools had been built, were too small for the purposes of the trust. Notice had been given by the Government inspectors that unless the buildings were enlarged the number of children must be reduced. Under these circumstances the trustees proposed to sell the old schools and apply the proceeds, together with other moneys in hand and a further sum to be raised upon mortgage of the new premises, in buying a new site and building larger schools. The petition came before the Court on November 6, 1897, when his Lordship gave the necessary sanction, but at that time the Charity Commissioners had not been served with notice of the petition and did not appear. Subsequently they became aware of the order which had been made, and on December 1, 1897, they applied to the Judge to stay the drawing up of the same in order that they might have an opportunity of submitting that the presentation of the petition required their sanction under section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853. The drawing up of the order was accordingly stayed, and the petition was reargued. Mr. Justice Stirling held that the case was within the 62nd section of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1862, which exempts from the operation of the Act, among others, institutions wholly supported by voluntary contributions; and was not taken out of the operation of that section by a proviso at the end of the section that the exemption should not extend to any cathedral, collegiate chapter, or other schools. The Commissioners appealed. The appeal was to determine what the Commissioners considered an important point of law, and they had given their consent and were willing to pay the costs of the institution.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C. and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins were for the Charity Commissioners; Mr. Ingle Joyce for the Attorney-General; and Mr. Henry Johnston for the trustees of the school.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said.—This case, he was sorry to say, turned upon that very obscure enactment the 62nd section of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853. His Lordship was of opinion that upon that, which was treated in the Court below as the main point, and was the most important point in the case—namely, the question whether the proviso at the end of section 62 taking out of the exemption from the operation of the Act "any cathedral, collegiate chapter, or other schools" applied to all schools or only schools of a like character to those specified—the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling was absolutely right. But, in his opinion, on the point that had not been so fully argued before Mr. Justice Stirling, he thought Mr. Justice Stirling had gone wrong. As to the exclusion of all schools from the exemptions contained in section 62, though the Court hesitated to press too far the doctrine of construction, that a phrase was to be cut down by the context—the maxim nositur a sociis—there were cases in which to carry out the obvious intention of an Act or the parties to an instrument that maxim was to be applied, and if ever there was a case to which the maxim was applicable this was one. If all schools were taken out of the exemption, there was no possible use in referring particularly to cathedral, collegiate, and chapter schools; and, on the other hand, the words of the earlier part of the section showed that it was the intention of the Legislature to exclude all Roman Catholic institutions, including Roman Catholic schools. This institution was a charity within the meaning of the Act; but if it came within the operative part of section 62, as it was not within the proviso, the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling was right. That section excluded from the operation of the Act institutions wholly supported by voluntary subscriptions; and, further, where the institution was supported partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income from endowment it enacted that the powers and provisions of the Act should be confined to that part of the charity which was supported by income from endowment. Now, it was to be observed that the circumstances of this case differed from the case "In re Clergy Orphan Corporation" ((1894) 3 Ch., 145; 10 The Times L.R., 672), which Mr. Justice Stirling relied on in that there there was an income from voluntary subscriptions and a building that had been provided out of voluntary subscriptions; but here there was an income from voluntary subscriptions, and one of the buildings was one that was not shown to have been so provided. One view was that an occupation in respect of this rent should be considered as income coming from this property as part of the income supporting the institution, and thus make the consent of the Charity Commissioners necessary to the mortgages; it was not necessary, however, to strain the Act by such a construction. For two cases only were provided for—the case where there was an income wholly from voluntary subscriptions, and the case where there was an income partly from voluntary subscriptions and partly from endowment; but in this case there was also an income from Government grant, payments by guardians and School Boards, and on this ground he held the case to be outside the section altogether. The section, however, was so obscure and difficult to understand that he declined to do more than decide each case as it arose. He would not decide, contrary to the spirit of the Act, that the Charity Commissioners had any jurisdiction over the income arising from voluntary subscriptions. He held that the school building could not be mortgaged without the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY delivered judgment, also holding that Mr. Justice Stirling was right in cutting down the proviso exempting schools from the operation of the section to schools in the nature of cathedral, collegiate, or chapter schools, whatever the meaning of the latter word was, but that the consent of the Charity Commissioners was necessary to mortgaging the school buildings.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

Measure of—Sale of orchid—Breach of war- ranty].—The plaintiff bought at a sale an orchid, which was warranted by the defendant as a Cattleya Aclandiae alba , for 20 guineas. After two years' cultivation by the plaintiff it flowered, and turned out to be an ordinary purple one, which was worth about 7s. 6d. In an action for breach of warranty the County Court Judge found that if the plant had been an alba it would have been worth £50 at the time of sale, but that until it showed its real nature there was no probability that any orchid grower would give more than 20 guineas for it. Held, that the true meaning of the warranty was that if and when the orchid flowered it would flower white, that there had been no breach of the warranty until two years after the sale, and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to judgment for £50 damages. The occupier of the field occasionally doing repairs to the footpath for his own benefit does not necessarily show a liability to repair ratione tenura . A footpath crossed a field in the occupation of the defendant at one point in which there was a stone stile with stone steps. The plaintiff in crossing the stile fell and injured himself owing to the stile having got out of repair. There was evidence that some of the defendant's predecessors had done small repairs to the path and stile. Shortly afterwards, but more than 12 years before the present action was brought, one of the defendants retired from the trust. The remaining trustees continued to pay interest on the mortgage debt. In an action against the defendants, including the trustee who had retired from the trust, to recover the mortgage debt, Held, that, though there was no express covenant by the defendants to repay the principal money, upon the facts of the case the transaction was one of loan from the plaintiffs to the defendants, accompanied by the security of the transferred mortgages, and that therefore the defendants undertook a personal liability. Held, further, that the money advanced by the plaintiffs was charged upon and payable out of land within the meaning of s. 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that therefore the payment of interest by the co-trustees prevented the Statute of Limitations from running as regards the trustee who had retired; and that in such a case s. 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, did not apply.—*BARNES AND ANOTHER V.
